DURING the week the value of foreign gold which arrived here exceeded $4,000,000, and foreign exchange still rules at rates which warrant further imports, although at the close of the week the tone of this market was firmer. The New York banks have difficulty, however, in maintaining their reserve, although in addition to the foreign specie arriving the Treasury continues out of its receipts to return more than $2,500,000 to the loan market each week, by purchasing bonds for the sinking fund. The loans and discounts of the banks of this city now amount to $313,700,000 against about $257,000,000 a year ago, when speculation in every market was "booming." There is now an absence of "boom" in any quarter, but the volume of legitimate business is enormous, as is shown by Clearing-house returns, by the receipts of transportation companies, and by the nearly unanimous reports of business men in a position to speak intelligently. At the Stock Exchange the tendency of prices was upwards until the Maine election, when there was a halt in the "bull speculation," which was followed by depression and what the brokers call a "feverish market." The prominence of the Greenback party in the vote, together with the willingness of the Democrats to stand on the Greenback platform, at least for this election, gave to the victory of the "Fusionists" a financial significance not at all pleasant to holders of securities. U. S. 4 per cents, however, did not decline, although other issues of the Government receded a fraction. The floating stock of U. S. bonds in Wall Street is very small. Silver was very steady in price here and in London; and the bullion value of the "buzzard dollar" at the close was about 87¾ cents.

The Maine election has resulted in the success of a single officer on the Fusion State ticket—the Governor—by a majority of about one thousand, the choice of a Republican Legislature, and the maintenance of the existing complexion of the Congressional delegation. Mixed as is this result, it has cast a damper on the Republican spirits, in spite of the reflection that at the November election it is more than likely that the vote of the State will be given for Garfield. In the moral aspect it appears at first sight shocking that there should not have been a decisive reaction against the frauds exposed last winter, but several considerations will serve to encourage those who lament the decline of New England integrity. In the first place, a certain number of prohibitionists, sufficient, no doubt, to turn the scale, voted for Plaisted, the Fusionist and ex-Republican, with the distinct object of punishing Governor Davis for his want of loyalty to their cause. In the next place, a motive must be found for the continued exile from the party of the eight thousand Republicans who, between 1876 and 1879, went over to the opposition. If part of these were tinctured with the Greenback heresy, another and a very respectable part are known to have been disgusted with Republican management and "magnetism." Governor Davis is a part of the machine which Mr. Blaine still controls, and to it and them there is naturally no diminution of repugnance, whose intensity is shown by its temporary alliance with folly on the currency question and the fraudulent spirit of the Garcelonites. This, it must be confessed, is a much more comforting as well as more plausible theory than that the majority are rascals; and yet we have no doubt that good Republicans generally would prefer to believe Mr. Blaine's explanation, in a despatch to General Garfield, that bribery did it, and that "such scenes were never before witnessed in Maine."

The "news from Maine" is said to have spread a panic among the office-holders in Washington, and no wonder. It has probably spread a panic among them all over the country, because it makes it more likely than ever that they will lose their places. Their case is peculiarly hard owing to the fact that the heavy income-tax levied on them by the Republican Committee differs from an ordinary tax authorized by law, in that it promises no certain return. For the ordinary legal tax the taxpayer is sure to receive the equal protection of the laws and security for the fruits of his industry; while the office-holder's income-tax resembles money put into a lottery ticket, or into the margin of a stock speculation, or into a racing pool. It is in the nature of a bet made on an extremely uncertain event, and the worst of it is that the unfortunate speculator makes the bet against his will. He is somewhat in the position Mr. Belmont's clerks would be if their employer forced them to back his horses out of their salaries. Nay, it is much worse; for the clerks, if the horses were beaten, would only lose the amount they had laid on the race, while if the Federal officers lose they are deprived of their means of livelihood. The time will come when the American people will look back with horror to their permitting or authorizing the agony of suspense and anxiety in which tens of thousands of persons in their employ pass the six months previous to the Presidential election. The mere barbarity of the thing, even if it worked no injury to the state, ought to condemn it in the eyes of any Christian, or even civilized, people. No government which allows an efficient and upright servant to be tortured before every election in order to make the politicians' game more exciting ought in our day to call itself enlightened—without a certain bashfulness of manner, at all events.

The Republican majority in Vermont turns out to have been just about 25,000, and the net gain over the majority of 1876 somewhat more than 1,300. The Greenback vote has thus pretty much been recovered, and we do not know that the election has any other "moral" unless it be the proverbial tenacity of parties in this country—the grand division remaining substantially the same, under changed names, from generation to generation. The latest intelligence from Arkansas leaves it doubtful whether the repudiating amendment has been defeated, though such is probably the case. Nothing seems to have given the better class of Democratic organs more joy lately than this unexpected honesty in a State which long ago flung good faith to the winds. The Boston Post thinks it "a noticeable fact that this noble position was taken and emphasized coincident with a splendid Democratic majority on the State ticket"; but unhappily the ticket was carried by 60,000 majority, while the amendment is doubtfully defeated. Nor is the nobility of Arkansas's present position so obvious. The amendment was passed by a Democratic legislature in accordance with the recommendation, by public resolution, of a Democratic Convention in the summer of 1878, and restrains the General Assembly from ever paying principal or interest on some three millions of funding bonds issued in 1869–70. Moreover, the prohibition merely confirms the past and actual repudiation, so that the creditor of the State, as of the various municipalities which have followed its example, finds not the smallest consolation in the recent election, even supposing the amendment to be rejected. The returns, by the way, are as yet too meagre to permit of their furnishing any test of the probable accuracy of the census. The Republican strength should be, in the absence of a separate ticket, measurable to a degree in the vote on the amendment, as compared with the straight Democratic vote.

General Logan is the only one of the Bosses attached to General Grant's fortunes who has as yet taken any part in the canvass. Mr. Cameron's health continues delicate. Mr. Conkling's attitude puzzles even the inner circle of his henchmen. He was in the same hotel with General Garfield at New York but did not call upon him, and kept himself so close that the committee did not know his whereabouts, and were telegraphing all over the country for him, when he was under the same roof. Since then he has written a letter in which he makes no mention of the Republican candidates, and his intimate friends are not yet able to say whether he will make a speech or not. He probably will make one speech, as in the campaign of 1876. This is all the more curious considering the eagerness he showed at Chicago to bind the delegates in advance to the support of the nominee of the Convention whoever he might be, on pain of expulsion. It of course raises a good deal of doubt whether the nomination of General Arthur was not a blunder after all; that is, whether the expected price will be paid for it. It is not at all unlikely that Mr. Conkling prized it simply as an outward and visible sign of his triumph over his enemies, and cares nothing whatever about its effect on the election. If he should now "go back" on the shrewd men who made it, it will be a veritable contribution to the cause of reform from one of its worst enemies. General Garfield's letter of acceptance was undoubtedly also a bid for "the Chieftain's" support, and the contempt with which the Chieftain treats it is not wholly regrettable. No one ever successfully plays any rôle in public or private life which is not natural to his temperament. General Garfield's proper line is the bluff, frank one, and in trying shrewdness on the old masters of the art he naturally exposes himself to the fate which overtakes amateurs who try to outwit horse-dealers. A horse-dealer, unless an uncommon knave, is usually disarmed by a frank confession of ignorance or simplicity, but has no mercy for those who profess to be a match for him in his own game.

Mr. Sherman, in a speech at Richmond, Indiana, last week, defending General Garfield against an attack made on him by Mr. Hendricks touching his action as a visiting statesman at New Orleans in 1876, said:

"Now, I was present with General Garfield at New Orleans on the occasion referred to, and I, with more knowledge of the facts than Governor Hendricks has, deny that the Returning Board made returns against the men who were elected, and for the men who were not elected; but, on the contrary, the Returning Board, in pursuance of the plain provision of the law of Louisiana, did reject from the election returns those from parishes and districts that were controlled by fraud and violence, and in doing so did their plain duty in strict accordance with the law."

This is not a candid statement of the case. The Returning Board was a judicial body empowered to pass on disputed facts, and it acted in this instance with the knowledge that its decision would determine the result of the Presidential election, or, in other words, would award the Presidency. The law provided that both parties should be represented in the Board, each by at least one member, who should participate in the secret deliberations by which the Board formed its judgment. Secretary Sherman knows that this provision of the law was disregarded in 1876—that the Board was composed exclusively and illegally of Republicans, and these Republicans men of poor reputation and violent partisans; and when he says that in rejecting the election returns from certain parishes which gave Democratic majorities the Board "did its plain duty in strict accordance with the law," he asserts something which he does not know to be true, and something which the established presumptions of the jurisprudence of all civilized countries make probably untrue. The decision of an illegally constituted tribunal, composed of men sitting in their own cause and giving judgment by which they expected greatly to profit, and, as a matter of fact, did profit, is, all over the world, presumptively a corrupt decision. The burden of showing that it is not corrupt lies on the tribunal and its friends. General Garfield is a moralist, which Mr. Sherman does not profess to be, and we hope and believe would not now attempt such a defence as this of the Louisiana doings of 1876.

Mr. Bayard's speech at Columbia, S. C., on the issues of the campaign contains nothing that is very new or original, but deserves attention on account of its characteristic difference from ordinary stump-speeches. It consists mainly of an "arraignment" of the Republicans for their insincerity in pretending to be friends of the negro and of the maintenance of the public credit. How can they be friends of the latter, Mr. Bayard asks, when they make alliance with repudiators in Virginia, and when they are the same party which twenty years ago gave the greenback its legal-tender quality? How can they be friends of the former when they give negroes suffrage in the South while refusing them office in the North, and when they actually take away their votes altogether in the District of Columbia? These arguments have a rather old-fashioned sound, and remind the Northern reader of the days before the war when statesmen of the South used to unmask the pretences of the hypocritical Free-soilers. The insincerity of the Republican party might be better shown in a variety of ways than in those selected by Mr. Bayard. It may be pretty conclusively established, for instance, that a party which insists upon the "Southern question" as the only important one before the country, and at the same time proposes no practical solution of it, must be tainted with insincerity. The affairs connected with the Freedman's Bank also constitute a more serious taint upon the philanthropic record of the party than the fact upon which Mr. Bayard dwells, that the blacks do not get themselves elected to office in Massachusetts or Minnesota. Mr. Bayard's audience seems to have been a good one, and a considerable amount of disappointment has been caused in many newspaper offices by the general calmness of the occasion. There are no accounts of red-shirted men with their belts full of pistols and knives occupying the front seats or platform, and there is almost nothing in the remarks of the orator of the day that will work up well into short sensational campaign paragraphs. It was, like all Mr. Bayard's speeches, addressed chiefly rather to the minds of his hearers than to their passions, and we all know what an odious stumbling-block a speech so addressed is to the paragrapher.

One of the select number of Republican orators who, as we have noted from time to time, take account in their speeches of topics which both parties in Congress ignore, is Mr. S. B. Chittenden. At a large meeting held in the Brooklyn Academy last week he insisted on the main issue being whether Southern statesmanship should again rule the country. An ordinary Stalwart declaimer would have justified his opposition to such a consummation by talk about the undoing of the constitutional amendments, the division of Texas into five States, the payment for the slaves, and the satisfaction of untold Southern claims. Mr. Chittenden did nothing of the sort. He only asked, "Shall the loyal States now surrender to the solid South and New York City the supervision and revision of the national credit, currency, tariff, internal revenue and civil service?" From the repudiation practices of the Southern States he argued the danger of entrusting the national credit to the control of the same section. As to the currency, he said, what is perfectly true, that "the South has held the balance of power and practical control of the House of Representatives for nearly six years, and during all that time has supported with great force the wildest and most inflammable currency projects"; adding, "I can count on the fingers of one hand the Southern men in the House who, in these late years, influentially opposed inflation and favored specie payments." Moreover, "the South in Congress is crazy on the silver question," about which Mr. Chittenden had some timely remarks. If in these he failed to reproach his own party for their share in the present silver inflation, it was evidently by oversight. "The South," he continued, "is confused and impracticable in respect to the tariff and internal-revenue laws. So is the North; so is the New York Chamber of Commerce. . . . But the argument against putting this business into the hands of the solid South is strong and unanswerable in proportion to the difficulties and importance of the subject." Finally, "the solid South and Tammany fairly abhor the faint glimmer of civil-service reform begun in good faith by President Hayes to meet a manifest danger, and promise to substitute for it a system of spoils for the victor." Here again Mr. Chittenden was candid: "It is but fair to admit that some Republicans also ridicule civil-service reform. Nor do the most intimate friends of the President boast much of his success." Nevertheless, "if this work of reform is to go on, the Republicans must push it."

The "exposures" of the week have not been numerous or important. The Tribune, however, has managed to show up a Democratic Congressman, named Beltzhoover, who wrote a letter regretting the hostility of the present Democratic House to pension bills, and subsequently denied having done so. E. W. Curriden, it seems, wrote to Beltzhoover, asking him to introduce some such bill, and received in reply a letter in which Beltzhoover used the following striking language: "With the present Democratic House pension bills do not have much favor," adding that "the Rebel general who is at the head of the Pension Committee in the Senate is still more averse to allowing any such bills to pass." This letter having found its way into the columns of the Tribune, Beltzhoover denounced it as an "infamous forgery," basing his denial apparently upon an immaterial suppression of a sentence at the close. This enables the Tribune, first, to show that Beltzhoover "lies, knowingly and wilfully"; second, to use the letter as an admission by a Democratic Congressman that the Democratic party is opposed to pension bills, and, inferentially, that the Democrats hate Union soldiers; thus providing a strong argument why the "soldier vote" should not be cast for Hancock. Curiously enough the Democratic newspapers, instead of retorting that there are many good reasons why pension bills as a class should be closely scrutinized by Congress, seem to be utterly at a loss for any answer, except that Curriden must be a very mean sort of person to let the cat out of the bag; which is true but irrelevant. There is no doubt that the Democratic conscience on the subject of Union soldiers is very sensitive.

We need not call attention to the reply, on another page, to the speech of our friend the Republican emissary at the South. Its moderation and humor will commend it even to those who feel how much still remains to be said on both sides of the debate. For our own part, we could ask no better illustration of the crying need of civil-service reform than our correspondent furnishes in showing how the maintenance of the present Federal office-holders in his State, under the existing political system, handicaps one party in State and municipal elections, with which, of course, these functionaries have no proper concern whatever. Precisely the same thing is true in South Carolina, under the auspices of the Treasury Department, represented by the corrupt Elliott. Now, we have never recommended tolerance of such abuses, but we have insisted that it is more important to change the system than to change the men, and in this we are glad to see that we have the support of a "Virginia Democrat," whose letter immediately follows Mr. Hilton's.

The approaching Democratic Convention to nominate a candidate for the vacancy in the Court of Appeals of this State is of unusual importance, and it is greatly to be hoped that the Bar will make some effort to force the politicians into nominating a good lawyer. The Court at present, though it disposes of business quickly, has a very crowded calendar, and can hardly be called a strong court. Public confidence in it was never very greatly shaken by the political attacks made upon its decisions at the time of the Tweed litigation; but it cannot be denied that the late chief judge was too much of a politician for the perfect discharge of judicial duties. Judge Rapallo has announced in a very frank way that he is a candidate for the vacancy, and, whatever objections there may be to him, his positive professional qualifications for the position are of the first order. He is, in fact, a very excellent judge, whose opinions not only display absolute freedom from political influence, but unusual judicial ability as well. If the Democrats can find any one who would be even probably an improvement upon Judge Rapallo they will be very fortunate. If the Bar does not make some effort in the matter they are not likely even to take the trouble to attempt it.

Mr. Fawcett, the present Postmaster-General in England, has proposed an ingenious and probably very useful supplement to the post-office savings-banks. The number of post-office banks is still limited. In some counties there are only a few, and of course in the country districts they are at some distance from the homes of depositors, and they take no deposits under a quarter of a dollar. Consequently, a great many pence are wasted, simply because the owner does not happen to have enough for a deposit, or, if he has enough, is not willing to take the trouble to go to the office. Mr. Fawcett now proposes to supply forms gratis, to which penny stamps can be attached, and when a form bears twelve stamps credit will be given at the post-office for one shilling to the owner. A man can in this way really make deposits of a penny at a time by buying stamps from any one who happens to keep them. The importance of this lies in the fact that the English laboring population is confessedly the least thrifty in Europe. Foresight and frugality seem to have been killed outright amongst them by the Elizabethan poor-laws, and it will take much time and fostering, both by legislation and education, to restore them.

The conflict of the French Government with the religious orders seems to have entered on a new phase, through a speech of M. de Freycinet, at Montauban, in which he announced that the decree of expulsion would be enforced against the Jesuits only, and that with regard to the others nothing would be done until the passage of a general law regulating the status of all the religious societies. The original arrangement was that all orders, except the Jesuits, would have to submit their rules for the approval of the Government, and their fate was to depend on their doing this and obtaining the approval. M. de Freycinet's announcement has caused a vehement outcry from the Radical Republican and the reactionary press, both of which treat it as a retreat, and the severe criticism bestowed on it by the République Française, Gambetta's paper, has led to the report that Gambetta is so much opposed to the new programme that it will have to be abandoned; but this is stoutly denied.

The issue of a ukase by the Czar, some weeks ago, dissolving the High Commission to which the Government was committed during the Nihilist excitement, and suppressing the famous "Third Section" of the Imperial Chancellery—which had charge of the secret police, and whose mandates overrode all law—transferring the control of the police to the Minister of the Interior, and making General Loris Melikoff Minister of the Interior, appears to be accepted by the Russian press as the close of the late troubles. What is most gratifying about the situation is that it has been brought about in the main by conciliation, and that the Government in abolishing the "Third Section" has not been afraid to acknowledge that the malcontents had some reason in their complaints.

The Prussian National-Liberal party has been sadly demoralized of late by the manner in which Prince Bismarck has turned his back on it. Part of it has continued to support him, rather through habit than from conviction; but the main body has been greatly discouraged and perplexed. An open split has now taken place in its ranks. The secessionists, who refuse to make any terms with the Government, have issued a manifesto at Dantzig, in which they declare that they will support the right of the national representation and labor to found and uphold, both in Prussia and Germany, real parliamentary government, will advocate in the field of public economy the policy of free-trade, and will oppose all modifications in the Falk laws, either as regards the relations of church and state or education and ecclesiastical discipline. This is really the original programme of the party, which its right wing has abandoned in the vain hope of getting the best of a new bargain with the Chancellor. Some of its members he has of late been luring on with hopes of high office, but he has taken care to keep them in a state of expectancy thus far.

The Powers are still trying to get Turkey to surrender Dulcigno to the Montenegrins, and Turkey is still trying not to do it, but is, nevertheless, apparently somewhat nearer doing it than a week ago. The Turkish troops have seized one Albanian position and repulsed an attempt to retake it, which is a good sign as far as it goes. The combined fleet has at last assembled off the coast, so that the naval "demonstration" has begun, but how far it will go—that is, whether it will end in the actual use of force—appears to be still uncertain. There are rumors, and likely ones, that the French ships have orders to retire as soon as a shot is fired. It is hoped that this display of force will satisfy the Sultan's religious scruples, and those of his Mussulman subjects, about surrendering part of the soil of Islam, which the Sacred Law forbids except under overwhelming necessity. He probably hopes to fare better on the Greek question, as in that the fleet can do nothing, and he trusts that the Powers will never agree sufficiently to land troops. The only advance made in the solution of the reform problem in Asia Minor is the presentation of a collective note, which "criticises" severely the account recently given by the Porte of the state of things in Armenia. The Porte is, however, prepared to submit to the most destructive criticism of its state papers, being in fact quite used to it, as long as no attempt is made to embody the criticism in action. We are glad to see our State Department is pressing for the punishment of the murderers of Dr. Parsons, the American missionary. But it must be prepared for a long siege. The murderer of Colonel Commeraoff, the Russian, though convicted months ago, has not been hanged yet.

THE TARIFF IN THE CANVASS.

THERE is nothing on which the two parties now in the field come so near joining issue as the tariff. The Democratic platform declares the party to be in favor of a tariff for revenue only, while the Republican platform declares the party to be in favor of a tariff for the protection of native industry. The difference is a very important one, and we might fairly expect that it would lead to a great deal of discussion of the tariff on the stump. As a matter of fact, there has been hardly any discussion of it at all. "A tariff for revenue only" is a term of uncertain meaning, but no Democratic orator has attempted, so far as our observation has gone, to fix the sense in which the Democratic party uses it. It may mean, and in Democratic mouths probably does mean, a tariff of low duties on all or nearly all the articles now dutiable, leaving the required amount of revenue to be made up by the increase of importation. But it may also mean a tariff like that of Great Britain, which would raise the required revenue on a very few articles, partly of luxury and partly of prime necessity. Either of these modes of raising the revenue would involve changes which would very seriously affect most of the industries now in operation, and for which the country could only be prepared and ought to be prepared by very full and minute discussion. Of any such discussion we do not hear a word from any Democratic orator. We know of no Democratic politician who appears to have given any special attention to the subject, or, indeed, to be particularly interested in it, or whom the public, if won over to the change, would be willing to trust to draft legislation for the purpose of bringing it about.

"A tariff for protection" is also a term of very vague import. The present tariff was not enacted as such a tariff. It was, as originally imposed, a scheme devised in haste, in a time of great national anxiety and distress, for raising the largest possible amount of money by any means which came to hand. Accordingly, it consisted of a string of duties clapped on everything of which the legislature could hear or think as likely to be brought for sale to this country by foreigners. It bore, in fact, in the beginning, the appearance of an attempt at that general prohibitory protection under which every branch of native industry received the same amount of encouragement from the state and was forbidden to deal with foreigners; and the growth of trade was thus left dependent on increase of population by immigration and by the surplus of births over deaths. It has since then undergone some slight revision, both by the reduction of duties on some articles and the addition to the free list of articles from which practically no duties were received. But it still remains in the main a war-tariff, framed without any careful or effective preparation for the function of protection. As long as the great government expenditures lasted, and the currency continued to expand, and vast additions to the working capital of the country were made by foreign loans for railroads, its defects as a protective tariff were concealed from the public. When these stimuli were withdrawn, seven years after the war, it was found that the tariff did not protect—that is, it kept out foreign goods, but it did not keep native industry from languishing. No worse years of depression have been witnessed since 1837 than the six years following the panic of 1873. No branch of industry escaped. In fact, the failure of the tariff as an instrument of protection—i.e., of support and encouragement—seemed so complete that the leading free-traders came forward in every direction to point to the condition of the country as a demonstration by experiment of the soundness of their position, and very few protectionists had the courage to gainsay them. No protectionist picture of the probable consequences of free-trade was more woful than that which the country actually presented after thirteen years' experience of as high a tariff as any protectionist called for. The iron manufacture, the cotton manufacture, and all their tributaries and dependencies were utterly prostrated. Capital lay idle in great masses in all the great cities, and the newspapers teemed with exhortations to the city population to go back to agriculture, in sheer hopelessness about the near future of manufactures and exchange. The revival which has since come about cannot have been due to the tariff, according to the received laws of thought, because the tariff was in operation when the depression came. It has doubtless been due to the increased stability of the currency; to the growth of population acting on the vast untouched resources opened up by the new railroads made before the panic; to the extraordinary demands for agricultural produce created in Europe, partly by bad harvests in that region and partly by the increased and increasing cheapness with which improved means of transportation enable the American producer to supply European markets. We have thus had a demonstration that the tariff as it stands is not a defence against overwhelming commercial disaster, and that in fact it is not an efficient protective tariff, because the object of a protective tariff is not to prevent foreigners, as such, from selling in the home markets, but to make the home markets profitable for natives, no matter who sells in them.

It would seem to be a fair and plain enough deduction from all this that the tariff as it now stands is by no means a perfect instrument, and will bear considerable revision in the direction of providing a foreign market somewhere which will prevent the recurrence of the tremendous collapse of 1873–9. For that collapse there was apparently no cure but the general growth of the country. The home market having failed the American manufacturer he had no other in reserve to help him out of his difficulty, because the tariff as it had existed from 1861 had cut him off from all relations with foreign countries, civilized and barbarous, so completely that even American ships, like the Chinese junks, were confined to the coasting trade of their own country. There is already a large and increasing exportation of agricultural products to Europe, but the foreign market for American manufactures is still small. What there is is so much talked of mainly because there was previously none at all, but it is undoubtedly capable of being fostered and enlarged by a readjustment of the tariff with reference to the cheap production of goods, rather than to the taxation of them simply. There is probably no industry of the world growing more rapidly than the carrying trade, owing to the opening up of the whole globe to traffic of one sort or another; but in this we have now no share whatever, except along our own coast, although there is capital and enterprise enough in the country to give the United States the second, if not the first, place in it. A revision of the tariff in the interest of real protection—that is, as an assistance to American citizens in getting much profit out of any lawful business—would give the United States this place very rapidly, but the only change in this direction as yet proposed by Republican politicians is the plan of having the Government pay people salaries for engaging in the shipping business. There is, indeed, no talk from that quarter on the stump of any possibility of improving the tariff in any way, or of revising it or adapting it to the new conditions of trade created by the changes of the last twenty years. Many industries are now willing to admit that they do not need so much protection; others have been proved to stand in no need of it at all; others, again, have shown they do not deserve it; others still are ready to show that with some slight shifting of the incidence of taxation they can flourish instead of languishing. But one gets no indication of this state of things from the Republican stump. Although it is only one year since the country arose from a deep and prolonged season of depression, the orators all talk as if nothing of the kind could occur under our present fiscal arrangements. The world changes rapidly, and has changed prodigiously since 1861, but they make little change in their wares, and offer us "the Solid South" and the tariff of 1861 as good old stand-bys which time cannot wither nor custom stale.

RUMANIA BETWEEN THE KAISERS AND THE CZAR.

A WEIGHTY rumor has got abroad, and confirmations of it are repeated, that at the recent princely and diplomatic meetings at Vienna, Ischl, and Friedrichsruhe an agreement was matured, under Bismarck's auspices, by which Rumania formally joins the alliance between the Emperors of Germany and Austria-Hungary, and is in return guaranteed integrity and independence, besides being raised to the dignity of a kingdom. Italy, too, is said to be ready to enter the alliance, having arranged with Austria their mutual external relations in regard to the territories of the Balkan Peninsula bordering on the Adriatic. Servia, wedged in between Rumania, Hungary, and Bosnia —which Austria now holds—must, voluntarily or not, place herself under the protectorate of the chief allies, and Russia is thus completely shut out from the Peninsula, as her only communications by land with the Slavic populations she has delivered are through Rumanian territory, and her connections through the Black Sea are highly precarious. If the reiterated statements are true, and Italy is to make the affair a quadruple alliance, this contrivance of Bismarck has more than one aspect, and its bearings will be gravely considered in Paris no less than in St. Petersburg. If only a triple alliance has been formed, or is being formed, the move is exclusively directed against Russia, yet its significance and importance are unusually great. It cannot fail to aggravate the tension already existing between the governments of the Czar and the allied Kaisers, and it can easily push matters in Eastern Europe to a violent crisis. The Polish question is looming up as another complication of incalculable gravity between Austria-Hungary, backed by Germany, on one side, and Russia on the other. In this article, however, only Rumania's position and probable or possible attitude will receive a cursory consideration.

Rumania, which consists of Moldavia, Wallachia, and the recently added Dobrudja, but to the chief component parts of which formerly also belonged Bukowina, annexed a century ago by Austria, and Bessarabia, taken by Russia in 1812, owes her deliverance from the Turkish yoke to the wars of the Czars against the Sultans, and her unity to the influence of the late Emperor of the French. The treaties of peace which Russian arms forced Turkey to conclude at Kainarji in 1774, at Jassy in 1792, at Bucharest in 1812, at Akerman in 1826, and at Adrianople in 1829, all secured autonomous rights to the Christian Principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, and the last-named peace even deprived the former masters, the Turks, of the right of permanent abode in them. The same treaties, however, also gradually established a Russian protectorate over them; and that the policy of St. Petersburg contemplated deliverance and protection first and annexation to Russia next, nobody doubted at Jassy or Bucharest any more than at the Foreign Offices of Vienna, Paris, or London. Austrian and West-European diplomacy checked the efforts of the Czars to break up the Ottoman Empire, and Russian diplomacy and armed intervention, in their turn, stifled the repeated attempts of the Moldo-Wallachian patriots to achieve a union of the Principalities and constitutional liberty. The Hospodars were by turns tools and opponents of Russia. The people were grateful to the Czars for freeing them from Moslem oppression and Fanariote extortion, but feared and often felt their despotic rule, and, though Orthodox Greek Christians like the Russians, they trembled at the idea of being absorbed by the latter, with whom they had no national affinity, while both their Romanic blood and liberal aspirations made them turn their eyes toward France. Finally, Napoleon III., having humbled Russia at Sebastopol, and being as anxious to erect a Latin barrier against Slav predominance in the East as he afterwards showed himself to strengthen the Latin race against the Anglo-Saxon by creating the throne of Maximilian in Mexico, took up the cause of Rumanian union, and under his auspices the Principalities became formally united, as a semi-independent state, in 1861. Alexander Couza, however, who was the first Prince of Rumania, was driven from his throne by a revolution in February, 1866, and was succeeded by Charles of Hohenzollern, a protégé of Bismarck, to whose royal master he was related, and a brother of the prince whose candidature for the Spanish throne was in 1870 to drive Napoleon to his fatal declaration of war against Germany. Her complete independence Rumania purchased at the price of blood profusely shed in the Russo-Turkish war of 1877, at the reduction of Plevna. That their timely aid rendered that reduction possible, and saved Czar Alexander from failure and disgrace, the Rumanians probably deem a full equivalent for the services rendered them by that monarch and his predecessors—not without selfish ulterior purposes—and they now undoubtedly feel morally free to choose friends and allies according to their own interests exclusively. Besides, they were, at the end of the war, badly wounded in their national pride, by being forced to cede to Russia that portion of Bessarabia which, by the Treaty of Paris in 1856, had been incorporated with Moldavia, and to accept as a compensation for that Rumanian district non-Rumanian Dobrudja.

Whether or not Rumania can, without a breach of gratitude, renounce her friendly relations with Russia and join an alliance purposely formed against that Empire, she would undoubtedly—as nations generally act—heed only her own interests, if these were clear and uniformly appreciated by her statesmen and people. This is, however, far from being the case. The Rumanians are agitated by considerations both of the future security and independence and of the future greatness of their country, and these considerations lead them politically in opposite directions. Their Principality of five million inhabitants, of whom nine-tenths are Rumanians, is now threatened in its integrity and independence only by the constantly-expanding Empire of the Czars, which, if it ever realizes its purpose or dream of uniting under its sceptre all the Slavs of Europe, including Bulgarians and Serbs, must necessarily, though perhaps involuntarily, crush and absorb Rumania, a Latin oasis in the midst of the Slavic world. The only empire which can save her from this fate, if the Panslavic struggle is to rage, is the neighboring Austria-Hungary, whose leading nationalities, the German and Hungarian, are equally threatened by the Slavic expansion. What is more natural, then, for Rumania than to seek the powerful protection of allied Austria and Germany, and, until Russia's ambition is curbed, to form a bulwark of the non-Slavic world between the invaders and their natural friends and helpers, such as the Magyars form on their side of the Carpathians? This policy, however, demands the giving up by the Rumanians of their long-cherished expectation of some day—perhaps in a not remote future—founding a great "Dacian" realm, a main component part of which is to consist of Transylvania and the adjoining parts of Hungary proper, together inhabited by more than two million Rumanians. These provinces—such is the plan as long ago formed, and zealously urged, both in Bucharest and Moscow—are to be torn from the domains of the Hungarian crown by insurrection and invasion, with the aid of Russia. If successful, such a revolution would break up Austria-Hungary, destroy the Magyar nationality, establish Russia's Panslavic reign, and leave her generous enough to tolerate the existence of an independent Dacian kingdom of eight millions. The execution, however, of this vast scheme must meet with immense obstacles, the principal of which are the backing of Austria-Hungary by Germany, the desperate resistance which the Magyars will offer to attempts on their national existence, their known bravery, and the stupendous rampart of the Carpathians which encircles their kingdom and fatally separates the Rumanians of Transylvania from their brethren in Rumania—just as the Pyrenees separate the Basques of France from their brethren in the Basque Provinces of Spain. To attain security from a peril which may any day become imminent, Rumania must rely upon Russia's natural enemy, Austria; to win the prize of greatness at some future day she must become the tool of Russia against her own natural protector. Regard for safety points one way, national ambition points the other. Each policy has its zealous adherents in the Principality. There is a Russian and there is an anti-Russian party, as there have always been, though under banners and with aims different from those of the present.

Between the supporters of the two diametrically opposite tendencies stand men of a third party, the party of neutrality. Correctly appreciating the position of Rumania, between the great Slavic empire in the East and the Germanic powers of Central Europe, to be perfectly analogous to the position of Belgium between France and Germany, and considering at what immense price of blood and virtual dependence their nation must buy security on the one side or additional acquisitions on the other, if it is to share in the great strife to come, they see the only rational course in a consistent and firm neutrality, like Belgium's. Such an attitude, even if not secured by treaties, might serve to prevent the storm from passing over Rumania; if too feeble to oppose, it would still allow her to re-erect herself after it had passed and live in peace with the victors. Though too weak for self-aggrandizement, she could become prosperous and influential through commerce and agriculture, as Belgium has become through industry. And as for Transylvania, there are still the varying chances of the future. Wars and revolutions might, without Rumania's initiative and peril, throw it into her lap, if the laws of geography permit it. This is the counsel of moderate men, and such counsels, whether the wisest or not, one would have expected to prevail with Prince Charles's Government. It was hardly presumable that he would adopt the revolutionary schemes of the Chauvinists of Moscow and Bucharest, and cast in his lot among the fanatical foes of his own nation for the sake of a distant object which may prove to be entirely visionary; but neither could his influence have been deemed strong enough to give a direction to the popular will completely at variance with its national and religious prejudices, leanings, and aspirations, however conformable to far-seeing statesmanship and the dictates of the present arbiter of Europe's destinies, Prince Bismarck. If Prince Charles has, in fact, persuaded his Cabinet and people to follow him definitely in the latter direction, his personal abilities and statecraft must have been greatly underrated, and a great movement has taken place on the diplomatic chess-board of Europe, the importance of which may speedily develop itself—outside of Rumania, which will merely rise in rank.

ENGLISH JOURNALISM.—V.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

LONDON, August, 1880.

THE Daily Telegraph in 1880 will complete the twenty-fifth year of its existence. It is, with one exception, the youngest of all the London morning newspapers. Its growth has been rapid, and its success, as a commercial enterprise at least, is without parallel since the period at which the Times became the leading journal of Europe and of the world. Like its older contemporary, the Daily Telegraph made a false start and had a ricketty infancy, in which extinction seemed more than once probable. Its originator was a certain Colonel Sleigh, one of those military men who for some mysterious reason exchange soldiering for literary and commercial adventures, in which they often lay the foundations of enterprises upon which more fortunate speculators build a large and substantial superstructure of success. The Daily Telegraph was set on foot by Colonel Sleigh in 1855, under the title of the Daily Telegraph and Courier. Colonel Sleigh was almost always borrowing money when he was not spending it, and among his creditors there happened to be at a certain time Mr. Joseph Moses Levi, a printer and the proprietor of a Sunday newspaper, which still exists, oddly enough devoted, like most Sunday newspapers, to sporting and to theatricals, and known by the name of the Sunday Times. Colonel Sleigh's debts were usually bad debts, and in discharge of one of them he made to Mr. Levi what would then be considered the bad payment of the Daily Telegraph and Courier. The paper in its new hands underwent many vicissitudes, and was more than once in danger of coming to a stop for want of resources. But the difficulties were tided over, creditors were paid as Mr. Levi had been paid by Colonel Sleigh, by means of shares in the paper, and found themselves in the course of a few years deriving incomes which it is a mistake to call princely, but which many princes would willingly exchange for their own revenues.

The Daily Telegraph was started as a twopenny paper, but Mr. Levi had the sagacity to reduce its price to a penny. Its present position is to be attributed entirely to the sagacity and energy of a single family. The journalistic faculty which Mr. Joseph Moses Levi possessed was simply the faculty of business management, but it was what modern art critics would call supreme, and it has been handed down with the addition of considerable literary perception to his son, Mr. Edward Levi Lawson, who is now the editor and manager of the Daily Telegraph. Mr. Lawson and his predecessor and associates in the conduct of the Daily Telegraph afford the most striking English illustration of a phenomenon common enough in Europe, and probably in America, too, of Jewish ascendency in all the arts in which success depends upon the skilful management of men and manipulation of opinion. Mr. Lawson is to journalism in England what Lord Beaconsfield is to statesmanship, what the Rothschilds are to finance, and what the late Lady Waldegrave (the daughter, as it may be remembered, of the Jewish singer Braham—originally Abraham, shortened) was to society. "The snub-nosed Franks," as Lord Beaconsfield has called the English people, are no match for their Oriental rivals in those arts of which journalism is one. The Orontes did not flow with a stronger current into the Tiber than the Jordan has flowed into the Thames. The subtle and sympathetic, and yet not sensitive, Hebrew character enables it to throw itself with promptitude and with completeness of transformation, or at any rate with consummate dramatic art of impersonation, into the moods of the people among whom the chosen race finds itself. The Jews in England, in France, and in Germany are more English, French, and German than the English, French, and Germans themselves. They exaggerate, as actors on the stage do, the passions and the purposes which they simulate, and the extravagances of art are more potent in their appeal to the public feeling than the modesty of nature would be. The Daily Telegraph, which was not Liberal, but simply Gladstonean, under Mr. Gladstone's administration, was not Conservative, but simply Disraelite, under Lord Beaconsfield's. It casts itself into the current of personal and popular feeling which may be flowing most strongly for the moment, and it has done so with a success which has never been surpassed in the records of journalistic pliancy since the earliest triumphs of the Times were won.

But the success of the Daily Telegraph has not been due solely or even principally to its political tactics. To it belongs the distinction of having enlarged, legitimately or otherwise, the sphere of journalism. It included in its descriptive articles and in its social leaders a range of topics which were thought to be below the level of newspaper cognizance. The old absurdity about the dignity of history, which Macaulay and Carlyle, in England, and Michelet, in France, exploded both by precept and by example, had its counterpart in journalism. As historians thought it would be a disparagement to their vocation to describe anything below the lives and deaths and actions of kings, the debates and councils and the wars of nations, so newspapers, being of the high-and-dry order, used to confine themselves to solemn leading articles upon political topics, to reports of proceedings in Parliament and in law-courts, and to foreign correspondence dealing with topics abroad as topics at home were dealt with. A school of historians arose which found in the daily life of the people, in their sufferings and amusements and vicissitudes, a worthier theme than in the formal records of the fortunes of kings and the rise and fall of statesmen. The Daily Telegraph did more than any other newspaper to effect a similar development in journalism. It was the business of the stage in Shakspere's time, or at any rate in Shakspere's conception, to hold the mirror up to nature. It is now the business of the newspapers to hold the mirror up to the world and to society. Their material, like the farrago of Juvenal's book, consists of everything that men do. Descriptions of the people in their homes and taking their pleasure, sketches of low life and high life, pictures of men in their several abodes and pursuits, of the crowds which fill the streets or the solitude of rural life, of trades and professions, of churches and theatres, of royal ceremonies and the people who frequent them, of military reviews and popular tea-gardens, public rejoicings and public executions, of eminent men and notorious criminals—these are but a fragment of the subjects and illustrative examples of the topics with which daily newspapers, following in the main the example of the Daily Telegraph, now deal. It cannot be doubted that the change is immensely for the better. The future historian, if we are to take account of a person who may perhaps be very well left to take care of himself, will find a great deal more for his purpose in the columns of the modern and cheaper press than in those of journals of the older and severer type. Even the descriptions of eminent persons, the accounts which are given of the dress which statesmen wear, the gestures which they use, the attitudes in which they sit, the incidents which give meaning to the dryness of ordinary parliamentary reporting, possess a value which only stupid pedantry will disparage. Mr. Carlyle would give anything to know as much of the manners and appearance, the clothes even, and the daily ways, of the subjects of his history and biography as the descriptive reporter tells the morning newspaper reader of Lord Beaconsfield or Mr. Gladstone. The images by which the distinguished men of former days lived before us are made up mainly of these despised details. The slender figure and stooping attitude of Tiberius, the blotches and the plasters which disfigured his face, were elements in the image of that mysterious character of which Tacitus did not disdain to avail himself. He used them without sneering, as our superfine lovers of the dry bones of contemporary history are prone to do, at the contemporary observers who supplied them. This is merely an illustration, to which it would be easy to add others. It shows that modern journalism in what are thought to be its excesses and extravagances of personal and social description is simply erring, if it errs at all, in the way in which the greatest historians of the past and present have erred, and in which the historians of the future will be grateful for the opportunity of erring.

Of course when a new feature or principle is introduced into journalism, or anything else, it is apt to be pushed to excess, and descriptive reporting has no doubt been occasionally, and it may even be said habitually, overdone in the Daily Telegraph. There has been often too much of a disposition to hold up to vice its own image, and to take it for granted that things which are necessarily done may therefore be fittingly described. The mirror which is held up to nature and to the world ought to be a discriminating mirror. There are things which it should decline to reflect; and the line has not always been correctly drawn. But the Daily Telegraph, it must be admitted, commenced a healthy reformation. In regard to society and to politics it was, as compared with the older form of journalism, what a naturalist of the fields and of the woods is to the naturalist of books merely and scientific memoirs. It brought itself into close relations with statesmen and political leaders at home; its correspondents found their way into courts and ministerial ante-chambers abroad, and dealt directly with foreign rulers and politicians. The intimate relations which during the Second Empire existed between the late Mr. Whitehurst, who was the resident correspondent of the Telegraph in Paris, and the court of Napoleon III. are an example of the tactics which the Daily Telegraph, in its dealings with great persons at home and abroad, has pursued with some success and with some rebuffs and failures, but on the whole with a decided advantage to itself and to its readers.

The newspaper genius of Mr. Levi and Mr. Lawson has been shown in an eminent degree in their selection of the persons to whom they have confided political and literary work on their journal. Probably the writer to whom the Daily Telegraph owes as much as any other is Mr. Edwin Arnold, a gentleman from whom have proceeded most of those extravagances of phrase and of sentiment which have gained for it the admiration of tens of thousands of readers and the scorn of a handful of critics. Mr. Arnold adds the experience of a traveller to whom the East and Europe are alike familiar, respectable scholarship of the Oxford type, and the imagination and eloquence of a rhetorician who is almost a poet. It is he who has sung in dithyrambic strains of sincere and passionate though fleeting conviction the praises now of Mr. Gladstone and now of Lord Beaconsfield. It was he who, Mænad-like, flung the torches of a fiery Jingoism, and performed the wild dances of an almost demoniac inspiration, during the crisis and agony of the Eastern Question. But Mr. Arnold is capable of writing quietly and gracefully upon subjects which touch the home-life of the English people, and even, it is said, of illustrating scientific discoveries with a graphic and almost poetic pen.

Next to Mr. Arnold, and perhaps some would say even more than to Mr. Arnold, the Telegraph owes its popularity to the leading articles of Mr. George Augustus Sala, who discourses in its columns of everything under the sun, and contributes from a copiously-stored memory and commonplace-book facts and fancies, anecdote and learning, to throw light upon the incidents and whimsicalities of the day. Perhaps, however, Mr. Sala's brilliant style, his remarkable powers of observation, of description, and that penetrating good sense which is the real basis of all these exterior gifts, are more conspicuously shown in the letters which he has written to the Telegraph in and from almost all nations of the Old World and the New. Mr. W. H. Russell, whose reputation is more closely associated with the Times than with the Daily Telegraph, is a newly-gained recruit to the latter journal, who brings to it something more than the fame of past performances. Among the political writers for the Daily Telegraph mention must be made of Mr. George Hooper, a civilian whose writings on military history possess a strategical and tactical value which military critics have been the first to acknowledge. Like Cassio, and like a good many closet-soldiers, Mr. Hooper knows only the "bookish theoric" of the art of warfare, but then his acquaintance with it is probably greater than that which many professors in military colleges can boast. The editor of the Globe in its better and Palmerstonian period, Mr. Hooper adds large political knowledge to his more special acquirements in military art. Another of the leader-writers for the Daily Telegraph is Mr. Wilson—the Wilsons swarm on the London press—who divides the labors of the Gallery leader-writer with Mr. Hooper. Other writers of leading and descriptive articles are Mr. Phil. Robinson (the author of 'Our Indian Garden'); Mr. Drew Gay, lately its correspondent in the East; Mr. Godfrey Turnor; and Mr. Clement, who is its dramatic critic. The musical critic of the Daily Telegraph is Mr. Joseph Barnett. Nor ought the name of the Hon. Frank Lawley to be omitted, an accomplished writer, sportsman, and man of business, who began as private secretary to Mr. Gladstone during his earlier Chancellorship of the Exchequer.

ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT'S LETTERS TO HIS BROTHER WILLIAM.

BERLIN, August, 1880.

YOU will probably remember the great sensation which, twenty years ago, was created by the publication of the correspondence between Alexander von Humboldt and Varnhagen von Ense. Full of interesting gossip, rich in slanders of persons in high life, independent in its sovereign critique, and attractively interwoven with important questions of a scientific character, the book could not fail to be translated into almost all modern languages and to find hundreds of thousands of eager readers. A young and enterprising firm of your city, Messrs. Rudd & Carleton, in spite of a London translation, published a translation of their own. While engaged in his work their translator received repeated calls from prominent New York gentlemen, historians, poets, and travellers, who were eager to learn whether Humboldt had really made disparaging statements about their personal characters and their writings. Grim old Count Gurowski had repeated over and over again, in some of the New York clubs, that Humboldt had exposed the utter hollowness of several American authors. Of course, not a word of Gurowski's insinuations was true, but the excitement caused by them was great.

Comical as this incident in New York may have been, the book produced a very deplorable effect in Berlin. The then Prince Regent, the present King and Emperor William, was just about to sign a decree directing the purchase by the Prussian Government of all the property, including books, collections, and manuscripts, of Humboldt, in order to keep it in its old place in the Oranienburger Strasse, in Berlin, and to make it the nucleus of a great natural museum, to be called the "Humboldt Museum." Just at this moment the correspondence with Varnhagen was published, and a courtier hinted to the Prince that Humboldt had very disrespectfully made mention of him, several times alluding to him as a very insignificant, if not stupid, drill-sergeant, who was entirely unqualified for his high position. Upon this information the Prince did not sign the decree, and the Humboldt estate was sold under the hammer. It would, of course, have been much better if the Varnhagen correspondence had never been published, the more so as its literary value is not at all extraordinary.

The present collection ('Briefe Alexanders von Humboldt an seinen Bruder Wilhelm, herausgegeben von der Familie von Humboldt in Ottmachau: Stuttgart, J. G. Cotta'sche Buchhandlung. 1880') is of a far greater calibre; but, as it gives little or no personal gossip, it has been less noticed than its predecessor of 1860, to which, nevertheless, it is in every respect superior. It thus meets with the fate of former valuable and more discreet publications, containing Humboldt's letters, such as: Correspondence and Conversations of Alexander von Humboldt with a Young Friend (Friedrich Althaus), 1871; Correspondence with Berghaus (1863); Letters to Pictet, in the eighth volume of Le Globe (1868); Scientific and Literary Correspondence published by De la Roquette (1869); Letters to Bunsen (1869); Correspondence with Count Cancrin (1869); Letters to Friedrich von Raumer (1869); Correspondence with Goethe (1876), with J. H. Campe (1877), and with Gauss (1877). While all the letters of William von Humboldt to Alexander are missing, and are supposed to have been destroyed by the latter, Alexander's letters number not more than sixty-three, and, written partly in German, partly in French, begin with Puerto de Orotava, June 20, 1799, while the last is dated St. Petersburg, December 9, 1829. These thirty years thus cover Alexander's American travels, his residence in Paris, and his last great journey, which, at the request of the Russian Emperor, he undertook to the Ural. They contain nothing new on natural science or historical events, to which they only here and there allude. It seems as if in 1822 William's wife, Caroline, née Dachroeden, had complained of this sterility, but Alexander answered that they could not be too careful, and that, instead of dilating upon the great convulsions of the world, they had better confine themselves to their personal affairs and family talk, as all their letters, even those which were forwarded by royal couriers, were repeatedly opened by order of the distrustful governments.

Humboldt does not think it worth while to characterize a single one of the diplomatists of the Congress of Verona, where, by the special invitation of the King of Prussia, he occupied a position equal to that of the most prominent participators. Only here and there he expresses his disgust at the royalty of the time, which he had ample opportunity of observing closely. He feels tired of that shallow society, and whenever he mentions men and things he speaks of them with utter disdain.

"I have just returned from the gardens of Giusti," he writes, October 31, 1822, "where we were alone with all the sovereigns to receive the King and Queen of Sardinia. These solemn entrances of the monarchs between a hedge of bayonets are the only spectacles which the Congress offers. In all other respects I feel perfectly at home, and live in noble retirement. In the evening the diplomatists gather at the Princess Lieven's, who wishes me to inform you that she daily deplores your absence in London. I often go there late in the evening. Prince Metternich is a friend of this society. I have learned there how to make maccaroni, how the lazzaroni get rid of their vermin, and other things equally instructive."

Humboldt longed to breathe in a purer atmosphere, and to rejoin his brother. "What a moral excitement," he laments, December 10, 1822, "have been these last three months. The mosquitoes of the Cassiquiare did not trouble me as much." Of only one man, whom he had met accidentally in the Tyrolese mountains, does he give a quite amusing sketch. It was the celebrated German geologist, his friend Leopold von Buch. He thus writes, October 11, 1822, to William:

"I have been seen by Leopold von Buch, who, armed with umbrella, cloak, and a whole library of books in his pockets, has been wandering for five months on foot and without a guide amongst the mountains of Tyrol. He did not recognize me sufficiently to stop my carriage, but followed me to Verona, where I spent five days with him in the most interesting mineralogical conversation. I have shown him a part of my essay on geognosy, which is printed but not yet published, and have had the satisfaction of seeing that he is very much pleased with it. I left again immediately to make a tour afoot with him in the surroundings of Verona, to the basalt valleys of San Giovanni and Ronca, viz., Stanghelini, Monte Bocca, where the basalt has killed the fishes in the caves of San Ambrogio. Von Buch, undoubtedly one of the first geognosts of our century, will always be a remarkable psychological phenomenon. It is scarcely possible to unite greater oddity with so much genius and nobility of character. The voluntary isolation in which he has always lived has so increased his love of independence and his nervous irritability that the mere thought of taking a guide enrages him. I have patiently marched hours with him; he consults his map; we do not find a village where to spend the night; it is raining heavily; we meet a vine-dresser; you immediately become the most detestable man in his eyes if you dare to enquire the way, or show any disquietude about the route selected. He is fifty years old, and walks fourteen hours daily. 'Talking continually' fatigues him most, as he says. He is all alone, and speaks very loud. He argues on mineralogy with his antagonists (and has the mania to believe that his merits are not appreciated). He argues alone, and this exhausts him. Sometimes he stops walking, rubs his hands together with increasing rapidity, lifts them towards the sun, and, with half-opened mouth, his spectacles on his nose, and head thrown back, 'enjoys the sun of Italy.' He always has a fixed idea, to which he incessantly recurs; but while gazing on the granite and euphotides he, nevertheless, likes to repeat the tales which his brother (the court marshal) relates about the adventures of the ladies of the late queen. He is par métier an aristocrat and ultra, and the small red ribbon, of which he often thinks in the midst of his enjoyment of nature, gives him a pleasure which is not at all philosophical."

In spite of all this, Leopold von Buch was to Humboldt, as he wrote Varnhagen von Ense on being informed of his death (1853), one of the few men of a distinct individuality ("Einer der wenigen Menschen die eine Physiognomie haben").

If a further proof had been required that the cruel policy of the Holy Alliance was repugnant to Humboldt's feelings, and that it made him even think of emigrating to America, it is furnished by a plan the details of which, a week later, he laid before his brother. It is, in my opinion, for your readers the most interesting letter of the whole collection, and reads as follows:

"I have a great plan of calling into life, in the city of Mexico, a central scientific society for all those parts of America which have become independent. The Emperor of Mexico, whom I know personally, is going to be dethroned; there will be a republican government, and I have decided to end my days in the most agreeable and useful manner for science, in a part of the world where I am extremely cherished, and where everything seems to promise me a happy existence. It is the best way of not dying without glory—uniting around one's self many learned men, and enjoying that independence of opinion and sentiment which is necessary to my happiness. This project of founding a society in Mexico for the purpose of exploring more than nineteen-twentieths of the country, which I have not yet seen (the volcanoes of Guatemala and the Isthmus), does not exclude a trip to the Philippines and Bengal. It is quite a short excursion, and probably the Philippine Islands and Cuba will form independent states and confederate with Mexico. In France four or five million francs are being collected to reorganize the working of the Mexican mines. I shall have no responsibility whatever in this great monetary affair, but it will be very useful to me, for all the most distinguished and scientific men who, like me, wish to leave Europe, are to be employed by those who advance the funds, and who will gladly follow all the advice I may give them. For this society, which the Mexicans wish so ardently, I count on Kunth's and Valenciennes's assistance. By this voyage I could enrich the museums of the King immensely, the zoölogy of Mexico being quite unknown here. How many plants could be introduced into our forests and cultivated in the open air! Perhaps you will laugh at the ardor with which I cling to this American project, but when one has no family and no children to care for, one must think of embellishing one's old age."

So, not for a short time, not for a few years, but for ever, Humboldt intended to leave Europe. What his brother thought about his "great plan" does not appear from the letters; but he probably did not disapprove of it, for, two months later, in a letter dated December 17, 1822, Alexander makes remarks about the Incas, especially about their language, and then continues: "About all these matters I shall make the closest researches, as soon as I shall have established my great society in the Spanish Colonies, and as soon as a lively correspondence between Buenos Ayres, Chili, and California arises." Not until the year 1824 was "the great plan" definitively abandoned, but only because in a country continually disturbed by revolutions there was no longer any prospect of carrying it out according to Humboldt's intentions.

The last nineteen letters of the volume were written in Russia, from April to December, 1829. Humboldt, who, in 1827, at the request of the King of Prussia, returned to Berlin, where henceforth he remained until his death, extended his Russian scientific explorations to Siberia. He was received everywhere with marks of the greatest distinction; but this extraordinary welcome tendered to him by all classes of society annoyed him much, and prevented him from following more closely his observations. "The noble hospitality of the Russians," he writes to William, "the throng of curious admirers, and the constant necessity of being presented, of answering and making addresses, deprive me, in a great measure, of a real enjoyment of people and country. I long for free air far away from the cities. These eternal introductions—a very hard necessity of my position—are very tiresome. In Petersburg, from eight o'clock in the morning till late at night, I have been driven from house to house."

While on this tour he was informed by his brother William that the King of Prussia intended to make him (Alexander) director of the Berlin Museum. The mere idea of such a plan excited the traveller to the utmost.

"Is it possible," he answers, "that you can really imagine me the director of a museum? Your words, 'I apprehend that you cannot well decline that office,' frightened me and deprived me of last night's sleep. Have I given up my residence in Paris and returned to my fatherland to become director of a picture-gallery, to busy myself with things which are diametrically opposed to all that has given me some reputation in the world? I would rather leave my country again than to submit to such a humiliation. I shall neither accept this position, nor the presidency of a permanent commission, nor any other office. Tell the King that I am at his command in everything that is only temporary. Even if my appointment should be published in the official paper, and if this commission should be endowed with the most extraordinary privileges, I nevertheless should flatly refuse, and request you everywhere, in my name, to declare this to be my resolution."

Those to whom outward appearances and a rich income are the most desirable objects in life will probably laugh at the fear of the great scholar, the more so as the office was expressly to be created as a kind of sinecure for Humboldt. In order better to appreciate this blunt refusal one must bear in mind that he had spent his whole fortune on his travels and on his costly description of them, and that he was often in great need of money. But far above a brilliant position in the eyes of the world he valued his personal independence—i. e., the freedom of his time and of his intellectual powers, and the right to dispose of them according to his own judgment. It strikes me that just this part of the correspondence would be excellent reading matter for your politicians during and immediately after the present Presidential campaign.

On the whole, these letters of Alexander von Humboldt form a very important contribution to a clearer understanding of his character, and should be read wherever his writings have become household works. Besides, they are eloquent witnesses of the harmony of the personal feeling as well as the literary lore of the two brothers, and furnish an extraordinary instance of noble love and friendship, in which the sacredness of nature was steadily intensified by the affection and devotedness of genius and sentiment. ??

THE ALABAMA CENSUS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: My attention is called to a charge in the Chicago Inter-Ocean, upon the alleged authority of J. P. Southworth, Esq., former United States District-Attorney for the Southern District of Alabama, but now of New Orleans, La., to the effect that the census of Alabama and Louisiana had been "swelled twenty-five per cent." The gentleman in question is well acquainted, personally, with the supervisor of the census in this district. If he had any evidence to sustain his charges, I can only express my surprise that he did not in some way bring the same to that supervisor's notice. That, up to this day, he has failed to do this, is proof either that he has no evidence or that the Inter-Ocean misrepresented him.

If such a statement has been made, I do not hesitate to pronounce it without foundation in facts, so far as applied to the Third Alabama District, comprising the counties of Baldwin, Choctaw, Clarke, Dallas, Greene, Marengo, Mobile, Monroe, Sumter, Washington, and Wilcox. I venture to add, from my knowledge of the practice in appointing the census enumerators, that all these stories of fraud in the census enumeration in Southern States are simply incredible. In this district the one hundred and seventy-five enumerators were selected out of fully double the number of applicants. Their names, together with the respective applications of each, executed in his own handwriting, and stating the principal facts of his education, public positions then or formerly held, and present occupation, were forwarded to the Superintendent at Washington for approval. No person knew the result of his application until he received, through the mails, a blank form of oath and his commission. Except in two cases in Mobile County, no one in this district received his commission and oath before the 20th of May. Before that date no enumerator knew who his co-laborers would be, even in his own county, and after that date he only learned by hearsay, having no information from this office.

Any one acquainted with the difficulties of correspondence by mail in interior Southern districts, and with the general immobility of the population therein, can easily estimate the probability that these one hundred and seventy-five enumerators became acquainted with the fact of each other's appointments, and reached a common understanding to deliberately make false enumerations, between the 20th of May and 1st of June. After the latter date they were in the field, moving from farm to farm, and distant from post-offices. It is simply incredible that even the dozen enumerators of any one county could have had an understanding to make fraudulent returns. If wrongs were committed, they must have been the result of individual crime in each case, and free from every element of a conspiracy.

From my personal knowledge of the appointees in this district I feel that I can safely assert that the charge of swelling the census made against them is absolutely false, and challenge the production of any evidence to support it. Therefore I also said, at the outset, that, from my practical acquaintance with the methods of the Census Bureau, I am led to believe that all similar charges against other Southern census districts are equally baseless with those made against the Alabama districts.—Very respectfully,

Frederick G. Bromberg, Supervisor.

Office of the Supervisor for Third Alabama District, Mobile, Ala., Sept. 6, 1880.

SUPPOSED REPLY TO THE SPEECH OF THE "REPUBLICAN EMISSARY" FROM THE NORTH.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: At a supposed meeting in Tallahassee, Florida, the following supposed rejoinder was made to the supposed speech of a Republican emissary (see the Nation of Sept. 2):

"My Democratic friends: I am gratified at the attention and respectful hearing which you have given to the gentleman, sent out from the North by the Republican National Committee, who has just now taken his seat. A hearing equally attentive and respectful, let me assure him, he will receive whenever and wherever, during the present political campaign, he may ask it from the Democrats of Florida. But neither he nor you will fail to note that, while the white portion (nearly all Democrats) of the assemblage have thus listened to him, I no sooner rise to reply than all his colored Republican auditors, under the counsels of their white leaders, publicly given in this city a few weeks since, to listen to no Democratic speaker, have taken their departure.

"One other preliminary remark, due to us, due to our visitor: he is mistaken in saying he comes among us an 'odious and suspected person because wearing the name Republican.' No Republican coming here from the North is either suspected or odious because of his party name. We know too well the wealth, worth, patriotism, and intelligence of the great body of the Republican party of the North to entertain any such suspicion. In my political addresses to the people of Florida I have again and again done full justice to the Republicans of the New England and other Northern States by showing that there was nothing in common between them and the mongrel crew of varied political antecedents and nationalities who, flocking here like foul harpies for our spoliation, had disgraced the name of the party of Lincoln, Adams, Andrew, Seward, and Trumbull; asserting, in all places and on all occasions, that these creatures while plundering the South had dishonored the North.

"He does us only justice in conceding that none of us desires the re-establishment of slavery. For myself, I go further and assert that, instead of regretting that slavery went down with our short-lived Confederacy, in the first agony of my disappointment the abolition of slavery was the one thing that reconciled me to our fate. Many things have since combined to do it. But more than this I will say, and our friend, I hope, will repeat it when he returns North, as the matter seems to be causing some anxiety in the minds of Mr. Sherman and others there: we take not the least stock in any scheme for the payment of Southern war-claims. And, as for the payment for our slaves, while the three or four hundred thousand ex-slaveholders might not object, yet any proposition to that end, submitted to the white people of the South alone, would be voted down by an overwhelming majority. The only form having any claim to popular favor in which the proposition has been presented was that of a Republican candidate for Congress in one of the Southern States where negro voters were numerous, whose plan was to have the United States pay for the slaves, the money to be equally divided between the emancipated blacks and their former owners! The cunning aspirant was elected, but I believe never introduced into Congress his bill, and on the expiration of his term did not offer for re-election.

"I am sorry to have to tell him, I need not tell you, that our visitor's brilliant picture of Southern prosperity is greatly overcolored. Florida is, I suppose, doing as well as her Southern sisters, and yet Florida shows a loss of 60 per cent. of taxable values as compared with 1860, and a large per cent. since 1867. True, the entire cotton crop of the South has increased in the twenty years from 1860 to 1880 about 20 per cent., but the increase for the preceding twenty years, say 1840 to 1860, was 100 per cent. But be our present prosperity what it may, it must be remembered that none of these States has been for four years, most of them not for six, under Republican rule. What is saved from the wreck we enjoy not through but in spite of that party, as known here. When it is considered that the losses suffered by the South from the carpet-bag and negro governments are estimated (and I take the figures as given by an able and impartial Northern authority) at two hundred and fifty millions of dollars, it is not strange that Southern prosperity, even under home rule, is of slow revival.

"But our visitor tells us 'if we had promptly accepted the inevitable—the negro as a citizen with a vote—the friction, bitterness, and hardships [of reconstruction] would have been vastly diminished.' Perhaps so. If our foresights were as good as our hindsights it would save us a great deal of trouble in other fields than politics. But how were we to know that suffrage for the negro, wholly uneducated as he came out of slavery, was one of the inevitables which the Republican politicians of the North had in store for us? We did know that in several Republican Northern States, where he had long enjoyed the advantages of public schools, and where his weakness in numbers as compared with the whites would make him, in any event, as a voter absolutely harmless, the ballot was withheld from him. We knew that Gen. Grant had asserted that to put it in his hands in the South would be disastrous; while Senator Morton was on record to the same effect. The late lamented Mr. Greeley's panacea for our ills was not universal amnesty and universal suffrage, but universal amnesty and impartial suffrage. And I concede that if Congress in its reconstruction acts had granted the former it would have been wise in the South to have conceded the latter, fixing, however, as in most of the Republican States of the North, an educational qualification for all voters, whites and blacks.

"Could we reasonably have supposed that the Republican politicians would have been so remorselessly vindictive as to inflict upon us such a punishment (in the consequences of which the whole nation must share) as to commit the government of more than a third of the Union to the voting power of absolute ignorance? Why should they do this? Was their purpose the preservation of order and the protection of persons and property? This could have been done with infinitely less loss to us by holding these States as conquered provinces until by schools, established and maintained at public expense, the negro could have been educated up to the duties of a citizen. If, on the other hand, their purpose was to make Republican States in the South, nothing would have been easier in the then general odium in which the Democratic party was held here, without disfranchising anybody, if the Republican leaders could have conquered their prejudices and shown as politicians, not to say statesmen, a very small modicum of practical wisdom. If they had made their appeals to the leaders and members of the old Whig party, the supporters of Bell and Everett in 1860, and to the minority in the South who had remained true to the Union all through the war; had given them the Federal offices which might reasonably have gone to one-third of the States—judgeships, cabinet places, foreign missions, appointments as collectors, postmasters, and the rest—the result would have been the making of most of these States as steadfast in Republicanism as Massachusetts or Vermont. I say this most confidently and disinterestedly, as my antecedents would have fixed me with the minority of outs, not with the majority of ins.

"I am aware that there is a prevalent opinion North that we might have saved ourselves from the disastrous consequences of the Reconstruction Acts by actively participating in the early elections thereunder; instead of which, it is supposed, we sullenly and sulkily stood aloof, leaving things to take their course. I assure our visitor that nothing is further from the truth. A large number of us at the first of these elections (1868) were disfranchised—could not vote, could only work and talk. This we did, and, running a popular ticket for governor and Congressman (Florida was entitled then to but one representative to Congress), and the Republicans, carpet-baggers, and negroes being divided into the support of two tickets of nearly equal strength, the Conservatives (as we called ourselves, to escape the odium of the Democratic name) undoubtedly polled a plurality of votes—all that was necessary to elect. But the other party, or, rather, one wing of it, did the counting, and counted in its own men, all carpet-baggers—Read, of Wisconsin, as governor; Gleason, of Wisconsin, as lieutenant-governor; Hamilton, of Pennsylvania, as Congressman. At the next election (1870) of Congressman, lieutenant-governor, and legislature, all political disqualifications having ceased, we again carried the State, electing lieutenant-governor, Congressman, and a majority of the legislature. Again the other side did the counting, reversing the popular verdict. As regards the legislature there was no remedy. Our lieutenant-governor elect appealed to the Supreme Court, our Congressional candidate to the House of Representatives at Washington; and though the court was Republican and the Congress Republican, each of these tribunals was compelled by the facts to decide in favor of the Democratic contestant. These facts our friend, if he is curious in the matter, will find in volume xiii. Florida Supreme Court Reports, in a case reported under the title of State ex rel. Bloxham vs. Board State Canvassers. The facts, I say, are to be found in the report of that case; though it is also true that, with characteristic rascality, after the court had ruled the principles which gave Bloxham the office, the Republican leaders, to defeat the ends of justice, by changing the State Canvassing Board gave the court an excuse for not pronouncing, in that case, a final judgment in his favor. So that his lawyers had to begin again, not by mandamus, whose proceedings are expeditious, but by the dilatory action of quo warranto, in which, after the lapse of some eighteen months, he obtained a judgment of ouster against his usurping opponent. The Congressional case was that of Niblack vs. Walls, decided in favor of the former—only, however, a few days before the expiration of the term for which he was chosen.

"And so the voting went on at every election, State and national (save, perhaps, the Greeley fiasco), the Democrats doing the electing, the Republicans the counting, up to and including the memorable contest of 1876. Once more the Democrats elected their candidates—governor, Congressmen (now two), Presidential electors, and a majority of the legislature; once more their candidates—governor and Presidential electors—manifestly chosen, were counted out by our model Returning Board, braced and backed up by ex-Governor Noyes, now minister to France; General Lew Wallace, now Governor of New Mexico; John A. Kasson, now minister to Austria—but not, I am gratified to say, by General Barlow, ex-attorney-general of New York, who did not, while the others did, get office from Mr. Hayes. The claims of the Democratic candidate for governor were, as in the previous case of their lieutenant-governor, taken before the State Supreme Court, two of the three members of which were Republicans, who, under the rulings already made in the Bloxham case, compelled the Canvassing Board to reverse their action. The result was the inauguration of the governor whom the people had elected. Not so, however, fared the Tilden electors. The Eight-to-Seven Commission, Mr. Garfield one of the Eight, shut its eyes to the fraud perpetrated by the Canvassing Board, and declared four men whom the people of Florida had not chosen Florida's Presidential electors. From this brief review it will be seen with how little justice our people can be charged with standing aloof in the political contests of the Reconstruction period. It is rather a matter of surprise the persistence with which they repeated, year after year, the struggle at the polls, with the chances all in favor of the popular verdict being nullified by a fraudulent count.

"But our visitor would have us forget the past. How can we? The record of its wrongs is burnt into our souls. We can't if we would, we ought not if we could forget them. We must remember them, not to avenge, but to guard against their repetition. I concede that he is right in saying that the Republicans of the North, for whom he speaks, 'do not desire the restoration of the carpet-bag governments in the South, and if successful we are absolutely secure against any attempts to set up our governments on a foundation of which the Federal Army and Navy constitute an essential part.' But he forgets that the contest here is not for the choice of Presidential electors and representatives in Congress alone, but for governor (who under our carpet-bag constitution appoints all State officers above the dignity of constable) and legislature as well; so that the success in Florida of the party calling itself Republican in November next will be, ipso facto, the restoration of carpet-bag rule over our people. Its leaders now are the same men who led it four and eight years since; its followers the same, its purposes the same now as then.

"We are told most impressively 'the Republican North will never be indifferent to State governments maintained by fraud.' Whether it will or not, will depend, if one may judge the future by the past, on the fact whether the State governments thus maintained are Republican or Democratic. State governments brought into being, as well as 'maintained,' precisely in this manner, existed for years in Louisiana and Florida, but professing to be Republican the Republican North beheld their existence, it seems to me, with considerable composure. Nothing is more notorious than the 'intimidation' for years, and now, brought to bear by their own race on colored people of these States to prevent them from casting Democratic votes—unless it is the 'frauds' by which their Returning Boards were able to convert minorities into majorities, and vice versa. But the victims being Democrats, I fancy the average Northern Republican thought they got just about what they deserved. And less than four years since (our friend will see I am not going back twenty or ten or even five years), when by one of the most memorable of these frauds, not by any means greater than its predecessors yet undeniable, the Presidency was given to the defeated candidate, was the Republican North very much grieved? Was it not, upon the whole, rejoiced? And though my favorite paper, the Nation, said in substance Mr. Hayes could not as a man of honor accept the office at the hands of the scamps composing the Louisiana Returning Board, he nevertheless did accept it at their hands; more: he rewarded the scamps for giving it to him, as he did quite a number of distinguished Northern Republican visiting statesmen who helped the scamps to give it to him. General Garfield, one of the 'statesmen,' for his participation in the work, or despite thereof, is, by a solid Republican North, if it can be made solid or nearly solid, to be rewarded with the succession to Mr. Hayes.

"Can our visiting friend put his hand upon his heart and say he verily believes the governing spirit of the Republican North would discountenance a resort to intimidation, whether among Southern negroes or Northern Democrats, if thought necessary to the success of their Presidential nominee? Let me read to him the following extract of a letter dated four days since, from an intelligent Southern woman summering North, written from Pottstown, in the midst of the iron-works of Pennsylvania. Pottstown is, I believe, the home of that most seeming virtuous Republican judge, Mr. Justice Strong, of the Supreme Court of the United States, whose influence should be potential there: 'They may talk of bulldozing in the South, but it is nothing to what they do here. All of the hands in the iron-works here are informed that if they vote the Democratic ticket they can leave. And so it is all over the North.'

"It will be gratifying to be assured that all reports like this are unfounded, that nothing of the kind is known, or at worst only to a very limited extent, in the establishments of the Republican manufacturers and capitalists of the North, and that the stupendous frauds charged as characterizing each succeeding election in Philadelphia, the second in population of all our American cities, are but a myth. I speak thus intending to justify no electoral fraud and no intimidation of voters perpetrated by Southern Democrats. Neither the one nor the other has marked our Florida elections to the extent of changing the result in favor of the Democrats; while the latter have been, as already shown, repeatedly the victims of both.

"In conclusion, let me notice what the speaker has said about the Federal office-holders in the South. Admitting that 'many of the incumbents are unworthy,' he thinks they should, nevertheless, be retained in their places. That there can't be anything very wrong about them, else we have been 'singularly derelict in making known our grievances.' Well, as Mr. Greeley used to say, let us ventilate this matter a little. The chief actor in one of the most monstrous political frauds ever perpetrated in Florida or elsewhere, that of 1870, above mentioned, by which the returns from seven Democratic counties were rejected, was then Deputy-Marshal of the United States and Attorney-General of Florida. By that fraud he earned his promotion, and was promoted to the office of Marshal, and held it at the time of the inauguration of General Hayes. A member of the Florida bar, State and Federal, of fair standing, thereupon wrote to Mr. Devens, the newly-appointed United States Attorney-General, courteously asking, in the interest of civil-service reform, that the marshal be removed; assigning his participation in this fraud as the ground of the request. The communication was not even acknowledged, and, of course, no removal made. About the same time the same gentleman, in like courteous manner, addressed a letter to Postmaster-General Key, calling his attention to the postmaster at Tallahassee (a negro of very little education, an active and aggressive partisan, thoroughly inflammatory and incendiary in his political harangues to the ignorant masses of his own race), asking that he be removed, and some intelligent, non-partisan, white man be put in his place. This communication met with the same favor as the other. Of course no such person would be allowed to hold the same office at the capital of any Northern State for a day.

"Our visitor is mistaken in supposing that it is because we covet the emoluments of the Federal offices that we desire so earnestly a change in the incumbents, and to have their places filled, not necessarily by Democratic partisans, but by men whom we shall not have to fight at each succeeding election. He cannot readily appreciate, nor, I fear, with all his liberality, be able to do justice to our feelings in this matter; for the reason that, coming from a State where both parties are reasonably intelligent, their leaders fairly honest, their candidates usually reputable and well qualified, it can be there a matter of no serious consequence, at any ordinary election, which side is successful. How different here! where on the issue of the vote is dependent the question whether those who are to make and administer our laws shall come from the class of the community having most, and nearly all, of the intelligence, virtue, honesty, property of the State, little as it may be; or from the other class, embracing the ignorant, the vicious, the degraded, who, paying almost no taxes themselves, gloat in the prospect of levying them on others, and of revelling in and squandering them when collected. Left to themselves they are not dangerous, either as a party or otherwise; but organized into trained bands by active, cunning, and unprincipled Federal officers distributed throughout the State, though the Democrats have unquestionably a majority in the number of qualified voters, yet every election is one of peril to our most vital interests. I use no figure of speech in saying this: we can conceive of no greater calamity—not famine, not pestilence, nothing with which the Almighty ever visits a sinning and sinful people—more direful than the restoration to power of the men whom four years since we hurled therefrom.

"As he shall mingle with us, as he is cordially invited to do, our visitor will perceive with what intense interest, anxiety, even apprehension our people, not Democratic office-holders alone, nor expectants or aspirants, but the people, the taxpayers, the property-holders, anticipate the result here in Florida in November next. And surely it is no trifling matter to any community that it should for several months preceding each succeeding election-day be doomed to the anxieties, perils, and apprehensions of such a crisis. With deliverance from the horde of busy, active, unscrupulous, partisan carpet-bag and negro office-holders and retainers now in the pay of the general Government would come deliverance from all this. Hence we work and pray for the election of General Hancock in the hope that from him we shall obtain the deliverance for which we so earnestly yearn. And even should it chance to turn out, as our visitor tells us—though Mr. English, who is understood to have considerable stake in the country, thinks differently—that a change in the Federal office-holders North will 'breed corruption and jobbery in the public offices,' involving evils the effects of which the whole country will feel, what are these evils, though actual and appreciable, and not merely conjectural and imaginary, compared with those which I have already described, as to the existence of which here there can be no mistake and is no denial?

"No. The evil we fear is not official changes throughout the North, the effects of which, good or bad, may or may not reach us; but the indefinite continuation in their places of power and influence here in Florida of a set of pestilent mischief-makers and evil-doers supported at the public expense."

After a brief rejoinder by the "Emissary" the meeting quietly adjourned, leaving me to report the above reply for the Nation. R. B. HILTON.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Any one who saw at the beginning of Hayes's administration how demoralized whole communities of our State were by the bare hope of getting an office, could not, it would seem, help becoming a civil-service reformer. There are, from whatever cause, a good many in our State besides myself who would like to belong to a civil-service reform club. But if any good is to be done in Virginia, the organization must support neither Garfield nor Hancock. Out of respect to the feelings of those among whom I shall have to work, I may even hope that the central committee will not long be the Independent Republican.

There is no better field for civil-service reformers to work in than the South. There are too many like R. B. Hilton (Nation, No. 786), who "desire, so far as this section is concerned, a 'clean sweep.'" They ought to know that the present incumbents would, under a good system, make better officers than any Hancock could put in under the "spoils system." The incompetent would, by the very nature of the reform we are striving for, be weeded out. I, for one, am willing to try the present office-holders, though our postmaster, for instance, does not spend in the post-office ten minutes a week, and one of the assistants has been in the office but once since Hayes was inaugurated. We must not wait till our party hold the offices to denounce rotation in office. We Democrats must not forget, either, that we began this mischief, and that reformed mischief-makers cannot better prove the sincerity of their conversion than by suffering for their principles.

A Virginia Democrat.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I approve of the idea of your correspondent "F. W. H.," and can promise ten subscribers to the Publication Society. At the same time, the advisability and utility of a conference seem to me questionable. Too many conferences without result have been held already in the campaign, and more are promised. If the Independent Republican Committee of New York would at once assume direction of the movement, and extend it by correspondence to other States, I am convinced that those interested in the reform would be satisfied, and there would be at least the hope of accomplishing something this autumn. That committee has already demonstrated its ability to conduct successfully a campaign for principle.

As neither General Garfield nor General Hancock represents distinctly civil-service reform, our efforts must be directed to furthering the election of Congressmen who will help to secure it by legislation. Open letters signed by any considerable number of Republicans and Democrats, addressed to candidates for Congress, asking a distinct expression of their views upon the subject of the civil service, and pledging the votes of the signers, independent of party connections, to the candidate from whom most could be expected, would compel attention to the issue, and would probably call out replies from candidates. Silence, at any rate, would naturally be construed as hostility to reform. In closely-contested districts, where the evils of the present system are apt to be greatest, by a happy dispensation of Providence our votes are most effective, and ought to be decisive. Action, however, must be undertaken at once, as Congressional nominations are being made every day and public sentiment is being formed, which, once settled, can be turned with great difficulty. In New York State the issue might be carried into the choice of Assemblymen. No Independent Republican, I take it, will support a candidate for Assembly whose vote by any possibility might help to send to the United States Senate Mr. Thomas Platt, or any of his kind. C.

Albany, N. Y., Sept. 10, 1880.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I belong to that class of Young America spoken of lately by a writer in the Nation as somewhat distrustful and sceptical in their views of America, of their countrymen, and of themselves. Though, on the whole, hopeful for the future and not despondent as regards the present, they are inclined to think that some things may be mended in our political and social life. They believe that on the whole America is the best country, and the Americans the greatest nation, on the foot-stool, but they are not so cock-sure that something may not be learned from "abroad." They are not very fond of marching in torchlight processions, nor do they greatly care for listening to the harangues of loud-voiced though rather harmless demagogues at the raising of ward-wigwams. They are generally pretty busy with their own affairs, but still they are not unwilling to give some time and energy to politics, if they could feel that their efforts were of any account.

The front of the Independent movement is largely made up from this class, and that they are not altogether without influence is evident from the real rancor which the stock politicians manifest towards them here and elsewhere—a very different thing from the hostility which the former assume for the sake of appearances against those of the opposite party, but which is hardly skin-deep.

The plan of a Civil-Service Reform Publication Society I find meets with quite general approval from Young America of this type, and many whom I know will be glad to help on the cause in a quiet way. At the same time with this I send to the Independent Republican Committee the names of seven men besides my own who can all be counted on for subscriptions of from one to five dollars. I think I could, without much difficulty, obtain a dozen more. Let a few other readers of the Nation take hold of the matter in the same way, and the Society will soon be under way. R. S.

Buffalo, Sept. 11, 1880.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have for years regarded fixity of office-tenure the most important reform question to be brought to the careful attention of our people. I am therefore glad to see that a society will probably be formed to use all proper methods to accomplish the desired end. If each of the 8,400 subscribers to the Nation would subscribe thereto, a sufficient fund would be forthcoming at once, and, as one of them, put me down for five or ten dollars, as may be needed; and, as the work can't be done in a year, I expect to be a yearly subscriber until the good fight is won.—Truly yours, C. D. Ritchie.

N. W. cor. Thirty-fourth and Hamilton Streets, Philadelphia, Sept. 11, 1880.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: There is no greater pleasure than to see the best minds and hearts in the nation suddenly breaking out into print and earnestly advocating principles and methods of action which one has been preaching for years in private and doing one's utmost to propagate. This thought is suggested by the numerous letters of approval you publish to the proposal to found a Civil-Service Reform Society to print documents and educate the masses in those principles which must eventually conquer if the Republic is to continue to exist.

But the question arises whether the letters you publish really indicate the wide-spread feeling they seem to suggest. I question it, and for this reason: Nearly a year ago I wrote a long letter to the most prominent civil-service reformer in the country, advocating this very plan, speaking of the utter ignorance of the people at large as to the nature of the question of reform, and advising the formation of a society to publish pamphlets, leaflets, and tracts, and send out speakers to explain to the mechanics and farmers how this question touched their pockets and concerned their prosperity and happiness. I suggested also the formation of branch societies all over the country, like the anti-slavery associations of thirty years ago, and I urged the gentleman in question to put himself at the head of this movement, saying our motto should be "Organize, organize, organize!" I offered in conclusion to begin such a society among the workingmen in my own neighborhood, and to contribute $100 toward the general fund. His reply, although extremely kind and courteous, was very discouraging. He said in effect that the time had not come to begin the good work, and that the people would not recognize the same deep moral question involved as in slavery. He did not, in fact, believe in the plan, and, although urging me to continue to preach these doctrines in private, discouraged all present action.

The name of this gentleman is so identified with civil-service reform, and his opinions so respected, that his declining to have anything to do with such a movement as a leader prevented my making public in your columns my proposal or organizing a club myself. I mention all this because your correspondents' hopeful letters fill one with pleasure to see others planning and longing to see fulfilled such a noble purpose, and yet with a half-despair as he thinks how our natural leaders are lacking in enthusiasm and determination. The letter from this eminent gentleman (which I would publish had I the right to do so) makes me fear that it is only in the unknown privates that readiness to work and to sacrifice exists, and that the generals remain passive-souled and sluggish.

Can you not call on them to come forward and head this movement? I repeat my offer of $100. I wish it could be multiplied tenfold, for as a patriotic American and as an intense Yankee I yet feel that our future depends more on the settlement of this question than on any other point. God speed the work which will remove America from the seventeenth to the nineteenth century, and separate her from the methods of the "unspeakable Turk"!—I remain, etc., A. M. S.

THE ARCHÆOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF ATHENS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Having spent the whole of last winter and spring in Athens, occupying my time almost exclusively in the study of the remaining antiquities of the city and neighborhood, I cannot but associate myself heartily with Mr. Stillman's strictures upon the management of the Archæological Society of Athens which appeared in his letter published in your last number. Not only is the Society slow about pushing on the excavations, as Mr. Stillman states, but it fails to protect those remains of the ancient city which are not preserved from injury, at least, by the earth which has accumulated over them.

The western slope of the Museum Hill, a great part of the Pnyx, and the whole of the Hill of the Nymphs, are—or, rather, were—covered with very perfect and interesting remains of the old city. We find here, both within the walls of the city proper and between the Long Walls to the Piræus, foundations of houses, flights of steps, cisterns, alleys, and streets deeply marked by the chariot-wheels—all cut in the solid rock. A great part of these remains upon the Hill of the Nymphs has perished, the hill having been used, without opposition, as a quarry by the ignorant populace of the neighboring quarter of the modern city. Fortunately, there is an exact plan of this part of ancient Athens, made some years ago by M. Burnouf.

A large piece of the summit of Lycabettus has been blasted off in the same way, to obtain building-stone, although stone may be had in abundance at a little distance from these historic hills—sites which are the world's property, and should be protected by the united influence of all antiquarians, without regard to nationality. Since leaving Athens I have received information that a great part of the Museum Hill has been bought by a private individual —I fear for no purpose in the interest of archæology and art. But it would take too long to enumerate all the instances of that Society's neglect of the priceless treasure committed to its keeping; to tell how half of the "white hill of Colonus" has been blasted away, like Lycabettus and the Nymphæum; how the arch is permitted to remain over the cella of the Theseum, which it is gradually deforming by its thrust; how the tops of steles and other funereal monuments are seen projecting from the ground around the gas-works upon the Sacred Way to Eleusis, just outside of the Dipylon Gate.

However, I cannot sympathize entirely with Mr. Stillman's views about the Greek law relating to the exportation of antiquities. The resources of the Archæological Society are so small that, even if well expended, they could not make very rapid progress; and it seems to me that we ought not to complain too much, for the present, if the Society would but protect what it has. And the ignorance of the people, owing to their recent emancipation from the most degraded slavery, is unavoidably so great, especially in matters relating to archæology and art, that, were it not for the law above alluded to, Greece might soon be compelled to send her students abroad to study the antiquities of their own country. As it is, a beginning, at least, has been made in the right direction. In the Varvakeion Museum the collection of vases and terra-cottas, though still awaiting classification, is excellent, and in the Patissia Museum (chiefly for sculpture), among many interesting and beautiful statues and bas-reliefs, are two statues in particular—a Meleager and an Apollo—which are, perhaps, equal to any ancient statuary remaining to us, except the Parthenon marbles. I cannot but think that the Elgin marbles—though it was, perhaps, well to remove them to London in the beginning of the century—would now do more service if they could be returned to their native Acropolis. Many of the pieces—the Southern metopes, for instance, so barbarously torn from their places—could easily be restored to their original positions in the Parthenon; while the others could take the places of the plaster casts which now fill the little Museum on the Acropolis. Athens is now so easy of access that all true lovers of Greek art would be amply repaid for the labor of the journey by the increased advantage and interest of studying those noblest productions of ancient art under their own pure sky, and, so far as possible, in their original positions, and in connection with the glorious monuments which they were designed to complete and to adorn.—I am, yours very respectfully,

THOMAS W. LUDLOW.

Notes.

THE first volume of Surgeon J. S. Billings's 'Index Catalogue of the Library of the Surgeon-General's Office, U. S. A.' (A–Berliński) has just appeared. Three years ago (Nation No. 568) we noticed the "Specimen Fasciculus" of this stupendous work, and gave some description of the scheme of it. We shall hope to return to it again. The present instalment fills 888 pages, large octavo, in double columns, with the catalogue proper; while 126 pages additional are required for a list of the medical periodicals whose contents are here indexed, and the abbreviations by which they are designated.——Part XI. of Grove's 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians' (Macmillan) has perhaps not been rivalled by any other in average quality, for it embraces very few titles besides Opera, Oratorio, Orchestra, Orchestration, Organ, Overture—all themes of the first importance—Pacchierotti, Paganini, and Palestrina (unfinished). Under Orchestra is given a list of the instruments used by fourteen of the most celebrated orchestras of the present day; in these, while the bass drum is always a unit, the violins range from eight to ninety-two in number. Under Organ we find a number of curious and useful cuts, and a history of the great English church and cathedral organs seriatim. Landseer's rough sketch of Paganini serves in lieu of a more serious portrait. An article is devoted to the career and works of Mr. J. K. Paine, the Boston composer.——D. Appleton & Co. have reprinted in two full volumes the sixth English edition of 'Cooley's Cyclopædia of Practical Receipts, Processes, and Collateral Information.' With its balsams, decoctions, draughts, drops, electuaries, essences, extracts, infusions, pills, spirits, syrups, tinctures, waters, and wines, it recommends itself especially to apothecaries. Its scope will otherwise be indicated by such titles as alcoholometry, blacking, bread, cements, cupping, electrotype, enamel, enemas, filtration, fritters, gargles, gems, glass, ink, pastry, phonograph, proofs (printer's), salicylic acid, sewage, soaps, soups, still, telephone, urine, etc., etc. Some of the articles, e.g., stoves, are inadequate for American use.——J. R. Osgood & Co. send us 'Perkins's Congressional-District Vote Map,' intended to show by parallel bars of color, on a given scale, the relative strength of parties as indicated by the vote of 1878. It seems to us to have few advantages over the figures on which it is based, and which are printed in the margin.——'Studies from the Great British Authors,' by H. H. Morgan (St. Louis: G. I. Jones & Co.), is a compilation of extracts from the works of the principal English writers from Chaucer to Macaulay, and consequently comprises, as a matter of course, much excellent reading. The editor's work in every respect, however, is such as almost any one could have performed.——Henry A. Sumner & Co., of Chicago, issue in two volumes a third edition of 'Essays in Biography and Criticism,' by Peter Bayne, M.A. The first has a preface, and to the second is prefixed a short but enthusiastic notice of the author, and we need only remark upon the publication that, since prefaces are rarely read, and in view of the faults common to youth (faults in some degree outgrown by Mr. Bayne) in which the essays are steeped, it would have been fair to have appended to these a date indicating how long ago the first edition appeared. Whether this time was recent or remote, however, cannot make the resurrection a matter of importance.——The official records of the war of the rebellion, now being prepared under the direction of Col. Robert N. Scott, will be issued in four series, viz., (1) formal reports of military operations, with correspondence, orders, etc., and an atlas—Confederate accounts of any event immediately following the Union—in all, 80 volumes octavo, of some 800 pages each; (2) correspondence, etc., relating to prisoners—4 vols.; (3) other correspondence, etc., Union—8 vols.; (4) ditto, Confederate—4 vols. ——The happy contagion of examples of public spirit is nowhere better manifested than in Cincinnati, where Mr. Charles R. West has just offered to give $150,000 towards building an art museum, if a like amount is raised. This will certainly come to pass.——Sampson Low & Co., London, have in press 'Forty Years' Recollections, Literary and Political,' by a Chartist leader, Mr. Thomas Frost.——A sequel to his 'Caliban' has been lately begun by Renan in the Paris Temps as a feuilleton, under the title of "L'Eau de Jouvence" (Water of Youth).——'De la Législation du Théâtre en France,' by M. Albert Guichard (New York: F. W. Christern), is better adapted than any of its immediate predecessors for giving the foreigner an exact idea of the principles which govern and regulate authors, actors, and managers in France. M. Guichard's treatise is laid out with logical accuracy, and in each of its divisions is a historical summary, leading easily up to the statement of the present state of the law. Literary quotations are apt and frequent, and the book abounds in facts and figures not easily attainable elsewhere.——Good maps of South America are still far from abundant. Notice may therefore be taken of the maps of the upper course of the Uruguay in Brazil, and of the river district of Peru, in No. 87 of the Berlin Geographical Society's Zeitschrift (New York: L. W. Schmidt). For the first time, we believe, a chart accompanies the Verhandlungen of the same Society (vol. vii., No. 4, 5) showing the route of Nordenskiöld's expedition from the Baltic to Yokohama.

—We continue our abstract of fall announcements with the list of G. P. Putnam's Sons, which includes 'Unbeaten Tracks in Japan,' by Isabella Bird; 'Holland and its People,' by Edmondo de Amicis; 'Portugal, Old and New,' by Oswald Crawfurd; Viollet-le-Duc's 'Learning to Draw' (Young Designer), translated by Virginia Champlin; a new edition, revised, of Leslie Stephen's 'History of English Thought in the 18th Century'; 'Art Suggestions from the Masters,' by Mrs. Susan N. Carter; 'The Comprehensive Atlas,' 122 maps, folio; new and cheaper editions of Frothingham's 'Life of Theodore Parker' and 'History of Transcendentalism in New England'; 'A Doctor's Suggestions to the Community,' by Dr. Roosa; and 'My Investment on the Mississippi,' by George C. Benham—a Northern cotton-planter who, had he not persevered to the end, might have thought his a "fool's errand." Messrs. Putnam will also publish for the Society of Political Education a "library" beginning with Nordhoff's 'Politics for Young Americans,' Johnston's 'History of American Politics,' Perry's 'Introduction to Political Economy,' and McAdam's 'Alphabet of Finance,' and to be sold only in sets.

—The difficulty of making good text-books is apt to be in due proportion to their importance, though the undertaking is too often considered a humble part of literary journeyman work. Three works before us illustrate in varying degree, however, that the difficulty is greatly increased in the case of art text-books. In art an hour's personal instruction may almost be said to be equal to a week's study of written directions; and the more elementary the aim of these the more necessity—generally absolute, we should be inclined to say—of a master's guidance. Such books as Couture's lectures or Hunt's 'Hints' are not addressed to beginners, and have the value of suggestiveness without being hampered by explicit elementariness. 'Modelling in Clay," by A. L. Vago, with an appendix on modelling foliage, etc., by Benn Pitman (Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co.); a translation of Karl Robert's 'Le Fusain,' being "a complete practical treatise on landscape-drawing in charcoal" (same publishers); and 'Handbook of Drawing,' by William Walker (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons), on the other hand, are designed for persons who know nothing of the subjects treated. After examining them we feel justified in concluding that none will be of much practical use to the beginner, the first especially, in which little more is attempted than to describe tools and insist on phrenology. The case is somewhat different with charcoal-drawing, which it is possible to describe more or less adequately to a draughtsman, and it is well enough done by Robert. But even here we question if the information conveyed is not already possessed by those to whom it can be of value. As for Mr. Walker's book, it is, like the others, very explicit in mechanical directions, and much more comprehensive, instructing the reader about art in general, and taking him as far in detail as technical perspective. We cannot refrain from giving one example of its convincing manner of enforcing important truths. Concerning the value of observation, it says (p. 8): "If a person were to travel, say, from Liverpool to London, and hold a looking-glass so as to have all the objects reflected in it as they were passed, on arriving in London there would be nothing left on the glass but the last image—perhaps the station; all the other myriads of objects would be gone. It is just so," etc., etc. All three books irresistibly recall such works as 'The Banjo without a Master,' and treatises purporting to teach legerdemain and ventriloquism in a few lessons, which it is well known to ingenuous youth are snares and delusions. We suspect the service done by all such is generally limited to the awakening or quickening of an interest in the subject.

—The permanence of American political institutions is a subject of public speculation considerably out of proportion to the private alarm which the question excites, but the discussion of it by a publicist such as Prof. Dwight, of the Columbia College Law School, is worth notice. It formed the subject of an address before the Hamilton College alumni last June, which has just been reprinted in a small pamphlet. Following the plan of such addresses, it is perhaps rather elaborate and elementary, and much of it might have been addressed to the author's law classes, but it recalls principles which do not just now receive the attention they deserve. The physical configuration of the country, and the unity in management demanded by the unity of nature, as well as the complicated system of government made necessary by a diversity of climate and productions; our inheritance of English political ideas and institutions, especially English parliamentary and criminal law, and of an English respect for court decisions; a popular conservatism, to which even modern England affords no parallel; the absence of powerful neighbors to force us to modify our theories, with the accompanying circumstance that our political and social life is thoroughly American and not international; the persistence of the religious sentiment, unaffected by modern theories of science and profoundly respected in America; the general prevalence of political virtue, "with due abatement for persistent office-seekers and people of that ilk"; "the readiness of the people to respond to appeals of a moral nature in the management of their public affairs"; the subdivision of land, and the facility of its acquisition and transfer; American systems of primary and secondary education, which are by no means perfect, but improving every decade; the growing interest of "our best citizens" in philanthropic schemes, whereby the latter are not devolved upon the Government; finally, the element of publicity, are reviewed by Prof. Dwight with confidence, but, it is to be said, without the neglect of qualifying considerations which renders a writer open to the charge of optimism. His explanation of American conservatism, we may add, is, first, the great variety of interests, and the difficulty of so innovating as to win the support of a majority; second, "the sentiment that there is nothing left for us to conquer," all great questions being settled, politics being now mainly administrative, and existing problems considered of too little consequence to awaken universal interest.

—Rhode Island's priority, in either hemisphere, in establishing the liberty of religious opinion among the bases of government, is a favorite theme with her writers. They cannot well treat it, nor are they particularly anxious to do so, without drawing an invidious comparison with Massachusetts, and it is natural for them to identify precedence with cause, and to attribute to Rhode Island the present degree of religious toleration throughout the United States at least. Among the local historians whose blood is still stirred by the circumstances which drove Roger Williams into the wilderness, is Dr. Henry E. Turner, of Newport. A paper read by him in February before the Rhode Island Historical Society has just been printed (and very badly printed) by the Newport Historical Publishing Co. Its title is, 'The Settlers of Aquidneck and Liberty of Conscience,' and it is occupied first with tracing the steps which compelled certain heretical Boston deputies to remove from the colony in March, 1638, to the northern end of Rhode Island, then known as Pocasset, and since as Portsmouth. The speedy division of the new colony and the founding of Newport; the subsequent reconciliation and political concord of the two settlements; and the careful preservation by statute of the principle of toleration in Providence, Warwick, and Rhode Island, are next successively illustrated from the records. "What do not Christianity, commerce, science, and the arts," concludes Dr. Turner, "owe to the three little communities which were driven from Massachusetts for nonconformity," etc. The way in which the obnoxious Boston deputies were rejected by the Massachusetts General Court in April, 1637 (which "found a means to send them home again, for that two of the freemen of Boston had not notice of the election"), seems to Dr. Turner to differ from the Maine frauds of last year only in having the decency of a plausible excuse. In general, however, this writer renders full justice to the Puritan character.

—Almost coincidently with the session of the American Association at Boston were held the meetings of the French and British Associations, the former at Rheims and the latter at Swansea. Judging from the meagre accounts that have as yet come to hand, it would appear that the French scientists were content with discussing subjects more of a special than of a general character, scarcely entering into those broad topics which it has of late been customary to associate with the addresses of their sister naturalists across the Channel. The presidential address of Prof. A. C. Ramsay, successor to Sir Roderick Murchison, as Director-General of the British Geological Survey, is a carefully elaborated statement of what might be termed chronological geology, setting forth the epochs and localities at which certain well-known physical phenomena have repeated themselves during the period of geological history. From the occurrence of metamorphism, volcanism, glaciation, and other geological "incidents" throughout almost the entire series of formations from the Laurentian to the Post-Tertiary, it is assumed to be shown that the forces operating these phenomena, as well as the phenomena themselves, differ neither in kind nor intensity from the similar forces and phenomena with which we are now more or less familiar. Prof. Ramsay, who is one of the few surviving geologists of note who can claim in their labors intimate relationship with nearly all the master minds of geological science from its foundation by William Smith to the present day, is strongly anti-cataclysmal in his views, and therefore a firm upholder of the Lyellian doctrine of uniformity. His conclusions, which are shared by the vast majority of living geologists, will probably not be considered as final by those who still delight in having recourse to unknown and visionary forces; and, indeed, it must be confessed it would be difficult from the examples furnished in the address to prove that, even if past and present forces and phenomena were equal in kind, they were likewise equal in intensity. The address of Dr. Günther, president of the biological section, treats of (scientific) museums, and ought to be carefully considered by all who are interested in the proper maintenance of institutions of this kind. It will be found very opportune in this country, where, in addition to the National Museum at Washington, there are at present a number of other museums which are in course of construction, or which have but lately been completed.

—Ole Bull died at his home on the island Lysö (Isle of Light), near Bergen, Norway, on Tuesday noon, August 17. He was born on the 5th of February, 1810, and ever since his remarkably successful appearance in Bologna in 1834, as a substitute for Beriot, his name has been before the public. His father, who was in very comfortable circumstances, wanted the boy to study theology, and had he acquiesced in his parent's wishes he would, no doubt, have been saved from many of the pecuniary embarrassments which troubled him in his early days. At the age of four or five years he could reproduce on a small violin all the songs he heard his mother sing, and at the age of eight he played the first violin at the Bergen Theatre. At the age of eighteen he was sent to the university, but failed in his examinations. In Christiania he also played at the theatre, and by the help of friends he was enabled in 1829 to go to Germany to seek instruction from the celebrated violinist Spohr, in Cassel. On Spohr's invitation he accompanied him to Nordhausen, where a concert was to be given. Here he heard Spohr and others play, but found their execution so cold that he left the concert overwhelmed with despair, thinking he must have mistaken his calling. He now joined some jolly students, who were returning from a Harz Mountain tour, and for the next two months there was "ein lustiges Leben" around Ole Bull's violin in Göttingen, where he made a pretence of studying law. After a visit to Norway, he next betook himself to Paris, and fared hardly for a year or two. When the cholera drove him from the boarding-house which had been found for him by the Swedish-Norwegian ambassador, he chanced to get lodgings with a lady who saw in the young man's countenance a striking resemblance to her son, who had recently died, and Mr. Bull himself became deeply attached to the lady's granddaughter, Alexandrine Félicité Villeminot, whom he afterwards married. On the 18th of April, 1832, he gave his first public concert in Paris, assisted by Ernst and other artists, and with a net profit of 1,400 francs. From this time we find him making rapid progress and giving a number of successful concerts in Switzerland and Italy, until he finally, in 1834, made his grand triumph at Bologna. In 1835 he played in Casa Lepre at Rome, where, after the performance of his famous "Polacca Guerriera," the sculptor Thorwaldsen sprang upon the stage and embraced him in the presence of an audience wild with enthusiasm. A few months later "the wild man from the North," as Jules Janin termed him in some extravagant eulogy in the Débats, was playing at the Opéra in Paris. In 1843 he first visited this country, creating a furore which is still remembered by many. In 1850 he built a theatre in Bergen, but soon got involved in litigation with the city authorities, and the theatre passed into other hands. In 1852 he bought a tract of land in Potter Co., Pennsylvania, on which he tried to form a Norwegian colony, but discovered that the parties who had sold him 120,000 acres did not own a foot of it. He again lost a large sum of money in useless litigation, and had to return to his violin. It was Ole Bull who found Jenny Lind, a girl of eighteen, ruining her voice in the Royal Opera in Stockholm. He laid the matter personally before the king, and succeeded in getting her sent to Paris, where she rapidly made her way to fame. Though always unlucky in his financial enterprises, he did not get out of tune with the world, but to the last was a man of a genial, cheerful nature, always ready to lend his professional services for charitable purposes. On one of his last visits to New York he played for the benefit of the Irish sufferers.

—It is true, however, that Ole Bull outlived his reputation, and that his later performances gave more distress than pleasure to connoisseurs. His own compositions were seldom written down, and the orchestra which accompanied him saw only its own score. His obituary biographers have fallen into numerous errors, owing mainly to their having followed the account of his life in Appleton's 'Cyclopædia.' No man was ever "killed" by Ole Bull in a duel. He never tried to "commit suicide by throwing himself into the Seine." He never "took part in a campaign in Algeria against the Kabyles with Gen. Yusuf." He never "established any national schools of literature and art in Norway." Nor does the 'Cyclopædia' state the facts correctly in regard to his Pennsylvania colony. His second wife was not "a German woman," as stated by most of the papers, but a Wisconsin lady, whose parents were born in New England. Her maiden name was Thorp, and with her he leaves not "a son," but a daughter nearly ten years old. Two children by his first wife are still living, a daughter and a son, Alexander, who, like his father, is an excellent violinist.

—Perthes, in Gotha, has just published a third edition of the 'Geschichte Alexanders des Grossen,' by Johann Gustav Droysen, a work the reputation of which is familiar to all students as the standard modern life of Alexander, and perhaps the best known work of this eminent historian (New York: B. Westermann & Co.) Droysen's point of view is that of the admirer and sympathizer, not as one dazzled by military successes, but as seeing in the career of the conqueror a great and wholesome plan, and an important epoch in history. It appears to him that the Particularismus of Greece had proved wholly incapable of remedy; with all admiration for the part which Athens had taken in the earlier struggles and national development, and with all recognition of the greatness and sincerity of Demosthenes and his compeers, he yet holds (p. 22) that their success at this juncture could have resulted only in a renewal of the old Athenian league, or the establishment of an Athenian empire, neither of which could build up a real unity of the Grecian states. The Macedonian leadership could alone unite Greece and conduct its united forces against Asia. In this conquering expedition, again, the historian sees conceptions and aims of the highest statesmanship. He does not attribute to Alexander (p. 221) the desire to carry out Aristotle's view, that the Grecian was formed by nature to rule over the barbarian, but a far more generous idea, to carry freedom and progress to the barbarians. It was with this view that, in his intercourse with the Asiatics, he assumed Asiatic dress and manners, while still meeting his own officers and soldiers in his old way. But this policy of placing the two nationalities on an equality offended his old officers. Hephaestion and Krateros comprehended and sympathized with it, but Parmenion was alienated; hence his downfall, which, by the way, the historian does not attempt to justify. There are five maps (plans of Granikos, Issos, Gaugamela, and the campaign against Poros, and a large map of Alexander's campaigns); but no index and only a very insufficient table of contents.

—Of the Sacred Books of the East, published by the Oxford University under the editorship of Prof. Müller, have just appeared three new volumes, numbered as iv., v., and vii. of the series (Macmillan). The two first concern the religion of Zoroaster: iv. is a translation, by the young French scholar, James Darmesteter, of the Vendidad, as first division of the Zend-Avesta; v., by E. W. West, gives a version of the Bundehesh and other documents, in Pehlevi, of the modern period of the religion. The remaining volume is a translation, by Prof. J. Jolly, of Würzburg, of the 'Institutes of Vishnu,' one of the Hindoo law-books of a class of which Manu is the leading and best-known representative. All are enriched with long and elaborate prefaces, which will be found of high value by scholars as well as by general readers. The one of widest interest, doubtless, is that of M. Darmesteter, which contains an account of the discovery and interpretation of the Avesta, of its formation as a collection, and of the origin and history of the religion. Some of the author's peculiar views—as the orderly and natural development of Zoroastrianism out of the primitive Indo-Iranian faith, and the non-historical character of Zoroaster—are opposed to those now prevalent, and will meet, as they have met, with much question and opposition; but no one will deny the ability with which they are put forth and supported.

DEXTER'S CONGREGATIONALISM.*

THERE is little risk in venturing the assertion that no work has issued from the American press for many years embodying the result of more diligent and intelligent research than this massive volume. On every page it bears abundant evidences of the painstaking labor that only follows from long and enthusiastic devotion to a particular subject. For the task which he has so zealously performed Dr. Dexter seems, to borrow a phrase of Milton, to have been "solemnly elected." He is a striking example of what his New England fathers would have termed foreordination. Born, he tells us in his preface, within ten miles of Plymouth Rock, with the blood of the earliest annalist of the old Colony coursing through his veins, it has been with him from childhood a filial duty to study the history of the Pilgrims, and in repeated visits to the Old World he has made it his aim to collect ample materials for further elucidating it. The present work, consisting of lectures given at the request of the authorities of the Andover Seminary, presents some of the results of those researches, yet is regarded by the author as merely preparing the way for the main work of his life. But while Dr. Dexter modestly terms the volume before us a mere episode, it is, in fact, an original contribution, of great importance, to our religious history. Though at first sight it might seem that the ecclesiastical annals of New England had been so thoroughly explored that nothing of value could be left to reward the most diligent research, yet it is a fact that some of the most curious and valuable material has not been brought to light until a very recent period. The manuscript of Governor Bradford's 'History' was only discovered, it will be remembered, a quarter of a century ago, and following, apparently, the useful hint that this discovery suggested, Dr. Dexter has been able to avail himself of sources to which none of the earlier historians of Puritanism had access. It is certainly an odd circumstance that to the zeal of some of the predecessors of the present Archbishops of Canterbury and York we owe the preservation of some of the most curious memorials of the early Separatists. But for the accident that in their libraries have been stored up many treatises, whose authors were either exiled or hung, we should be destitute of the most authentic material for tracing the early course of that religious movement in which, Dr. Dexter asserts, New England Congregationalism had its origin. The restrictions which for a long time closed these collections to historical students have been removed, and the author of this volume has enjoyed free access to works for which Neal and Cotton Mather sighed in vain. As a consequence, we are now placed in possession of a survey of the writings of the early advocates of the Congregational Church polity which, for exactness and comprehensiveness, has, so far as we know, nothing that can be compared with it.

With this abundance of new material, so intelligent and independent an enquirer as Dr. Dexter could hardly fail of arriving at some novel conclusions. Thus, he does not hesitate to claim a new hearing for Robert Browne, of whom he was fortunate enough to discover, among the treasures of the Lambeth Library, a sort of spiritual autobiography, and whom he pronounces, on the whole, a good and singularly clever man, though eccentric and probably insane. Respecting the authorship of the famous Martin Marprelate pamphlets he also advances a new theory, holding that they were the work, not of Job Throckmorton, as recently maintained by Arber, but of Henry Barrowe. Dr. Dexter, who has been the first to gain sight of the entire collection, is inclined to place a much higher estimate upon these tracts than the writers who have preceded him, but he surely forgets Piers Ploughman when he says "that they furnish the first instance in the English tongue of the employment of satire as a successful weapon against ecclesiastical wrong." Another instance of the author's willingness to run counter to popular opinion is found in the decided manner in which he argues that the famous saying reported of John Robinson had no such meaning as has been ascribed to it. The Leyden pastor, according to Dr. Dexter, did not speak after the manner of an "advanced thinker" of the present day, but had in mind simply the existing differences about church polity. With regard to the Congregationalism that came afterwards to be set up in New England, the author also presents some conclusions that do not accord precisely with commonly received opinions. New-Englanders as a class have been much inclined to exalt the faith and principles of their fathers, and no one has been more generally regarded as the head and front of New England Congregationalism than the famous John Cotton, the first minister of the Boston Church. But, according to Dr. Dexter, this is a mistaken notion, and the founders of New England did not clearly apprehend their own principles. For the first hundred years of its history Congregationalism, he assures us, was not consistent with itself, being, in fact, a modified form of Presbyterianism derived, not from Robert Browne, but from Henry Barrowe. In the opinion of Dr. Dexter, the true founder of Congregationalism, upon its pure democratic foundation, was John Wise, of Ipswich, whose reply to the "Proposals" of the Boston clergy embodied the first clear and cogent argument for unmixed popular rule as the only legitimate government for church or state. The author discusses with great fulness the functions of ecclesiastical councils, and undertakes to define the precise meaning of Congregationalism.

While disposed to recognize most heartily the unwearied research which this volume evinces, we must still be permitted to doubt whether the result which the author reaches is at all commensurate with the pains he has taken. Dr. Dexter is a zealous Congregationalist, and his evident aim throughout these lectures is to exalt the polity to which he is so sincerely attached; but we cannot resist the conclusion that he has been far more successful in establishing his own reputation as a learned and sagacious historical enquirer than in setting forth the attractiveness or the advantages of the ecclesiastical system whose origin and history he so faithfully explores. We cannot imagine that a Congregationalist, accustomed to dwell with pride upon the names that have rendered New England illustrious, will have his complacency much increased by the assurances that his ecclesiastical polity had its origin in the crude fancies of a man who lived to disavow his own opinions, and respecting whom the most charitable supposition that can be made is that he was mad. Nor is one who is not a Congregationalist likely to be persuaded of the advantage of that polity by the picture which Dr. Dexter gives us of the wretched bickerings of the exiles in Holland, who seem no sooner to have escaped persecution at home than they fell into most discreditable differences with one another. The controversy about Mrs. Johnson's gown is surely not calculated to heighten our respect for those early Separatists. Nor is it altogether pleasant to have the researches of Dr. Dexter strip John Robinson of the sole claim to distinction that raised him above the dead-level of his age. We respect the frankness with which the author of these lectures lays before us the results of his researches, but we fancy that the impression left on the minds of his more intelligent readers will not be precisely what he intended. As an exposition of Congregationalism as a system, this volume cannot be accepted as very satisfactory. Dr. Dexter's strength lies much more in laborious investigation than in philosophical exposition. He is more successful in ascertaining a fact than in estimating its significance, and possesses the aptitudes of an antiquary rather than a historian. Hence, when he undertakes to lay down general principles, he is not always consistent with himself. Thus, he makes Congregationalism consist essentially of two things, the complete autonomy of the local church and its relation to other churches by means of councils. By this definition the Independent churches of England have no claim to be called Congregational, yet he does not hesitate to insert an elaborate chapter on Congregationalism in England. Again, in his eagerness to deny to Unitarian churches the title of Congregational, he argues strongly that Congregationalism is not only a polity but a creed; yet the English Congregationalists not only have no formal creed, but the fact is notorious that they could not adopt one, that an immense majority of their ministers are only moderately Calvinistic, and that by many the doctrine of eternal punishment is no longer held. Dr. Dexter has a curious way of changing his tone. He claims for Robert Browne a place "among the great thinkers of Liberalism," yet resents it as a wrong that Robinson should be reckoned among "advanced thinkers." The reader is left somewhat puzzled with regard to the system which he so fondly presents as a type of the millennial church.

THE "POLICY OF PALMERSTON."*

DURING the elections in England many respectable Liberals tried to define their attitude in reference to foreign affairs by expressing their approval of the "policy of Palmerston." The formula meant, or was intended to mean, something. It was pretty well understood to imply that the candidate who used it did not endorse the policy of Lord Beaconsfield; it was supposed, further, to hint that he did not entirely approve of the peaceful and humanitarian tendencies attributed, whether rightly or not, to Mr. Gladstone. But, though this phraseology was not absolutely without signification, we may conjecture that its main merit was a certain sonorous vagueness which, while it impressed the audience, did not commit the speaker to the support of any very definite course of action; and, further, that even those Liberals who expressed with genuine fervor their admiration for a leader whose name is still popular with his countrymen, did not accurately define to themselves what, if any, were the peculiarities of Palmerston's statesmanship. Ideas, however, which are neither accurate nor well defined have often great weight with mankind, and persons engaged rather with the theoretical than with the practical aspects of politics may find a good deal of interest and instruction in studying the shorter and improved edition of the 'Life of Lord Palmerston,' with a view to discover (if may be) what were the essential traits of a policy which commanded the approval of the English nation.

The first and most salient feature of Lord Palmerston's statesmanship is, if one may be excused something like a bull, that it exhibits no fixed policy at all. He was not a man of abstract ideas; he was utterly unlike, for example, a leader such as Cobden, who pursued through life certain fixed notions which, whether one admires them or not, give the color to his whole career. He was, again, thoroughly unlike either such a noble dreamer as Mazzini or such an ignoble dreamer as Louis Napoleon. Of dreams or visions, of abstract ideas, of fixed and immutable lines of policy, the English premier knew nothing. From such things both his defects and his merits kept him aloof. His moral fibre was rather tough. No man of keen susceptibilities would have hastened to greet the President when Louis Napoleon's hands were dripping with the blood of slaughtered citizens. He was also—and herein lay the strength of his nature—full of life, and, within a limited range of vision, saw things as they were. If he overlooked the moral defects, he saw the political strength of the President's position with an insight displayed by no other Englishman but Walter Bagehot. This freedom from the influence of ideas or dreams made Palmerston from first to last a "hand-to-mouth" statesman. With great energy, with great tact, and often with pre-eminent success, he met the wants of the day as they arose. Sufficient for the day were, in his eyes, the good and the evil thereof. Philosophers and enthusiasts will be inclined to think that to call a political leader a hand-to-mouth statesman is to condemn his statesmanship. But in truth this is not so. The one certain fact of politics is the limited power possessed by mankind of making forecasts of the future. Mr. Senior has with patient accuracy recorded the speculations of almost all the most eminent foreign statesmen who lived and talked during the last thirty years. With two exceptions—Thiers and De Tocqueville—no one of them foresaw anything even of the immediate future; and though the cleverest of Frenchmen showed that he could cast a keen glance over the surface of politics, and the most profound political critic of the age certainly proved that a genius for analysis could be applied as powerfully to the present as to the past, yet the happy hits of even Thiers or De Tocqueville must be balanced against a hundred unhappy blunders. But, if all the acuteness of some of the acutest observers the world has seen proved unable to penetrate the secrets of the future even for a few years, the inference (confirmed by every page of history) must necessarily be drawn that politics cannot at present be based on supposed calculations of what is likely to happen in the future, but must in the main consist in endeavors to deal with the immediate and pressing needs of each day. Hand-to-mouth statesmanship is the statesmanship of common sense.

Nor let theorists suppose that this kind of policy requires for its successful discharge talents of a common or low order. It is in one sense more difficult of execution than schemes such as those of Mr. Cobden's, which are wholly governed by one or two obvious considerations. To promote free-trade and at all costs to secure peace may be noble objects; but the man who makes the attainment of these ends the sole scope of his efforts greatly simplifies the problems of his statesmanship. For their solution he needs one or two great gifts, but he may dispense with many of the talents, such as the experience, the promptitude, the coolness, the versatility, the knowledge of men, which are absolutely essential to the success of a minister whose aim it is to deal successfully with each of the complicated affairs of life as they in turn require his attention. What is above all needed by a statesman such as Palmerston is the capacity instinctively to recognize the relative value of the forces of which he can dispose, and of the forces with which he may come into conflict. To have in the main estimated fairly the immediate importance of the forces with which he had to deal seems at bottom to have been Palmerston's greatest claim to fame. He occasionally made bold strokes. He at least twice defeated Guizot. He supported Turkey against Russia and carried her through the contest with success. He estimated at pretty well its right figure both the strength and the weakness of Louis Napoleon, and in consequence stood firmly by Italy, and, without risking either English blood or English money, secured the most beneficial diplomatic triumph which has ever been achieved by an English statesman. Yet if his course of action be critically examined it will be found that Palmerston never acted with vigor unless he had secured force adequate to carry out his objects. He took the greatest care to be perfectly sure, before going into action, that he was supported by English sentiment, and further either that the task was one which England was powerful enough to accomplish alone, or that England was well provided with allies. Whenever he doubted his strength for a fight he held aloof or drew back. He detested Austria, yet he declined to interpose in favor of Hungary. He probably wished to help Denmark, yet no taunts would tempt him into a contest in which he might without a single ally have been called upon to meet the combined armies of Germany. He dealt summarily with the affair of the Trent, but, though he showed very little moral appreciation of the true issues involved in the war of secession, he declined all propositions which would have involved Great Britain in a contest with the United States. He knew that England was powerful, and acted on the knowledge; but he also knew, what his modern imitators forget, that a country may be a great power without being all-powerful, and acted as constantly with an eye to the limits as to the extent of English power.

The second and most obvious trait of Palmerstonian statesmanship is that it was governed by the conviction that an English minister is bound to consult the interests of England and to make his policy conform wholly to her interests. This is a doctrine which in recent times has met with much vituperation; but surely, if properly understood, it is open to no valid objection. A minister is the agent, not the master, of the nation. Like every other agent, high or low, he is bound to act for the benefit of his principal. In matters of business no one questions this maxim. A manager or an attorney who insisted upon doing acts of charity or generosity with his employer's money would certainly be cashiered, and probably might be compelled by a court of justice to refund the money he had wasted. Why should not the same rule apply to the agent who transacts the business of a nation? The reply generally is that to maintain the doctrine for which we are contending, and which every statesman worth his salt invariably in practice adopts, is equivalent to asserting that a politician is not bound by any rules of morality. This we utterly deny. A minister may find that the course which a nation is bent on pursuing is one to which he cannot lend a hand. Many Englishmen would have felt that no just man could have countenanced any scheme for giving English aid to the efforts of the Southern Confederacy. Let us suppose for a moment that England had been bent on this course. The duty of a statesman would have been clear: he ought to have retired from the Government. Here, again, the analogy of business applies. To say that an agent must look wholly to his principal's interests is very far from the same thing as saying that an agent is bound to carry out the business say of smuggling or slave-trading. Moreover, a man who goes into public life at all must almost of necessity be prepared to act on the assumption, which is perfectly justifiable, that the prosperity of his country is bound up with the prosperity of the world. Palmerston, at least, never opposed in his own mind the welfare of England to the welfare of other countries. He had none of the elements of a reformer: he was therefore saved from the grave error of confusing the functions of a prophet with those of a statesman. But it would be the gravest injustice to deny that in looking after the interests of England he did much for the freedom of mankind.

For the third and the best trait of Palmerston was his genuine dislike to oppression, and his keen perception of the fact that the interests of England were bound up with the cause of general liberty and of national independence. He was the true heir and disciple of Canning. On this matter he has scarcely received full justice. He, like his teacher, was far ahead of the statesmen who had preceded them. He, like his teacher, was constantly found fighting on what has proved to be the right side. He founded Belgian independence; he aided Greece; he supported constitutional government in Spain and Portugal; he was the firm friend of Italy; he withstood the aggressive despotism of Nicholas. Even his friendliness for Louis Napoleon (by far the worst point in his career) had this amount of justification, that he perceived far more clearly than most Englishmen that foreign courts hated the President, not because he had overthrown a republic, but because he might be expected to aid oppressed nationalities. In any case, though Lord Palmerston's judgment may in this, as in other instances, have suffered from a certain want of fine moral feeling, there is no doubt that in the main the bias of his mind was in harmony with English love of freedom. This is the point on which he differed far and wide from the miserable plagiarists who have in later days caught up his phrases without imbibing his spirit. Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Beaconsfield's followers have, from some fatal association of ideas, fancied that the interests of England were hostile to human freedom. The Austrian, the Pope, the Turk have each in turn enlisted their sympathies. They admired Louis Napoleon till Louis Napoleon attempted to deliver Italy. Hence, in their hands, pursuit of the interests of England has always meant hostility to the welfare of the world. From this error Lord Palmerston was free. If he followed the interests of England, he also made them promote the independence of Belgium, of Switzerland, and of Italy. Hence the constant harmony of his policy with what may be called the average moral tone of the English people. It was certainly not Quixotic, it was not heroic; but it was based on good sense, it was manly and simple. If it did not appeal to the highest feelings, still less did it pander to the baser forms of national vanity and self-interest. England might do far worse than adhere to the "policy of Palmerston."

RECENT NOVELS.*

'BEAUTY'S DAUGHTERS,' by the anonymous author of 'Airy, Fairy Lilian,' a book that had a great popular success, we believe, a year or two ago, is great trash of the fast but innocent order. It is founded clearly enough on Rhoda Broughton, but its successful imitation is confined to the constant use of the present tense, a vicious trick now grown threadbare, one would say. The author may claim the invention of a new type of hero, perhaps, the fortunate lover of one of the "daughters" being a man who has injured his spine on the hunting-field, and is introduced to his future wife as a bed-ridden invalid. The beautiful amiability of the pair is such that we experience some relief when after a year of matrimony an able young doctor restores the hero to a fair degree of health and strength. The second "daughter" achieves matrimonial happiness after the usual jealous struggle with the charming young widow and former love of her husband. There are a pair of friends nicknamed Brandy and Dandy who fill in odd corners and flirt with the widow till her time to be remarried comes, and a sharp young girl who is developing into a third "daughter."

'A New Race' is the rather misleading title of Mrs. Wister's latest translation from the German, which has the qualities, albeit a good deal diluted, of its predecessors. The heroine, whose mother has been wrongfully deprived by her husband's family of her fortune, is reinstated by her grandfather, who accomplishes the task, however, by something very like sharp practice, which his desire for revenge justifies to him. After his death she attempts to redress the wrong her cousin has suffered at his hands, and her success is followed by their happy marriage, and "the new race" that grows up in the old castle promises to inherit only the virtues of its ancestors—a fulfilment that would certainly entitle it to a new label. The story, it will be seen, is sufficiently mild, though it has romantic episodes.

'The Octagon Club' is a novel with a purpose; but the purpose changes its aspect so frequently, and so hopelessly entangles the thread of the narrative, that it is difficult to judge of the outcome. The briefest statement is that there are two happy marriages concluded in the intervals of long speculations on the problems of life and the world, and that the author's decision is that a modified communism is the next change to be met, that America is best fitted of all countries to meet it, and that in the ensuing conflict woman will take a lofty position.

For a harrowing tale of unrelieved misery commend us to Helen Campbell's 'Unto the Third and Fourth Generations.' It has no literary merit that we can discover, unless an intention to elaborate the horrors to which a fanatical Calvinism may lead can be so called, or a depressing effect upon the reader be proof of literary power. The depression here produced, however, is of the nature of that excited by accounts of the execution of common criminals, and is relieved of intensity, and at the same time of dignity, by a certain ghastly absurdity. A virtuous young woman falls in love with a noble and true-hearted scapegrace, and, in spite of her father's curse, marries him. In a fit of passion he knocks down a man whom a casual sailor subsequently robs and kills. Robert's act has been witnessed by his closest friend; he is indicted, pleads guilty to the murder he supposes he must have committed, and is convicted of robbery and murder. Spite of his wife's efforts, duly detailed, he is forthwith hanged. Then she has to watch his grave to keep off the body-snatchers. When her son is born she considers that his father's curse is upon him, and through his boyhood religiously refrains from kissing him This son goes West; is befriended by the witness against his father, who thus expiates his sorrow at having being obliged to testify in the case, and falls in love with this gentleman's daughter. They are about to be married when Robert's son discovers the reason of his patron's kindness and haughtily throws the young woman over. The truth about the casual sailor comes out, and then the young man feels free to wed the daughter of the man who had got his father unjustly hanged. After the marriage his mother "pressed his lips with the first mother's kiss they had ever known." This is the first gleam of sunshine, but it is soon shut in, the rest of the book, which chronicles the death of the mother, being, however, in the subdued tone of chastened and consecrated sorrow, as such writers conceive it.

'A Stranded Ship' is the least unimportant of three stories, by L. Clarke Davis, which are bound together. The hero, who murders his best friend in the first chapter and subsequently leads a life of alternate dissipation and benevolence, in the last chapter risks his life to rescue the passengers of a wrecked ship. The last saved proves to be the supposed murdered man returning from foreign parts to clear his friend's name of a false charge. The change, conspicuous in this book and the last mentioned, from the old way of dealing with crime in fiction is, perhaps, worth notice, and suggests that if the moral accountability is to depend upon the legal aspect of the case, sagacious murderers who will choose victims of vigorous constitutions might be invented, that the reader may be left in no uncertainty as to the hero's real worth during the progress of the story.

'Uncle Jack's Executors,' without serious claims on the attention, is written with sufficient brightness to find many readers. The author, however, should be capable of better work, and may be advised to eschew melodramatic absurdity more attentively than she has here done, in spite of her assurance that her book is not of the class of "astonishing, convulsionary literature." It is also to be remarked that her literary theories are not important, and that a curbing of the wit which is, nevertheless, what makes the volume readable would be an experiment worth trying. The best indication of her power is a character belonging to the order of Mrs. Nickleby.

The heroine of 'Ethel Dutton,' it may be confidently affirmed, would escape a lunatic asylum only within the covers of a particularly absurd novel.

'After Many Years' is all about kidnapped children and the conduct of an old-fashioned villain, who successfully postpones the explanation and happy termination until the closing chapters.

'Rev. Mr. Dashwell' is intended to pillory the sensational preacher who makes a trade of his profession, and readers of the book will wish the design had been better executed.

'Elsie's Widowhood' belongs to the Sunday-school series of 'Elsie Stories,' and calls for no comment, except the obvious one that the indefiniteness with which it is clear such a series may be prolonged must rob it of verisimilitude to any but very young readers.

Some of the 'Strange Stories' by Erckmann-Chatrian here collected we have a vague remembrance of having met with in some of the old magazines now not only discontinued but forgotten, at a time when these prolific authors were many years younger than they now are. At all events, such a haven is best adapted to their draught, and at present they seem as much out of date as they must always have been out of literature properly so understood. The best works of MM. Erckmann-Chatrian have a certain seriousness in light matters that bespeaks their Alsatian origin, but these little stories are completely German in the deliberateness of their weirdness and the sang-froid, so to speak, with which they rely for it upon the unexplained supernatural. Nothing like Poe's handling of psychological phenomena, or Hawthorne's fancy, or even De Quincey's, is to be discovered in them, and with the best intentions to the contrary they will keep no one awake nights; but they are readable enough, and they are sufficiently dread and romantic to be finished if once begun, which is getting to be fair commendation in the case of old-fashioned ghost-stories.

Report to the Trustees of the James Lick Trust of observations made on Mount Hamilton with reference to the location of Lick Observatory. By S. W. Burnham. (Chicago 1880. 4to, 32 pp. and plates.)—It is gratifying to learn that at last the difficulties in the way of carrying out the provisions of Mr. Lick's magnificent bequest of $700,000 for the establishment of the "most powerful" telescope in the world at some point in California have been overcome, and that active steps are being taken in this important matter. A circular of the Trustees introducing the document before us reads as follows:

"The Trustees of the Lick Observatory, in presenting the accompanying report, beg to say that they will be glad to receive the publications of Observatories, and of Astronomical and Scientific Societies, for the permanent library of the Lick Observatory; and take this occasion to state that the preliminary work on Mount Hamilton has already been commenced, and will be prosecuted as rapidly as is possible under the circumstances. The smaller equatorial, of twelve inches aperture, has been ordered of Alvan Clark & Sons, and will be placed in position early in 1881; and the great equatorial, meridian circle, and other instruments, will be contracted for at an early day. It is not expected there will be any further delay in putting the Lick Observatory in complete working order, other than that incident to the importance and magnitude of the undertaking."

It is known that after various places had been proposed, Mr. Lick finally settled on the summit of Mount Hamilton, in Santa Clara County, as the site for the proposed observatory. This mountain is twenty-six miles by the road (thirteen miles in a straight line) from San José, which is itself about fifty miles by rail from San Francisco. The county of Santa Clara has built an excellent carriage-way to the top, the grade being kept at less than six feet and a half in one hundred by windings. An approximately level space of about four hundred feet long, and of width varying from forty to one hundred and twenty feet, is four thousand two hundred and fifty feet above the sea-level, and commands the entire country within forty miles around. It became a serious question as to whether this isolated summit was a suitable place for the establishment of so important an observatory as is contemplated, and, acting on the advice of Professors Newcomb and Holden of the Naval Observatory at Washington, the trustees invited Mr. Burnham, of Chicago, the noted observer and discoverer of double stars, to make preliminary observations on the mountain to test the question. The plan was for Mr. Burnham to take his own telescope (a six-inch, by Alvan Clark) from Chicago to Mount Hamilton, and to observe at the latter place the objects with which he was familiar at home. The gain of establishing an observatory at this elevation would be tested by the comparative ease with which difficult known double stars could be seen, and by the new ones which might be discovered. There is probably no observer in the country whose opinion on this special point would be more valuable.

In pursuance of this plan, Mr. Burnham remained on the mountain from August 17 to October 16, 1879, inclusive. For the whole period of sixty days he divides the nights, astronomically, as follows:

First-class nights	42
Medium nights	7
Cloudy and foggy nights	11

By a first-class night Mr. Burnham means such a one as occurs in Chicago not more than ten or twelve times a year—a night when the most difficult and delicate measures are practicable, when the air is not only clear but steady, so that stars are bright but do not twinkle. A peculiarity of the vision on Mt. Hamilton is that the night, if good at any part, is good throughout, which is quite different from experience at lower stations, or at the few high ones that have been tested. The quality of the vision during the day was inferior to this; it was clear, but the images of stars, etc., were not tranquil. Hence only certain observations of the sun can be prosecuted with special advantage here. The indications are that in all observations of stars or planets this is a site better fitted for a new and well-equipped observatory than any other in the world. The remarkable dryness of the air seems to be connected with its excellent quality for astronomical work. Mr. Burnham's report contains a great number of measures of known double stars, and of new ones discovered, and to the astronomer the examination of this list is the surest proof of the conclusions he has reached.

It appears that an admirable site has been selected, and that a suitably-equipped observatory placed here cannot fail to be of important service. It is understood that preliminary plans for cheap, commodious, and serviceable buildings have been prepared, and that some of the instruments, at least, will soon be in position. Only a part of the endowment will be spent for outfit, the balance remaining as a fund for maintenance. The conservative spirit shown in the plans already carried out promises a career of useful work to this latest of the great observatories of the world.

Chinese Buddhism. By Rev. Joseph Edkins, D.D. (London: Trübner & Co.; Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1880.)—The subject of "Chinese Buddhism" must always be an interesting one, if only on account of the number of people who belong to that section of the Buddhist community. In fact, in one way or other the whole of what is called Northern Buddhism (except, perhaps, that form of it known in Nepal) is connected with China. The Thibetan and Mongolian books were mostly translated from Chinese versions of the Buddhist Scriptures, whilst the Japanese use the same sacred canon as is generally accepted in China. We are compelled, therefore, to examine these translations if we would understand the character of the religion founded on them. Dr. Edkins, from his long residence in China and his acquaintance with its language, is well able to give us much information on the subject. The present work, however, is not so much the result of his latest reading and examination of the Buddhist religion as it is a reproduction in a continuous form of his treatises and essays already published. This, of course, is a great advantage to those who are unable to obtain the magazines, etc., in which the original papers appeared; but it is disappointing to others who looked for some new work and wider research from the hands of this trustworthy writer.

The plan of the book is an excellent one. The author first gives us a life of Buddha from the time of his birth till he entered Nirvâna. From what particular work he derives his information on this subject we are not told. There are more than ten distinct treatises in China professing to give the life of Buddha. Perhaps that found in the Vinaya Pitaka is the most reliable. The shortest and most interesting, however, is that known as the Pen-k'i-king. From whatever sources Dr. Edkins gathered his materials, they are tolerably correct, though we must object to the restoration of Godinia for Kâuṇḍinya, and it is to be regretted that such an error as that found on p. 35, and the note at the foot of the page, should have remained uncorrected. The Chinese Ho-shang cannot be derived from Upâsaka. In fact, Dr.

Edkins seems to be aware of the mistake when he implies, on p. 143, that the original Sanskrit form of the word was Upâdhyâya, although here again he endorses the strange error of Dr. Eitel, who translates the simple phrase ts'in-kian-sse by "self-taught teacher," instead of "personal instructor."

Following the life of Buddha we have a good chapter (the fifth) on the Patriarchs of the Northern Buddhists. This is a very important study. It is probable that many events recorded about these patriarchs may contain some historical truth. For example, the patriarch Upagupta, the fourth in succession, is unknown in the South, but in the North he is celebrated as being a contemporary of Aśoka, and the first who introduced a schism into the Buddhist Church. This may probably account for the succession of Theras in the South agreeing with the North no further than Sonaka or Sanakavâsa, after whom we have only one patriarch before Aśoka the Good. And here again comes in the question about the two Aśokas, and whether the Southern patriarch Siggava was not the orthodox successor of Sonaka, in the place of Upagupta. Take, again, the patriarch Singalaputra, the twenty-fourth in the list; we have an important record of this priest that he was the last of the line who dwelt in the Northern regions bordering on the Swat River, and that he and thousands of his followers were slaughtered by Mahwakûla. This king probably lived about 450 A.D., so that we may from this date, if it be correct, gather roughly the date of the patriarch and his predecessors. Anyhow, these questions are mixed up with the history of the patriarchs, and are deserving of notice.

In his sketch of the history of Buddhism in China Dr. Edkins shows his extensive reading and accurate judgment. This portion of his book, as it appeared in the Shanghai Almanac many years ago, attracted general notice in China, and has been frequently made use of by other writers on the subject. Our author is at home, too, when treating on the T'ien T'ai school of Buddhism; his visits among the secluded monasteries where Chi-k'ai, the founder of this school, lived and died in the sixth century, have been recorded among his essays in the Almanac referred to before, and the accounts are full of interest and instruction. The least satisfactory part of the work is the translation of the Shaster known as the Ekasloka (cap. xix.) We have always felt surprise at Dr. Edkins's version of the opening verse (Gâthâ) of this short treatise. Surely the right translation of the first line of this verse is not "My body (or substance) in its nature is not permanent," but "The nature of self-existent substance (swabhâva) is impermanency." The entire treatise is intended to overthrow the swabhâvika school of Buddhism, and so it is explained in the sequel of the Shaster, although Dr. Edkins restores the original words used in the Chinese to "*sub*hava," which has no meaning. We must also object to the translation found on page 316, where the well-known phrase yih-ts'ie-fa is strangely rendered "all acts," as though the meaning of ye dhammâ could be doubted as referring to all phenomenal existence.

These and other imperfections are much to be regretted. We want some careful account of Chinese Buddhism from a resident scholar in that country; Dr. Edkins is the best qualified person to write on the subject. It requires something more, however, than a mere reproduction of old matter to put the question as it is now understood before the student. If this work should reach a second edition, it is to be hoped the author will carefully revise it and give the world the result of his latest reading on the subject.

Deutsche Urzeit. Von Wilhelm Arnold. (Gotha: Friedrich Andreas Perthes. 12mo, pp. 441. 1879.)—The distinguished historian of the German cities, Professor Wilhelm Arnold, has of late years devoted himself especially to the earlier period of German history. His 'Wanderungen und Ansiedelungen der deutschen Stämme,' published a few years ago, is now followed up by 'Deutsche Urzeit' (The Primitive Age of Germany), in which he gives, in a compendious form, a complete account of the early history, institutions, and customs of the Germans. It is in two books, each containing four chapters; the first book, the history, contains Præhistoric Migrations, the Contests with the Romans, the "Pfahlgraben," and the Formation of New Races; the second book, on the internal condition of the Germans, treats of their Civilization, Art of War, Constitution, and Religion. The special feature of the earlier work, 'Wanderungen und Ansiedelungen,' was the attempt to trace the history of society by the aid of local names; this was equally remarkable for detailed knowledge, ingenuity, and sound judgment, and the book has been uniformly recognized as a very valuable contribution to early German history. In the present work we have the principal results of these investigations presented summarily and in connection with the information derived from other sources. In treating of the Thuringians, for example, he points out (p. 169) that the suffix leben is found in a series of towns reaching from northern Schleswig to the neighborhood of Würzburg, and nowhere else. This fact he brings in connection with the fact that Angles were found in Thuringia as well as among the Saxons, and draws the inference that there had been a migration of this Lower-German nation from the Cimbric Peninsula into the heart of Germany. We find on page 165 the useful remark that national names as names of localities (e.g., *Thüringen*hausen and Holz*engel*) indicate either scattered places of foreign settlers, or, in old times, frontier places. Perhaps the most original part of the book is the chapter upon the Pfahlgraben, or line of fortifications carried from the Rhine in the neighborhood of Mentz to the Danube by Domitian and Hadrian; probably the great historical importance of this work has never before been adequately shown. It made, he thinks, the turning point in the history of the Germans. Southwestern Germany now became Roman territory, under the name Agri Decumates (either tithe-lands or measured lands), while the Germans beyond this enclosure were for a long series of years checked in their incursions and migrations. From this time, therefore, begins definitely their settlement in permanent habitations, and their transition from a half-nomadic to an agricultural life. Two hundred years later the enfeebled Empire could no longer withstand their attacks, and the Limes ceased to be a boundary; but the Germans proper had by this time passed completely out of their nomadic condition. The great civilizing work of the structure had been accomplished.

Professor Arnold takes an intermediate position in regard to two important questions which have been hotly disputed, chiefly between Frenchmen and Germans. In his view the Germans of Cæsar and Tacitus were neither savages nor peasants of the nineteenth century; they were, he says (p. 216), "wandering tillers of the soil, or agricultural nomads, as one pleases." And the apparent discrepancies between Cæsar and Tacitus he explains rationally by pointing out that there were a hundred and fifty years between the two historians, and that the account given by Tacitus represents a somewhat more advanced state of society than Cæsar's. The second question is the nature of the conquest, and this he reminds us differed widely in different countries. "It was an essentially different thing whether they [the Germans] were only tolerated in the Empire, colonized as subject to military duty, or taken into the pay of the Emperor, as was the case in the main even with the Visigoths, Burgundians, and Ostrogoths; or whether they went actively to work, took possession of Roman soil by the right of conquest, and established things as they pleased—in other words, became masters, as the Anglo-Saxons, the Vandals, and afterwards the Langobards, did" (p. 183). He does not say, it will be noticed, in which category the Franks belonged.

Elementary Treatise on Electric Batteries. Translated from the French of Alfred Niaudet. (New York: John Wiley & Sons. 1880.)—M. Niaudet's work is an illustrated cyclopædia of electric batteries, containing a brief history of their origin, and describing in detail the construction and modes of operation of all the forms of batteries known. Plain definitions are given of the few technical terms employed, and the "general remarks" interspersed through the work explain so much of the science of the subject as is necessary to enable the reader to comprehend the peculiarities of the various kinds of batteries, and their especial adaptability to different uses. The translation is almost literal, and preserves the simple, direct style of the author. As is justly said in the short preface by Mr. George D'Infreville, of this city, "Telegraphers generally will find many of their frequently-recurring problems solved in its pages," the perspicuity of which will save both inventors and investigators from useless experiment, while at the same time offering them new fields for careful research.

The Week.

THERE is no State in which the Republican platform comes so near being a real enunciation of principles honestly held, in the language of every-day life, as that of Massachusetts. The platform adopted by the Convention at Worcester on the 15th is the first on either side which acknowledges what everybody knows to be true, that gold and silver are of unequal value, and that it is absurd to talk of the paper currency as redeemable in both on equal terms, and points out the danger of continuing the present silver coinage, and calls for the repeal of the Silver Bill. It also calls in detail for that reform of the mode of appointment and conditions of tenure in the civil service to which the party was solemnly pledged by the convention which nominated Mr. Hayes, and which nearly every Republican politician of note has ever since either ridiculed or evaded. The reasons it gives, too, for dreading the return of the Democrats to power are expressed with the clearness and moderation and comprehensibility of the ordinary conversation of intelligent business men, and must commend themselves to all that class. They are: the danger of sweeping and ill-considered changes in the tariff, and the destruction of the national banking system; the certainty that no reform of the civil service is to be expected from the party which originated the "spoils" system, and has carried it out during the last four years wherever it has had the power, and has refrained from legislation, or attempt at legislation, in that direction; the preponderance among Democrats of the advocates of inflation and various forms of repudiation; the probability that, if in possession of the three branches of the Government, the Democrats would initiate legislation for the exclusive benefit of the States lately in rebellion; and the unscrupulousness displayed in the attempt to usurp the State government in Maine last winter, and in the means resorted to to suppress the negro vote in several Southern States.

Mr. Conkling began his "support" of Garfield by a speech in the Academy of Music on Friday. We have commented on some features of it elsewhere. The argument against the right of the South to share in the Government drawn from its poverty was, as we have shown, based in large part on delusive statistics, and was extraordinary as a formal presentation of the Republican party as par excellence the party of the wealthy, and as an assertion of the danger of giving political power to small taxpayers. The true measure of Southern interest in the Government and in good order is the total amount of its production and the total amount of its consumption—data which Mr. Conkling carefully avoided giving. The most effective portion of the speech was the account of the gradual disappearance of the Republican vote at the South in recent elections; of the dislike and possible modification of the Supreme Court by the Democrats; of the Democratic hostility to the Army; of the claims against the Government on "ex-rebel" account which may be made good by legislation without violating the Fourteenth Amendment, and of the probable Democratic indifference to the public credit. It was, however, in the prominence given to General Grant, and in the insulting allusion to President Hayes, and in the slighting commendation of General Garfield, very distinctly intended as a vindication of Mr. Conkling himself rather than as a statement of the claims of the Republican party on popular confidence. The Republicans who fancy they help the party by producing speeches of this kind are, we fear, mistaken.

One of the chief reasons why politicians of the Conkling class possess the powers of mischief and of demoralization which they make so much use of, and of the contempt in which they hold the press, is to be found in the subservient way in which the newspapers of their own party allow their most sophistical and unscrupulous utterances to pass whenever they seem in the least likely to "help the party." One of the functions of the press is to expose and explode such attempts at imposition as these statistics about the South which Mr. Conkling produced the other night. There is probably no Republican editor in this city who did not perceive their fallacy as soon as they were uttered, and the monstrosity of the inferences he drew from them; but they all printed them nevertheless, and commented on them as if they were valuable contributions to the political thought of the day. A party press is a useful and respectable thing, but a press which allows itself to become the claque of the class of statesmen to which Mr. Conkling belongs, need not wonder if its claims on public confidence and respect are constantly disputed.

The calculation by which a Fusion majority of one thousand for Governor in Maine was reported last week was subsequently upset by unexpected Republican gains in the districts not then heard from. Both candidates are now claiming a plurality, and perhaps the official count alone can decide between them. The total vote, upwards of 147,000, is surprisingly large, exceeding that of last September by more than 10,000; but the two parties maintain their neck-and-neck relation in an equally wonderful manner. Our late comments remain unaffected by the see-saw in the returns: the 8,000 missing Republicans are still missing, and the explanation which we offered of their absence, and which we discuss at length in the present issue, is confirmed by the candid, if reluctant, Maine correspondence of the Boston Advertiser. "No place," it discreetly says, "has been reserved for the class of voters who are disposed to dissent from some views of the managers, and to dislike the perpetual rule of a few prominent men. There has been a decided attempt to smother any endeavors to liberalize the party here." Likewise, it is added, the erring Republican Greenbackers have been unwisely rebuked and repulsed. "Plantation manners" are darkly hinted at; and, worse still, "property in man was rendered out of the question in Mississippi, but something very like it was counted a perquisite in Maine." Some Republicans, it seems, were so sensitive as to resent the managers' assault on Mr. Hayes's administration. "Liberty in the party" was, however, denied them, and "the sight of a 'scratcher' in this State excites comment which would be appropriate to the vision of a rebel flag."

The difficulty of satisfactorily interpreting the "victory," with which the Democrats have had to contend, has been in some degree of a practical as well as of a moral nature. General Hancock courageously hastened to forestall scepticism by sending a despatch of enthusiastic congratulation to General Plaisted; but, although the latter replied with courtesy and apparent cordiality, he also signed himself to some alarmed New Jersey Greenbackers "Yours for Weaver and Chambers," and the National Greenback Committee accepted his supposed success as a triumph over "the Bourbon Democracy" as much as over Blaine. There seems to be no doubt that the Greenbackers, as such, have everywhere shown a disposition to appropriate all the moral effect there was, and in Indiana especially it has stiffened their necks in the most ominous manner. On Tuesday, too, when the Maine Greenbackers met to ratify the Democratic scheme of Presidential electors—namely, three Democrats and four Greenbackers—there was a bolt on the part of those who valued fusion only for local issues, and a pure Weaver ticket was made up and will undoubtedly obtain a large support. This doubly assures the State vote for Garfield.

The estimated probability of the fate of the Arkansas repudiating amendment ranges from 5,000 majority for to 10,000 majority against the measure. The great moral lesson of the election for the Democracy and for the country at large is therefore still obscure. Except in a few counties the Greenbackers exhibited the greatest weakness, while in half a dozen or more the Republicans achieved a complete success in electing their local candidates. The total vote was unprecedentedly large—130,000, or about one in six of the population (790,000) ascribed to the State by the Stalwart compiler of the table showing the Southern census frauds. The Maine vote, we observe in comparison, was about one in four and a half of the total population (147,000 out of 647,000), which is, we think, a higher ratio than our political cipherers are wont to allow in such cases. Here, however, every nerve was strained to bring every voter to the polls; but who knows the extent of the stay-at-home vote in Arkansas, ex hypothesi a bull-dozing community?

The Democratic dissensions in Virginia have never afforded any substantial ground for Republican encouragement, and the result of the conference last week between the hostile factions is of small interest from a national point of view. There are, it will be remembered, three electoral tickets in the field—Republican, Funder, and Readjuster—of which the last two are pledged to Hancock. The Readjuster ticket was nominated solely for the purpose of demonstrating its "strength" and title to Federal patronage in the event of Hancock's election, there being no State officers chosen this fall in Virginia. The Funders, or regular Democrats, becoming alarmed—at the danger of the Republican ticket "slipping through," according to their own accounts, and according to their opponents at the imminent disclosure of their weakness—proposed a compromise, by the terms of which each faction was to have five electors and the eleventh was to be chosen by lot or by the National Committee. This the Readjusters declined, and proposed instead submitting the question of numerical superiority to "the people" at a primary election. The Funders amended this by substituting "Democrats" for "the people," whereupon Mahone adjourned his Committee, and the Funders, of necessity, followed suit. It is obvious that Mahone represents a minority of the whites and relies largely on the negroes, whom he speaks of as "faithful allies." The negroes, of course, are the only Republicans of the State, and the majority of those who pay their capitation tax will vote for Hancock. The Times correspondent cannot find it in his heart to blame them after their bitter disappointment that the saviour of their race was not nominated at Chicago. A Republican paper of Richmond, in changing its colors, says: "There may be Republicans who by some mysterious influence have been chained, roped, or screwed on to this inanimate thing called the Garfield ticket; but we are not of that kind, and propose to serve the Republican party in a more practical, sensible, and efficient way." This is a euphemism, but its significance is sufficiently understood by any one familiar with the aims of the Readjuster movement.

The Independent Republican Committee of this State have published an address in which they enumerate their reasons for supporting the Republican Presidential ticket. They can find nothing positive in the Democratic programme, and nothing in the party's use of its power in Congress to justify the expectation that it will interest itself "in any vital political or economic question." "Even its hereditary doctrine of free-trade has so little hold upon it" that, after five years of opportunity, "it has left tariff-reform still untouched." As the spoils system was a Democratic invention, so "the hope of spoil is the stimulus of the Democratic campaign." The party "urges change merely for the sake of change," dwelling upon abuses which "occurred many years ago, and have, for the most part, ceased to exist." Its refusal to allow legislation demanded by the Constitutional amendments; the mode in which the South has met the dilemma of an ignorant and indigent suffrage; the fear that Hancock's election will "obscure the fact that the war ended in a conquest, not a compromise"; his inferior civil capacity as compared even with President Grant's, are so many additional objections to lending countenance to the Opposition. Finally, the charges against General Garfield are unsubstantiated, and cannot offset his "long, honorable, faithful, and conspicuously useful public career." The Committee announce their continued existence, and call for further contributions in support of their work.

Attorney-General Devens made a forcible speech in Boston, last week, on the political situation, in which, among other good sayings, he met Mr. English's doctrine of limited lease of power with the legal assertion that "it is the right of a good tenant to have his lease renewed. If we prove that proposition it is all we have to do." This is the ground upon which Mr. Schurz based his argument at Cincinnati, it will be remembered, and there is certainly no better. The only objection to it which has even the appearance of weight comes from the South, which demands a clean sweep of the Federal offices for reasons which, as we have frequently pointed out, would be irresistible if they were based on principles of genuine civil-service reform. But the South does not, either as a body or through individual leaders, make any public pledge of its attitude towards this reform in case its hopes of Democratic success are realized. Mr. Devens himself had but little to say about it, but his words deserve to be repeated: "He was fully sensible that as an administration changes, all the great officers ought to change; but it is wrong, and sometimes wicked, that these changes should be pursued down to the humblest messenger."

The sort of pledge which one does not get from the Democratic side is illustrated in a recent speech of Mr. Wayne McVeagh's in Philadelphia, who, though a well-known Independent, here speaks for the great majority of the Republican party: "We will not violate the constitutional limitations in order to interfere with them [the South]; we will not use the Federal army in order to control their State elections. We will hope that other methods will prevail, and that within the limits of the Constitution and the laws, by the operation of forces greater than prejudice, they may be brought to believe, what is the truth of God, that it is the interest of the South to-day, far more than of the North, to recognize the political right of the Republican voter, black or white, who lives among them."

On the 17th instant Boston celebrated the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its founding with a pomp peculiar to that city and probably unsurpassed on any previous occasion of public rejoicing. Several New York regiments took part in the procession, which still preserved the local color given to it by the moving exhibition of trades and manufactures in full operation in which the Bostonians so delight. A philosophic observer would have found much to admire in this practical assertion of the dignity of labor, while the entire abandonment of the citizens to the occasion, and the perfect good nature and good order that prevailed (as usual, be it said) showed that, in spite of the preponderance of the foreign element in the population, Boston still preserves a close municipal spirit, that clings to the old traditions both of democratic and of decent government. In singular accord at once and contrast with this view was the fact that the most novel part of the display was devised and carried out by the Germans, who generally do not figure largely in our conception of what constitutes Boston. We say novel, because, although the historical and allegorical tableaux vivants on platform-cars drawn along the street railways recalled the spectacle of Mardi-gras in New Orleans and Memphis, the subjects were chosen, and the designs studied, rather in the spirit of Hans Makart's Vienna pageant of last year. There was, as more than once before in late years, an attempt to do something also towards closing the "bloody chasm," and accordingly Mayor Courtenay, of Charleston, S. C., was a prominent guest and speaker. Nor should those who take the darkest view of the party to which Mayor Prince belongs overlook his "pointing with pride" to Boston's precedence in all good works, the abolition movement not excepted.

Nearly five million dollars of foreign gold arrived at New York during the last week, which makes the sum received this year more than $26,000,000, the larger part of which has arrived in the last six weeks. The rates for foreign exchange are yet favorable to further imports. The New York banks lost about $400,000 of surplus reserve last week, but the loan market continues to be very easy for borrowers, at little more than nominal rates. The Treasury is pushing the issue of silver dollars, and last week $822,000 were sent out of the Treasury, against $360,000 the week before. It is said that the Treasury is also having printed silver certificates to the extent of $25,000,000, in anticipation of a demand for them. The price of silver in London has declined to 52⅛*d.* to 52¼*d.*, and the bullion value here of the "dollar of the fathers" is now only about 87 cents. The autumn trade of the country continues large and active. The movement of wheat in the West is, however, slow, on account of the low prices ruling in all the markets for it. Railroad earnings continue large; but at the Stock Exchange speculation is tame and hesitating, on account of the growing political excitement and uncertainty as to the October and November elections.

It seems hardly worth while to follow in detail the process by which the Powers are coercing the Porte into the surrender of Dulcigno and the adjacent territory to the Montenegrins, particularly as it now seems probable that a crisis will be reached in two or three days. The British admiral has sent an "ultimatum" to Riza Pasha, the Turkish commander, calling on him to surrender the place in four days. Riza, however, appears to be a good deal of a farceur, and, although ostensibly sent from Constantinople with two thousand men for the purpose, has never had any intention of surrendering the place at all, and now makes no secret of it. In fact, a few days ago he allowed his position to be occupied without resistance by eight thousand Albanians, and has been living in perfect amity with the chief of the Albanian League. The Montenegrins are all ready to attack the town with a force about equal to that of the Albanians, and will do so under cover of the guns of the fleet; but the fleet cannot act until the Christian population have got out of the place. There appears to be no longer any doubt felt that the Porte is simply killing time, in the hope that some disagreement will show itself among the Powers, or a storm blow the fleet off the coast, or, in short, that something will happen to postpone indefinitely the evil day. The chances seem to increase that the action of the fleet will be the signal for a rising in Eastern Rumelia, and when this occurs the devil will be let loose all over European Turkey. Baker Pasha has come back from his tour of inspection in Asia Minor, and frankly reports that the state of things there cannot well be worse.

The ministerial crisis in France which was threatened by the language of M. de Freycinet in his speech at Montauban has actually occurred, and has led to the retirement of that minister and of Admiral Jauréguiberry, the Minister of Marine, and of M. Varroy, the Minister of Public Works. M. Jules Ferry has been charged with the formation of a new Cabinet. M. de Freycinet's downfall is ascribed to the hostility of Gambetta, who disapproved of his expressed willingness to accept a declaration of obedience to the laws from the religious orders, other than the Jesuits, in lieu of their expulsion. This declaration appears to have been drafted at Rome and then signed by the heads of the orders in question, and M. de Freycinet's apparent readiness to accept it has been treated by the Radical wing of the Republicans as a retreat on the part of the Ministry from their anti-clerical policy. It is probably resented the more by Gambetta because M. de Freycinet made his speech without consulting him. The incident furnishes a fresh illustration of the inconveniences caused by Gambetta's present position. He is not a minister, and yet he makes and unmakes ministries, and his ascendency makes the Cabinet a place in which first-rate men cannot remain without considerable sacrifice of dignity. M. de Freycinet is one of the very ablest men on the Republican side, and his retirement gives another serious blow to the prestige and influence of the Moderates, and will probably, whatever the momentary success of the Jules Ferry combination may be, make it impossible for Gambetta to maintain his present position much longer. It is not unlikely that he sees this himself, and that the Republican victory at the election of the Councils-General has convinced him that the time has come when he may safely assume greater responsibility.

The Irish question appears to be the only one with which the Gladstone Ministry charged themselves when they came into office, towards the solution of which they made no progress before Parliament was prorogued, and Parnell has gone home, and is preaching his policy to the farmers, as a good thing to fill up the time with until the Government does something. Its principal feature is the refusal of the tenant to pay more than what he himself considers a fair rent, and the social persecution of everybody who takes a farm from which a tenant has been ejected for non-payment. On the other side, Mr. Froude has appeared on the scene with his cure, which is, as might be expected, about as foolish and much less practicable than Parnell's. He proposes, in an article in the Nineteenth Century, which we fear will have considerable influence in England, a suspension of trial by jury in Ireland, and hints at some sort of arrangement by which the Government would become the head owner of all land in Ireland, and the landlord a sort of Mogul zemindar, or agent of the Government, who would collect the dues, hold office like "the governor of a crown colony" or the captain of a man-of-war, with promotion if he managed his estate wisely and dismissal if he did not. The assurance with which he censures Mr. Gladstone for ignorance of Irish history and of the state of Ireland, gives a gleam of the comic to an otherwise very dreary paper.

It opens with the characteristic assertion that "in every garden in Ireland there grow a hundred weeds for one potato," and that Lord Leitrim was murdered because he ejected inefficient tenants "and gave the land to some one who would grow potatoes and not weeds." The fact is that Lord Leitrim was murdered for the long exercise of an all-pervading and grinding social tyranny. Mr. Tuke, in his late pamphlet, gives as an illustration of it his having ordered a comfortable house which a tenant had erected, at his own cost and risk, in lieu of his previous wretched cabin, to be levelled to the ground because his permission had not been obtained. There are probably few men in England less capable of understanding the Irish problem than Mr. Froude. He has in an extraordinary degree the ordinary English incapacity to understand states of society differing from that in which he was bred, and the defect is aggravated by what may be called the wonderful recent growth of conceit in the "historical school" of political investigators. It is getting to be very common for anybody who has worked hard among "the archives" to offer to give lessons to the most experienced statesmen of his own time in any field of legislation. With Mr. Froude, Mr. Gladstone's forty-eight years of familiarity with Irish griefs count for nothing against his own greater knowledge of the manner in which Tyrconnel failed in the seventeenth century.

The Pope has issued, through Cardinal Nina, an appeal to the Catholic world for pecuniary aid in keeping up his establishment, which has been expected for some time, and which will probably lead to the provision of some settled financial basis for the Papacy on the voluntary system. He has, he says, to support the cardinals resident in Rome, the nuncios at various European courts, a large number of the Italian bishops who have been deprived of the revenues of their dioceses because they have not obtained the exequatur of the Italian Government, and a number of employés of the old Pontifical Government who have lost their positions. All this, besides the care of the Vatican, the repairs of many Roman churches, and the support of clerical schools in Rome to counteract the schools set up by "the unbelievers and the heterodox." Hitherto the Pope's want of money has been treated as a temporary affliction due to his being kept out of his temporal sovereignty, but all hope of restoration must be rapidly passing away, and the faithful all over the world must make up their minds to supply him with a permanent and fixed revenue. It is proper to add that the Italian Government makes him a standing offer of, if we remember rightly, $600,000 annually, which nothing but the theory that he is still a temporal sovereign who has been robbed prevents him from accepting. If he came to terms with his disputers, he would undoubtedly, in addition to this subsidy, be relieved of several other burdens, such as the support of his expelled civil functionaries. How long he will keep up the fiction that he is the lawful King of Rome it is impossible to say; but every one knows it must be abandoned some time, and it is a fair question whether the Catholic world ought to be made to pay the cost of it. Nothing is now likely to oust the Italian Government from Rome but a miracle, and, though miracles are still numerous, there is no sign or promise of any of this character.

THE "BOSS" SYSTEM AND THE MAINE ELECTION.

WE spoke at some length last spring in these columns of the transformation which has taken place in many of the Northern States of "the great Senator" into "the Boss." The explanations and complaints which have been called forth from a large and influential portion of the Republican press by the very disappointing result of the election in Maine, have given fresh interest to the subject. As we anticipated, sober-minded Republicans are not prepared to accept Mr. Blaine's explanation that the Republican majority in the State has disappeared under the influence of direct bribery, nor yet the other explanation, that the majority of the voters have become so immoral and unscrupulous that they approve of the Fusionist attempt to seize the State government by fraud last winter, or, at all events, were not sufficiently shocked by it to be willing to condemn it at the polls. Now that the mischief is done, and appears to be really serious, the best Republican papers have begun to confess, what many of them have known very well for some years, that the "Boss" system of party management has been producing in Maine, as well as elsewhere, demoralization and disgust so great as to overcome even the dread of the Democrats and the hatred of the "Solid South," from which the Republican party has drawn so much of its support during the last ten years, particularly in the New England States. It is now at least four years since we began to receive from prominent Maine Republicans, who did not wish their names to be published, warnings of what was likely to result from a continuance of Mr. Blaine's management. Since then the evil has not diminished: it has grown. The Boss system has been perfected, and its yoke made more oppressive and galling, until finally "the splendid leadership" has produced what nobody can deny is a catastrophe. Maine, instead of furnishing encouragement both to the October and November Republicans, has disheartened both, and has made General Garfield's election seem doubtful to hundreds of thousands who even a fortnight ago had no doubt about it at all; and the only consolation the State Boss has to offer is that a very large proportion of his fellow-citizens are great rascals.

The truth appears to be that the Republican party in the State has become a sort of machine for the support of Mr. Blaine's fortunes in Federal politics. The conventions have been managed by his henchmen, and the nominations distributed among those who made it their chief duty in politics to bear fealty to him, and to submit to "assessment" for his benefit. The Boston Herald is the authority for the statement that one State office-holder, whose salary amounted to $800, was in this way mulcted of $100, and had to borrow the money to pay it. The distribution of the offices by a ring, and the heavy taxation of the unfortunates who get the places in order to enable the Boss to make a good appearance in the Presidential arena, of course may produce a considerable campaign fund; but such things are not likely to stimulate the enthusiasm of the younger voters who have been coming to the polls in successive waves every year during Mr. Blaine's reign.

This was not the whole, however. The ideas which make a party strong and aggressive in our time are always ideas which spring up by a kind of spontaneous generation among the voters themselves. They are never ideas which are brought home from foreign parts in his valise by a "gifted leader," however excellent these ideas may be in themselves. Now, one of the peculiarities of the Boss system is that the opinions which are to fire the voters with enthusiasm and carry them to "rousing victories" are always opinions supplied by the Boss himself out of the private stock which he keeps on hand for various emergencies. It is he, and he alone, who knows in any given year what the "pressing danger" or "vital issue" of that year is to be, and he issues it to conventions, just as "the parole" is sent out from headquarters to an army in the field. Mr. Blaine took it into his head very soon after he left the Speakership of the House that the best vein for him to work was hatred and distrust of the South, and dread of the Brigadiers, and he began operations with characteristic vigor on the floor of the House when hardly anybody else in the country had thought of this mode of retrieving the party fortunes, then seriously injured by the scandals of General Grant's administration. His tactics were measurably successful at the outset, and were of invaluable service to him when his railroad transactions were under investigation, because he was able to say, when he had little else to say, that the Brigadiers were rummaging the private affairs of a stanch Unionist. But when, after Mr. Hayes's accession to the Presidency, he persisted in forcing barren hostility to the South on his followers in his State as a substitute for support of the new Republican administration in anything whatever, he strained the Boss system beyond its capacity. He made himself from the outset the remorseless critic of the President and Cabinet, in nearly everything they did or tried to do, without furnishing the slightest evidence that he himself had any policy whatever to offer as a substitute for theirs. Mere negation and hostility, as has been often said, are neither in politics nor religion a sufficient basis for an enduring and growing organization, and yet this is all that the Maine Boss furnished to the voters of the State. No young Republican in Maine has in ten years heard from Mr. Blaine one word looking to constructive or progressive legislation in any field, or one scintilla of hope or cheer with regard to the problem to which he was continually pointing as the most important problem of our time—the condition of the South; and the gloomier he grew, the more active his "management" became, and the more remorseless his use of the party machinery for objects which were at least as much personal as political.

The "great Senator," whose place the State Bosses have taken, was one of the oldest and most familiar figures in American politics, and of course had, like the Bosses, a powerful influence in State politics. But the influence was derived from a wholly different source. He held it as the exponent of ideas which had taken possession of the popular mind, and by maintaining and propagating which he made his fame. He was loved and admired because he stood for something about which the people felt deeply, and from which his career derived most of its lustre. He had, like the Bosses, warm personal adherents, but he won and retained their allegiance by his public utterances on all the great questions of the day. The management of the party machinery he could, therefore, well afford to leave to men of smaller calibre and fewer weighty cares, and keep his own powers for the real work of statesmanship. There could hardly be, for the young voters to whom so much advice is just now addressed, more instructive reading at this moment than the examination of the way in which Webster and Seward and Sumner passed their time, and of the agencies by which they retained their hold on the popular confidence and made sure of their re-election to the Senate. People voted for them, listened to them, and followed their advice, not because of their skill in parlor conclaves and their dexterity in distributing patronage, but because of the things they said before great audiences on the topics by which the popular heart was stirred. Their speeches were the speeches of men who thought much, and knew much, and therefore when they spoke spoke with the authority of statesmen. They had their faults and their shortcomings, like all the rest of the world, but their faults were those of a great rôle and great responsibilities. Right or wrong, their thoughts were always worth weighing, and when the tug of a canvass came it was not in hotel bedrooms or in the corners of piazzas that their guidance and help were looked for. It was on the platform and in the face of the whole State and nation.

If the disasters which have overtaken the Boss system in New York and Maine should lead people to turn back with reverence to the older type of American statesmen and revive the art of "managing" great constituencies through open discussion, there will be little reason to regret the reverses which the Republican party has sustained through the extraordinary ascendency achieved of late years by electioneering dexterity. The rule of Mr. Conkling in New York, of General Logan in Illinois, and of Mr. Blaine in Maine is, as has been often remarked, a copy, and a poor one, of the device by which Tweed mastered the ignorant vote of New York City. If it could succeed in the larger field of State and Federal politics we might well despair of the Government. The extent to which it has already miscarried seems to show that we are near the end of it, and if this be true the failure in Maine may be fairly set down as, in more senses than one, a "blessing in disguise." If Mr. Blaine will now direct his consuming activity to the study of real politics, and to the creation of some sort of authority for himself on weightier questions than the probable vote of "the French plantations of Aroostook County," he may still win a fame which the Brigadiers cannot dim.

MR. CONKLING'S SPEECH AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

SENATOR CONKLING has delivered his campaign speech, probably the only one he will make in support of the Republican ticket. It is useful reading both as an exposition of the political attitude of the section of the party which he represents—and which is a very large one—and as a very adroit presentation of the statistical justification of the Republican distrust of and hostility towards the South. It differs, too, from most of his late speeches in being largely statistical. It contained little or no rhetorical denunciation, and no one idea or entity like "State rights" was made to bear the whole burden of the argument. Nor was there any of that dithyrambic reference to "the guilt of rebellion," which makes so many Republican speeches and articles sound like "the plaintive numbers" of Wordsworth's Highland girl, who sang of "Old unhappy far-off things, and battles long ago."

Mr. Conkling's argument may be summed up thus: the Democratic party ought not to be entrusted with the Government, because it is controlled by the Southern portion of it in Congress, both in the caucuses and in the committees of both Houses; and because these Southern members, owing to falsification of the census and the suppression of the black vote, are more numerous than they ought to be, and do not truly represent the population which they pretend to represent. But this is not the principal reason, which is that the region from which the members who will control the Democratic caucus come, only contains one-fourteenth of "the producing, commercial, industrial, tax-paying, and property interests of the country." It pays only one-sixtieth of the customs duties, only one-sixth of the internal revenue; possesses only one-fourteenth of the internal trade, only one-eleventh of the shipping tonnage, only two-ninths of the exports, only one-forty-third of the imports, only one-sixteenth of the manufactures, and only one-thirty-first of the mining products. The Southern ports, too, Baltimore, Charleston, Savannah, New Orleans, do vastly less business (we need not give the figures) than Northern ports, and their business since 1860 has not increased in the same ratio. Mr. Conkling further produces the following table, as showing the difference in the growth of Southern and Northern production respectively:

		Value.
1860—Bales of cotton exported	3,812,345	$191,806,555
1870—Bales of cotton exported	2,095,323	227,027,624
1880—Bales of cotton exported	3,810,153	211,535,905

Fewer bales this year than twenty years ago.

In 1860 breadstuffs exported sold for	$24,422,320
In 1870 breadstuffs exported sold for	72,250,933
In 1880 breadstuffs exported sold for	288,036,835

The inference he draws from all this is summed up in the following remarkable passage, to which no summary would do justice:

"I affirm that the broad issue at this election is whether our colossal fabric of commercial, industrial, and financial interests shall be under the management and protection of those who chiefly created and own it, or shall be handed over to the sway of those whose share in it is small, and whose experience, antecedents, theories, and practices do not fit them or entitle them to assume its control.

"Tariffs, tax laws, finances, currency, banks, courts, appropriations, the maintenance and enforcement of national as well as State laws—these are the things upon which prosperity depends, and these are the things at stake in this election. The party which represents the tax-paying portions of the country is the party whose representatives can best be trusted to vote upon drafts on the Treasury. A Congressman whose constituents 'foot the bills' may not stand up alone, or with a few others, against his party and its caucus; but if he belongs to the party all of whose Congressmen represent tax-paying constituencies, they may be trusted to stand together against raids on the Treasury which they know all their districts would condemn. It is still more certain that if you place the tax-laying power in the hands of those who do but little of the tax-paying, your situation is like that of the man who sat on a limb and sawed off the limb between himself and the tree."

We do not propose to follow Senator Conkling through his figures. But we must say that, after long experience of the disingenuousness with which statistics are used in political controversies, we can recall nothing which surpassed in hardihood the attempt to spread the belief that the customs duties levied at the Southern ports represent the extent of the contribution of Southern consumers to this branch of the revenue. Senator Conkling, of course, knows perfectly well that, the distributing agencies of foreign goods being mainly at the North, the bulk of the duties paid by the South are paid in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. He knows also that Southern contributions to the internal revenue are not to be measured by the amount of internal revenue collected at the South, inasmuch as Southern consumers repay in the price of Northern goods the tax paid by the manufacturer at the place of production. He knows, further, that the exports and imports at Northern ports are made up in a considerable degree of articles of Southern production and consumption. We are not so sure that he knows, but we strongly suspect it, that the falling-off in exports of cotton, in spite of the rapid increase of the crop, is largely due to increased consumption by home manufactures, and that in this increased consumption the South itself has a respectable share. His proposition that the South cannot be safely entrusted with the Government because its mines only produced in 1870 three and one-quarter per cent. as much as the Northern mines, must surely be one of his rare touches of humor.

What we are most concerned about is the deduction he makes from these statistics, and which we have cited above. We dare say some of our readers will be amused, and more shocked, to find that it is the very deduction by which the Southern whites justify their hostility to negro voting and their determination by hook or by crook to prevent it. "Outrages" and the use of the tissue ballots at Southern elections are due to a determination on the part of the owners of "the commercial, industrial, and financial interests" of the South that these interests shall "remain under the protection of those who chiefly created them, and shall not be handed over to the sway of those whose share in them is small, and whose experience, antecedents, theories, and practices do not fit them or entitle them to assume their control." They agree with Mr. Conkling in thinking that "if you place the tax-laying power in the hands of those who do but little of the tax-paying, your situation is like that of the man who sat on a limb and sawed off the limb between himself and the tree," and they act on their conviction. The municipal commission which sat some years ago to devise a plan of municipal government for the cities of this State embodied this doctrine in some amendments to the constitution, for the peremptory rejection of which by the legislature Mr. Conkling is understood to have given orders to his supporters. He was not even willing that his party should take the responsibility of submitting them to the popular vote. Republican meetings have applauded many strange utterances of the Senator, but probably none odder than this, considering the actual political situation.

We agree in general terms with the Senator's position with regard to the importance to the property of the country of having the Government in the hands of those who appreciate the delicacy and complexity of financial interests. For this reason we have always considered the reconciliation of the property-holders of the South to the Government of the restored Union a matter of paramount importance, and we have taken it for granted that, slavery being gone, there would be but little difficulty in showing them that their interests and those of Northern property-holders were identical. We have taken it for granted, too, that the Southern property-holder is the same kind of human being as the rest of us, and has to be conciliated by the same methods. We have thought, therefore, that the denunciatory tone of Republican platforms and speeches and articles ever since 1860 was, as a matter of practical politics, a great mistake, and that with more forbearance of speech, and more blindness to faults which were, in a moving world, plainly temporary, and a little livelier perception of virtues on our part, the owners of the commercial, financial, and industrial interests at the South might have been largely won over into sympathy with, if not active support of, the party at the North which is, in our eyes, unquestionably the guardian of those interests all over the country. The policy which has been pursued, however, and of which Mr. Conkling has been one of the foremost supporters, has been that of organizing, through Federal agents, the non-tax-payers of the South against the tax-payers in a political party, and preaching to them at every election hatred and distrust of the very persons to whose skill and intelligence the South must mainly look for the revival of her material prosperity. The mischief thus done we believe to be incalculable, and speeches like Mr. Conkling's, which have not even the excuse of fanatical ignorance—for he is anything but a fanatic—cannot but greatly aggravate it, because they convince the Southerners that the Republican party is determined to hate and pursue them whether they present themselves as tax-payers or non-tax-payers. Whether the stream flows from them or towards them, it is they who trouble the water.

We must say, too, that if the Republican party should father the Senator's doctrine that those sections of the country which have most capital and manufactures, and the best mines, ought to have most political power, and that the distribution of this power as made by the Federal Constitution on the basis partly of population and partly of historical unity is in practice dangerous and unfair, it will ensure itself as deep and swift damnation as overtook the Federal party for sins much less grievous. It is, thus far, one of the happy conditions of American politics that population and wealth, as a general rule, go together. The State with most voters is apt to have most money, and there is every likelihood that this association will last for an indefinite period. There is, therefore, no practical use in arguing just now that some States ought to be discredited and deprived of a share in the Government, if possible, because they are not as well off financially or industrially as some others. It raises a question which every party in this country ought to avoid sedulously, and which can lead to no legislative result, but can produce great exasperation, not at the South only but at the North. The best mode for any party in this country to protect capital is to say as little as possible about protecting it, and to make the liberty, and happiness, and the more perfect union and equality of all in all parts of the country, whatever the amount of the revenue they return, its real as well as its avowed object.

There are some points in Senator Conkling's speech which Independents would do well to note. One is the prominence which he gave General Grant, and the frequency with which he quoted some very commonplace utterances of the general's as the words of a wise statesman. This indicates clearly enough that the Bosses mean to try their luck again with their candidate if the party should in November secure another term of power. Another, is the bitterness of his reference to Mr. Hayes, and third, the almost insulting commendation he bestowed on General Garfield. He gave him a character such as might properly, with hardly the change of a word, be offered to a worthy drayman applying for the cartage of a dry-goods house. These things furnish a fresh illustration of the doubtful character of the service which the Senator renders the party. When its interests and what he conceives to be his own seem to coincide, he does for it all that long experience as a manager and manipulator can do. But he never allows regard for its welfare to repress any utterance, however indiscreet, which his personal animosities make necessary for his comfort, and probably never speaks for it in public without repelling the class of voters on which in this State, and in the present state of its fortunes, it must rely for success. Ever since the enthusiasm of the earlier days began to flag, and the dread of what the Democrats might do began to take the place of anticipation of what the Republicans would do, his management of the party in this State has been a long record of disaster and disappointment. Increasing numbers of Republicans ask themselves, when he is produced by the managers as the great gun of the campaign, whether the opinions of a man who has been so often wrong at other crises, and whose judgment is so plainly dominated by his temper, can be of any real service at a time when the bonds of party discipline are greatly relaxed, and the party more than ever dependent on the moral earnestness and sincerity of those who speak for it.

MR. FORSTER AND THE LORDS.

LONDON, September 9.

PARLIAMENT has been prorogued, and the two Houses have separated on the brink of a quarrel which will probably be appeased as the rolling months bring round February, which is the usual time of their meeting. Things have not looked so serious for the hereditary branch of the legislature as they do now since the controversies which immediately preceded, and which immediately followed, the Reform Act of 1832. The House of Lords was then a good deal threatened. Motions adverse to it were made; public meetings were held; the bishops especially were rudely assailed not only by argument but by physical violence—in their character of lords spiritual, however, and not in that of overseers of the flock. Mr. O'Connell declared that an hereditary legislator was even a greater absurdity than an hereditary tailor, and that as no one would go to the one for a suit of clothes so no reasonable person ought to have recourse to the other for useful legislation. The tailor, he went on to say, would certainly be a botcher, and the House of Lords was simply an assembly of botchers. Franklin put the matter in a more reasonable and dignified form. His illustration became the philosopher as appropriately as Mr. O'Connell's did the demagogue. According to him it was as rational to think of hereditary mathematicians as of hereditary politicians. If we are to trust the speculations of Mr. Darwin and of Mr. Francis Galton, neither assumption is as ridiculous as it appeared to the thinkers of Franklin's time. The doctrine of heredity plays a great part in the speculation of the present age. It is the basis of Mr. Darwin's theory of the origin and development of species. Mr. Galton has written a book upon 'Hereditary Genius'—a book of which the general doctrine, it may be hoped for its own sake, is sounder than some of the illustrations by which he supports it. Mr. Galton, without intending the slightest imputation on the virgin author of 'Pride and Prejudice' and 'Sense and Sensibility,' speaks of her as the mother of Lady Duff Gordon. He confounds Mrs. Sarah Austin, the wife of the eminent jurist, John Austin, with Miss Jane Austen, the inimitable novelist, who differed from that lady both in name and in race as well as in genius. Nevertheless it is true that hereditary mathematicians, hereditary artists, hereditary actors, scholars, and lawyers are among the common phenomena of intellectual history. Hence it is sometimes asked, Why should we not have hereditary legislators also? But no attempt was ever made to appoint to professorships of mathematics or of languages persons whose sole title was their birth. If they showed the faculty which their fathers possessed they earned for themselves the distinctions which their fathers also had acquired. The position of the House of Lords is, of course, very different. A member of it becomes a legislator not because he has given proofs of inherited talent and fitness for his work, but because it is taken for granted, without any evidence at all, that he may possibly have the qualities which some ancestor, more or less remote, was credited with possessing. This view of the matter places it in a light even too favorable for the assembly on behalf of which it may be pleaded. For three-fourths of the House of Lords consist of men and the descendants of men who have received peerages not because they were politicians of mark, but because they were men of wealth, or possessed the patronage of boroughs which a generation ago were negotiable in the market, or had rendered military or other services not involving statesmanlike gifts, or had shown a readiness for dirty work of one kind or another. The political capacity which the family of the Duke of Richmond has inherited from Charles II. and Nell Gwynn can scarcely be pleaded in any legitimate court of argument.

As a matter of fact, the descendants of considerable statesmen have seldom themselves attained to high political positions. There are exceptions. The houses of Russell and of Stanley have conspicuously presented them. After running underground for several generations the ability which marked the Cecils of Queen Elizabeth's time has shown itself anew in the present Marquis of Salisbury. Lord Randolph Churchill may possibly revive the memory of the talents and the disposition for unscrupulous intrigue which marked the great John, Duke of Marlborough, and the scarcely less great Sarah, his duchess. But for the most part titles once illustrious are now worn by peers whose insignificance they make sometimes ludicrously conspicuous. An hereditary mathematician would be scrupulously trained in mathematical science; the hereditary tailor would be taught to cut out, and to "seam and gusset and band." Politics, it is assumed, like reading and writing in Dogberry's conception, come by nature, and those who act upon this assumption find, as Dogberry would have done, that they do not come at all. The fact is that the House of Lords represents not hereditary brains but hereditary estates; and the estates very often clog the brains. The increased opportunity which leisure and ease and the means of instruction give is usually more than counterbalanced by the lack of stimulus to exertion and mental development which an assured position carries with it. Those who are surrounded with ease and wealth, and who are accompanied through life by a deference independent of their personal qualities, cannot be expected to strive to attain by their own merits what is theirs already without any such effort. The men are few who, with every opportunity of indolent self-enjoyment, and subject to no pressure of necessity, will scorn delights and live laborious days. The House of Lords assuredly presents a very small percentage of them. The argument from hereditary talent to an hereditary chamber breaks down. It may be conclusively shown that inherited genius never displays itself except under the necessity for its exercise and cultivation. When the prize is offered without the need of any contest for it there will be no exertion. Therefore, with the view to make the most of inherited capacity, it will be desirable to abolish the hereditary branch of the legislature.

There is no reason to think that matters will come presently to this issue in England. The House of Lords always strictly keeps its courage within the bounds of discretion, and its first instinct is that of self-preservation. A little rough correction is usually sufficient to recall it from its aberrations. A humorist describing one of his friends who was a little given to arrogance and self-assertion, said that he was a very good fellow, and might be confidently reckoned on to behave well during the day if he was kicked once immediately on getting up and again before luncheon-time. We may say something like this of the House of Lords. It will behave well during a parliament if it is kicked once or twice each session. Mr. Forster has administered this kicking, and the result was shown in the prompt withdrawal by the House of Lords of the principal amendments by which they had marred three of the leading measures of the Government. As for their courage, it was rather cheaply displayed. The peers took advantage of Mr. Forster's blundering. Whatever were the merits of the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill a tactician, as Mr. Forster professes above all things to be, ought to have seen that it had no genuine support in the feeling and convictions of the country, and that it was disliked by the great majority of the Liberal party in both Houses. The Lords perceived this, and assumed an independence of general opinion in the very act of deferring to it. It was not their own strength but Mr. Forster's weakness on which they acted. Probably the consciousness of this fact led to the extraordinary declaration which Mr. Forster made in the House of Commons with respect to the possibility of a reform being demanded in the constitution of the House of Lords. The lecture which he read to the peers from the motto noblesse oblige; the fact to which he called their attention, that the House of Commons owed its existence to the direct choice of the people whom it represented, while the Lords sat merely by the accident of birth; the reminder which he offered to them that what is called the Lower House, which ought, perhaps, to be called the First Chamber, is probably the hardest worked legislative assembly in Europe; while the Upper House, or more properly the Second Chamber, is the least severely taxed, and the hint which he threw out that in all these circumstances measures carefully prepared and minutely discussed by the House of Commons ought not to be wantonly marred or capriciously rejected by the House of Lords—all these considerations were true and forcible. The Liberal members applauded them to the echo, and the popular party in the country has welcomed them. But they were, nevertheless, in Mr. Forster's mouth, exceedingly indiscreet. They should not have been spoken by a Minister of the Crown from the Treasury Bench unless with the foreknowledge and deliberate assent and consent of his colleagues. If a statement had to be made at all Mr. Forster was not the person to make it. His position in the Ministry, though a very important one, is still secondary. He holds a post which involves very delicate and difficult functions at the present time, but which is not one of the great offices of state. If the Government had made up their minds to give the House of Lords the first of the three warnings to which it may be held to be entitled, the admonition should have come either through Mr. Gladstone on his return to the House of Commons or through Lord Hartington in Mr. Gladstone's absence. Proceeding from Mr. Forster, under the circumstances which Lord Granville explained afterwards in the House of Lords, and expressing merely the individual impressions of the Secretary for Ireland, it seems to have been dictated by personal mortification and pique.

The fact is that Mr. Forster up to this time has failed in the office which he now fills. His breakdown is conspicuous. No other minister has collapsed so completely and signally. Mr. Forster labors under the common error of believing that his weak point is his strong point: he prides himself on his art of managing men. He thinks that he can play off one person or group of persons against another, and that he is in an especial degree an adept in the practice of putting bills through. His success with the Education Act has misled him. In that measure he succeeded in "dishing the Dissenters," but he did so by enlisting upon his side the whole force of the Conservative Opposition, which, with the Liberal ministerialists of that day, gave him an overwhelming parliamentary majority. In the Irish Disturbance Bill he tried to play off the Home-Rule party against the Conservative Opposition. But the Home-Rule party are only a handful of men: they do not command more than forty or fifty votes. In coquetting with them Mr. Forster not only offended the whole of the Conservative party, but also a fair half of the Liberal majority. Mr. Forster does his conjuring clumsily. He has no great sleight-of-hand. You see the trick as he is in the act of performing it. He coquets with the two parties whom he is endeavoring to beguile in the full light of day. When Don Juan in the "Festin de Pierre" persuades in turn Charlotte and Mathurine that he intends to marry one and has no regard for the other, he does it by asides and secret whisperings to each. Mr. Forster is a sort of political Don Juan. But what he says to his Home-Rule Charlotte he says aloud in the hearing of his Tory and landlord Mathurine, while the illusory promises by which he endeavors to beguile Mathurine are not whispered into her ear covertly, but are bawled in the presence of Charlotte. Mr. Forster is nevertheless surprised that neither of these rustic beauties is deceived, and that both fall vehemently foul of him. He spreads his net in the sight of the birds, and the birds sagaciously keep out of it. If the events of the present session teach Mr. Forster a little straightforwardness, if they show him that parliamentary parties cannot safely be hoodwinked and played off against each other, and that trimming and balancing are likely to bring him to the ground, they will teach him a lesson which he needs to learn. The maintenance, to say nothing of the aggrandizement, of his position in the Liberal party depends upon the completeness with which he learns it. In the meantime the House of Lords has suffered less through its own mistakes than it would have done if they had not been eclipsed by the infinitely greater and more glaring mistakes into which Mr. Forster has betrayed himself, and to some degree the Government, whose responsibility cannot be wholly separated even from his merely personal and individual blunders. †††

HARD TIMES IN GERMANY.

BERLIN, September 6.

THE imperial order of September 1, issued to the German army on the eve of the tenth anniversary of the battle of Sedan, is a highly important political document. It is couched in a few sentences, modest in tone, but of positive expectations. In alluding to the glorious victories of 1870, and thanking the soldiers and officers, as well as the whole people, for their bravery, devotion, and perseverance, the Emperor feels sure that, united by the strong ties of honor, discipline, and duty, the German army, in future serious times, "which may God long keep from us," will, as in the past, prove a safe shield and stronghold to the Fatherland. These words are a noble and dignified answer to Gambetta and all Frenchmen who long for revenge. They are calmly notified that Germany will rejoice if peace is preserved, but that she will always be ready to take up arms when provoked to do so. From my own experience I can state that not a day is lost in perfecting the army and in making it more efficient, but that at the same time all classes of the people are eager for the preservation of peace. The Emperor's order, therefore, met with the universal approval of the country.

Whatever the shortcomings of the German nation may be, military boasting or chauvinism is not one of them. I can boldly say that no other people would, or probably could, have been less intoxicated by the successes of the last French war than the Germans. They looked at them as the legitimate net results of an adventure into which they had been forced, and, without being greatly excited, returned to the pursuits of daily life as if they had only extinguished a fire. The reason is very plain: the liability of every German to military service is comparatively old in Prussia, which in this respect has moulded the German institutions and nation. At present the fourth generation is about to enter upon the performance of this duty. Every one feels the burden of it, and the loss which it causes in preventing him from following his civil pursuits. In discharging it he is the happier the less time and money it costs him, and he knows from his own experience, as well as that of his father or grandfather, what an expensive and unproductive thing war is. The desire, inclination, and care of the German are, therefore, peace. A war of conquest is, in his eyes, a reckless hazard; a war of defence, a duty not to be avoided.

The appeal of so shrewd a politician as Gambetta to the warlike passions of his countrymen is the most incontestable proof that the system of universal military duty, which is interwoven with the feelings and interests of every German, has not yet taken root in the French popular mind, and that Frenchmen feel and think not like citizen soldiers who must risk their blood, but like conscripts and mercenaries who are paid for fighting the battles of their masters. Let me add, in exculpation of the French, that in any intellectually and materially developed country the introduction of the German military system will and must in our days meet with the most momentous difficulties. With us it sprang into life at a time (1813) when we were poor and oppressed, when trade was prostrated and business stagnant, when we had no choice between perishing and triumphing. The subsequent victories which led to the reorganization of the state and of impoverished society form with us the basis of a new start in national life, and are chiefly due to the then adopted military system. It is significant that some twenty years ago rich manufacturing towns of Rhenish Prussia and Westphalia proposed to do away with that system, and to introduce the French method of conscription. After the years 1866 and 1870 such a change has, of course, become impossible in Germany. For this important progress we are indebted to the French, much against their will.

The people this year did not celebrate the Sedan day with the usual enthusiasm. The Government did its best to stifle it, in order not to rouse the susceptibility of the French Republic. Old Emperor William himself declared that he wished to spare the feelings of the French people, and deemed it best not to continue the celebration of the great battle after the lapse of the first ten years. This consideration seems a little sentimental to me; the French, at least, have never spared our feelings in a similar predicament. Besides, Sedan is of less moment to us as a great military success than as the first battle which was fought by the united Germans under one command, and which, in its consequences, led to the establishment of the Empire. It is of the same general importance for European politics as the battle of Quebec, in 1759, was for the French in their contest with the Anglo-Saxon race in America; it is a great landmark in the history of the world. To cite another instance: has an Englishman ever complained of your celebration of the Fourth of July, or if he had done so, would you ever have heeded his remonstrances? It was rather the Government's duty to encourage the celebration of the Sedan day, as the parties opposed to the existence and consolidation of the Empire ignore or even attack its observance. Thus, Ultramontanes and Socialists, in order to show their enmity to the new order of things, have always kept aloof from the celebration. In the capital of Bavaria it is dangerous to confess sympathy with the Empire. When, on the 25th of last month, the seven-hundreth anniversary of the rule of the present Wittelsbach dynasty was celebrated, the mob of the city of Munich tore down the German colors which adorned the office of a Liberal newspaper, and threatened to sack it if they should be replaced. The police, instead of protecting the proprietors of the house, stood passively by, and even encouraged the mob.

If ever a dynasty since the time of the Reformation has been a curse to Germany it is this Wittelsbach family. I do not know of any redeeming feature in their long treachery to the best interests of our country. During the sixteenth century they were at the head of the Catholic counter-Reformation, and in the seventeenth century they succeeded in firmly establishing the Jesuitical sway over the richest and largest part of Germany. In the last third of the seventeenth century nine-tenths of its population were Protestants; a hundred years later, through Bavarian influence and co-operation, the last Protestants were driven out of Austria and Bavaria by the red gendarmes of the princes and the black gendarmes of the Pope. Maximilian I., Elector of Bavaria, was educated in the Spanish political school and drilled by Italian Jesuits. It was he who, animated by the most selfish political views, split Germany into two hostile camps. In the wars of the Spanish and Austrian succession the Wittelsbach electors were in the pay of France and Austria, while in the Seven Years' war they confined themselves to stipends from France. In the war of your independence they sought to make a dishonest penny, and offered England some regiments, but these were refused because, as the English negotiator, General Fawcitt, wrote home, they were worse than the worst soldiers of Europe—i.e., of the Pope. Napoleon made the Wittelsbach electors kings of Bavaria, enlarged their domain, and made them his obedient tools for carrying out his plans in Germany. When the French conqueror was defeated by the almost superhuman efforts of Prussia, Max Joseph, by the grace of Napoleon king of Bavaria, took up arms against his benefactor, but at the same time, by entering into a secret alliance with Metternich at Ried, secured for himself a rich compensation for his treachery. Lewis, the friend of Lola Montez, was the successor of this man. The last king but one, Maximilian II., and the present king, Lewis II., are the only gentlemanly characters of the family, but not important enough to make up for the deficiencies of their ancestors. For the intellectual development of Germany, and her weight in the councils of the world, Bavaria is of about the same importance as Florida or Mississippi is for that of the United States. If it were swept from the surface of the earth to-day it would not leave the least gap, in spite of all the hyperbyzantine flatteries with which the seven-hundredth Wittelsbach anniversary was officially celebrated.

To return, however, to the politics of the day. The popular mind, on the whole, is not disposed to celebrate holidays. Our economic condition is rather poor this year. If not starvation, at least distress is staring hundreds of thousands of Germans in the face. Our crops have been very bad, and in some parts of the country—as, for instance, in Upper Silesia and Western Prussia—they have failed entirely. Bad weather, rain, and hail-storms raging for months were followed by large inundations. To complete the misfortune, the effects of last year's tariff are just making themselves felt among the poorer classes of the people. It was a selfish conspiracy and a mean bargain between the iron-founders, the landlords, and the cotton-spinners to shift the taxes from their own shoulders to those of the poor and dependent working classes. It is, therefore, not so much a question of duties, laid or to be laid, on single articles as a war against the whole corrupt and unjust system, against a policy which rules the state in the interest of certain classes, and which strangles our free economic development by undermining the intellectual and physical power of the people. There is a great difference between your protectionists and ours. In your country by a change of the tariff they do not attack the foundations of modern society, and at least respect certain inalienable rights which are guaranteed by old custom and the Constitution, such as free intercourse of the several classes of people and their removal from one village, town, or county to another; the liberty of every individual to work and to make a living wherever and whenever he pleases; the right to make promissory notes and draft bills of exchange; the right to enter into marriage contracts, and other elementary principles, which are a matter of course in every English-speaking community. Our protectionists, on the contrary, are more like a horde of hungry politicians who for years have not had access to the fat state offices, and, having carried most of their points, now try to appropriate to themselves all the benefits the Government is able to bestow. For the protection of "national labor" the iron-men ask prohibitory duties, while, the better to compete with foreign manufacturers, they sell their goods cheaper abroad than at home. In face of the bad crops the landlords demand a double and treble increase of the present duty on breadstuffs. Others, again, want more stringent laws for the indenture of apprentices. Ultramontane leaders, to prevent the swindling of the masses, propose the regulation of commodities by law. In order to win over to his side the commission-merchants of our seaports, Bismarck offers them discriminating duties on goods imported from non-German ports and by foreign vessels (surtaxe d'entrepôt and surtaxe de pavillon), an offer which, however, is disdainfully rejected by the parties concerned. Other manufacturers want to reintroduce bimetallism, since they cherish the delusion that by re-establishing silver as legal tender they will increase the circulation of money, and consequently the extent of trade and commerce.

I do not pretend that all the proposals for such foolish experiments will be carried out: on the contrary, they meet with a strong and energetic opposition; but the uncertainty, suspense, and insecurity in which the most vital interests of the country are constantly kept weaken confidence and enterprise, and clog the working of the social and industrial machine. It would be premature to pass final judgment upon the effects of the new duties, which, in my opinion, are partly overestimated, partly undervalued. As much as by duties the great transactions of commerce are ruled by production and consumption, by supply and demand, and a great many other conjunctures of international trade. But one thing is certain: the new prohibitory tariff has annihilated a great part of our carrying trade, and created two foreign ports to the south and north of our boundaries. These ports are Fiume and Liebau. The latter, as you will perceive from a glance at the map, lies on the Baltic about a hundred English miles north of Memel, and is now already a dangerous competitor of Eastern Prussia. Königsberg and Memel, before the new tariff, were the great receiving depots for Russian breadstuffs, tallow, hemp, and other staple goods, which were exported hence to England, Holland, and France. Now they are directly shipped by way of Liebau. The Russian Government has connected it with the great inland railroads, and built docks and warehouses, so that the city has grown to quite extraordinary proportions. While during the last fiscal year Königsberg altogether did not receive more than five to ten carloads of Russian grain a day, eighty and more were delivered at Liebau in the same time. While the latter's imports and exports in 1876 amounted to 2,356,400 and 7,184,255 rubles respectively, in 1879 they increased to 5,277,720 and 28,218,606 rubles. While in 1876 not more than 586 ships entered and 577 cleared, in 1879 there were respectively 1,800 and 1,730. A similar development has taken place in Fiume, the only Hungarian port on the Littoral (southeast of Trieste). It is the suicidal policy of the German Government—the abolition of all discriminating freights on lumber and breadstuffs passing from Galicia and Hungary through Prussia to Hamburg, Bremen, and the Dutch ports—which has driven a considerable export of the south and southeast of Austria into the hands of English merchants who have lately established regular steamship lines to Fiume. Thus, to mention the most important articles, Fiume in 1879 exported 155,960 hectolitres of corn against 89,153 in 1878, and 86,499 hectolitres of wheat against 38,040; further, 697,482 metric quintals of flour against 412,722; beech staves (in pieces), 9,629,900 against 383,300; oak staves, 1,571,900 against 645,100; boards, 1,191,700 against 26,700. In these and other important articles the exports have risen from week to week, and likewise the return freights of pig-iron, petroleum, and soda have increased in value and number.

At home the misfortune of a protective tariff has become generally apparent, as far as the cruel tax on the necessaries of life is concerned, by the failure of the crops. Yet, urgently as it may be demanded, in my opinion the duty on breadstuffs will not be suspended, because Bismarck is not willing to sacrifice the interests of his friends, the landlords, to those of their more lucky confederates, the iron-founders and the spinners. ??

THE SEQUEL TO "CALIBAN."

PARIS, September 2.

M. RENAN has just put forth a second part of his "Caliban." "Caliban" was intended as a sequel to "The Tempest" of Shakspere; the "Eau de Jouvence" is a sequel to "Caliban." He tells us in his short preface that he composed this fantastic drama in the island of Ischia, where he goes to cure his rheumatism: he has lived for a few weeks in the company of Prospero, of Ariel, and of Caliban.

"I at first," he says, "thought of a continuation of my 'Caliban' which would certainly have pleased the Conservatives. Prospero would have been re-established in his Duchy of Milan; Ariel, after a resurrection, would have placed himself at the head of the purs. But I saw much that was not advantageous in this solution. I love Prospero, but I do not like much the people who would re-establish him. . . . Caliban, made better by the use of power, pleases me more. . . . Caliban in the end renders us greater services than would Prospero re-established by the Jesuits and by the Pontifical Zouaves. . . . Let us keep Caliban; let us try to find means to inter Prospero honorably, and to reconcile Ariel with life so far that he will not be tempted to die for the most futile reasons."

The "Eau de Jouvence," as you see, is the renovating water, the water in which the monster Caliban, the representative of revolution, of ignorance, and of democracy, becomes better, more enlightened, more worthy of his high position. Renan, who has the most yielding and gentle-natured temper in the world, likes to be in harmony with his milieu; he loves Prospero, but what if Prospero has made himself impossible? He did not much like Caliban at first, but now he is becoming accustomed to him. He is like a child who timidly pats a huge dog, is at first afraid of him and then finds out that after all the dog will not bite him. We find Prospero at first, where we left him, in his Certosa of Parma. He has no worldly ambition left, he cares not for his Duchy of Milan, nor for any worldly satisfaction; he is a devotee of truth, of science. "Yes," he says, "the reign of the ideal is finished; whatever is not a force is looked upon as chimerical. A scientific man who has no fulminating powder, a pope who has no army, will say in vain, 'I represent an idea.'" So Prospero makes himself an alchemist, and appears surrounded by all the paraphernalia of Dr. Faustus; he tries to fabricate an essence of life, the "water of life," a liquor which can give life and death, a liquor which may make death agreeable, voluntary, desirable, which can give to old age the sensations and pleasures of youth, deceiving time and eternity. We must not wonder if, in the midst of these dreams, he receives very coldly his noblemen of Milan who propose to restore him. These noblemen are French Legitimists in disguise. "We are not among those whose notion of right is change; we protest against accomplished facts. . . . The republic has this advantage, that it furnishes the means with which it can be attacked. The essential thing is to prove that order will never be established by a government directed by popular assemblies. The tactics are easy: in order to prove that order does not exist we trouble it." Thus speaks the baron Servadio, but Prospero says that he has no orders to give; he adds that there are two things which cannot change—the interest of the people and his historical title; if Milan must have a prince in order to subsist, he and his family are there. "If the republic of Milan, founded by my race, can do without us, well! I have other duties and other pleasures. The Duchy of Milan is a very little thing in the ensemble of mankind."

Prospero is very philosophical here, but he ceases to be dramatic and human. If he cares not for the Duchy of Milan, Caliban is right; but I am afraid that Prospero here is only Renan; it is in the eyes of Renan that Milan is a mere atom. Queen Elizabeth, Charles V., Philip II., Napoleon, Richelieu, Bismarck would not, cannot, reason in this way. Prospero is a mere ideologist, and he is so afraid of his own partisans that he disguises himself as Professor Arnaud, and begins a new life. The second act brings us to the residence of Pope Clement at Avignon. The whole act is a somewhat bitter satire on the Papacy. The pope is old, and his mistress, Brunissende de Talleyrand (why did Renan choose this name?), is young. She wants money, and the pope must sell abbeys and bishoprics. The pope is afraid of dying: he has heard of the famous Doctor Arnaud of Villeneuve, who can make the "Eau de Jouvence"; this water may prolong his life. He has been summoned before God in the course of a year by one of his victims, Gualtherus of Bruges. He goes into the vault where Gualtherus lies, and forces the cadaver to give him the parchment on which he reads his assignation to appear before the throne of God. This second act is somewhat painful; the pope, seller of indulgences, simoniac, coward, on his knees before a profligate mistress, half-believer and half-unbeliever, is a type which our time cannot well understand. The story of Gualtherus Brugensis, bishop of Poitiers, is forgotten; the sale of bishoprics is not among the abuses of the nineteenth century; and Brunissende de Talleyrand seems as old as Cleopatra.

The third act is more amusing; its scene is the famous bridge of Avignon.

"Sur le pont
D'Avignon,
C'est là que l'on danse;
Sur le pont
D'Avignon,
Que l'on danse en rond."

The place is well chosen for dialogues. Sister Douceline and Donna Albina exchange their views on resuscitation and the miracles wrought by Doctor Arnaud. Young gentlemen talk about Brunissende and her charms, and her young lover, the bachelor Waltherus. Prospero arrives; he begins at once to declaim about the people: "The truth for the people is the truth which it makes for itself. The people needs at the same time religious illusions and much amusement." One of the followers of Doctor Arnaud, the honest and heavy Gotescalc, objects to the doubtful amusements of the bridge of Avignon; he wants to "moralize the masses."

"How can you be so childish?" answers Prospero. "Morality must be reserved for those who, like ourselves, have a mission. Whoever occupies a privileged place in humanity must impose on himself, in payment of this privilege, austere duties, a sort of life subjected to difficult rules; but poor folks, the common people, why so? They are poor, and you wish them besides to be virtuous. You ask too much. By heaven! their part is not the worst. Amusement is only for the simple-minded: amusement is an inferior but a real way of attaining the end of life. . . . If man did not exist, the highest forms of adoration on our planet would have been the games of the dolphins, the play of the butterfly, the song of the birds. Love is the pearl for which all the rest is given; and love exists almost exclusively for the people. The greatest prince, with all his treasures, cannot buy the love which the country girl or the working-woman gives for nothing to the young peasant or to the young workingman. The poor love only each other. The people must be amused; it is its great compensation. The gayest people is the best people."

Gotescalc says a word for the temperance societies, and Prospero almost loses his temper: "Why will you hinder these poor people for a moment from plunging into the ideal? These are perhaps the best hours of all." He goes on, expounding the philosophy of pleasure, not so much for his own sake as for the sake of the many. He is an aristocrat, and he is willing to sacrifice his own happiness to make great efforts for a doubtful object; he suspects that the last word of science as well as of religion is "Omnia vanitas." He would not recommend others to do as he himself has done, and even the knowledge which he has bought at so dear a price seems to him a doubtful coin which he would hesitate to put into circulation. "We are too old; let us at least leave others to do as they please, and let us enjoy their happiness. My ideal now would be an old patriarchal castle, full of singing children, of playful girls and young men, where everybody would eat, drink, dance, live at my expense."

Meanwhile, everybody is dancing and singing on the bridge; but by degrees it becomes deserted. Prospero and his disciples remain alone; and here begins the most fantastic scene of this fantastic play. A vision is forming in the skies. An immense guillotine rises at the end of the bridge, and its triangular knife shines in the moonlight. Instead of the gay ronde which was heard some time ago, we hear now—

"Dansons la carmagnole,
Vive le son,
Vive le son;
Dansons la carmagnole,
Vive le son
Du canon."

A great macabre procession begins on the crenellated ramparts of Avignon, formed of couples who dance with gravity till they arrive under the guillotine; they place their heads under the knife, their heads fall, and another couple take their place. This new Holbein's Dance of Death begins with the King and the Pope; then come in long succession the Duke of Burgundy with the Golden Fleece, the Duc de Bourbon and the Duc d'Armagnac, twelve preux and their ladies, Jacques de Lalain, the Good Knight with the Lady of Tears, Petrarch and Laura, Anne of Britanny, Roland and Oliver, a host of bishops, of abbés, of ladies, of judges, of doctors. Thousands of them are waiting for their turn. Prospero witnesses the scene, and looks on this huge execution of the old world.

So far we have not seen Caliban. Prospero fills the whole play with his melancholy, his contempt mixed with love for the past. His love of science does not give him any more happiness than it does Faust in the immortal drama of Goethe. I confess that I do not quite understand Prospero. He sees that the old world has come to an end, and that the old symbols have lost their power. But what would he put in the place of these symbols? He does not believe that science is made for the people; he would only have the people profit by its applications. But we can imagine a community of men where each citizen would be housed, fed, clothed, transported, washed, nursed in sickness, all in the most perfect and scientific manner, and which, nevertheless, would be far from happy. The mind is its own place; and "stone walls do not a prison make." Prospero would keep all the idealism of science for himself, and only leave to the people the drudgery of telephones, electricity, railways, Liebig's extract, and so on. His people would be a soulless people, and he can find nothing better for it than blind obedience to the lower instincts of animality. Will pleasure be the new religion? And what is pleasure? We must go on with this analysis and see what becomes of Prospero in the later acts, and what Caliban has to say in his turn on the terrible problems which Prospero treats with the solemnity of a professor and the pedantry of a philosopher.

ADULTERATION OF NEWS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I venture to send you one of the most amusing examples I have lately seen of the adulteration of news, which has been under discussion in your columns. It is taken from the Inter-Ocean of this city, the chief organ of the Stalwarts, and a paper which aspires to the leadership of the Republican press in the Northwest. The passages quoted appear in a despatch from Lafayette, Ind., describing two political meetings held there on the 8th of September. The Democratic meeting is first spoken of, then the Republican.

"The ignoring of the Democratic stand, erected for political speaking, and choosing the Opera House, was most unfortunate for the Democracy, numerically considered, for its exact capacity could be ascertained to a dot, while the public stand has capabilities of that unknown quantity that renders it an easy matter, by Democratic arithmetic, to multiply hundreds into thousands. The seating capacity of the house, dress-circle and parquet, is precisely six hundred, every seat being occupied, while about one hundred persons stood in the gallery. . . . At this hour, 8 P.M., the Hon. J. M. Butler is addressing an immense throng at the Opera House, who came up with banners, torches, bands of music, glee-clubs, etc. He is listened to with profound attention, and is frequently greeted with deafening applause."

The italics are my own. Plainly it must have been the difference of quality, rather than of quantity, that made an "immense throng" of an Opera House full of Republicans, while the same house, "every seat being occupied" by Democrats, was so small as to excite the derision of the correspondent. Yours sincerely, L'Homme qui rit.

WHICH CIVILIZATION SHALL GOVERN?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your remarks this week on the persecution of Miss Crandall in Connecticut fifty years ago, and on its analogy to what our Southern brethren are doing to-day, have a twofold application. Admitting that South Carolina is only half a century behind Connecticut, the question naturally suggests itself, Will South Carolina ever come up to Connecticut? For it is only fair to presume that while the former makes an advance in civilization, the latter will not stand still. And, secondly, supposing even that at some time in the more or less remote future the two sections will be abreast of each other in all that goes to make a civilized community, we must ask, What shall be done in the meanwhile? Which section ought to preponderate in the government of the country—the section which is in full sympathy with the spirit of the century, or the section which lags fifty years behind? That is, after all, the one great practical question of the hour. It is the only real issue, to my mind, of the coming election. There is no longer any pretence anywhere that the Southern States are not to be allowed to govern themselves as to them seems best, without interference from the Federal Administration. The financial question has become the question of again demonetizing silver, and neither party is as yet ready for that. The tariff is like a sun-dial—it has to be adjusted, for both parties, according to latitude. Civil-service reform has been practically thrown overboard by the Republicans, and has never been a part of the Democratic cargo. There is only one thing to be decided by the election—viz., whether during the next four years the country is to be ruled by the North and according to the ideas of to-day, or by the South and according to the ideas of fifty years ago.

The backwardness of the South is not by any means to be regarded as a result of the Reconstruction policy, but dates back to a period long before the war. The South has always been a generation behind the North. Even at the time of the persecutions in Windham County this phenomenon could have been observed. It can be verified now. Compare a volume of the Southern Literary Messenger for 1835 with a volume of the New England Magazine of about the same date, and you will find that while the New England Magazine, judged by the standard of to-day, seems feeble and raw, it is a model of robust maturity alongside of its puny Southern rival. Everybody knows how antiquated were the literary ideals of the South before the war, when the South set up to be literary. The critics of the Sunny South were in ecstasies over Byron and Scott at a period when all the rest of the world had long arrived at a more sober judgment. Since the war it is possible that the Southern youth have progressed as far as Wordsworth and Dickens; and before the end of the century they may, possibly, overtake Tennyson and Thackeray.

Aside from books, we find a similar state of things in other matters. The practice of duelling still flourishes in the South. The old-fashioned notions of hospitality, which to a citizen of the modern Cultur-Staat are merely a survival, still retain their sacred binding force to the "Southron"; a Southerner's ideas of a dignified foreign policy are still a caricature of Palmerston's methods, and mean that you must bully the weak, bluff your equals, and cajole the strong. And Southern opinions concerning women are no more liberal to-day than they were fifty years ago.

That the Southern States should, like Ireland, present an example of arrested development, is a sad phenomenon, and one with which statesmen have to reckon; but it offers no argument for calling in the South to rule us, or even for intermitting Northern criticism of Southern conduct. It is only by such criticism that any improvement can be worked. To excuse what is going on in the South by the plea that fifty years ago there were Northern people who did worse, is to imitate the opponents of civil-service reform when they point to the corruption of Walpole's administration in England as a reason why we should not worry about our custom-house.

The Southern States are now left entirely to themselves, and the physical pressure which has been removed must be replaced by moral pressure. The Southern people must be made to understand that as long as their entire section is given over, whether by force, or fraud, or even by fair means, entirely to one of the two national parties, the North will not trust that party with the national Government. A. T.

New York, Sept. 11, 1880.

[We know of nobody who has ascribed "the backwardness of the South" to the Reconstruction policy. We ascribe it to slavery, and slavery being gone, we maintain, in opposition to some of our esteemed contemporaries, that the ordinary civilizing influences of our time will act on the South as they have acted on the North. There is not half as much reason for a dark view of the Southern future in the South Carolina dislike of "nigger teachers" from the North as there was for a dark view of the future of Connecticut in the persecution of Miss Crandall. The teaching of negroes had none of the odious associations to the Connecticut persecutor which it has to his confrère in South Carolina. We agree with our correspondent as to the unfitness of the South in its present temper to take charge of the Government, but we think much of the exposition on this subject is very injudicious. It may be very wise to say to a man with whom you have to live and do business, "I do not think it safe just yet, considering what our relations have recently been, to have you take the active management of our concern. I may be mistaken in you, but you must acknowledge that, in view of everything that has happened, my mistake is a natural one." But it can never be wise to say to such a man, "You are without exception the greatest scoundrel I ever knew. Your atrocities and outrages and hates and prejudices are absolutely unprecedented. The like of you was never seen in any age or clime. The worst of it is, too, that all attempts to improve you are useless. You are utterly irreclaimable. I believe you would set fire to the store and murder me in my bed to-night if you got a chance. But you won't get a chance. I keep a good watch on you, I promise you, and the more I watch you the worse you seem. Murder is your favorite pastime, and you contract debts not because you want the money, but just for the fun of not paying them. Why don't you acknowledge that you are a wretch? You know you are, and yet you keep constantly denying it, thus proving the hardness of your heart. As soon as you are ready to acknowledge it let me hear from you and I may possibly allow you some active share in the business."—Ed. Nation.]

MR. CONKLING AND THE NATIONAL-BANK SYSTEM.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Some surprise, I see, is expressed that Mr. Senator Conkling, in the recent "greatest effort of his life" at the Academy of Music, in your city, should have devoted himself almost exclusively to the sectional aspects of the pending Presidential canvass, and should have dismissed the currency question without the slightest reference to the depreciated silver dollar, and with only a mere mention of "Democratic hostility" to the national-bank system.

It seems not to be generally remembered that Mr. Conkling has the best possible reason for treating the latter of these topics in a gingerly fashion. No Greenbacker on the stump—not even Gen. Weaver himself—has inveighed more strongly against the policy of the national banks, as a fiscal arrangement for the Government, than Mr. Conkling in the public debates of the Senate. For instance, on the 15th of June, 1868, on a motion to increase the U. S. bank circulation to the amount of $20,000,000, by withdrawing pro tanto legal-tender notes, he opposed the measure, and gave the following reason for his opposition:

"The general banking system, regarded as a fiscal problem between the Government and the people, involves an interest in coin of six per cent. per annum upon bonds exempt from taxation, paid by the United States to corporations for circulating a currency for which the United States are ultimately responsible, and which currency they might themselves have issued without the expense of one farthing beyond the paper and engraving, and the cost of striking it off. I have heard a great many financiers deal with this point, and I have never heard it so disposed of as to make it appear a good fiscal arrangement for the Government of the United States."—Cong. Globe, 2d Session 40th Cong., p. 3153.

At another stage of this same debate he reaffirmed this bad opinion of the national-bank system. If any Greenbacker or Democrat has ever stated the argument against the system more emphatically I have failed to mark his language; and if the Greenback "machine" was to-day in as good working order as the Republican "machine," it is evident that Mr. Conkling would be the proper man to manage it. That his argument against the national-bank system in 1868 was as sophistical as the argument of Gen. Weaver to-day (because leaving out of view its advantages as well as blinking the perils of "fiat money," and so stating only one-half of the case), does but serve to strengthen the likeness between the reasoning processes of the two "statesmen." CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I shall be happy to be a subscriber yearly of $100 to a Civil-Service Reform Society. Yours, B.

NEW YORK, September 17, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The proposition made by "F. W. H.," in your issue of Aug. 19, to form a publication society for the purpose of publishing and disseminating information pertaining to Civil-Service Reform, is a good one, and will certainly meet the hearty concurrence of every friend of good government and of political reform. After canvassing somewhat, I am sure that in our little town, upon the extreme borders of civilization, we can find thirty or forty subscribers to such an organization. Very truly,

E. W. HENDRICK.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., September 6, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Would not your "supposed Republican emissary at the South" be very rash in asserting that the "Republican party at the North have never sanctioned such modes [false counting] of perpetuating its power"? Did not virtually the whole Republican party, including its nominee for President, sanction the action of the Louisiana Returning Board in 1876? His most forcible argument is the one in regard to Federal offices. In no section of the country has the "spoils" system done more harm than in the South, but I am afraid that a demagogue would not find it difficult to divert popular aversion from the system to the men who are believed to be responsible for it. I for one should be perfectly willing that every office-holder in the South should hold his place until removed for cause; for I have no doubt that if he was a man who would use his office for ignoble purposes, without being urged to do so for self-preservation, the cause would soon come. I think it very probable that three-fourths of the subscribers to the Nation would support a Civil-Service Reform Publication Society. I am willing to be one of a thousand to raise the sum that your correspondent thinks necessary for that purpose.

Very respectfully, WINDSOR SMITH.

ALTAMONTE, FLA., September 13, 1880.

P. S.—I wish to call the attention of your correspondent, "W. H.," to the speech made by General Gordon in the Senate some years ago, when he was sharply rebuked by one of the leaders of the Republican party for having been a rebel. This speech seems to have been entirely overlooked.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One of your correspondents suggested the local newspaper as a means of commending the Civil-Service Reform Association to the people. Why not use the local newspaper at once and extensively for the promulgation of civil-service doctrines? Large numbers may be thus reached and prepared for receiving and reading profitably the publications of the Association.

The local paper, as a political factor, is scarcely appreciated. It furnishes to those who have something to say many of the advantages of personal advocacy. All civil-service reformers who live outside of the great cities should resort at once to the columns of their local paper, explain the subject, give facts in its history and the sayings of the wise on the subject, answer objections to it, and in all possible ways remove prejudice and prepare the people for the favorable reception of the strong political measures necessary for "thorough, radical, and complete" reform.

The editors of local newspapers are especially open to conviction by articles printed in their columns. Z.

IOWA, September 16, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read with much interest the correspondence in the Nation relative to civil-service reform, and approve most heartily of the Publication Society in that interest, and will subscribe to the good cause with work and money.

I should say the duty of the civil-service reformer, in the present campaign, was to vote for Garfield, inasmuch as while his election will retain and put in office many who are not worthy, yet, in the main, honest, efficient, and experienced officers will be had. But in the event of Hancock's election the spoils system will turn out of office many valuable men of long experience, and put in their places men unacquainted with the duties of office, and who will need to serve a number of years before they will be competent therefor.

I think the Independent press of the country, in conjunction with the Civil-Service Reform Publication Society, could perform a good work. There are a large number of non-partisan papers published in small towns which could greatly help the circulation of reform ideas. You can count on me for all the assistance in my power, and the columns of my paper are open to the good work. Yours truly, J. F. G.

OFFICE OF THE GAZETTE, BALDWINSVILLE, N. Y., September 20, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In 1874, when the Convention for altering the Constitution of Pennsylvania was in session, I had prepared for submission to it a scheme of permanent office-holders and appointments by fitness. On consultation with some sagacious and "practical" reformers as to the propriety of bringing the plan before the Convention, I was so overwhelmed with ridicule as to the quixotism of my ideas that I lost the courage my convictions should have enforced, and was silent. I do not mention this to claim credit as an early explorer or discoverer, but as evidence of the length of time I have been studying, and the importance I attach to, this subject. Indeed, I believe it to be to-day the paramount question of our politics, both State and Federal, beside which, if the integrity of our country is to be preserved, all questions of finance, the currency, and tariff, important as they are, must for a while be subordinated. After this confession you probably, and certainly all of your Republican friends who invariably assume for themselves and their party a monopoly of virtue and intelligence, will be surprised to learn that I am not a Republican but a Democrat of the strictest sect, and that not alone myself but several of my friends would be but too pleased to contribute towards the support of a journal or a party which would advocate, explain, and educate the people in "civil-service reform."

It is not unreasonable, however, that gentlemen who think as we do should desire that our opinions (prejudices, if you will) on other political questions should be respected, and, therefore, what is called "The Independent Republican Committee" would not be a proper depositary for contributions or organ for action. Neither of the great political parties can, of necessity, be now used for this reform. They are and must be run on the "spoils" system. We must start as a small band of rabid, impractical fanatics, until by disseminating knowledge we shall have gained over enough votes to make ourselves of political value in closely-contested Congressional districts, and in State and municipal elections. Then the "practical" politicians will bid for our votes as they did for those of the abolitionists, and pay for our support by voting for our measures. Meanwhile, let us have the newspaper and begin to teach at once. The ground is ready for the seed. Make a new committee to receive subscriptions, with members in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and the Western and Southern cities. You will be astonished at the number of subscribers you will get. I think I could get a dozen at $5 each. J. S.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I sincerely hope there will be a Civil-Service Reform Publication Society. As to the need of some organization of the kind there seems to be general agreement.

But I also sincerely hope that such an organization will not be partisan. There are men among the Democrats who are as truly in favor of true reform as any in the Republican ranks. And if this new movement falls into the hands of the so-called Independent Republicans, honest Democrats who favor the cause will be kept away from the organization. If the Independent Republicans will open their doors, change their name, and call for workingmen from all parties, then let them take the lead in the movement. But if they insist on forming practically only a wing of the Republican party, then I trust that an organization which is independent in fact will take the lead in this new movement. INDEPENDENT.

NEW YORK, September 18, 1880.

[We are now able to state that, in view of the spirit manifested by the correspondence on this subject, the Civil-Service Reform Association of this city, of which Dr. H. W. Bellows is President, and which has a large, influential, and non-partisan membership, is taking steps to reorganize itself for active work. This Association was formed some four years ago, but has accomplished little. It is now capable, under wise counsel, of guiding to a certain if not speedy consummation the movement which aims at the overthrow of the greatest remaining obstacle to all reform, whether political or social. Letters of adherence can still be sent until further notice to the Independent Republican Executive Committee, Box 1827, N. Y. City.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

THE Library Journal reappears in its familiar dress, making a double number for July and August. Mr. Leypoldt explains in a card the disinterested motive of his undertaking, and requests suggestions calculated to enable a new volume to be begun on a more economical and not less useful basis.——Mr. S. C. Griggs, jr., Chicago, has assumed the American agency of the Roman periodical Minerva, of which we have already spoken. It is printed in English, and has a truly international list of contributors—Karl Blind ("The Suez Canal and the Circumnavigation of Africa"), A. V. Vecchi ("Yachts and Yachting in the Mediterranean"), Henri Rochefort ("Mlle. Bismarck," a tale), and Dr. Stamatius Antonopoulos ("Public Education in Greece"), for example, in the July number, in which every article is a translation.——Mr. Alexander Graham Bell's remarkable account of his new photophone is given in full in Science for September 11, which proves its title to existence by continuing to print the papers read at the Boston meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.——So few persons make a business of rescuing old pamphlets for sale to the seekers after rarities or after sets, that we must mention a very full "Catalogue of Political Pamphlets embracing the Period between 1789 and 1879," just published by E. P. Boon, 86 Nassau Street, New York. It abounds in curiosities.——Among recent Government publications is an 'Introduction to the Study of Mortuary Customs among the North American Indians,' by Dr. H. C. Yarrow, U.S.A., issued by the Bureau of Ethnology of the Smithsonian Institution. A volume will ultimately be devoted to the subject, which is still explored by means of circulars to be had of the author on application. The Bureau of Education has put forth a circular on the "Legal Rights of Children," in the matter of education, namely—a comparative view of existing State legislation; also, a report on the condition of the Indian school at Carlisle Barracks in February last, accounts of the progress of Western education in China and Siam, and of European "vacation colleges" for sickly school children.——From the Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences have been reprinted two essays by Waldo S. Pratt, now of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, discussing (adversely) the derivation of the Doric order from Egyptian prototypes in columnar architecture, and proposing a new classification of Egyptian columns. They are excellent examples of industrious and intelligent study.——In the Athenæum of Sept. 4 an Athens correspondent gives some gratifying details of recent activity on the part of the Archæological Society, resulting in the identification of the theatre of Zéa referred to by Xenophon in 'Hell.,' ii. 4, and the discovery of that of Munychia. The same correspondent states that the excavations preliminary to re-erecting the Lion of Chæronæa have revealed the bones of the Theban Sacred Band, with a few remains of arms, buttons, etc.——The Music Festival to be held in the Seventh Regiment's Armory, in this city, next May, under the direction of Dr. Damrosch, will employ a chorus of one thousand voices and an orchestra of more than two hundred instruments. Handel's Dettingen Te Deum and Messiah, Berlioz's Grand Requiem, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Rubinstein's Tower of Babel will constitute part of the programme, the last-mentioned work being performed for the first time in this country.——In the July number of the Moliériste M. Nuitter, the archivist of the Opéra, describes three great rarities just acquired by that institution for its library. These are three "posters" of performances given under Louis XIV. by the three companies of actors then existing in Paris. That of Molière's company was, unfortunately, badly torn, but M. Nuitter has conjecturally restored it with great skill. In the August number M. Louis Moland identifies the date as 1660. In the second, or May, number of Dr. Schweizer's tri-yearly Molière und seine Bühne: Molière-Museum is reprinted the very scarce "Festin de Pierre," by the actor Dorimond, a play needful for the study of Molière's "Don Juan."——Prof. Adolf Tobler has recently published his lectures on French versification delivered to his class in the University of Berlin, two years ago, under the title: 'Vom französischen Versbau alter und neuer Zeit' (Leipzig. 1880). The work rests on a strictly historical method, and is a very convenient compend for the use of the teacher.——Part 8 of Vapereau's 'Dictionnaire Universel des Contemporains' (New York: F. W. Christern) ends with Ricci. The article on Napoleon III. is concluded. After him the late Pope Pius IX. is most considered, being sketched in four pages. Olivier, F. V. Raspail, Persigny, Pelletan, Pouyer-Quertier, Félix Pyat, Quinet, Rattazzi, Charles de Rémusat, and Renan are treated in limits of a page and upwards.

—From the Publishers' Weekly of the 11th instant we complete our list of the fall announcements of new books, as follows. Harper & Bros.:—G. O. Trevelyan's 'Early Life of Charles James Fox'; the fourth volume of Kinglake's 'Invasion of the Crimea'; Dr. Schliemann's 'Ilios, the City and Country of the Trojans'; Alfred R. Wallace's 'Island Life: or, the Phenomena of Insular Floras and Faunas, with their Causes'; a biographical sketch of the late William Cullen Bryant, by A. J. Symington; a second volume of J. W. Forney's 'Anecdotes of Public Men'; Mrs. Helen Jackson's 'Century of Dishonor,' viz., the United States Government's dealings with the Indians; Henry James, jr.'s, 'Washington Square'; and 'Pastoral Days,' by W. Hamilton Gibson—articles reprinted from Harper's Monthly, with the author's illustrations. D. Appleton & Co.:—'The Political History of Recent Times, 1816–1875,' from the German of Wilhelm Müller (of which, by the way, Little, Brown & Co. promise another translation, by the Rev. J. P. Peters); Geo. H. Jennings's 'Anecdotal History of the British Parliament'; Sir C. G. Duffy's 'Young Ireland'; a 'History of Greece,' by T. T. Timayenis; 'Life and her Children,' by Arabella B. Buckley; 'Mashallah: a Flight into Egypt,' by Charles Warren Stoddard; the second and third volumes of Badeau's 'Military History of U. S. Grant'; and perhaps the most American work of the season, 'Uncle Remus, His Songs and His Sayings,' being an unrivalled collection of negro animal fables, by Joel Chandler Harris. Macmillan & Co.:—Volumes 3 and 4 of Ward's 'English Poets'; 'Cicero's Life and Letters,' by the Rev. G. E. Jeans; 'A Visit to Wazan,' the sacred city of Morocco, by Robert Spence Watson; a welcome translation of Kiepert's 'Manual of Ancient Geography'; and new editions of Hamerton's 'Etching and Etchers,' and Gilchrist's 'Life of William Blake,' both enriched by new illustrations. Charles Scribner's Sons:—'Gleanings from a Literary Life,' by Prof. Francis Bowen; 'Army Life in Russia,' by Lt. F. V. Greene, U.S.A.; a 'Life of Charles Hodge, D.D.,' by his son, Dr. A. A. Hodge; and a 'Boys' King Arthur,' matching his 'Boys' Froissart,' by Sidney Lanier. Henry Holt & Co.:—'Old Paris, its Court and Literary Salons,' by Charlotte, Lady Jackson; and 'Our Familiar Songs, and Those Who Made Them,' by Helen Kendrick Johnson. Fords, Howard & Hulbert:—'Bricks without Straw,' and 'A Royal Gentleman,' by Judge Tourgee, author of 'A Fool's Errand'; 'An Earthly Paradise; or, Rifle, Rod, and Gun in California,' by T. S. Vandyke; a 'Memoir of John Howard Raymond,' late President of Vassar College; and an elegant illustrated edition of 'Aucassin and Nicolette,' translated into prose and verse by A. R. Macdonough. Cassell, Petter & Galpin:—a new 'Life of Jane Austen'; the second volume of the illustrated description of Great Britain and Ireland called 'Our Country'; and final volumes of Hodder's 'Heroes of Britain in Peace and War,' and Whymper's 'The Sea.' A. C. Armstrong & Son:—A series of popular biographies called 'Heroes of the Christian Church,' leading off with Wilberforce; and 'Memoir of Henry Boynton Smith,' late professor in the Union Theological Seminary, edited by his wife. E. P. Dutton & Co.:—'Indian Summer,' an illustrated poetic album, by Miss Clarkson; 'Masterpieces of Antique Art,' permanent photographs from objects in the Vatican, the Louvre, and the British Museum, with text by Stephen Thompson—we presume, the photographer himself; and a new edition of White's 'Memoirs of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America,' with notes and a sketch of the Colonial Church by the Rev. B. F. De Costa. Dodd, Mead & Co. will shortly have ready the first volume of Woltmann and Woermann's 'History of Painting in all Ages,' translated and edited by Prof. Sidney Colvin. Thomas Nelson & Sons promise 'Shakspere's Stories Simply Told,' by Mary Seamer, with numerous illustrations. George Routledge & Sons will issue, no doubt this time in an adequate edition, Kate Greenaway's 'Birthday Book for Children.'

—A somewhat shorter list will include the forthcoming publications of the Boston and Philadelphia houses. Little, Brown & Co.:—'A History of the Conquest of Spain by the Arab Moors,' by Professor Henry Coppée; and Grimm's 'Life and Times of Goethe,' translated by Miss Sarah Holland Adams. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.:—'Ballads and other Verses,' by James T. Fields, together with 'Under the Olives,' verses by Mrs. Fields; a volume of poetry by Lucy Larcom; and 'Historical Sketches of Andover, Mass.,' by Miss Sarah L. Bailey. James R. Osgood & Co.:—'Eminent English Liberals,' by J. Morrison Davidson; 'Self-Culture,' by the Rev. James Freeman Clarke; Charles T. Congdon's 'Reminiscences of a Journalist'; the literary remains of John Brougham, with an autobiography, edited by William Winter, who cares in like manner for the 'Tales, Sketches, and Poems' of the late Fitz-James O'Brien; a 'Life of Dr. Rimmer,' by his fellow-sculptor, T. H. Bartlett; Dr. Angell's 'Records of William M. Hunt'; a 'Dictionary of the Stage,' by Townsend Percy; a series of dramatic biographies, beginning with Edwin Forrest; 'Jewish History and the Bible Narrative'; a translation of the Georgics of Virgil, by Miss H. W. Preston; and Mrs. John T. Sargent's 'Records and Reminiscences of the Radical Club of Chestnut Street, Boston.' Lee & Shepard:—'How I Found it North and South,' a farmer's experience; General O. O. Howard's 'Nez-Percés War'; 'Conversation: its Faults and its Graces,' by Dr. A. P. Peabody; and 'Gleanings in the Field of Art,' by Mrs. Edna D. Cheney. J. B. Lippincott & Co. have in press 'The Beef Bonanza; or, How to get Rich on the Plains,' by General Brisbin. Presley Blakiston will publish 'School and Industrial Hygiene,' by Dr. David F. Lincoln.

—The October Harper's is not remarkable for substance. An ascent of Fuzhiyama is described in slovenly English by Constance Gordon-Cumming, who saw perhaps two things worth recording—the morning shadow of the sacred mountain (as she had seen that of Adam's Peak in Ceylon), and the beaten path near the summit so thickly strewn with cast-off pilgrims' sandals "as to give it the appearance of having had straw laid over it." Dr. T. M. Brewer's "Reminiscences of John James Audubon," accompanied by a striking portrait, embrace a number of Audubon's letters to the writer, who out of affection for his old friend vindicates the latter's character for honesty of purpose and statement without clearly defining his rank as a naturalist, as to which Dr. Coues's Bibliography lately made some unexpected revelations, apropos of Macgillivray. Mr. M. D. Conway, still pursuing his studies in demonology, talks discursively of the St. Hubert legend in Touraine, and then of Louis XI., making free use of Willert's life of that monarch, with an evident desire to show that this devil of popular tradition was not so black as he was painted. Mr. A. A. Hayes, jr., glorifies Chicago as the "Metropolis of the Prairies." That literary salt, Captain John Codman, throws cold water, in his "Sophia Walker," on a story of second-sight printed as "A Puzzle for Metaphysicians" in the June number of the magazine. Captain Codman was "at the other end of the line" from the seer, and corrects her narrative of the incident which happened under his own eyes in several material particulars. Much pleasant gossip of the high seas he throws in gratuitously. "Some Peculiarities of Turkish Politics" are well pointed out by Henry O. Dwight, who writes from experience of the Turkish character.

—In the October Scribner's the number of articles which challenge perusal is not great, but several of these are of unusual excellence. Mr. Cable's "Grandissimes" is concluded with an art and a degree of pathos not surpassed in any of the previous fifty-odd chapters; and almost one might say of this story as a whole that it restores—in the field of fiction, at least—the intellectual balance of North and South. The "countrymen," as they may still call themselves, of Wm. Gilmore Simms, will perhaps not take this for a compliment, seeing that the theme which Mr. Cable has made his own is the spirit of slavery not only in its most brutal aspect (seen in the tragedy of Bras-Coupé), but in its equally subtle and detestable manifestation as the pride of caste. Nevertheless, we hope this imaginative and powerful tale will find Southern readers in abundance, and that its humane teachings will have a salutary influence on minds which still lament the bloody passing away of an ideal social institution. It is by an easy transition that one turns from "The Grandissimes" to Mr. Sidney Lanier's article on "The New South"—of small farmers, namely. This writer's poetic fancy, too, and nice literary taste have invested an economic topic with a palatable husk of philosophy and history. The reductio ad absurdum of farming quâ farming in the gigantic wheat-raising of the Northwest, which Mr. Lanier justly classes rather with mining or manufacturing than with agriculture, is contrasted with the multiplication in the Southeast and South of small farms with diversified products, bringing in their train a new social structure, unknown amenities and amusements, and the slow but inevitable extinction of the "color line." The subject is one of the highest importance, for slavery notoriously made farming disreputable for the white man who labored with his own hands. Mr. Lanier has been the first, as far as we know, to compare the censuses of 1860 and 1870 for evidence of the great change in holdings since the war. He makes it clear that the freedmen probably form a very large proportion of the small cultivators in Mississippi not less than in Georgia, and it will be strange, in spite of the exodus, if the new census does not reinforce his statistics. Other articles deserve mention, but we cannot dwell upon them. The second instalment of the biography of Millet reveals still more intimately the noble character of this artist. Under the caption "To Bolt or Not to Bolt" the Rev. Washington Gladden makes a good argument in defence of scratching, or, in other words, "the right to oppose a thoroughly bad candidate in the canvass, in the caucus, and at the polls."

—The appearance of no fewer than seven pieces of verse in the October Atlantic is no sure warrant, of course, for expecting as many lines of poetry; and, accordingly, we are not disappointed, but only get a keener sense than ever of the worth of magazine poetry. It must be difficult to obtain anything out of the ordinary, or we should oftener see it; and doubtless the editors are as well aware as any one of the shortcomings of what gets printed. But why not do without verse altogether if good verse is not to be had, and by making merit the qualification draw a sharper line between magazine and "newspaper poetry"? We suspect that it is a mistake to suppose poor poetry as popular as poor prose, and that readers who are not alive to good verse occupy themselves very little with any. This should, at least, be true of the Atlantic's readers. Among the poets of the present number are Robert Louis Stephenson, whose "Not Yet, My Soul" strikes us as a singularly prosaic thing for its author to be deceived about; Mr. Whittier, and Mr. Aldrich. Mr. Whittier gives us another version of his favorite theme of 'The Eternal Goodness,' and Mr. Aldrich sixteen lines called "Comedy," and belonging to the little-gem order of verse. It is a prettily polished little gem, and, though the conceit is not new, it has enduring possibilities; but whether its prevailing quality is to be called delicacy or insipidity is a question. The last verse is:

> Ah, what a comedy this is!
> Neither was hurt, it appears:
> She had forgotten his kisses,
> And he had forgotten her tears; and we have no doubt Mr. Swinburne's following would say the poem had a jaunty, dilettante air contrasted with the real irony and passion of the "Interlude" verses, which conclude:

> And the best and the worst of this is
> That neither is most to blame,
> If you've forgotten my kisses
> And I've forgotten your name.

Mr. Bishop contributes a short story, very well done, and evidently—or perhaps, rather, inferentially—very carefully thought out and executed. Those whom it interests, nevertheless, will be apt to enquire, in some irritation, if the low tone could not have been preserved without making the conclusion tragic; the fanciful part is not good enough to stand in the way of a more agreeable and equally real ending, and the effect produced is one of perversity. Mr. White's English paper this month is about the drinking habits of the people, and is one of the more interesting of his series, all of which have had more or less suggestiveness; what he says in digression as to the character and limits of the period during which the excuse for the phrase "drunk as a lord" was furnished, is worth noting. The reviews are all better than usual, that concerning Channing being perhaps the best; it is good enough, at all events, to make us wish its moderation of temper—which has almost as good results as clairvoyance often—extended even to such remarks as "Channing is, without doubt, the chief ornament of the American pulpit," which may be true, but in which surely the "without doubt" is misleading, and "he was a Falkland on Cromwell's side"—a statement needing too much qualification or explanation to pass as a matter-of-course allusion. These are slight blemishes as such things go, but in a real contribution to the current understanding of Channing they deserve notice. Dr. William James's "Great Men, Great Thoughts, and the Environment" is a vivacious attack on the Spencerian school, and amounts so nearly to a demonstration—though, pace Dr. James, it is hard to be sure about any demonstration in such an inexact matter as science appears to the lay reader of such discussions—that it will seem to many people the article they have been looking for. It is, at any rate, the article of the number.

—The opening article of Lippincott's, "A Chapter of American Exploration," by W. H. Rideing, is the noteworthy paper of the number for its popular instructiveness as well as for its crisp and enthusiastic style, which makes it a contrast to the usual way in which perfunctory work of this kind is performed. Considering this, it is perhaps a small thing to mention that, from a literary point of view, the last sentence—"suspended by his fingers from the rocks, four hundred feet above the level of the river: Major Powell is a one-armed man!"—is vicious writing. "Glimpses of Portugal and the Portuguese" is less striking but has more than the ordinary interest of such papers. "Adam and Eve" increases, as it has done every month, the impression of sustained power left by the first number; it should be near the climax. The short stories are not bad, but are all more or less morbid—a trait which we are not sure, by the way, is not becoming a little characteristic of Lippincott's lighter fiction. Ouida's is the best, but it is distinctly not "A Child's Story," we submit. The social part of Louise Coffin Jones's "Seven Weeks a Missionary"—in Honolulu—is suggestive, as indeed everything about the fated Hawaiians must be. "Americans Abroad," by Alain Gore, will profitably instruct readers (no doubt there are such, though they must be few) to whom his views are novel. Lucy Hooper's short paper on the French tenor Roger, with his reminiscences of Jenny Lind, is as good as it is short. There are but two poems, "Under the Grasses," by Dora Read Goodale, which is formally pretty but sentimentally rather vague; and "From Far," by Philip Bourke Marston, which calls for no particular comment.

—In reviewing Ludlow's 'Dramatic Life as I Found It" (Nation, No. 790) we said he had "shattered" the tradition that J. B. Booth ever acted Oreste in French in New Orleans. Mr. Ludlow was the manager in New Orleans in 1822 when Booth played Orestes in the "Distrest Mother," and records his belief that it was this performance in an English version of "Andromaque" which gave rise to the tradition of Booth's having actually acted in French. A Rochester correspondent promptly called our attention to a page which we had overlooked in the 'Passages, Incidents, and Anecdotes in the Life of Junius Brutus Booth (the elder),' by his daughter, Mrs. Clarke, which gives in the original French the programme of "Andromaque," as acted by a company of French actors, with Booth as Oreste, in 1828—that is to say, six years after the performance in English to which Ludlow alludes, and several years before Ludlow again returned to New Orleans. The point seemed to us curious enough to be settled by contemporary testimony, and a correspondent in New Orleans has very obligingly transcribed for us the theatrical criticism of the French and English editions of the Louisiana Courier of February 21, 1828, together with the advertisements of the two performances, viz., on Tuesday, February 19, and Thursday, February 21, and Mr. Booth's card of grateful acknowledgment.

—The French critique is perhaps a little more forcible in its expressions, but it substantially agrees with the English, from which we make the following extract. The rôle of Hermione, by the way, was taken by Mme. Clozel, a much-admired actress, who often, in conversations with Mr. Lamache, the present controller of the New Orleans Theatre (as he informs our correspondent), spoke of her surprise at Mr. Booth's portrayal of Orestes in a language not his own. We omit the laudatory passage relating to her performance:

"A spectacle of deep interest, one as novel as it was pleasing, was offered last Tuesday night in the Orleans Theatre to the lovers of dramatic talents. Yielding to the solicitations of several gentlemen in this city, Mr. Booth consented to present himself before a French audience in the part of Orestes. He was aware that his pronunciation was far from being considered correct even by his most partial friends, but relying on the indulgence of a polite audience he determined to make the attempt, depending on his power of action to diminish, at least, the defect of his accent. This effort, perilous in the extreme, and which nothing but a wish to give to Frenchmen an opportunity of judging fairly of what is termed the English style of acting, could have urged Mr. Booth to risk, has been crowned with the most flattering success. After the first scene the unpleasant effect of his English accent was lost in the deep and ever-increasing interest excited by the warmth of his feelings, the earnestness of his manner, and the impetuous ardor of his delivery. There certainly were moments when the dialogue did not call for the enthusiastic vigor which carried away the hearers without giving them time to attend to mere sounds, when harsh and discordant words wounded the delicacy of French ears; but, whenever passion rose high, and, above all, when the furies guided Orestes to crimes, the accomplishment of his fatal destinies, criticism was merged into admiration, and, with one voice, all wondered that a stranger should thus feel and express all the beauties of Racine.

"The spectators, after the curtain dropped, called for Mr. Booth and saluted him by long and reiterated applause.

"It were unjust not to say that 'Andromaque' had been judiciously selected; 'The Distressed Mother,' the title given by Philip to his translation of that tragedy, having made it as familiar to the English as it is to all French readers."

—What will first strike the reader of Mr. Fitzedward Hall's article on "English, Rational and Irrational," in the September number of the Nineteenth Century, will be the two pages of instances of neologisms explained or discountenanced by the saviours of the English language in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Beginning with Sir Thomas Elyot in 1531, who "condemned, by implication, industry, magnanimity, maturity and modesty," the list of words now utterly familiar and for the most part indispensable is expanded to upwards of two hundred, and is, pending the publication of the Philological Society's Dictionary, worthy to be used in annotating Webster or Worcester. The next striking passage is an incidental description of the Democratic party, which we cannot safely advise any member of that party to consult till after election. But Dr. Hall's main object is to pay his respects to the late Mr. Bryant's much-circulated index expurgatorius of words which must on no account be used in the Evening Post—by its own staff, at least—and which perhaps is still in force. If so, as all are interested in the emancipation of those needlessly held in bondage, we recommend to the Post particularly the results of Dr. Hall's examination of the list, which not only deals with the supposed reasons of Mr. Bryant's interdict, but contrasts it with his own practice in his 'Letters of a Traveller' and 'Orations and Addresses.' It is charitable not to go into the details of the contradictions thus exposed, and the real lapses which Mr. Bryant innocently committed. Dr. Hall declares: "Not only Germans, Hollanders, Danes, Russians, Italians, Hungarians, Greeks, and Finns, but divers Hindus, Parsees, and Japanese, distinctly better versed than Mr. Bryant in the employment of the English language, have, from first to last, crossed our path." And in a foot-note, remarking on Charles Brockden Brown's American novel, 'Edgar Huntly' (1799), that "it seldom reminds one of its author's nationality," he adds: "Whoever compares it with Mr. Bryant's 'Letters,' the English of which is not much worse than that of ninety-nine out of every hundred of his college-bred compatriots, will very soon become aware to what degree the art of writing our language has declined among educated Americans." The appearance of a posthumous attack is relieved by the statement that the article, substantially in its present shape, was in the editor's hands several months before Mr. Bryant's death.

—The translation of Schwegler's 'Geschichte der Philosophie,' by President Seelye, through which that work has been known in this country since 1856, has been revised from the ninth German edition by Mr. Benj. E. Smith, whose name appears with President Seelye's upon the title-page of the new issue (Appletons). There result some rearrangements in four of the sections, and the addition of the antinomies of Zeno, absent from the earlier edition. The translation is clear and finished, and for the purposes of a text-book is decidedly preferable to that of Dr. Stirling (Edinburgh, 1868), whose style stumbles, or is always about to stumble, with excess of the thought. Schwegler's original history yet stands with academic Germany a model compendium in philosophy, under the limitation that the work finds its close and cumulation in Hegel; Mr. Smith by an appendix to the translation "continues the history in its more prominent lines of development since the time of Hegel." That is, there are 47 pages 12mo, of which two-thirds go to Schopenhauer, Von Hartmann, and Hickok, while the remaining morsel is given to Hartley, the two Mills, Comte, Bain, and Spencer. Spencer's whole system is decided to be materialistic because "materialism consists not so much in asserting the substantial identity of mind and matter [or better, does not so consist at all; the identity of mind and matter is the view of monism], as in asserting that the laws which govern the phenomena of both are the same." On this showing, however, Hegel would have to be decided the materialist par excellence.

THE BRAIN AS A MENTAL ORGAN.*

ANOTHER rather bulky volume on the relations of mind and body. Dr. Bastian, though best known to the general public as the man whose opinions about spontaneous generation have been more generally jumped upon and maltreated by his colleagues than almost any scientific opinions of recent days, is also an energetic worker on the nervous system. This book exhibits both his merits and defects. It is difficult to say which preponderate—the rough sort of independence in thinking, the general copiousness of information, and the fluency; or the disorderly literary form, and the tendency of the best of the author's ideas never to get exactly into focus in his mind.

The subject of the relations of brain and mind will certainly be one day the most fascinating one ever offered to a reader, but that day has not quite arrived, and all efforts at combining popularity with accuracy must fail. One might write an article for the Popular Science Monthly in which it should be shown how every idea has its pigeon-hole in the cortex; and the cells, and the ganglia, and the motor and the sensory processes, and the superposed stages of reflex action, and the reasons why some patients can understand but not speak, and others read whole words but not single letters of the alphabet, should all be exhibited to the reader with the beautiful distinctness of objects under the gaslight reflectors of a well-arranged shop-window. And he will think (if otherwise ignorant of physiology) that he knows the matter like his pocket, as the French say. But all this beauty is reached by simply picking out one set of facts and leaving others unmentioned. The deeper one advances in the study the more one becomes penetrated with the idea that most of our authorities on the subject are probably on a false scent. The facts we know are like separate mountain peaks emerging from a sea of cloud. An explorer in a balloon might think that there lay the whole country unrolled before his eyes, with the very visible material which connected one summit with another. But really that which connects the facts in view is the valleys far beneath and out of sight. One of the most thorough chapters in Dr. Bastian's book is that on the "External Configuration of the Human Brain"; but we fancy it will appear some day that all this elaborate discussion of convolutions (one of the most tedious chapters in human anatomy) has just about as much to do with the study of the brain's functions as a painstaking set of measurements of the external dimensions of chimneys, windows, doors, and cornices would have to do with an enquiry into the sizes, weights, and complexions of the indwellers of a house.

Dr. Bastian cites his colleague, Dr. Ferrier, incessantly, but makes hardly a reference to the still more recent researches of Munk and Goltz; nor does he discuss much the views of Dr. Hughlings Jackson, which, though based on human pathology rather than on brute vivisection, and often expressed obscurely enough, seem to us to shine with the genius of interpretation. Munk and Ferrier see the peaks, but often seem to take the clouds for land; Jackson sees the peaks, but feels the clouds as clouds and strains his vision for outlines of the hidden vales. His glimpses are misty enough, but they are glimpses of something lying deep. For our part, we firmly believe that the man who will do most service to brain physiology to-day will be not he who scoops most cerebral material from dogs and monkeys, but he who makes most guesses, simple guesses, different from any made hitherto, as to what may possibly be the elementary forms of functioning of this mysterious organ. Dr. Jackson sees most brain disturbances in the light of "dissolutions"—that is, general retrogressions from the more educated and latest acquired modes of action to the more machine-like and primitive. But in none of these disturbances need any single faculty, motor or sensorial, be utterly lost. They may all remain with what remains of the mutilated brain, but their co-operation will no longer bring forth the same result. Such physiologists as Munk, on the contrary, say that when you spoon out a particular morsel of grey matter from the surface of a particular convolution you have absolutely and totally shunted out from the animal's life a definite faculty, that of relation with the external world through a perfectly definite portion, say of its retina. The present critic recently had the privilege of examining a dog of Prof. Goltz's which had suffered a very heavy loss of cortical substance. The extraordinary behavior of the animal, which was otherwise in perfect bodily health, would certainly have attracted a large crowd had he been in the street. He was quite imbecile, but exhibited a restless activity prompted apparently by appetite for food. The most curious thing about him, as Goltz observed, seemed to be the total loss of the sense of his whereabouts in space. Sounds evidently attracted his attention, but he seemed unable to tell their direction. Food seemed to excite him by its presence, but his movements to reach it were entirely indefinite. He never went in a straight line towards anything; his whole life seemed to be a sort of confusion. How exactly to interpret the mental condition corresponding to such outward manifestations is a task which Goltz expressly renounces, which to our mind neither Ferrier, Munk, nor Jackson has made anything like clear, on which Dr. Bastian throws no new light, and for which we must perhaps wait till our heaven-born "guesser" comes along.

Dr. Bastian is a very explicit and thorough evolutionist; most people would begin by thinking him a materialist, since he at some length in chapter ix. defines the scope of "Mind" as constituted by "all ingoing (!!) nerve currents, whether accompanied by a recognizable conscious phasis or not." "The functional results of outgoing nerve currents lie wholly beyond the sphere of mind. . . . They are purely physical phenomena." This strange discrimination between outgoing and ingoing currents seems to hang together with a theory which in 1869 Dr. Bastian was, we believe, the first to advance explicitly, and which is to our mind one of the truest and most original parts of the present book. It is that the outgoing current is not, as Bain, Wundt, and almost the whole body of recent authors have assumed, accompanied by consciousness, but is wholly insentient. It is true that since Dr. Bastian allows insentient *in*going currents to be "Mind," it is hard to see why he excludes similar *out*going ones. But that is a caprice; the main point is that he can fairly profess to be the original English reformer in this question of fundamental importance (see chaps. xxv., xxvi., and appendix). The chapters on Brain, Speech, and Thought are also the fullest and clearest analysis yet written on the subject of aphasia, and should be read by all interested in that fascinating disease. The book, as a whole, is to be recommended to advanced students. They will find in it plenty of suggestive ideas. With the wants of beginners its faults of form will be likely to interfere.

MODERN NAVIES.*

WITHIN the past twenty years the changes in the fleets of the principal naval powers have been so rapid and universal that it has been almost impossible at any time to form a true estimate of the strength of any maritime power. With the introduction and improvement of iron-clad ships, the vast increase in the power and weight of ordnance, torpedo warfare developing as a new and special arm, modifications in engines and boilers which have tended greatly to increase speed and to economize fuel, the revolution in tactics and entire change in the conditions of naval warfare brought about by the growth of armor-defence and ram-attack, it is only by the closest attention, and under exceptionally favorable circumstances, that naval officers have been able to comprehend the magnitude of the general result. Within the past two years, however, the rage for naval development has subsided into a slow and steady advance, making the present a favorable time for measuring the actual strength and resources of the navies of the world. This task Lieutenant Very has undertaken in the work now before us, a work necessarily so extensive that the limited space of this article would be hardly sufficient to notice its principal features, were all to be considered, but from which we may draw one or two facts which seem important enough to deserve special attention.

Ever since the introduction of steam propulsion in ships of war England, France, and the United States have taken the lead in the development of types of naval vessels. In Great Britain the navy has always been considered the main defence. Its support and advance have for over two hundred years been reckoned of the first importance, and in legislating for its maintenance expense has seldom been spared. England, of course, leads the world as a naval power. Her ships and guns are not only numerically superior, but are actually better than those of any other nation. In France there has always been a generous system of legislation for the support of the navy, but it has never been considered of the vital importance to the safety of the nation that it has been in England; consequently, naval controllers have been obliged to exercise a much greater economy in development, and the rigidly mathematical system of the French in the exercise of all control is nowhere better exemplified than in the management of the fleet. There was one period when the French fell so far to the rear as almost to take the third place in naval strength, while progress ceased entirely. This was caused by the Prussian war, from whose effects the navy still suffers, although it has fully regained its former position close to that of Great Britain.

In the United States naval development has been hampered by a constant legislative meddling, imposing a restraint far more injurious than lack of funds or the distractions of war itself. At no time has the strength of the fleet been sufficient to bear a comparison with that of either England or France; but in the matter of architectural advance the United States has repeatedly passed to the front at a single stride. In spite, however, of the advantages gained, parsimoniousness and political meddling have invariably interfered to hold the navy fast at its single stage of advance, until its first developments had sunk into utter insignificance beside the modifications and perfections applied in Europe. In 1865 the United States possessed a fleet fully able to protect the whole line of its immense coast against foreign aggression; in 1870 the fleet was reduced to a handful of vessels which, while showing a heterogeneousness equal to that of the English fleet, did not possess a single element of strength.

We have so far confined ourselves to almost verbatim quotations from the book before us. But figures are not wanting, and are fully given, in support of these assertions of our naval inferiority. While it has never been necessary for our country to possess an immense fleet like that of England or France, still it is surely important that our small naval force should be made up of the best material. Since the foundation of the navy it has always been one of the principles of American construction to build ships whose measurements exceeded those of similar types in Europe. This principle was successfully carried out to the close of the civil war, when the immense fleet which we had collected faded and disappeared, partly through legislative reduction, by sale, and partly on account of the inferior material used in the construction of the more recent ships. At the present time the English navy comprises a total of 302 ships; France has 227; Russia, 126; Turkey, 102; and Holland, Spain, and the United States stand on about an equal footing in point of numbers, each nation reckoning 72 ships in the fleet. In the great fleets of Europe ships are classified as "armored vessels," "unarmored rapid cruisers," and "general-service ships." The bulk of these navies is made up of the first two classes, the third class being composed of vessels of the earlier types, steam frigates and corvettes, which represent primitive developments in steam propulsion and are incapable of a high rate of speed, an element of the first importance in modern naval warfare. It is of this third class, discarded for war purposes in Europe, that our navy is principally composed. We have twenty iron-clads, but these are of the monitor type, incapable of keeping the seas as cruisers, very slow under steam, and useful only for coast defence. The sea-going iron-clads of England and France, or the unarmored rapid cruisers which, with a high rate of speed, embody the latest developments in naval construction and carry heavy batteries, find no representatives in our navy; and the principle above quoted, that of keeping a few of the best ships of each class, seems to have been entirely abandoned.

The Russians, whose iron-clad fleet is vastly superior to our own, and whose total number of vessels is nearly double ours, spent on their navy in the five years between 1875 and 1880 nearly one hundred million dollars. In the same space of time our fleet has cost the country ninety-six millions. In the same period Holland has made some progress in construction and ordnance and maintained a fleet equal in numerical strength to ours at an outlay of only thirteen millions, and Spain has accomplished as much at an expense of twenty-nine millions. These figures need no comment. The large yearly appropriations squandered with no visible result, the general decadence in the power and efficiency of our foreign squadrons, bringing our flag into contempt abroad and leaving numbers of expensively educated young officers unemployed; the abuse of administration which places the good and the bad alike on the same level, the inordinate rank conferred on the civil and non-combatant branches of the service to the detriment of discipline, the constant interference of mere political intrigue in the details of control—all these furnish sufficient food for serious reflections, and lead to a gloomy forboding as to what might be the result of a demand on the services of the navy in event of war. Reflections like these Lieutenant Very, indeed, leaves to his readers. His work is voluminous, and the information is conveyed generally in the form of figures and tables, but these are clearly arranged and the book is intelligible to the non-professional reader, the explanatory text being profusely illustrated with wood-cuts and heliotype plates, the latter not so well executed as the value of the book would warrant.

A chapter is devoted to the principal naval battles of the last twenty years. These are classed as bombardments of earth-works and of masonry forts, passages of forts, dashes, assaults, deliberate general actions, iron-clads against wooden vessels, and duels. Since the introduction of iron-clad ships there have been only three deliberate general actions between opposing fleets. These were, first, the action between the gunboat flotillas on the Mississippi River on June 5, 1862, which resulted in the total defeat of the rebel fleet and the surrender of the city of Memphis; second, the battle of Heligoland, May 9, 1864, between the Danish and Austrian squadrons, the action being indecisive; and third, the battle of Lissa, in which the Austrians defeated the Italian fleet, destroying two of their iron-clads. Of the duels the most noticeable is the action of the Kearsarge and Alabama. The accounts of these battles are very short and given without comment, but are valuable as showing the progress made in ordnance and tactics. Further chapters contain full descriptions and classifications of ordnance, small arms, machine-guns and torpedoes, and a treatise on the developments of naval architecture and construction since the general introduction of steam as a means of propulsion.

An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion. By John Caird, D.D. (New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880.)—Three years ago Professor Edward Caird published his elaborate work on the philosophy of Kant, in which he traced with great thoroughness and skill the negative beginnings of the German philosophical revolution. His elder brother, the Principal, or, as we should say, President, of Glasgow University, now presents the more positive results to which that revolution subsequently came in the absolute philosophy of Hegel. Of his own system Hegel well said, in reply to an inquisitive Frenchman, that it was not possible to give a brief exposition, especially in French. Roughly, however, and in English, it may be stated that up to the time of Kant individual objects and feelings were supposed to be given in separate entirety to an apprehending yet undisturbing mind. Such finite data might, no doubt, be subsequently conjoined according to the habitudes of human reason, but the conjunction conferred no added perfection on the data themselves. The constitution of every feeling and object was already complete in itself, that of the mind in itself. With finite objects of knowledge, therefore, whether within or without, the finite knower was exclusively occupied. The pretence to know an infinite must with these premises arise either from a deluded and illogical sentiment, or from the operation of some quite exceptional principle, like that of faith, not amenable to the tests and processes of regular reason. But in the latter case, where the two modes of regard of faith and reason have no other relation to one another than that of opposition, there arises a difficulty in applying to both alike such terms as knowledge, belief, certainty. So long as the meaning of these as applied to finite things was supposed to be incontestable, the infinite of the theologians might well be politely treated, but not entrusted with much influence over daily concerns. It was, however, a main business of the German philosophical enquiries to determine how far finite and infinite could thus be separated; and the outcome of those enquiries may be summed up in Hegel's well-known saying that to know a limit is to be already beyond the limit. This principle once admitted, the popular fancy of finite things known in themselves as finite is swept away. Every finite discernment implies an infinite postulate; and since each individual object will then contain in itself an implication, or folding in, of all others, advance in knowledge will consist not alone in farther aggregation but in completer unfolding. Philosophy will become as much a science of facts as physics; indeed physical speculation itself, no less than psychological, ethical, social, will take on a new color when an understanding of its phenomena is sought rather in their connection than in their isolation. The scientific catalogue raisonné receives life from the law of evolution. The system of theology, with its separate doctrines separately known and requiring subsequent adjustment, gives place to the science of religion.

These results, even in their philosophic form, have already attracted much attention in England, and have called out a considerable literature. Before either of the two Cairds had written, Dr. Hutchison Stirling made his dark attempt to divulge the secret of Hegel, and Dr. Wallace published his remarkable translation and excellent prolegomena to Hegel's 'Lesser Logic.' Prof. Green, in his edition of Hume, and more recently in a series of papers on Spencer in the Contemporary, brought a destructive battery of the same mode of thought to bear upon Empiricism. Mr. F. H. Bradley, in his 'Studies in Ethics' three years ago, gave a profound, if somewhat esoteric and sacerdotal, exhibit of the young-Hegelian view of Duty. Hegelianism, indeed, would seem to have now become modish enough to be good capital for the young littérateur, if we may judge by Mr. Courtney's dashing attack upon Mr. Mill, and by the many magazine articles now appearing in which may be discerned the shadows if not the lights of Hegelianism.

To several of these writers Dr. Caird has expressed his indebtedness. But as they had not the wealth of which he shows himself in possession, that indebtedness can have been but slender. Indeed, there exists no other English exposition of the philosophy of the Infinite where the theory and its difficulties are so firmly grasped, stated with such lucidity, brevity, and interest, and made to shed such light on the dark and urgent problems of our day. Dr. Caird's long experience in preaching—for he is one of the most famous preachers of sermon-loving Scotland—has given him a strategic mastery of the approaches to his readers' minds, and he has too much conscience and good learning to abuse his power. After sketching in a few introductory pages the nature and limits of his subject he passes at once to scrutinize three considerations which often are felt to render a science of religion impossible—the considerations, namely, that knowledge must always be relative, that religion being an affair of intuition is insusceptible of scientific treatment, and that that to which religion is directed, if anything more than a dream, can only be known by revelation. These preliminary difficulties being set aside, as resting on an erroneous understanding of ambiguous terms, infinite reason is shown to be a covert assumption in all attempts to formulate the facts even of the physical world; to be already postulated in the three great theological arguments, which rather set it forth than prove it; and to come to a concrete manifestation in religious devotion. Still, the inadequacies of a merely emotional manifestation are reverently pointed out, and the rational elements involved in worship are found only to reach their consummate display in speculative thought, in morality, and in history, to which subjects the last three chapters are devoted.

The book must be widely read on account of its attractive style, and because nowhere else can so compendious a statement be found of a mode of thought becoming every year more influential. To many a student the reading will mark an intellectual and spiritual epoch.

Our Future Highway to India. By Verney Lovett Cameron, C.B., D.C.L., etc. 2 vols. (London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880.)—Commander Cameron's journey was begun in September, 1878, when Jingoism was at its height, Beaconsfield and Salisbury had received the garter, the Anglo-Turkish convention had transpired, and the Chamberlain embassy had been refused admittance to Afghanistan. His expedition, though unofficial, was in sympathy with the popular sentiment of the day, and everywhere he moved in Syria he had almost flattering testimony of the great expectations of administrative reform which the news of the convention with England had inspired in the long-suffering victims of Turkish misrule in the far East. The present narrative, on the contrary, is published to what it is not too much to call a different England, in the midst of the difficult retreat from Afghanistan, and on the eve of a naval demonstration against Turkey directed by a British admiral.

There is nothing, in fact, in these two volumes (easily compressible, by the way, into one) that compares in instructiveness with the incidental glimpses of the field for reforms of which the Beaconsfield Government engaged to be the patron, or rather for which it contracted as part of the consideration for renting Cyprus and guaranteeing the integrity of the Porte's dominions.

"From Shtaura," we read on p. 57 of vol. i., "our route led along the valley by a road which had been commenced in imitation of the French road to Damascus, but never completed. A little show is being kept up of working at the necessary bridges, but in many places it has been ruined before it is finished. Scarcely any attempt is made to metal it properly, and it is so rough in consequence that all the traffic passes on either side.

"If the inhabitants are to be believed, for this road—which is supposed to reach Baalbek, a distance of twenty-four miles—sixty thousand pounds Turk, or about fifty-three thousand sterling, have been extorted from the inhabitants. What has been done has been accomplished by forced labor or corvée, the statutable amount of which is four days in the year. The completion of the road was now delayed purposely, in order to extract more money from the inhabitants; nearly the whole of this extortion having fallen upon the Mohammedans, as most of the Christians have emigrated into the Lebanon."

At a village not far from Aleppo, the sheikh bitterly complained of the government of that city for not protecting them against the Bedouins (i. 207):

"According to his story, the Bedouins originally used to levy black mail from these villages, and in return prevented the Turks from extorting taxes. Some ten years before, the Turks had organized a corps of riflemen mounted on mules, who had kept back the Bedouins. Since that time the taxes had been regularly levied until during the war, when the Turkish Government, in its mortal agony, requiring every available soldier, had sent the men composing this corps against the Russians. The Bedouins were not long in availing themselves of the opportunity, and made the unfortunate villagers pay up all the arrears for the time they had been protected by the Turks. Whilst doing so, they refused to interfere with the tax-gatherers, so that the unfortunate peasantry have also had to pay the heavy war taxes, and are in a far worse plight than ever before."

At Aleppo, Cameron was told a similar tale by one of his countrymen just returned from a tour through Palestine (i. 282): "In one place he found the people cutting down their olive-trees, because the amount at which the tax upon them was assessed was more than the whole value of the crop; and in another the headman had built a very fine new house from people who tried to escape the conscription." That is, he taxed them for permission to hide while the conscription was going on, and then betrayed them; "so they had both to pay, and to go as soldiers, while he pocketed the money, and also got rid of probable enemies." Of this he boasted openly.

We have not space to describe the curious struggle for existence between refugee Mohammedan Circassians and the Arabs, of which the details are given in vol. ii. passim; nor to tell of the insurrection of the Kurdish beys Bahri and Osman, which provokes the comment (ii. 117): "To reward rebels and punish the innocent seems to be one of the ideas of the Turkish Government, and that it has borne fruit may be seen from the new Kurdish revolt, which has not yet even come to an end. The Sultan's paltering with these chiefs I have seen termed a judicious mixture of moderation and force; I call it a premium on revolt and an incitement to disloyalty." To come to the main object of his journey: Commander Cameron found no engineering obstacle to the proposed Euphrates railway. He would have it start from Tripoli, and thence extend via Aleppo, Mosul, Baghdad (already, shade of Haroun-al-Raschid! provided with a suburban tramway), to Bushire. The profitableness of it is more or less speculative, but the reader cannot fail to be impressed with the intimations of active trade with which these pages abound. For instance, at a village just before reaching Mardin, "the average number of camels, they told us, that passed by daily was over five hundred. Over a thousand were camped between the two villages, besides mules and a large number of pilgrims, of whom several thousands passed by in the course of the year." We here take leave of a book interesting in spite of its literary defects, prominent among which is a prodigal use of slang.

The Origin and Growth of Religion as illustrated by the Religion of Ancient Egypt. By P. Le Page Renouf. [The Hibbert Lectures for 1879.] (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1880. 8vo, pp. 270.)—These lectures are a charming production. The chaste and animated diction, in excellent English, is worthy of the importance of the subject; conciseness and lucidity characterize alike almost every sentence; the author states his own views with the firmness of an old enquirer—which he is—and those of others with the reverence of a disciple; and every page is interesting and instructive. All the lectures, six in number, were delivered in 1879, but the first two, at least, appear to have been written nearly three years earlier. On the other hand, several notes extend the very abundant references of the work to the time of publication. Notes and text familiarize the reader with most of the bibliography of Egyptology. "The Sources of Information respecting the Ancient Egyptian Religion," "The Antiquity and Characteristics of Egyptian Civilization," "The Gods of Egypt," "Communion with the Unseen World," "The Religious Books of Egypt," and "Religious Books and Hymns: Henotheism, Pantheism, and Materialism," are respectively the subjects of the various lectures. In spite of numerous introductory remarks and apparent digressions, there is perfect unity in the whole; only the view is extended. Unable to follow here the lecturer in the examination of the innumerable details of his subject, we shall try to epitomize his main conclusions: The interest of Egyptian religion is derived solely from itself, not from its supposed connections with Judaism, Greek philosophy, or Christianity. Even in the Hebrew institutions no Egyptian influences are discoverable, though purely external resemblances abound. There is no sufficient ground for identifying the golden calf with Apis or Mnevis; "the Israelites had an independent mythology of their own"; they failed to learn from the Egyptians even as much as the length of the year. The nuk pu nuk of the "Book of the Dead" has not the meaning, as has been asserted, of the sublime ehyeh ăsher ehyeh ("I am that I am") of the book of Exodus. Not less than two thousand years before "the birth of Moses" Egypt had developed the religious belief and institutions which she possessed in the last years of her national existence. The external appearance, at least, was the same. This religion, however, was not originally that mere worship of brutes which foreigners saw in it in the days of Egypt's decline. The worship of animals was not a principle, but a sequence: it was based upon symbols derived from mythology. Egyptian mythology originated exactly like Aryan mythology. "The early language had no words to express abstract conceptions, and the operations of nature were spoken of in terms which would now be thought poetical, or at least metaphorical, but were then the simplest expressions of popular intuition. The nomina became numina." Egyptian mythology dealt only with phenomena of nature conspicuously reflecting eternal law, such as the rising and setting of the heavenly bodies: "the recognition of universal law and order underlies the whole system of Egyptian religion." Maāt, a noun signifying primarily a perfectly straight rule, and derived from sensuous impressions, became the name for moral order or righteousness. The Egyptians worshipped the eternal powers of nature, under various symbols; but from the very first they also spoke of the Power which directs the whole physical and moral government of the universe. "Horus and Rā and Osiris and Set are names [among numberless others] of individual finite powers, but a Power without a name or any mythological characteristic is constantly referred to in the singular number, and can only be regarded as the object of . . . immediate perception of the Infinite, . . . an intuition as irresistible as the impressions of our senses." The moral code which they derived from this perception of the Eternal and Infinite Power—the Nutar—was pure and noble. Man was responsible and immortal. But the symbols of religion, aided by art, overpowered its essence. The religion which had in it the germs of monotheism, but never rose above pantheism and never ceased to be polytheistic, was degraded by the force of its rank symbolism and religious quackery into a vast system of gross superstitious belief and idolatrous practice, full of bewildering incongruities.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1880.

The Week.

GENERAL HANCOCK has written the letter which now seems to be expected from every Democratic candidate for the Presidency, denouncing "rebel claims," or claims in the interest of persons who were in rebellion, and declaring that "the Government can never pay a debt, pension, or reward of any sort for waging war upon its own existence," and that he would not, if elected, either "approve or encourage" any such payment. In regard to "Union war claims," he pronounces them "lasting and sacred," but adds that, as the war closed more than fifteen years ago, he thinks claims of this kind are becoming stale, are now mostly in the hands of brokers or persons other than the original sufferers, and ought to be barred; or, if entertained, subjected to "the strictest scrutiny." He also declares that to suppose that "rebel claims can in any degree be countenanced is an imputation of disloyalty" against the Democrats. The effect of this seems to be somewhat severe on the Republicans. The Times is so far affected by it as to call the letter "frank and explicit"; and one which "every intelligent citizen, whatever his politics, will rejoice to receive," and says "the country can now devote its attention to other and graver issues." The Tribune, however, is not disposed to be as wasteful and improvident as the Times, and declares that the general's letter is "flippant," that the claims exist and are before Congress to the amount of $300,000,000, and that if there is no danger of their being passed, "why does General Hancock promise to veto them"?

As we once heard an eminent Republican remark sorrowfully, "There seems to be a great deal of lying about these rebel claims." The truth about them is, we believe, that great numbers of men in the South who lost property in the war, or say they did, and are short of money, get their member of Congress to present their claims in the shape of little bills. These bills are, thereupon, referred to a committee, and in the hands of the committee they lie with much similar rubbish. While here they are no nearer payment than if they had never been preferred (no nearer than the division of large English estates among the large American families who so often expect them), because there is a statute which positively forbids the payment of any claim to any person who cannot prove his loyalty. The contention of the Republicans is that if the Democrats get into power they will repeal this statute, and promptly add three hundred millions to the national debt for the benefit of a comparatively small body of persons at the South. General Hancock now says that if they do he will veto their action. When the election is over we shall probably hear no more about the matter for another four years, but we have little doubt the claims will figure in the Presidential canvass until the end of the century. The whole "rebel-claims" argument is based on the theory that, if the claims are admitted, it is only the Republicans who will have to pay them, and that the Democrats will not be taxed for them; but this will hardly hold water. Democrats dislike taxation for other people's benefit as much as Republicans. We think ourselves that a bill providing that every Democrat, North and South, should receive ten dollars and a barrel of flour at every Federal election, would have a much better chance of passing than a bill giving an enormous sum to the comparatively few "ex-rebels" who can prove the loss of property in the slave States from the operations of the Union armies. The story is a nice little thing to have on hand, but it does not bear critical examination.

A very singular meeting took place at Chickering Hall on Friday evening. It was called by such "Independent Republicans" as Mr. Leonard Jerome and Mr. J. W. Forney for the purpose of expressing their enthusiasm for the Democratic ticket. It was composed, the Herald says, of "fully two thousand persons, several hundred of whom were ladies of stylish and intelligent appearance," and, in fact, "appeared to be a gathering of Republicans." The Times says, on the other hand, that it was "a motley crowd," five-sixths of whom were Tammany and anti-Tammany Democrats, sent down from the Democratic National Committee rooms, and most of whom, if not all, were unable to read, and therefore could not tell what was in a printed address which was distributed among them. In respectability, too, the crowd was, according to the Times, "rather below than above the average Democratic ward-meeting." The Herald says that Mr. Jerome delivered "a brief, off-hand but most effective speech," which "was frequently punctuated with applause." This same speech, the Times says, was of "the characteristic kind": "he dropped his voice in a queer way," and seemed somehow a good deal flurried, though "at what nobody could find out." An address to the public was then read which, the Herald says, was "a long and forcible arraignment of the Republican party," but which the Times calls "a rambling and disjointed address." Colonel Forney then followed, and, the Herald says, was received "with much applause"; the Times says he had a speech ready on printed slips, but betrayed the reporters by making a very different one. The Colonel announced his return to the Democratic party after twenty-two years' absence. Whether the meeting was a success or a failure, it will thus be seen, is only known to those who attended it. The Tribune says it was composed of Democrats drawn thither by curiosity or sent by their leaders.

The most remarkable speech of the week has been Senator Bayard's in New York on Thursday, and the most effective portion of it was an attempt to show that the Republican party was not entitled to the credit of resumption. The history of resumption is a somewhat confused narrative, in which neither party appears in a perfectly creditable light. Mr. Bayard had no difficulty in making a bad exhibit of the Republican attitude towards the legal-tender notes up to 1875, by merely showing that nothing was done by the party in power up to that date to bring resumption about; that, on the contrary, it forbade Secretary McCulloch to prepare for resumption by contraction; that Secretary Boutwell used the surplus funds of the Government not in redeeming greenbacks, but in buying up bonds not due; and that a bill actually passed both Houses, the Republicans being in a majority in both, providing for the inflation of the currency up to $400,000,000—such Republican chiefs as Morton, Ferry, Logan, and Howe supporting it vigorously; that when President Grant vetoed this, a compromise, providing for the reissue of $28,000,000 cancelled greenbacks, was passed with Mr. Sherman's support. All this is true, but it does not prove, nevertheless, that the Republicans are not after all entitled to the credit of passing and executing the subsequent law of 1875. It was agreed on in the Republican caucus and introduced by Mr. Sherman, and all Mr. Bayard can say against it is that it was a "juggling measure," capable of two constructions, and that when he asked Mr. Sherman to amend the act so as to provide for the destruction of the redeemed greenbacks he refused. This would be tolerably destructive criticism if the act had not been executed, in spite of much opposition, by the persons who introduced it. What Mr. Sherman intended by the act is fixed by what he has done under the act, according to all rules of construction, legal or moral. Saying, as Mr. Bayard went on to say, that resumption was really effected by the abundance of American harvests and the scantiness of those of Europe, is like saying that when a sailing ship crosses the ocean the success of the voyage is due to the wind and not to the captain.

Mr. Bayard's attack drew an answer from Mr. Sherman. He alleges that Mr. Bayard voted against the bill for strengthening the public credit by declaring the United States notes payable in coin, and that he did not vote (this Mr. Bayard acknowledges) for the Resumption Act. But this is all he is able to say against Mr. Bayard's share in the financial legislation, and it is fairly set off by the fact that Mr. Sherman himself opposed the payment of the bonds in coin. But the rest of Mr. Sherman's retort was very effective, and really goes to the root of the whole matter of the comparative claims of the two parties on the confidence of the country in financial matters. The truth is that, whatever Mr. Bayard or a few other Democrats did or refrained from doing, the bulk of the Democrats in Congress opposed every measure looking either to the restoration of the public credit or the resumption of specie payments. Some Republicans did so, but not always, and never more than a small minority of the party, while the Democratic majority was constantly on the wrong side. There is no doubt, too, that if a Republican had got up in Congress and maintained, as Mr. Bayard now maintains, that good crops, or, as he calls it, "the statesmanship of the plough," would restore specie payments, he would have laughed at him, and with good reason.

In speaking of the treatment of Mr. Conkling's speech last week by the Republican papers in this city we overlooked a very trenchant exposure of its malignity and dishonesty in the columns of the Evening Post, which does much to atone for the subserviency—to use a very mild word—of its morning contemporaries. Since then the Times seems to have recovered some sense of the duty the press owes the public by an article, on Sunday last, "deploring" the extent to which the politicians who call themselves statesmen are, in the present canvass, taking a "narrow view of the perpetual contest between parties," and "appealing to prejudices and fears rather than rational convictions; exciting the passions rather than persuading the intellect." It calls attention also to the notorious fact, which the manufacturers of "campaign thunder" on the Republican side have been forgetting, but of which we trust the pending State elections will not unpleasantly remind them, as that of Maine has done, that the decision of the conflict rests largely, if not wholly, with a small class who do not like and are not moved by the "thunder" which is served out to the faithful at the mass-meetings. The fact is, the Republican party needs new "thunder" and a fresh set of thunderbolts. The old articles which the Blaines and Conklings rattle over the heads of the Custom-house men do not scare the "grumblers," and the "disorganizers," and the "theorists" in the least, and they make it unpleasant at the polls for the statesmen. No wonder it is now announced that the Indiana Republicans are afraid to have Mr. Conkling go out there and "wet-blanket them with sneers," second-hand "thunder," and cooked figures.

Mr. Blaine, in a speech delivered in Newark last week, drew a cheerful augury from the assumed fact that "it is not in the history of any ministry in England or in this country that it has ever been overthrown in a time of general prosperity." But if this be so, one wonders that Mr. Blaine or any other Republican politician should deem it necessary to take the stump or to levy assessments on Government clerks in order to prevent Hancock from being elected. It is commonly supposed, too, that currency delusions arise and flourish when times are hardest; and it would have been pertinent to explain the vitality of the Greenback organization in Maine, unless that State is debarred from the "general prosperity." One orator, we observe, has accounted for the strength of the Fusion vote by alleging a want of water in Maine; and if the present drought should last until the middle of November, we do not know why it should not go hard with Mr. Blaine's law of stability in national politics as well.

The "campaign stories" are few in number and poor in quality, but Mr. S. S. Cox and some other Democratic politicians are accused of sending or attempting to send through the mail whole bagfuls of franked envelopes to be used in the transmission of Democratic documents. Mr. Cox denies he has had anything to do with the matter, but at this late date in the canvass we cannot accept his denial. A carrier pigeon labelled "Garfield" has also beaten a "Hancock" pigeon in a race from the West to the Eastern coast, which is a very remarkable "straw." The "Cuclux clan" is reported also to be revived in North Carolina, with the spelling slightly changed, and will probably ravage that State up to November. In Indiana both parties are very enthusiastic, and will both carry the State, the Democrats by 15,000 and the Republicans by 8,000 majority. There is also a story that Mr. Jewell is to be deposed from the chairmanship of the Republican Committee and Mr. T. H. Platt substituted for him, and counter stories that this is an invention of the enemy. The excitement, however, is increasing in every direction, and the next three weeks will be very prolific. General Hancock is reported to have lost thirty pounds through the pressure of Democratic office-seekers, and will probably lose more.

The Indiana Supreme Court last week overruled the petition for a rehearing in the case of the Constitutional Amendments which it recently decided to be defeated, and the October election will proceed as usual. The action of the court was, of course, expected; and though, as in the first instance, the haste with which it was taken is complained of, there does not seem to have been much time to spare or any new consideration to be weighed. The result of the election is as uncertain as ever at this writing, but the temper of the Greenbackers is such as to encourage the Republicans. An attempted arrangement by which the election to Congress of the Rev. De La Matyr should be guaranteed in exchange for Greenback votes for the Democratic State ticket fell through, partly through the protests of hard-money Democrats who "have all they can do to swallow Landers as it is," according to a Stalwart correspondent, but mainly, it is probable, because the Greenbackers themselves attach more value to a show of "strength" than to electing a Congressman. General Weaver is to stump the State, and his hostility to fusion in any degree is great. In his latest utterance—a reply to Frank Hughes, of Pennsylvania, who favors coalition with Democrats—he expresses a desire for "an open, straight fight against the Democratic and Republican wings of the money-power," and says he has "no choice between them."

On the 19th inst. the Times, in a special despatch from Washington, gave an illustration of the bitterness of the contest in Georgia between the adherents of Colquitt and Norwood. According to its correspondent, U. S. Marshal Fitzsimmons, a Democrat, was openly taking sides in the canvass with Norwood, and this circumstance had so offended his bondsmen, who desired Colquitt's election, that they gave him notice of withdrawal, and obliged him to make a new bond with Norwood men for his backers. This done he returned to Georgia to continue his electioneering, and showed his earnestness by at once discharging all his Colquitt subordinates who had been recommended by his former bondsmen. This was a nice picture of intolerance; but on Sunday last the Times had another Washington despatch, explaining that the first was based on statements put in circulation by Fitzsimmons and his friends, whereas the truth of the case was that formal complaints had been brought against Fitzsimmons by internal-revenue officers in Georgia and others, which must ultimately lead to his removal from office, and perhaps indictment for malfeasance. His bondsmen, hearing this, naturally took alarm, and hence the necessity of making a new bond. We must add that the list of charges is a very damaging one, and involves gross fraud and oppression.

This little history has several morals. In the first place, it stands as a warning to partisan editors and their correspondents. In the next, it will serve to show our Florida correspondent, Mr. Hilton, how easy it was for the North to be deceived as to the real behavior of the Returning Boards, and generally as to what went on in the South during reconstruction. Further, it ought to convince him that the "clean sweep" he desires will not be as clean as he fondly imagines. Fitzsimmons, as we have said, is a Democrat, and was such when nominated by President Hayes. His confirmation was stoutly opposed in the Senate by Senator Gordon, and defended by Alexander Stephens and Ben Hill. His successor, nominated by Hancock, could hardly find more respectable support and might encounter as formidable resistance in his own State; but, once confirmed, not only would his integrity have no more guarantee than Fitzsimmons's, it would actually have less, and the people in his district have fewer safeguards against plunder and outrage, for he would lack the restraint of an Administration differing from him in politics, and therefore not afraid of scandal in letting his malfeasance transpire. Finally, disgraceful as it is to the present Administration that it allows Fitzsimmons, either innocent or guilty, to interfere in a State election, does anybody suppose his successor would keep out of politics, especially if his appointment depended on the superior influence of one or other of two Georgia factions at Washington?

General Sherman has on more than one occasion lately spoken publicly of war as a bad business, and the paradox has no doubt had a wholesome effect on the generation now for the first time becoming a political factor in the country. He uttered the same sentiment the other day in San Francisco, when addressing the Associated Veterans of the Mexican War who were celebrating the anniversary of the taking of the City of Mexico, and never, certainly, was it more in place. But the general went on to find a justification for all our wars, from the Revolution down, and when he came to the Mexican War he evaded any discussion of it by saying that "the matter was discussed in the forum of the nation," and, having been decided on there, all the army had to do was to obey. But a dim perception that the duty of an army and the justice of a war which, as a "posse comitatus," it is called upon to execute are two different things, made him presently assert that "the war with Mexico was not ordained by the Congress of our people: it was ordained by Him who rules our earth." The "decree of the Almighty," or, as it used to be called, "manifest destiny," demanded an expansion of our territory, and the same high authority at once indicated the means and sanctified them. This would be all very well if, pending the discussions in the forum of the nation, some one were authorized to say what the Creator had ordained; but, in default of this, it would seem as if the arguments urged against an unjust war before its inception could not be vitiated by the acquirement, say, of a "scientific frontier," and as if war, being at the best "a cruelty," to use General Sherman's words, became doubly one when waged without provocation and for an immoral purpose on a weak and distracted people.

Usually before a Presidential election efforts are made by the adherents in Wall Street of each political party to create the impression that the success of the opposite party will be detrimental to the public credit and to business interests. The reasoning of the partisans of General Garfield now is that the high degree of prosperous activity in every branch of business, and the high public credit as expressed in the market price of United States bonds, are in large measure due to wise management of the public finances, and that the election of General Hancock, with the accession to full power of the unsound party back of him, would paralyze business and prostrate the public credit. The advocates of General Hancock make a general denial, but in a defensive and almost timid manner. Thus far in the Wall Street contest the Republicans have had the advantage. Before the Maine election United States 4 per cents were selling at 110⅜ to 110½. During the week they have fallen to 108½ to 108⅝; but since General Hancock's letter respecting war claims the price has recovered to 109¼. Speculation at the Stock Exchange in railroad securities has, to some extent, sympathized with the changes in United States bonds, although operations seem to be governed more by the inclination to do nothing important until the issue of the Presidential election is clearer than it now is. Current trade in every department of business is very large, and there is a notable absence of speculation anywhere. The surplus revenues of the Treasury still warrant purchases of $2,500,000 bonds each week for the sinking fund; and gold imports continue on a large scale, more than $4,000,000 foreign gold having arrived in the last week. The surplus reserve of the New York banks is slowly dwindling, but the loan market continues remarkably favorable for borrowers, who get all they want at 2 to 3 per cent. "on call," 3 to 4½ per cent. "on time" with collaterals, and at 4½ to 5½ per cent. on good mercantile paper. The price of silver bullion remains steady at about 52⅛*d.* to 52¼*d.* per ounce in London, and at the close of the week the "buzzard dollar" was worth about 87⅜ cents. The Treasury is now making great efforts to force these dollars into circulation; and the scarcity, compared with the demand, of note currency, makes the work easier than it has been since silver was remonetized as a full legal tender.

We have commented elsewhere on some aspects of the situation at Dulcigno. It seems to grow more complicated every day. According to the latest news the Sultan has thrown aside all restraints, and has taken an attitude of open defiance to the Powers, and with such violence as to forbid the offer of any advice in a contrary direction by his own ministers. This seems to suggest an attack of insanity such as overthrew his last two predecessors, and may lead to some kind of outbreak at Constantinople. He has refused the surrender of Dulcigno, and even forbidden the Powers to speak of any concession to Montenegro, or to meddle further in the Greek affair. Riza Pasha, too, has informed the Montenegrins that he will consider an attack on the Albanians a declaration of war against Turkey, and as he has five thousand good troops and a well-appointed field battery, this has disconcerted the Montenegrins, and they have informed the British admiral that they cannot move without reinforcements. The Albanians occupy the heights above the town behind five lines of entrenchments, and, with the aid of the Turks, can make a desperate resistance, unless the guns of the fleet can fully reach them. The naval commanders must now be in a quandary. They have no instructions, apparently, to land troops, and perhaps none to land except a handful of marines. Moreover, the problem before them has assumed dimensions for which their instructions cannot have provided, being neither more nor less than war with Turkey. For this the British Ministry can hardly be prepared. The Liberal programme in the East has all along been based on the theory that Turkey would not venture to disobey the commands of united Europe, but this made no allowance for the contingency of the Sultan's insanity, which actually seems to have occurred. Somebody now will have to be found willing to chastise him on land. The only Power which is always willing to undertake this job is Russia, but the others will hardly be willing to let Russia do it again. Anyhow, the final dissolution of the Ottoman Empire seems to have become a question of months rather than of years.

The French Ministerial crisis has ended in the formation of a new Ministry under the presidency of Jules Ferry, the author of the famous "Article 7" against the religious orders. The only other change in the Cabinet which excites much attention is that of M. Barthélemy Saint-Hilaire to the Foreign Office. The other two new appointments are Admiral Clouet, Minister of Marine, and M. Carnot, of Public Works. M. Barthélemy Saint-Hilaire is an old man, and has never held office before. He has been a journalist and a professor in the Collège de France, and is well known as the author of numerous philosophical works; he was at one time secretary to M. Thiers. He appears to inspire confidence among Republicans of all shades of opinion, and has issued a circular to the French agents abroad assuring foreign Powers that the policy of the Government, as regards its foreign relations, has undergone no change. But it is quite evident that in Paris the new Ministry is regarded as more or less of a stop-gap, and that it will only last as long as Gambetta chooses. There appears to be no change in the attitude of the Government towards the Eastern Question, as the advices from Dulcigno state that the French admiral is to confine himself to moral support in case hostilities are opened by the vessels of the other Powers.

Affairs in Ireland seem to grow worse. Another landlord, Lord Mountmorris, has been murdered, and very brutally, and presumably by or at the instigation of his tenants, with whom he was on bad terms. He was just returning from a meeting of magistrates at which a resolution had been passed asking the Government to resort to coercive measures. Other outrages and attempts at assassination are reported from other parts of the country. Bad as the situation is, a much worse has been witnessed in Ireland within the memory of men now living; but the mischief of it is just now unusually great, inasmuch as it will probably cause the miscarriage of any land bill the Government may introduce next year, through the effect on English opinion. It is with great difficulty that the English middle class is ever got to give any serious attention to Irish grievances, and it always seizes any plausible excuse for dismissing the odious subject; a better excuse than numerous murders it could hardly have. By the way, Mr. James Redpath, who has been acting as Irish correspondent of the Tribune, is over there making terrible speeches, and threatening all sorts of horrors if his views on the land question are not carried out; and, coming from an American, they are, of course, more than ordinarily exciting. We would suggest, therefore, in the interest of humanity, that his paper should recall him and set him to work on those old sinners of our own, the Democrats and the ex-rebels.

FINANCE IN THE CANVASS.

WE presume there is little question that the weakness of the stock market, in the teeth of the large railroad earnings and the activity of business in almost every branch of industry, is due in some degree to the great increase of uncertainty as to the result of the Presidential election caused by the Maine election. There is nothing the business world likes so much and finds so valuable as certainty with regard to the future; there is hardly any state of the law, as long as property is secure, to which trade cannot adapt itself, and under which active and intelligent men cannot make money, if they are only sure that it will not be suddenly altered. Whatever be the defects of the present financial legislation of the country, it is undeniable that a great prosperity exists under it, and is likely to continue for a few years, if no sudden or violent change be made in it. The business of the country has, in other words, adapted itself to the situation created for it by Republican legislation; and the Republican party has, in the present canvass, the great advantage of being able to promise that if it remains in power this situation will last. It thus appeals to one of the most powerful of the motives by which the business world is governed, when it asks for its retention in office. This appeal, too, is very successful even with those who dislike the spirit and management of the party, and believe that it is keeping itself alive by fanning the embers of civil strife. They stick to it for somewhat the same reason that the European Powers defend the existence of Turkey; that is, they feel that they know the worst about it, and find they can live under this worst with considerable comfort, but do not know what would be the worst of anything which succeeded it.

The three things which most concern the business world in the existing situation are the national banks, the greenback and silver portion of the currency, and the tariff. If the Republican party remains in power, the national banks will almost certainly be let alone; if the greenbacks are not withdrawn when redeemed no additions will be made to their volume, and in all probability we shall not be allowed to descend to a silver standard without some effort to prevent it. The Republicans are, in fact, in a sort of rough way pledged to conservative finance by their traditions. They established the national banks, and therefore are compelled for their own justification to uphold them. They issued the greenbacks as substitutes for gold, and were driven by the mere force of their own proclamations into making them as good as gold, and will probably be compelled by the same force to prevent their again becoming worth less than gold. They have caused by the tariff immense investments in manufactures which they dare not suddenly disturb. In other words, their history gives a certain fixity to their policy. The weak point in their system is the silver coinage. They rushed into this with almost as much recklessness as the Democrats, because the war had created no traditions or prepossessions about silver. If the Confederates had used silver money they would probably have opposed the recoinage, just as many Greenbackers opposed redemption in gold because gold had basely left the country in the hour of our trouble. But the Republican party did not start as a party of financial reform, and never became one. Its whole financial system was the offspring of military necessity and of a desire to affirm the principle of national unity, and therefore silver had no place in it. When the great silver idea made its appearance the Republicans had for the moment no better defence against the delusion than the Democrats. Silver had neither helped nor hindered the putting down of the rebellion, and every Republican was at liberty to take his own course about it. But it must be said that the mere responsibility of financial administration, the prolonged effort to keep the paper currency at par with the current money of the civilized world, and to raise the public credit and reduce the public debt, not only has made the Republicans tolerably sane and conservative in financial matters, but has kept them in some sort of intellectual relations with the financiers of other countries. In spite of Mr. Stanley Matthews's question, "What have we to do with abroad?" the party has on the whole kept in mind the fact that the United States are a great commercial nation, sell largely to other countries and buy from them, are likely to do so more and more, and must therefore, in order to avoid loss and confusion, adhere to the same monetary standard. There is, consequently, a strong probability that by the time the double-standard experiment has gone as far with us as it has with France, and produced a premium on gold, the Republicans, if they have a majority in Congress, will make an effort to retreat from the false position into which they were hurried by the craze of 1877, and recognize the danger of making the United States a receptacle for the discarded silver of Europe.

On all these points it is impossible for any candid man to ascertain the position of the Democrats, or to describe it beforehand. We say this without in the least sharing the popular Republican notion that the Democrats are a band of evil-disposed persons bent on the ruin of the Government. They form fully half the voters of the Union and have as much interest as the Republicans in good order and good government. Democrats do not live by brigandage or gambling. They are farmers, and lawyers, and merchants, and laborers, like their opponents, although at the North they have fewer of the great industrial interests of the country under their control. But in political matters we have to judge them by their politicians, who represent their views in Congress and on the stump; and even if we give these politicians credit for the utmost honesty of intention, we are bound to say that it is impossible to get from their utterance a fair idea of what their financial policy would be if in power. Finance is, above all other subjects, a mass of details. To talk finance is to talk details. But there is nothing about which Democratic politicians seem so unwilling to go into detail as finance. All they tell us about their views on the currency is, that they are in favor of "honest money." But what is "honest money"? Butler considers his leather tokens "honest money." Nobody recommends any kind of money which he acknowledges to be dishonest. Every concocter of a currency scheme, no matter how wild, claims for it the merit of honesty. Then, again, when a Democratic politician talks of paper redeemable in "gold and silver," what does he mean? Does he propose to redeem in gold and silver at the nominal value of these metals or at the market value? If a man made a note promising to pay a certain amount in horses or asses, who would take it without knowing whether each ass was to count as a horse, or if not, how many asses would be the equivalent of a horse? Turning to the national banks, we find ourselves left in the same state of uncertainty. The abolition of the national banks would of itself be a serious, and possibly very disturbing, change. It seems likely, however, that it would be accompanied by the substitution of the legal-tender Government paper for the bank-notes—or, in other words, by the conversion of the Treasury into a vast bank of issue by a party which is composed in large part, if not in the larger part, of persons who do not believe that Government paper need be redeemable in coin, or that, if it be made redeemable in coin, any coin need be kept on hand for the purpose.

Now, this opens up distinctly to business men the possibility of an enormous paper inflation of the currency, the expulsion of coin from the country, and another commercial crash on a scale which would make that of 1873 seem a trifle. We believe we have read with more or less care every utterance of prominent Democrats on these grave subjects during the past four years, and we have not found in any of them any assurance on which a business man would be justified in relying that the position of the party on them was such that no great financial disturbance need be feared from its accession to power. In fact, most of the speakers take care to be sufficiently vague in their utterances to avoid committing themselves or anybody else on any important point. But in counting-houses nobody is satisfied with vague utterances. Nothing makes business men comfortable but full particulars and carefully prepared estimates, showing the dark as well as the bright side of every proposed venture or operation. The Republicans, we grant, are not much more explicit in their financial utterances than the Democrats. The evasions of their leading men about the silver question, for instance, are very discreditable; but their past history and their own legislation furnish, as we have said, fairly trustworthy grounds for anticipation as to what they will do and refrain from doing in the future. The Democrats have nothing of the kind to produce, and their platform ought therefore, on the currency question and the tariff, to have bristled with specifications which would bind the party. We believe it is something new in the history of constitutional government for a party in opposition to seek power on financial issues without producing a financial programme, and this the Democrats are doing. All they really promise about the finances is that when in office they will be virtuous in their management of them. That either party should venture to go to the country in this way is a striking proof of the disorganizing and confusing influence of the Southern question in party politics.

We do not mean to be unusually disrespectful to the gentlemen who work up the various cries which form the ingredients of what is called the "Solid South," such as the rebel-claims cry, the rebel-pensions cry, the payment-for-slaves cry, the division-of-Texas-into-five-States cry, and so on, when we say that only a very small number of voters consider these really serious questions. They are the music of the campaign and make the halls resound, but few people take them in dead earnest. Nevertheless, they make the discussion of the really grave questions of the canvass difficult. Most stump-orators shirk finance; it is dry and full of quagmires, and the committees do not call for it or insist upon it, and the public is therefore left to work out its conclusions about it in private houses and offices. Within a week, we believe, orders have been issued by the Republicans to "scare the business men," but we doubt much whether this operation will be performed with either knowledge or discretion. Exorbitant demands will be made on the credulity of audiences, and pictures of ruin will be drawn so dreadful that the American imagination will not take hold of them, for the American imagination is very optimistic, and grows more so. It is difficult, if not impossible, to find an American who swallows the Republican prophecies about the Democrats. He secretly laughs over them, but hopes they will frighten some other man and make him vote the Republican ticket.

THE TURKISH CRISIS.

THE news from Turkey, that the Sultan has thrown off the mask and refused point blank to cede Dulcigno peaceably, is the most serious which has come since the break-up of the Constantinople Conference in 1876. Riza Pasha, who commands at Dulcigno the force which was supposed to have been sent down to deliver the place to the Montenegrins, has announced to the fleet that he will treat any attack on the Albanians who occupy the town as an attack on the Turkish forces, and resist it. To this Admiral Seymour, who appears to have some kind of direction of the naval operations, has replied by arranging with the Montenegrin commander to begin his operations under cover of the guns of the fleet, and by the time this is in the hands of our readers fighting will probably have begun if not ended. Dulcigno itself is a wretched village, for ages a nest of pirates, and the Albanians will probably burn it down before they are driven out; but it will be hereafter more famous than Plevna, as the place in which the final step was taken towards the dissolution of the Turkish Empire. Of course the Gladstone Ministry, having entered on the momentous policy of coercing Turkey, cannot afford to be foiled or worsted. The Montenegrins, who are probably a match for the Albanians even if left to themselves, will not find much difficulty in carrying the Albanian positions after they have been shelled by the monster guns of the fleet, and once in possession of the place they will not be disturbed. The process, which by a convenient euphemism is called "executing the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin," once begun at Dulcigno will be promptly carried out in Greece also by another naval demonstration in the Gulf of Volo, in support of the Greek army, now said to number thirty thousand men. This force will operate against the Turkish troops within the new line of frontier traced by the late supplemental conference. The bulk of the Greek troops are, however, raw levies. No matter how good the material there has not been time to drill and discipline them, and the supply of good officers is said to be scanty. It is true they will receive aid, and very effective aid, from the large Greek population of which they are seeking to take possession, but even with this a defeat or severe check at the hands of the Turkish forces is among the strong probabilities of the crisis, and would undoubtedly be followed, as all Turkish successes are, by great atrocities. Such a result would lead to an immediate rising in Eastern Rumelia, and probably in Servia and Bulgaria. In fact, the whole Balkan peninsula would be enveloped in a few weeks in fire and blood, and a general European interference would rapidly and inevitably ensue. Austria would have to look after her eastern frontier and secure her communications with the sea at Salonica, and Russia would take up her old work of protecting the Christians in the Turkish provinces from Mahometan barbarity, while England, at least, would be bound to see, first of all, that Greece got what the Treaty of Berlin assigned her, and then that nobody got an unfair advantage of her at Constantinople, in case "the unspeakable Turk," as Mr. Carlyle calls him, found it necessary to retire into Asia. That the Turks will now be left to take care of themselves, as far as England is concerned, has been announced in the most explicit manner in Parliament by Mr. Gladstone in the first speech he made after his recovery from his late illness; so that any disagreement which may now arise between the Powers will not be due to a desire on the part of any one of them to save Turkey from her impending fate, but to the difficulty of reaching a common understanding as to what shall take her place in case she goes to pieces.

The problem has been somewhat complicated since the naval demonstrations began by the change in the French Ministry. Gambetta's speech at Cherbourg some weeks ago, with its obscure intimations of a revival of the warlike spirit in France, produced a good deal of uneasiness in Germany, to which the official press gave full expression. This uneasiness has been aggravated by Gambetta's late triumph over the Ministry on the question of executing the decrees against the religious orders. He is believed, rightly or wrongly, to have driven M. de Freycinet from office for the indiscretion of not consulting him before announcing a policy of greater leniency, and it is supposed, too, that he will be driven by the logic of events to take office himself before long, and become in form, what he is already in reality, the head of the French Government. To Germany, however, he represents, more than any other man in France, "unconquerable hate and study of revenge," and this new demonstration of his power in French politics is, of course, well calculated to infuse greater caution into the foreign policy of the Empire, and make the management of the Eastern Question an exceedingly delicate task. One of the contingencies of this question, and the one most feared by all the Western Powers, is a collision of some kind with Russia if the necessity of distributing the Turkish estate should arise under the pressure of events now pending. Even those who have the strongest confidence in the moderation of Russian aims are well aware that this moderation has been largely due in the past to the feeling that the Turkish régime is temporary and will sooner or later give way to something permanent, something which will probably last, if not for ages, at least until European politics and society shall have passed into some entirely new phase. That the Russian people will be satisfied if Russian influence is not largely felt in the making of this more permanent settlement, even if all their aspirations are not gratified by the shape it will take, seems very unlikely. With the overthrow of the Turks, therefore, a great increase of the sensitiveness of Austria and Germany about Russian interference may confidently be looked for. Russia will be forced to arm herself against its consequences by alliances, and the only ally she can count on with confidence is France, for France is the only Power which is meddling in the Eastern Question to which it has only a secondary importance—that is, which has another question on hand to which it would willingly sacrifice its influence in the East, and for the solution of which it would willingly use any opportunity the Eastern Question may give it. In other words, the recovery of Alsace and Lorraine is now the dominant idea of French politics. It is this which now makes France peaceful and industrious, and which leads to the enormous sacrifices she is undergoing in the reorganization of her army. It is, in the opinion of the Republicans the one thing needed to consolidate the Republic by giving it what it needs, the prestige of restoring the Old France which the Empire allowed to be dismembered, and releasing the Government from that position of modesty and self-effacement in the European councils which is so galling to French pride, and forms such a mortifying departure from French traditions.

Germany and Austria will, therefore, in any trouble which may now arise out of the Turkish problem, naturally suspect France of pursuing very different objects from their own, and should their suspicions be confirmed by a rapprochement between France and Russia, we should probably be threatened more nearly than at any time since 1815 with that "general war in Europe" which the country editor so much delights to anticipate. The position of England has been marked out with the utmost clearness by the present Ministry. As long as Mr.

Gladstone lives and is at the head of affairs, it is certain that her influence and arms will be used to give the sovereignty of European Turkey to the races which preponderate on its soil. The importance of the crisis from a merely commercial point of view can hardly be overrated. The final disappearance of the Turkish Government would really bring into the market a vast and fertile region which has, up to the present, been almost as much cut off from the world of industry and exchange as the interior of Africa. It is literally true that the Middle Ages have lasted in European Turkey down to our own day, and the expulsion of the Mahometan power would be attended with many of the commercial phenomena of a sudden addition of a rich territory and large population to the modern world.

ENGLISH JOURNALISM.—VI.

THE DAILY NEWS—THE DAILY CHRONICLE.

LONDON, September, 1880.

THE Daily News commenced its existence in the year 1846. Its early career illustrates in a very remarkable way the fact that if journalism falls short of being literature, yet on the other hand literature is not always a sufficient equipment for journalism. Literature is a gift, journalism is a business. The first editor of the Daily News, as is very well known, was Mr. Charles Dickens. His name confers a distinction on the paper which will always attach to it, but probably no one ever existed who was less qualified for the work of journalism. Dickens was almost entirely without political knowledge or power of articulate reasoning on political affairs. Thackeray remarked of him once that "his genius was stupendous and his ignorance was miraculous." He was little versed in politics, and was incapable of learning more of them than he gathered during his few years' experience of the House of Commons as a reporter for the Morning Chronicle. He had one of those minds, apparently, which is without proper receptivity for facts and ideas of a certain order. From his early manhood, and at a time when he had scarcely passed boyhood, his literary success opened to him the highest society, so far as he chose to enter it. But he never learned the ordinary conventional distinctions, which, worthless as they are in themselves, are yet signs of a knowledge or ignorance lying behind them. In one of his earliest novels he speaks indifferently of the profligate young nobleman who figures in its pages as Lord Frederick Verisopht and as Lord Verisopht. He might, with a blunder no more absurd, speak of Earl John Russell, or of Sir Peel, or Sir Dilke. In one of his latest novels he makes a Lord Decimus Barnacle a peer, though the title of lord borne before a Christian name can belong only to the younger son of a duke or a marquis, to whom it is allowed not by law but only by social courtesy and usage. In fact the Lord Bobs and the Sir Browns of George Sand and Eugène Sue, and the Tom-Jim-Jacks of Victor Hugo, do not display an ignorance greater, though to English and American eyes it is more glaring, than that which marks the points at which Dickens touches upon English politics and society.

For a man thus disqualified by want of early training and by incapacity of later learning to undertake the editorship of a political journal was as if an Ojibway Indian should volunteer to conduct a Londoner from Tottenham Court Road to Ludgate Hill. Mr. Dickens, in his editorship of the paper, surrounded himself with men most of whom, if they did not share his genius, were yet scarcely capable of supplying the defect of his ignorance. The late Mr. Mark Lemon was his sub-editor, and on the whole the staff of the paper in those days consisted of the comic and cockney writers of the period. Mr. Dickens and his coadjutors rather played at editing the newspaper than actually edited it. The theatrical element was, as the readers of his letters and of Mr. Forster's biography of him know, stronger in Dickens than anything else. He seems, if the expression may be used, to have stage-managed his life. Even in its most thrilling and pathetic incidents, the thought seems to have been constant of the "get-up," of the action and by-play, required from him as in the part for which fortune had cast him. The Daily News office in his days was conducted much as a newspaper office might be depicted on the stage. There was the joviality and recklessness and Bohemianism which it is customary to attribute to the journalistic character. It was blended, according to tradition, with a kind of tawdry finery and display, the use of over-dressed servants and of salvers for the conveyance of letters and messages, in the fashion somewhat of a stage drawing-room. Mr. Dickens's editorship of the paper lasted only for a few months. He was succeeded in it by his friend and biographer, Mr. John Forster, who affected to be in a certain sense his patron and adviser, but who was really his butt. The biographer of Goldsmith and of the statesmen of the Commonwealth, Mr. Forster's knowledge was greater perhaps of the politics of the time of the Stuarts, of the great Rebellion, and of the great Revolution than of that part of the nineteenth century in which he happened to live. But he had had what Dickens lacked, newspaper experience. He had been the literary editor of the Examiner, to the political editorship of which he succeeded when Mr. Albany Fonblanque accepted that appointment under Government which in those days was the destiny of almost every editor of the Examiner. With him was associated, as manager of the paper, Mr. Charles Wentworth Dilke, the grandfather of the present Sir Charles Dilke, now Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Sir Charles Dilke has published some of the writings of his grandfather under the title of 'Papers of a Critic,' and he has prefixed to them a brief biographical memoir. This memoir gives incidentally some glimpses of the interior of the Daily News office as it existed in the years 1846 to 1849, and of the difficulties with which Mr. Forster and Mr. Dilke had to contend. The original proprietors of the paper were Messrs. Bradley & Evans, the printers, the late Sir Joseph Paxton, the late Mr. William Jackson, M.P., father of Sir Henry Jackson, member for Coventry, and some others. To them Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright were afterwards added. Sir Charles Dilke has published some letters from Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright to Mr. Dilke, letters which are more creditable to their recipient than to the writers of them. They exhibit the intolerance and narrowness and the occasional bad manners which marred many nobler qualities and sincere patriotism in those distinguished men. The attempt to put pressure on Mr. Dilke as to the line which he should take on political questions, and even to bias the literary criticism of the paper in favor of the personal friends or political associates of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, was indignantly and successfully resisted. Mr. Dilke protested especially against the Daily News being made, as Mr. Bright seemed to wish to make it, a dissenting organ. Mr. Dilke showed during his brief connection with the Daily News, which, extending only over three years, terminated in 1849, that faculty of business organization in the acquisition and in the arrangements for news, more particularly in the acquisition of information from abroad, which has since characterized it.

On the retirement of Mr. Forster from the editorship he was succeeded by Mr. Knight Hunt, who is now chiefly known as the author of a history of journalism entitled "The Fourth Estate." Mr. Hunt was followed by Mr. Weir, a man of large information, especially versed in German theology of a rationalistic order, and in the topography, buildings, and social life of old London, some papers on which he contributed to the publications of the late Mr. Charles Knight. Mr. Weir was succeeded by Mr. Thomas Walker, who retained the editorship of the paper until the year 1870. To Mr. Walker's fidelity of conviction and strength of purpose the firmness may be attributed with which the Daily News adhered, against much adverse pressure of opinion, to the cause of the North in the American civil war. The newspaper owed to him no small part of that reputation for adherence to principle at the risk of temporary loss of popularity which has formed so much of the basis on which its subsequent success has been erected. The first quarter of a century of the paper was, it must be admitted, a time of struggle and difficulty. Experiment after experiment was tried, with only a temporary success, to lay hold of that popularity which at length it secured. Its price and shape were repeatedly changed. It was started as a 5*d.* paper when other morning journals were published at 7*d.* From 5*d.* it was reduced to 2½*d.*; from 2½*d.* it was raised to 3*d.*; and then again it was reduced to a penny. Changes of form followed these changes of price, and all these mutations indicated too truly that prosperity was being striven after rather than realized. Ground was quitted which it was not found practical to occupy.

When the paper became a penny one it entered on a field already marked out and divided among existing journals which had made the change to this price at a much earlier period. The Daily Telegraph commanded an immense circulation, not only in the Liberal party, to which it then belonged, but among that mass of newspaper readers who care nothing for politics, but who like to be amused by descriptive articles of a sensational order. The Standard had the monopoly of the Conservative readers. The Morning Star was the organ of a comparatively small but earnest body of Radicals, whose politics were what Lord Beaconsfield has unjustly said that the politics of the Liberal party are, cosmopolitan rather than national. The Daily News is believed, before its change to a penny, to have been for some years carried on at a heavy loss, broken only by a period of temporary and accidental success due to the advertisements of the great speculative period in which companies were being formed on every hand. The circulation had fallen, it is said, to a few thousands. It had, therefore, to conquer its public from the newspapers already in existence, or by calling into existence a new circle of readers to create a public of its own. No doubt its present body of subscribers and purchasers have been formed from both of these classes. Its circulation is understood to approach closely, if it does not actually touch that of its most formidable rival in the daily press, which continues to boast the largest circulation in the world.

Under Mr. Walker's editorship, and in part under that of his successors, the Daily News counted among its contributors the late Harriet Martineau; Father Prout (the Rev. Francis Mahony); Mr. Edward Pigott, the brilliant and accomplished examiner of plays; Sir Joseph Arundel, afterwards an Indian judge; Mr. Edmund Yates; Mr. Hollingshead, at present manager of the Gaiety Theatre; Mr. Lathbury, now editor of the Economist; Mr. McCullagh Torrens, M.P., and Mr. Boyd Kinnear, a thoughtful writer on legal and political subjects. Mr. Walker was appointed by Mr. Gladstone in 1869 to the editorship of the London Gazette, a journal of official announcements and advertisements. Political and ministerial nominations, military and naval appointments and promotions, bankruptcies and dissolutions of partnership, with now and then official despatches, form the contents of this interesting publication. Mr. Walker was succeeded by Edward Dicey, now the editor of the Observer. Mr. Dicey was for a long time one of the ablest leader-writers and special correspondents of the Daily Telegraph. Few writers possess a larger knowledge of men and politics, especially of foreign politics, than Mr. Dicey. Some of his letters have been republished in volumes, and they show great political penetration and a quick and observant mind. The present editor of the Daily News is Mr. Frank H. Hill, who had been one of the principal leader-writers in the Daily News, and to whom the series of sketches of English statesmen published under the title of "Political Portraits," and the papers in the Fortnightly Review entitled "The Political Adventures of Lord Beaconsfield," are attributed. The manager of the paper is Mr. J. R. Robinson, to whose business energy and promptitude, and to whose literary perception and discernment of opportunities, no small part of the success of the paper may probably be assigned. Besides the editor of the paper the list of leader-writers is believed to include Mr. Justin McCarthy, M.P., the novelist and historian of "Our Times"; Mr. Clayden, the author of "England under Lord Beaconsfield"; Mr. Andrew Lang, the translator of the Odyssey of Homer, the Idylls of Theocritus, and the author of the verses of society recently published under the title of 'XXII Ballades in Blue China'; and Mr. George Saintsbury, who is understood to be engaged on a history of French literature. Mr. Moy Thomas is the dramatic and the principal literary critic of the paper. Mr. Andrew Lang has succeeded Mr. William Black, formerly one of the leader-writers of the paper, as the art critic; and Mr. H. J. Lincoln is the musical critic. Mr. Ellis is the city editor. The best-known name in connection with the paper is probably that of Mr. Archibald Forbes, whose war correspondence may be said to combine the characters contrasted in Leigh Hunt's poem, of "Captain Pen" and "Captain Sword." Among the writers of social and descriptive articles Mr. Forbes also has a high place, and with him the names may be associated of Mr. B. H. Becker, Mr. Moy Thomas, and Mr. Grenville Murray. Mr. H. W. Lucy, the author of many sketches of political and social life, is the chief of the Parliamentary staff, and the writer of the descriptive Parliamentary summaries. It is not possible for an outsider to know all that goes on inside a newspaper office, and possibly some names which ought to have been mentioned have been omitted. Mr. G. M. Crawford has long been the Paris correspondent of this paper, a work in which he is believed to receive efficient help from his accomplished wife. Its other arrangements in the foreign department, which appear to be very complete, are less known. The politics of the Daily News are rather Radical than Whig, and though it has, in the main, followed the leadership and supported the claims of Mr. Gladstone, it has not done so without many reserves and qualifications. It professes, and in the main, I believe, justly, to be true to Liberal leaders in so far as they are true to the Liberal party, and to the Liberal party in so far as they are true to Liberal principles, or to its interpretation of those principles. In the general character of the paper it may be said to occupy a mean between the highly-colored sensationalism of the newer school of journalism and the bare and bleak propriety of the older.

The Daily Chronicle is the only other morning paper. It was the Clerkenwell News, and its transformation into a general political newspaper is not yet, perhaps, complete. But it started on a basis of acquired prosperity, of ample circulation, and copious advertisements. Its proprietor is Mr. Lloyd, who is also the owner of a penny weekly newspaper called Lloyd's News, of which Mr. Blanchard Jerrold is the editor. The editor of the Daily Chronicle is Mr. Boyle, and Mr. Hance is the acting manager.

THE CONGREGATIONS AND THE GOVERNMENT IN FRANCE.

PARIS, September 1.

THERE is no vacation for our French Kulturkampf. Questions of this kind, when once raised, never lie dormant. The end of August was the expiration of the term allowed the Jesuits by the March decrees for the closing of their educational establishments. In reality, it was in order to close these that the decrees against the non-recognized religious orders were published; for the state, with reason, troubled itself little about the Jesuit houses devoted to purely religious offices. Indeed, so long as the Jesuits are not expelled individually from the country, it is certain they will do exactly the same outside their houses as in them, since the bishops are quite disposed to entrust the most important charges in their dioceses to the Jesuits' care. What the Government wished to annihilate was the influence they acquire by bringing up and educating our youth. It was reasonably thought that to close their educational establishments in the middle of the scholastic year would display useless violence and cause much annoyance to the parents of the students. The Government, therefore, deferred the execution of the decrees concerning these houses until the vacations, in order that families might have time to make necessary arrangements. It could well be surmised that the Jesuits would in the interim endeavor to twist the law to find a loophole of escape. They have not belied their well-known reputation for cleverness. Taking advantage of our laws on civil societies, they have instituted them wherever they owned colleges, putting influential laymen, senators or deputies, at their head—men who entirely belong to them, and are known as Jesuits in short coats. The direction, properly speaking, has been committed to secular priests, whose opinions do not differ an iota from theirs, and they hope soon to reappear as professors, as mere abbés; for the Pope has the right of releasing them from their religious vows. By acting thus they conform to the letter of the law, and their trick is successful.

What will the Government do in face of such a situation? To prohibit the new establishments would be an arbitrary course; to tolerate them would be to own its powerlessness. I do not know how the Government will extricate itself from this unfortunate dilemma. This is a fresh proof of the political error it committed in allowing itself to be compelled by the radical party of the Chamber to pronounce these unfortunate decrees. I have only spoken of the first, but you know a second exists which threatens to dissolve all non-recognized religious congregations which will not ask for Government authorization by communicating their statutes. This second decree, as I have already observed, is far graver than the first, as it would involve the closing of more than five hundred religious houses, among which are a considerable number of orders for women devoted to entirely charitable works, and of others belonging to religious orders standing high in public esteem, such as the Dominicans reconstituted by Lacordaire, and the Oratorians re-established by Father Gratry. The dissolution of all these societies would provoke much agitation. They are bound in honor not to demand authorization of the Government, because they would appear to recognize the validity of the old legislation which the Government wishes to apply to them, and which they have always contested. I have felt certain that the only means of getting out of this difficulty was for the Government to propose a new law on associations of every kind, and it was with a lively satisfaction that I saw M. de Freycinet, the President of the Council of Ministers, announce, in a speech made to his electors of the Council-General at Montauban, that such a law was being prepared for the opening of the next session. On hearing him express such wise and liberal views, it was thought that the French Government had had a previous understanding with the Holy See, with the object of facilitating the solution of a question equally dangerous to both, for the Papacy has no interest in losing in these religious orders its most devoted adherents and active militia.

It was notorious that the French ambassador at the Vatican, M. Despiez, was actively negotiating in order to bring about some concessions from the Pope, who is known to be prudent by nature, even if constrained to speak as the organ of triumphant Ultramontanism. These suppositions were strengthened when we read the public act of submission to the constitution, signed by the chiefs of the non-recognized religious bodies; it is known that this document was drawn up at Rome, with the formal approbation of the Holy Father. The essential part of it must be reproduced to understand its import fully:

"In order that all misunderstanding may cease, the religious orders concerned in the March Decrees make no difficulty about proclaiming their respect and submission to the existing institutions of the country. The dependence they profess to the Church, from which they derive existence, does not constitute them independent of secular power. Such has never been their pretension, as their respective constitutions and history prove. The moral and spiritual aim they pursue does not allow them to bind themselves exclusively to any political régime, or to exclude any. Their only banner is that of Christian charity, and they believe they would compromise it by serving the changing causes of human interests. They, therefore, reject all solidarity with parties and political passions. Lastly, the only thing concerning the temporal government which interests them is teaching, by precept and example, obedience and respect which are due to the authority whose source is from God. Such are the principles which have hitherto inspired their thoughts and acts; they are resolved never to swerve from them. They, therefore, cannot refrain from hoping that the Government will kindly receive the sincere and loyal declarations they here profess, and that, fully assured as to the feelings which animate them, it will allow them to continue unmolested the works of prayer, instruction, and charity to which they have devoted their lives."

This declaration first appeared in a provincial paper at Bordeaux. The monarchist journals, before knowing its high origin, launched invective against it, for it negatived the union of the throne and the altar, which is the very foundation of their political doctrine. The fanatical Ultramontane newspapers, such as the Univers, the famous journal of Veuillot, have shown greater prudence, while carefully abstaining from any sign of approbation which would have given the lie to all their opinions, for they are passionately hostile to the Republic. It was, however, necessary for the entire monarchist and Catholic press to end its criticisms, or protestations, when it was proved that the document had been framed at Rome. It now remains to be seen in what degree it is the result of negotiation between the Papal Court and the French Government. It was at first maintained that M. de Freycinet knew and accepted it. He has contradicted this assertion, but this may refer to the wording of the document itself, which may not have been presented to him formally. It appears to me very unlikely M. de Freycinet was ignorant of the projected advance. Perhaps our ambassador, M. Despiez, may have admitted the declaration as a first concession, or at least as evincing a pacific spirit, and that M. de Freycinet, in consequence of it, felt encouraged to express himself as he did at Montauban. Without doubt the French Government cannot be content with the declaration, but it ought to draw from it a fresh motive for substituting a new law on religious societies, in place of the decrees whose rigorous application would seem still more inopportune now.

I know that the most influential Republican papers, beginning with M. Gambetta's, have but bitter words for the declaration, treat it as mere juggle, and urge the execution of the second decree of March 29, 1880. If they mean to imply they have strong doubts as to the affection the non-recognized congregations entertain for our present institutions, they are scarcely mistaken. No one can doubt that between the government of the ancien régime and theocratic Ultramontanism there was a great affinity. Papal infallibility cannot reconcile itself with the sovereignty of the people, the fundamental principle of democracy. Leo XIII. has just shown in his speech at the last consistory that he has lessened none of the Catholic Church's pretensions of imposing its rule on the state where matters of religion and public education are concerned. These facts are undeniable, yet the civil power gains nothing by pushing the conflict with the Church to the last extremity, especially when it can, as in France, take away all its privileges and subject it to the common law. CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Independent Republican Club of Rhode Island has instructed me to express its hearty sympathy with the plan, proposed by one of the correspondents of the Nation, for the formation of a Publication Society for the dissemination of correct and enlightened views in regard to the civil service. The club pledges itself to the active support of such a scheme, both by work and with money. Trusting that the plan will receive the sympathy and support of all sincere advocates of a pure and efficient civil service throughout the country, I remain yours truly,

John R. Gladding, Secretary.

POSSIBLE GOOD OF AN AWFUL EXAMPLE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I suppose there are few Republicans who will admit that the result in Maine is in any way indicative of that which is likely to follow the general election in November. Already I observe that several of the party organs attribute this disaster to the flow of money and whiskey. Doubtless these rather potent factors in American politics have not been without their influence in the matter, but beyond all this does not the Maine election go to show that many of the ignorant and unreflecting voters who, during and since the war have acted with the Republican party, have now abandoned it? We all know the success of the Democratic party for many years prior to the late war in attracting and holding this element, now greater than ever. May it not be that the supremacy of the Republican party (now that what may be fairly termed an exceptional state of things, a state of things to which it owes its existence, has passed away) has come to an end? Is it not likely that anticipations of this have led to the return to the Democratic fold of such wandering sheep as the Hon. Benjamin F. Butler and Mr. John W. Forney?

For the cause of civil-service reform, by all odds the most important and vital question of the day, though by no means generally so considered, the return of the Democratic party to power would doubtless appear to many tantamount to an indefinite postponement of the whole matter. It appears to me, however, that in this direction, at least, the success of the Democrats in November would not be an entirely unmixed evil, from the fact that it would afford the younger generation of voters an opportunity to observe the practical operation of the spoils system, a spectacle to which, in its entirety, we have been treated on only one occasion since 1860. The moral to be drawn therefrom by the young men of the country could hardly fail to be salutary.

It is hardly an exaggeration to say that the amount of anxiety, and I may say mental agony, which prevails at this time throughout the entire civil service of the country, in anticipation of the result in November, could hardly be exceeded were a considerable portion of the country stricken by a pestilence. Such calamities are, happily, to a degree preventible; would that the plague which now infests our body politic could be as readily eradicated!

GARFIELD versus GARFIELD.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I hope the suggestion for a Civil-Service Reform Publication Society will grow to definite action. The halting progress of this movement during the last fifteen years in our Congress and political conventions shows that we can expect little from our law-makers and politicians, unless there is a strong and exacting public sentiment behind them. When Garfield the Presidential candidate flatly contradicts Garfield the statesman, as shown in the following extracts, it indicates that there is something wrong. In 1877 General Garfield wrote thus:

"To sum up in a word, the present system invades the independence of the Executive, and makes him less responsible for the character of his appointments; it impairs the efficiency of the legislator by diverting him from his proper sphere of duty and involving him in the intrigues of aspirants for office; it degrades the civil service itself by destroying the personal independence of those who are appointed; it repels from the service those high and manly qualities which are so necessary to a pure and efficient administration; and, finally, it debauches the public mind by holding up public office as the reward of mere party zeal. To reform this service is one of the highest and most imperative duties of statesmanship. This reform cannot be accomplished without a complete divorce between Congress and the Executive in the matter of appointments."

In the letter of acceptance General Garfield writes:

"To select wisely from our vast population those who are best fitted for the many offices to be filled requires an acquaintance far beyond the range of one man. The Executive should, therefore, seek and receive the information and assistance of those whose knowledge of the communities in which the duties are to be performed thus qualifies them to aid in making the wisest choice."

That is, Congressmen should have a guiding and controlling influence in appointing the civil officers of their respective States and districts.

The work of reform must begin with the people. The people, to demand a change, must be instructed and aroused. They must see the perils. Their consciences and sympathies must be enlisted. The need of the hour is instruction and agitation. Your subscribers in this place are united in approval of the suggestion made by "F. W. H." They can be counted upon to cooperate in sums of one to five dollars and by personal work.

Respectfully yours, M. S. Dudley.

THE LOUISIANA RETURNING BOARD.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your strictures on Mr. Sherman's defence of the Louisiana Returning Board, in the issue of September 16, are to the point, but they do not cover the whole ground. The law did provide, as you say, that both political parties should be represented on the Board, but it also required that the number of members should be five, and that, whenever a vacancy occurred, through death or resignation, it should be immediately filled by a selection made by the rest. When James Madison Wells was examined by Mr. Morrison, chairman of the New Orleans Investigating Committee of 1876, the writer, in his capacity of clerk, noted this question and answer:

Mr. Morrison: Why did you not comply with the statute by choosing a fifth member before proceeding to compile the returns?

Wells: Because we could not agree on the person; we took a vote several times, but two of us always voted for one man, and two for some other man, and we could never agree.

It thus appears that the men who awarded the electoral vote of Louisiana to Mr. Hayes, did not constitute a legal body with power to act in the premises. But further: even had the Returning Board been lawfully made up, it had no power to reject any returns unless they were accompanied by protests from the supervisors. In regard to such as came to them protested, and in regard to some others, they were authorized to examine witnesses, and count or throw out the vote, according to the testimony. Now, the Democrats offered to prove, and had conclusive evidence to prove, before the Electoral Commission that the unprotested returns, as they were sent in by the Republican supervisors to New Orleans, gave the State to Tilden by some eight thousand majority—the said evidence consisting, in many instances, of the oaths of the supervisors themselves, who were willing to swear that protests were attached to their returns after they had left their hands, and were false in fact, and more than one declaring that they had been invited to New Orleans and offered money if they would add protests to the returns as first made.

These things are of most interest now as matters of history. But history, if written correctly, must state that, bad as the election law of Louisiana was, if its provisions had been carried out to the letter Mr. Tilden would now be in the White House. Thoughtful and sincere Republicans have about abandoned the claim that Hayes was chosen President; but some of them still insist that his position is impregnable in law, or, as they are fond of putting it, "that he was constitutionally declared elected." From the statements just made it follows that Mr. Hayes, resting his claim, as he must, on the unlawful acts of a body without legal existence, has a title to the office he has held for the last three years which is without foundation, whether in law or in fact.

THE DECLINE OF VOCAL MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is the quality of all just criticism to beget further discussion, as fine distinctions are in themselves gratifying to the mind, yet almost invariably suggestive of new considerations. After reading with satisfaction and indeed admiration the article on "Vocal and Instrumental Music" in your number of August 19, I yet feel it to be a pity that so much good musical criticism, and the influence of the Nation to boot, should go to persuade people that it is best to relinquish vocal music altogether, both in public and private, and to confine their efforts to the study and practice and support of that which is instrumental. This is the unhesitating conclusion of your contributor; but very good reasons may be given for dissenting from it.

The art of singing, like the greater arts to which it is allied, has had its periods of progress, of glory, and of decline. It may also have its revival. We may agree with your contributor when he says that at present the art of singing is in its decline—provided that he limits the statement to operatic singing. I should myself be inclined to fix the period of the culmination of that branch of the art to the days of Pasta, Malibran, Sontag, and that unequalled quartette consisting of Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini, and Lablache, which reigned over the lyric stage from about 1826 to 1850.

But there still remains the singing of the church, of the concert-room, and of society; and surely it will be granted that all these are better than ever before—better, sweeter, more intelligent, and more expressive; and though singing, like everything else, has profited by our growing civilization, our greater sensibility to poetry and painting and other forms of art, yet singing is essentially imitative, and our present condition, such as it is, in church, home, and concert-room could never have been arrived at without the lessons—the unconscious lessons—which Europe and America have been taking these last hundred years from the Italian opera. Whether these lessons are to continue I do not know. Whether they have lasted long enough, I doubt. Whether, having once heard the utmost calm beauty of which the human voice is capable; and then the utmost pathos, passion, force, and brilliancy which it can express—subject to that great law of moderation which the Greeks imposed, and which the Italians respected, never to carry passion so far as to revolt the sense of beauty—and then, of late years, having heard singers, under the terrible pressure of the modern orchestra, forgetting that law and forcing themselves to efforts destructive to voice and ear in order to maintain the supremacy once accorded them; whether, this decline admitted, it is best to abolish the Italian opera altogether, need not be debated at this moment. But to abolish the practice of singing and the delight of listening is impossible. Irritated by the fretfulness of Italian singers and their outrageous vanity, unable to allow for persons whose all depends on the success or failure of each night, Wagner seems to have wished to stamp out the race; while his followers are animated by a spirit towards them which might almost be called sanguinary. If, however, their services are in future to be dispensed with, let us at least not be unjust towards the past. If your contributor will read the disinterested criticisms of a contemporary on Marchesi and other great singers of the last century (Lord Mount Edgecombe, quoted in Hogarth's 'History of the Lyrical Drama'), he will learn that it was not reserved for the excellent German artists whom he names to be the first to combine dramatic propriety and a faithful rendering of the composer's intention with the gift of song. Nay, more; if he will turn to Stendhal's 'Life of Rossini,' he will find an admirable criticism of the famous singer Mlle. Colbran (Rossini's first wife) in the character of Queen Elizabeth, from which it is evident to any one who has seen Madame Ristori in that part that the great tragic actress has learnt or adopted much from the great lyric actress who preceded her. Few persons now living can remember Madame Pasta; but from the accounts we have all heard in our youth she must have been an actress of great power. No one has accused her, at least, of "strutting like a peacock" or of "gigantic self-conceit." It so happens that New-Yorkers who have chanced to take an interest in the art of singing combined with acting had, some years ago, an opportunity of forming a very good idea of the acting of Madame Pasta. That artist, after her own retirement, showed a generous interest in the fortunes of younger aspirants; and in particular did her utmost to develop the talents of a certain Mademoiselle Parodi, who sang in London and in New York for two or three seasons. The stupid joke that she was a "parody of Pasta" did much to injure her in London. She was not handsome; the style of Pasta was a little too grandiose for an altered taste, and she disappeared as so many hundreds have done; not, however, without having left a lesson behind her for those who cared to profit by it. Her grand gestures, her intense earnestness, her fine by-play, her utter oblivion of the audience and absorption in her part, showed in what a noble school she had been trained. Considering that the two greatest tragic actors living, Ristori and Salvini, are both Italians, it is rather hasty to assume that all the remaining genius of the Italian stage is concentrated in Madame Patti, and that, too, doomed to speedy oblivion because she has lately been ill-received at Munich.

Your contributor is hurried into an injustice, foreign, I think, to his intentions, when he speaks of the trills and other vocal absurdities of the singers trained for the Papal Chapel during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and then says that such tricks indicated the taste of the time. That singers were able to perform such tours de force is a proof that their training had been severe and thorough; but it does not follow, and is not the fact, that they were incapable of refined and exquisite singing, pathetic and tender expression, and, above all, a noble style of declamation; for these were precisely the qualities in which they excelled, and which the taste of their day required of them. They declaimed long speeches, like those in Addison's play of "Cato," with no other accompaniment than an occasional chord from the harpsichord; and the "sensuous beauty" of their voices was only equalled by the correctness of their elocution.

The truth is that singers and singing must never be judged without taking into account the state of the orchestra. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries instruments were few and costly, and voices were used in their stead and did their work. Madrigals, sung by a score or so of voices, without accompaniment, were of a wonderful intricacy and difficulty. Hence the need of a long and severe training for the singers who executed them. As instruments became more numerous and more various, and singers could rely more and more on an accompaniment which supported without overpowering them, there arose that succession of great individual singers whose fame has been handed down to the present day. It ceased to be necessary for them to learn counterpoint or elocution; their sole business was to execute faultlessly that which had been set down for them. Then was the happy period when the voices did not suffer from too much orchestra, as at present; nor too little, as before; when a sort of truce existed, and the drama, the music—considered as composition—the orchestra, and the artists each got no more than their fair share of the credit due to the whole. A period which, commencing with Cimarosa and "Il Matrimonio Segreto" in 1792, took in Mozart, with "Don Giovanni" and the "Zauberflöte"; Weber, with "Oberon" and "Der Freischütz"; Beethoven, with "Fidelio"; Rossini, with "Semiramide," "Tancredi," the "Barbiere," and "William Tell" (1830), and then declined through Bellini, Donizetti, Meyerbeer, Verdi, and came, one fears, to a final end in Gounod with "Faust." Looking back on the whole series, thinking of the grace, the brilliancy, the imaginative and creative power contained in these works, the great and varied talent employed in their production, the exquisite beauty of much of the music, and the equal loveliness of the voices which breathed it, and the amount of innocent pleasure and delicate emotion which they have caused to successive generations, one need not envy the puritanism, æsthetic or other, which despises Italian opera. And we may be sure that if that particular form perishes, vocal music, as a whole, will not. Your contributor admits that "a smooth and well-trained voice indeed has more elementary beauty, and is capable of more intense and varied expression, than any instrument"; but when he goes on to say that such a voice is scarcely ever to be heard I cannot follow him; nor, if the scarcity existed, should we be less likely to take the pleasure he considers so reprehensible in the exquisite gift.

Nor are we likely to burn our musical libraries. "Sound an Alarm!" is in print; and so is "Let the bright Seraphim," and "Lord, remember David," and "Lift thine Eyes," and "Comfort ye My People," and Mozart's "Agnus Dei," and Stradella's "Pietà Signore," and Rossini's "Inflammatus," and—one gets breathless with thinking of the thousand divine compositions for the voice which never can die, and for the right interpretation of which no voice is too beautiful, no training too laborious, and for the rendering of which no instrument could suffice.

But to argue such a point is absurd. People will sing, well or ill; and though we may resign ourselves with a sigh to the present preponderance of the orchestra, and may feel it to be well that a great genius should develop his ideas to the uttermost, even at the sacrifice of a generation of singers, and the temporary obscuration of the sense of vocal beauty and excellence, yet we know that a reaction must come; that art will not always remain estranged from beauty and divorced from joy; and that a more catholic taste and a wider culture, while doing justice to the great development of orchestral and dramatic music which has been the glory of our time, will restore to their due estimation the writers as well as the performers of genuine vocal music.

Notes.

DODD, MEAD & CO. will shortly publish a new story by Mr. E. P. Roe, 'A Day of Fate,' and, before Christmas, 'Pretty Peggy,' a collection of five old ballads, with illustrations in color after designs by Miss Rosina Emmet.——Ingram's 'Edgar Allan Poe,' in two volumes, will be issued in a few days by Cassell, Petter & Galpin.——J. B. Lippincott & Co. have in press 'Kate Comerford; or, Sketches of Garrison Life,' by Theresa Aloysia Thornet.——D. Appleton & Co. have issued a cheap edition, in paper covers, of Herbert Spencer's 'Education: Intellectual, Moral, and Physical.'——J. R. Osgood & Co. have reissued the collection of prose and verse entitled 'Favorite Authors,' derived from the works of Hawthorne, Holmes, Landor, Browning, Scott, Percival, Charles Sprague, Whittier, Lowell, Longfellow, etc. Steel portraits of several of these writers, gilt edges, and a tasteful binding give the volume a holiday air.——'The Mudfog Papers' of Dickens, contributed to the early numbers of Bentley's Miscellany, and now for the first time collected and published in this country in the "Leisure-Hour Series," amount to very little. Their only interest lies in their authorship, and though they appeared after the 'Pickwick Papers,' they have none of the spontaneity of humor characteristic of Dickens's earlier works. As they were written apparently with a distinct notion of their ephemeral nature, it is doubtful if they were worth republishing.——The first number of Education, an international, bi-monthly magazine, has reached us (Boston: New England Publishing Co.) The editorial conception of it seems to us to bear date of 1840, and we fear the magazine will only serve to suppress the real organ of the higher education. Here is a taste of the editorial calibre: "In short, and in earnest, the effort of the Concord School of Philosophy is to interpret the whole universe,—from protoplasm, through Proteus [!], up to the Godhead,—by the nobler key of Plato, Aristotle, and Hegel, rather than by the dog-headed and monkey-tailed ciphers of Darwin and Haeckel. That is a curious and invaluable alphabet, and we owe all honor to the men of science who invented it, yet," etc.——In the Harvard Register for September Professor C. E. Norton calls for volunteers to assist in "the investigation of the remains of an ancient Greek city upon Turkish soil," under the auspices of the Executive Committee of the American Archæological Institute, and the immediate direction of Mr. Joseph T. Clarke. Board and lodging will be provided upon the spot, but neither salary nor travelling expenses can be paid. Prof. Norton should be addressed at Cambridge.——Mr. William Page's advocacy of the genuineness of the Shakspere death-mask of Kesselstadt is familiar to the reading public. In the August number of the Antiquary (J. W. Bouton) Lord Ronald Gower wrote on the same side; but in the September number Mr. C. M. Ingleby, the well-known Shakspere scholar, prints a woodcut, lent by Mr. Parker Norris, of Philadelphia, after the miniature supposed to represent Shakspere lying in state, also in the Kesselstadt collection, and denies any resemblance between this and the mask, or that the former was copied from the latter. From the date on the painting, 1637, he infers the likeness to be rather of Ben Jonson, who died in that year, and whose portrait in the Dulwich gallery it resembles.——O. Spamer, Leipzig, is publishing in parts a richly illustrated work on the Russia of to-day ('Das heutige Russland'), by G. von Lankenau and L. von der Oelsnitz.——B. Westermann & Co. send us Parts 18, 19 of Stieler's Hand-Atlas, the first bearing immediately on the present Eastern Question, with its general map of Germany (beautifully executed) and Southwestern Russia and the Balkan Peninsula. The other maps represent Saxony and the adjacent states, the Levant, (equally useful with the first-named for the Eastern Question), the North Atlantic, and the southern heavens. From the same house we have Parts 19, 20 of Oncken's 'Allgemeine Geschichte.' In the first of these Hertzberg's 'History of Ancient Rome' is brought to its conclusion, and Dr. Bernhard Kugler begins his 'History of the Crusades,' which, running through Part 20, will terminate in Part 21. The illustrations are among the most curious yet offered in this series, especially those taken from a Venetian MS., 'De Passagiis in Terram Sanctam,' of the beginning of the fourteenth century. Views of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and of the Crusaders' strongholds, plans and maps of Constantinople, Jerusalem, Ascalon, Acre, etc., with military engines, seals, coins, and many other objects, are also freely interspersed with the text.

—With the vast majority of the descendants of the Puritans the unbroken pedigree can be traced no further back than the settlement of Massachusetts Bay, and the industry of one or more generations of genealogists will be necessary (among so many identical surnames) to enable every one with certainty to fix the line of his ancestry even to the year I. of our New World nobility. To cross the ocean and confirm an English connection has been, nevertheless, the darling aim of almost every victim of the genealogic mania, and a sad amount of baseless conjecture and of mortifying imposition by pedigree-mongers has been the result. Still, the search goes on, honestly and securely in the hands of such a man as Colonel Chester, and somehow, whether well or ill, in all sorts of ways. What we take to be the most important general contribution yet made to this pursuit is the 'Gleanings from English Records about New England Families' just reprinted from the Historical Collections of the Essex Institute (Salem, Mass.) The authors, Messrs. James A. Emmerton and Henry F. Waters, had special qualifications for their undertaking. In the summer and fall of 1879 they made hasty notes, chiefly at the Principal Probate Registry, Somerset House, Strand; the Public Record Office, Fetter Lane; and the British Museum, of wills, etc., relating to familiar American names, with a view to stimulating further research by the possible clews furnished, as by the neighborhood, the similarity of Christian names, and other indicia. The result is a volume of 138 pages, in which some of the notices are joined with already extant data, thus actually performing the work of making (or extending) a connection. Thus, we have the will of Andrew Bordman (father of William Bordman, steward of Harvard College), whose widow married Stephen Day, the first printer in the colonies; the full pedigree of Captain Francis Champernon, involving a relationship with both Sir Humphrey Gilbert and Sir Walter Raleigh; the Gilbert pedigree itself; the paternal and maternal (Lord) pedigree of Nathaniel Hawthorne; the will of John Halliock, father of Edward Holyoke, the immigrant ancestor of the New England family (related, by the way, to the Hawthornes); the will of Captain John Mason; the will of William Sheaffe, showing a connection with Fletcher, the dramatist; and much other interesting matter, including some comparatively recent data from the Island of Jersey. We may also mention here Mr. Waters's monograph on the Gedney and Clarke families of Salem, the latter connected with the Fairfaxes of Virginia, as is illustrated in some family correspondence of the last half of the last century.

—The contents of the recent numbers of the North American Review seem to show that the editor has somewhat changed the plan of conducting the magazine originally adopted by him. It was a plan which necessarily must have been modified sooner or later, as it was based on the idea that the value of an article depended altogether on the name appended to it, a proposition not any more absolutely true in literature than it is in trade. Up to a certain point names will no doubt prove sensationally attractive, but after a time the curiosity of the public, for instance, about what one notorious visiting statesman may have to say about another notorious visiting statesman must die out, and in the end, too, the supply of names must be exhausted. The editor has apparently seen this difficulty in his path, and has come to the conclusion that, in the long run, the serious and thoughtful is superior to the sensational. It is, however, a much more arduous task, as previous editors of the North American long since found out to their cost, to provide serious and thoughtful articles, from writers who are masters of their subjects, which the public will read, than it is to provide articles which the public will read, but which are neither serious nor thoughtful, nor written by masters; and if the present return to the old method of editing is not altogether successful, it should be remembered that the old method itself was never altogether successful. In the numbers for the last three months we find several articles by experts in various branches on subjects which are of historical or scientific interest. Mr. Richard H. Dana contributes a discussion of the "Nullity of the Emancipation Edict," in which he very conclusively shows that Mr. Lincoln's emancipation proclamation had no effect of any kind as a war measure, because it assumed to operate upon territory not in the possession of the Northern army. He thinks that the end in view should have been accomplished by a proclamation freeing the slaves pari passu with the advance of our troops. But the chief effect of the proclamation was a moral one, and its positive moral effect upon the fortunes of the war cannot be estimated now. M. Désiré Charnay writes for the September and October numbers an account of his discoveries among the ruins of Central America, a contribution which is valuable archæologically. M. Charnay, to judge by it, is hardly a scientific man, but belongs to the great and useful class of investigators who furnish material for scientific men. Besides these we may mention the "Trial of Mrs. Surratt," by Mr. John W. Clampit, and "The Personality of God," by Professor W. T. Harris, as well as an article on "The Democratic Party judged by its History," by Mr. Emory A. Storrs. These last show perhaps rather the difficulties with which Mr. Rice labors than the success with which he overcomes them.

—Mr. J. Brander Matthews introduces the October number of the International Review with a paper on Émile Augier which is to be described as an account rather than a critique, though, considering Augier's rank and American unfamiliarity with his works, that is perhaps a merit rather than a disadvantage. Indeed, we should have been glad of still further exposition, and a page or two of extracts from Augier's metrical plays would have served this end acceptably. Supposing it to be the end Mr. Matthews himself has at heart, we feel like suggesting that his characterization would have gained in force by the sacrifice of some caprices of composition of which the following sentence is an example: "The Third Person is as important to many French dramas of this century as was the 'Third Estate' to the nation in the last; but he is in no way aided and abetted by M. Augier." These, however, do not prevent his article from being valuable and worth the reading of every one interested in the contemporary French drama, Augier's place in which is defined very justly, we imagine, if somewhat enthusiastically. "John Cotton in Church and State," along with its biographical interest, presents a view, whose attractiveness may be new to many, of the secular influence of the early New England ministers; and the writer, the Rev. George E. Ellis, preserves a candid temper, though he will hardly expect what he says to settle the controversies upon whose confines he treads. M. Le B. Goddard tells anew "The Story of the Poncas" with a good deal of indignation, and evidently thinks there is but one side to the question, concerning which, at all events, agitation is not wholly out of place. Its result in due time ought to be something more reasonable than anything here suggested, so far as we can gather. Carroll D. Wright discusses "The Census: Its Methods and Aims"; Gamaliel Bradford takes "A Bird's-Eye View of Our Railroad System"; A. Talandier, by no means a personal admirer of Gambetta, writes confidently of "The Political Situation in France." His paper may be commended to readers familiar only with the current foreign writing upon French politics, which assumes that the Revolution is no nearer its termination to-day than it was three years ago, and looks for a speedy return of the old alternative—chaos or a dictator. There are two papers devoted to the Presidential election, with which we may class a review of Bundy's 'Life of Garfield,' some sentences of which read curiously—for example: "He [the candidate] must regard, as those who nominated him do, party success as the first thing to be thought of," and "We do not see that it was his duty to commit himself after his nomination on either question (civil-service reform and the tariff), or before it presented itself in a practical form for his executive action, should he become President." These are sentiments adapted to the confidence of personal conversation, and have an awkward ring declaimed from the house-top.

—"The Concord School of Philosophy" finds a sympathetic expositor in the Rev. Julius H. Ward, who furnishes the remaining paper of the number. He thinks that though it has been much celebrated in the daily press it has been somewhat overlooked "as a movement in American thought and life." In this sense it has a natural relation to the Transcendental movement of forty years ago, and it has also significance as "at least a hint of the direction in which philosophical and religious thought is moving at the present time." Upon the Transcendental movement Mr. Ward has many praises to bestow; he thinks it acted beneficently on "a certain provincial narrowness of thought" characteristic of the New England religionists, "traces of which," he says, "are yet to be seen in the rural districts." The Transcendentalists "built upon the same basis upon which Buddha built," and put "imagination into daily life," and, though they failed at the time, to their influence must be attributed the new "movement," which is "simply to articulate a distinctly American School of Philosophy." Historically, however, the school started in St. Louis, where Messrs. Brockmeyer, Harris, and Snider "spent many a leisure evening over Plato, Aristotle, and the great Germans before they had anything to say to the world without." Mr. Snider especially "was soon found to have a rare power of thinking out questions to their results," and they thus nursed into life "a Western School of Philosophy." Before long "came the demand for utterance," a periodical was started, then "the chief philosophical minds of the West" sought to "join hands with the best thinking of the East; and out of this desire sprang the Concord School of Philosophy." The school is eminently practical because "it will hardly do to say that the ideal is not in the best sense practical," or, as Thackeray made the late Lord Lytton express it, "The Ideal is the true Real." It is also original. Dr. Jones is notably "an original thinker," for, though he is a Platonist, "Plato has simply furnished the basis of his lectures," which apply only what is immutable in Plato to the purposes of modern society. Of Dr. Harris the same may be said. He, however, "restricted his survey, both in speculative and historical philosophy, to the points which involve man's being and destiny," leaving other equally interesting points, such as "the spiritual consciousness of man as unfolded in religious history," to other lecturers. There was a cordial agreement between all upon "the great and central verities of religious thought," and Mr. Ward succinctly sums up the position of the School as "simply that of ideal realism." Its future is "reasonably assured," for as the only thing of the kind among English-speaking people it has met a want, and it may "lay the basis for a constructive interpretation of Christianity." It is, furthermore, thoroughly independent and "owes nothing to our universities, and does not propose to lean upon them except so far as they have something to add to the stock of existing thought."

—In recent numbers of Westermann's Monatshefte (beginning with that for July) Prof. H. H. Boyesen has been describing literary life in this country in a way which, we fear, will induce an enormous immigration of German literati. Authors, he says, are here "the heroes of society, and in all the large cities of the North are overwhelmed, from the beginning to the end of the year, with invitations to dinners, ball, and soirées." This, one might think, was sufficient to prove them pretty well off, but after reading the next sentence the reader sees that it was of no consequence at all; for he is then informed that "their position in society practically corresponds to that of the high nobility in Europe, and they are much sought after, in order that their presence may lend brilliancy to an otherwise uninteresting and commonplace company." It is also agreeable to know that "they no longer, as formerly, are distinguished by flowing locks and shabby clothes, but appear in irreproachable and fashionable society dress." Mr. Lowell, whom the essayist assumes to be "hardly known in Europe except as a diplomat," is for all that "the most complete type of the American gentleman," which, it seems, corresponds, "mutatis mutandis, to a noble Athenian of the age of Pericles." "The New England element," remarks Mr. Boyesen, "is the yeast which penetrates the whole northern part of our continent"; but, singularly enough, Boston being the capital of this literary New England, "not one of the literary magnates in whom Boston glories is a resident of the city." This remark might be an accidental ignoring of Dr. Holmes and Mr. Parkman, but that neither of these writers is mentioned in the article. We will conclude our extracts with one calculated to revive the drooping spirits of the jaded novel-reader, who will be pleased to learn that "our publishers cause every month a shower of native novels to fall upon the market," of which "the majority are remarkably well written, and display a sharpness of observation which would do the highest honor to an experienced author."

—The music of the "Sultan of Mocha" is, like all Mr. Cellier's music, pretty but imitative. The libretto is of the English burlesque order, and in the performance recently given at the Union Square Theatre the actors seem to have felt obliged to adapt themselves rather to the libretto than to the music. The plot is well enough suited to the purposes of comic opera, and in the hands of a French dramatist, even of an inferior order, would have been made very funny. A young girl betrothed to a sailor is carried off by her mercenary uncle, for the purpose of using her to the best advantage in the marriage market. He goes so far as to sell her to the Sultan of Mocha, but in the end, of course, the plans of the old wretch are foiled, and she is happily united to her lover. Mr. William Hamilton, who takes the part of the Sultan, is a fair bouffe actor, but he is the only one of the whole company who seems to have the slightest idea of what bouffe acting is. Considering that the Anglo-Saxon race have now for fifteen or twenty years been desperately endeavoring to catch the spirit of French opera bouffe, and that every year there are dozens of operas, brought out in the United States by Anglo-Saxon companies, which are more or less remotely the result of these endeavors, it is an extraordinary proof of the permanence and fixity of race characteristics that they still remain Anglo-Saxon in their heaviness and in their vulgarity. Anglo-Saxon seriousness is a very good quality, but it does not fit any actor or actress to act in the bouffe manner; and even when relieved of vulgarity we never quite get over the impression that the entertainment is not precisely what we were promised. Miss Leonora Braham, who has been taking the part of Dolly, is a pert little actress, without a great deal of voice, but able to make the most of what she has. Mr. Dixon (Admiral Sneak) is a very vulgar burlesque actor, while Mr. Allen (Captain Flint) is not even that. Some of the choruses are good, but that of the Greenwich Pensioners is too like similar music in several other operas to be altogether satisfactory.

—It is well known what an outcry was raised last year against the proposed "restorations" of St. Mark's, Venice, and how the Italian Government was induced to stay its hand, at least for a time. The danger is by no means felt to be over, and partly lies, of course, in the instability of Italian administrations, as well as in the persistence of architects and builders intent on completing their scheme of a general overhauling of the façades, and of ceilings, pavements, and walls. Accordingly, as the result of a conference held in London last May, a permanent committee was organized charged with the delicate task of preserving "the genuine character of St. Mark's," in "sympathetic co-operation with those numerous and influential Italians who hold the same views," and "with every determination not to wound any national susceptibilities, or to take exception to what are plainly necessary repairs." This committee now makes a public appeal for support, but without present reference to pecuniary contributions. "The names of all who may be disposed to join them in their endeavors" may be sent to the Honorary Secretary, Henry Wallis, of Buckingham Street, Strand, London, W. C. No chairman is as yet announced—an Italian is perhaps desired. Prof. Geo. E. Street, the eminent architect, is Vice-Chairman. Among the members, we find, of course, Mr. Ruskin, many directors of museums, English and German, Sir John Gilbert, Alma-Tadema, Burne Jones, Meissonier, Poynter, Prof. Colvin, W. R. S. Ralston, Rev. Mark Pattison, Charles Yriarte, M. Challemel-Lacour, Mr. James Russell Lowell, and Prof. Charles E. Norton, of Cambridge, Mass.

—Three annuals of the kind in which the French excel have lately been published by A. Quantin, and are to be had of J. W. Bouton, the American agent. These are the Année Archéologique, edited by M. Anthyme Saint-Paul; the Année Artistique, by Victor Champier; and the Répertoire Poli- tique et Historique, by M. Charles Valframbert. The first, which is now in its fourth volume, has greatly enlarged its scope, and lays down a programme requiring the year 1900 for its completion. We can only indicate a part of its contents: a list of notable events in the "eighties" B.C. and A.D., handy for centennial observances; archæology in France—embracing special paintings at the Salon of 1879, congresses and reunions in that year, excursions, explorations, the official report on historical monuments, and the budget of 1880; archæology abroad; mélanges, with a notice of Viollet-le-Duc, and the theses of the École des Chartes, 1849–80; bibliography, including publications of archæological societies; remarkable lists of learned societies, with a sketch of their history and their memberships (even to the residence in each case, with street and number), and of committees and commissions; the personnel of museums and libraries within the scope of this annual; finally, reports, and archæologic projects for 1880–81. More readable is the Année Artistique (vol. ii.), with corresponding and wonderfully painstaking lists of the personnel of fine-art administration in governments and institutions, both in France and abroad; accounts of the acquisitions of museums, the changes in the fine-art schools, the condition of the national factories (Sèvres and the Gobelins); a critical review of the Salon, in classes; the great sales of the Hôtel Drouot; a chronique of the year, with its exhibitions, new societies, etc.; full chapters on art in the provinces and in foreign countries in detail; a classified and annotated bibliography; a careful necrology; an appendix of official documents; finally, an index of names—altogether an admirable performance. Adapted for wider circulation than the foregoing, though strictly confined to France, is the Répertoire Politique, now in its fourth year. It opens with a political review of the year 1879 in a Republican sense, then notes the election of President Grévy and the return of the Chambers to Paris, and then summarizes in strict order—topical, not chronological—the discussions on bills and the interpellations in each house, adding a list of bills in preparation. The budgets and financial measures follow; and the several departments, with their laws, decrees, etc., are taken up seriatim. Presidential messages and ministerial and party manifestoes; the Press, with a bibliography of "biographies and portraits"; the Social and Economic movement; and, finally, Necrology, complete this useful volume. It lacks, the reader will observe, the personnel of the Chambers, and the election returns.

—In the September Livre will be found a review of M. Amédée-Edmond Blanc's 'Napoléon Ier: ses institutions civiles et administratives,' on which Karl Hillebrand bases a remarkable article in the Rassegna Settimanale of Aug. 8, vindicating the greatness of Napoleon as a civil reorganizer against the depreciations of Lanfrey and his school, and demonstrating anew the writer's dictum in his 'Frankreich und die Franzosen' that "the great architect of modern France gave six foundation stones to the edifice of the Cæsarian democracy." The same periodical makes M. Littré's latest and last work (as he himself announces), 'Études et Glanures,' an occasion for reviewing the career of this venerable scholar, citing a perhaps not familiar bit of autobiography relating to his ancestors. The family belonged in Normandy, and consisted of goldsmiths in an ascending and descending line. A copper group in an abbey near Avranches having needed repairs, a Littré was called in, who, being shown Satan under the foot of Michael, on examination reported the devil to be the better of the two (le diable avait du bon), and the archangel good for nothing (l'archange ne valait pas le diable), and proposed to execute his commission by making them exchange rôles and putting the devil in the place of the angel. The vulgar idiom quite unintentionally gave his language a facetious equivocation, and being a Huguenot he found or thought himself in danger of persecution for impiety. He therefore made pretence of being converted, and the family from that time became Catholic. "Sans la facétie d'un aïeul," comments the reviewer, "tous ces gens-là restaient huguenots et étaient damnés éternellement."

—One of the most brilliant and accomplished of the critics of the Revue des Deux Mondes, M. Ferdinand Brunetière, has gathered together in a volume of 'Études Critiques sur l'Histoire de la Littérature française' (Paris: Hachette; New York: F. W. Christern) half a dozen studies of the life and times and works of French writers. To a foreigner the most interesting and the most important essays are those on Molière, Racine, and Voltaire. The article on Molière was called forth in 1877 by the publication of M. Loiseleur's 'Points Obscurs de la Vie de Molière,' and it reappears now enlarged and "brought down to date" by a diligent use of the unending pamphlets and papers which are so rapidly increasing our scant knowledge of the life of the great humorist. It is not too much to say that the seventy pages which M. Brunetière devotes to this subject contain the best brief biography of Molière, in the light of the latest researches, now to be had. The article on Racine, though less exhaustive, is almost equally instructive. It sets forth with much force the comparatively new view that, coming after Corneille and discarding his traditions and his theories, Molière and Racine were both literary revolutionists, as daring in their day as the Romanticists of 1830, or the equally audacious but less gifted Naturalists of the present. Speaking of Naturalism, M. Brunetière (p. 67), in an essay on French literature in the Middle Ages, signalizes the love of minute detail to be seen in it, and notes that this love "is one of the points where extremes meet and where a literature beginning is like a literature about to end"; adding further that we can reconstruct out of the songs and fabliaux the every-day life of the twelfth or thirteenth century as completely as our grandchildren can put together the details of the life of our time from the descriptions of Balzac or Zola. It is perhaps characteristic that a French critic should appear ignorant of so important a work on Voltaire as Mr. John Morley's.

WHEELER'S SHORT HISTORY OF INDIA.*

THIS is an age of manuals; yet there still exists among many worthy persons a feeling that an historical compendium must be uninteresting. This sentiment is a prejudice. It arises not so much from the defects of authors (for no more exquisitely constructed little books exist than some of the series which is adorned by Mr. Gardiner's 'History of the Thirty Years' War') as from the mistake of readers who do not understand the right use to make of a good manual. They attempt to learn its details, so to speak, by heart. You might as well use a map as a table whence to commit to memory the names of all the towns which it contains. The true way to use a manual, which is after all an historical chart, is to read it through pretty rapidly, let the main outline and general impression sink into your mind, and, if this can be achieved, contrive that a few salient facts and dates become impressed upon your recollection. A student who does this will, if his manual be a good one, have gained for himself a general view of the period described, which will, it is true, be of no advantage in an examination, but will give him a sort of scheme into which to piece any minute knowledge he may subsequently gain from detailed histories. Another advantage of taking this historical bird's-eye view is, that such a glance at the outline of a whole period gives a kind of knowledge which one is apt to lose in the minute study of particular portions of one era. A sketch of history has, in short, with the defects the merits of a sketch. It should, and if properly used may, impress on one the grand, bare, and obvious features of its subject.

These remarks emphatically apply to such a book as Wheeler's 'History of India.' We defy any one without considerable waste of labor to learn the multitude of facts and dates compressed into its six hundred and eighty-four closely-printed pages. But any intelligent person who assumes (as in the absence of special knowledge he ought to do) that the facts stated by a careful writer who has had special means of studying his subject are in the main correctly stated, will find that a book which bears no traces of genius, and is certainly not a perfect manual, nevertheless can be so read as to convey to the student's mind certain general ideas which are well worth consideration, and are at any rate not deficient in interest. If any one wishes to test our advice, let him take the course we have ourselves taken. Let him gaze on the maps which form, perhaps, the best part of Mr. Wheeler's book. Let him note how from 1700 onwards the red which marks British dominion spreads on till it virtually covers the whole country. Then let him reflect on the astonishing fact of an eastern continent ruled by the inhabitants of a small western isle, put to himself definitely any one of the many enquiries which this phenomenon arouses, and consider how far Mr. Wheeler's sketch may supply an answer. The possible questions are infinite. None perhaps is better than the enquiry, What are the benefits or the evils which, on a general view of the whole matter, the sovereignty of England has caused to India?

Never was there a case to which the fable of the shield with two sides applied more obviously than to the Anglo-Indian Empire. Yet Mr. Wheeler's sketch at once suggests a notion that the good and the bad of British rule each flow from the same source. The one permanent, certain, indisputable effect of English government in the East has been the establishment of the rule of law. The great achievement and true monument of British power has been the enforcing throughout the length and breadth of the land of the pax Britannica. Under this head comes all the blessing, such as it is, and a good half (one may suspect) of the curses accruing to the natives from the might of the English crown. Readers of the Nation have had set before them in a very striking manner the vices of Anglo-Indian administration. Whether the opinions enforced by our correspondent are sound none but an expert in Eastern matters is competent to pronounce. What a student sees who tries to gaze at the long and rather monotonous panorama of Indian history as he might look at the record of the growth and fall of Rome, is, that critics who discern, justly enough it may be, the evils of the present, are apt to conceal, if not from themselves, yet from their hearers, the evils of the past. Generations accustomed to the unbroken order of modern civilization can hardly realize a condition of society which even in its order approached what would seem anarchy to a European or Anglo-American of the nineteenth century. This trait of Aurungzeb's justice is worth a thousand:

"A practice had grown up in preceding reigns of permitting Hindoos to acquire religious merit by ransoming condemned criminals. Some Banians had offered large sums for the release of certain professed stranglers known as Thugs. But the arrest of the Thugs had reached the ears of Aurungzeb: his orders were paramount. The Thugs were condemned to be hung in the jungle. The Banians accompanied them to the place of execution and gave them sweetmeats on the way. The wretches knew their fate, but walked along as gaily as if going to a wedding. They were hung up by the left hand, their legs were cut off, and they were left to bleed to death in lingering agony."

* 'A Short History of India and of the Frontier States of Afghanistan, Nipal, and Burma. By J. Talboys Wheeler, late Assistant Secretary to Government of India.' London and New York: Macmillan & Co.

This wild justice, which brings to view the existence of reckless lawlessness curbed by savage torture, was the work of the most powerful of eastern rulers at a date between the end of the Protectorate and the death of Queen Anne. It is vain to point to the parallels afforded by the savagery of the dark ages; for the undoubted fact is that under the Mogul empire India attained an amount of order far greater than she ever knew again until she came under the sovereignty of Englishmen. Of palace intrigues, treacheries, massacres, and cruelties it is, as Mr. Wheeler well points out, easy to make too much. The provinces of Rome suffered little from the cruelty of Tiberius or the insane vices of Nero. What tells far more of popular suffering than do any of the horrors of the palace is the one expression, the "Mahratta chout." A "right" to harry whole provinces for the collection of an exhorbitant tribute was the fundamental principle of Mahratta government. If we imagine what Scotland and England would have suffered if the Highlanders had, during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, levied blackmail up to the gates of London, had occasionally sacked the capital, and had constantly ravaged Sussex and Middlesex with fire and sword, we may form some notion of what a Mahratta raid really meant. Moreover, though it would be absurd to judge of the state of the country by the disorders of the palace, one must bear in mind that the very system of eastern succession almost entailed constant intrigue and, as its consequence, constant feebleness at the centre of government. Mr. Wheeler brings into marked relief the little realized fictions in which eastern government seems to be wrapped and by which it is weakened. No sooner is a strong and, therefore, for practical purposes, a good, ruler in power than, as though by some inevitable law, he gives birth to a series of rois fainéants. Somehow or other some mayor of the palace obscures the nominal monarch, and no sooner does the mayor turn into the avowed king than he in his turn becomes the shadow or the plaything of some official who governs whilst the titular master is compelled merely to reign—it may be in a prison. The causes of this constant divorce between the show and the substance of power certainly want an explanation, which Mr. Wheeler hardly affords. Its effect in paralyzing the administration can hardly be doubtful. India, when French and English began to make it their field of contest, reminds one of mediæval Europe deprived of even that limited kind of order resulting from the permanence of great dynasties and the vigor of great monarchs. The establishment of English supremacy was the substitution of an administration like that of Rome for anarchy worse than that of the middle ages.

So much for the bright side of the shield. The dark side may not be as visible to Englishmen, but it will certainly be clearly seen by future historians of England. It may, however, to a certain extent, be understood by any one who tries to keep his eye with impartial firmness fixed on obvious facts. The sudden creation of legal order is at the best not an unmixed benefit. If some external force could have coerced mediæval Europe into peace, it is as likely as not that the process which gave immediate rest would also have caused moral and intellectual death. The rule of England's peace means an arrest of native energy. Law itself, by a process which has attracted the attention of writers such as Sir Henry Maine, and which needs still further investigation, constantly becomes a source of oppression, by giving a rigid consistency to rights which, until defined by the courts, meant in practice something very different from what they were made to mean by judges. This is specially apt to be the case where foreign tribunals deal with a society of which they do not understand either the habits or the ideas. It is now pretty well established that centuries back English lawyers laid the foundation of half the miseries of Ireland by ignorance of a land system foreign to their own, and by applying to it inappropriate conceptions. That something like the same error has more than once been committed in India is, to say the least, highly probable. The rule of law is a blessing when it means the protection of the weak against the strong, but it may mean the arming of a tyrant against his victims. An Indian peasant can hardly be expected to bless courts which he finds give the rights of usurers a practical efficiency which they did not possess in the good old times of predominant custom tempered by lawlessness.

Civilized government further means expensive government. Large expenditure means heavy taxation. It may be true that the regular tax-gatherer is on the whole a less heavy burden to bear than the irregular Mahratta horseman, but the visits of the Government official are a present and constant oppression. The raids of the Mahrattas were always uncertain and are now forgotten. Moreover (though on this point one must speak with great hesitation), there would appear to be some signs that the order and unity enforced by British power are gradually producing something like that unity of sentiment which is termed national feeling, and must, if it come into existence, rouse a sentiment of new hostility to foreign rule. The Sepoy revolt was a military outbreak; but it is difficult to resist the conviction that it commanded Indian sympathy and all but turned into a popular insurrection. An imperial government of foreign races is, sooner or later, certain to be forced to the adoption of one of two courses: it may remain in a state of permanent conflict with the national spirit of its foreign subjects, and the very merits of its administration are likely to add strength to a spirit of opposition which if allowed head would be fatal to the existence of the empire. It may, again, incorporate subject nations so completely as to make them citizens of the empire and imbue them with imperial sentiment. To have achieved this feat is the glory of Rome. Whether England has the capacity for the like achievement is a problem of the future. A gaze over the past history of the English people does not inspire one with much hope that the problem will be happily solved. Meanwhile, the partial opening of careers to a limited number of the inhabitants of India is, unless the matter be managed with the utmost prudence, almost certain to be felt, and to be, a grievance to the greater number of England's Indian subjects. The qualities by which a native recommends himself to foreigners, especially to foreigners speaking another tongue, are intellectual suppleness and moral pliability. Characteristics of this kind are almost necessary for any one who is to adapt himself to habits, to a language, to ideas, which are not his by birth. But these characteristics are not those which in the main conciliate the love or respect of his own people. The Germans who served the first Napoleon were not, we may be sure, highly esteemed by the best men of the Fatherland. In like manner one may feel nearly sure that the Hindu who speaks English like an Englishman, and who slips like an eel through all the meshes of a competitive examination, is a thoroughly clever fellow, but is not the man born to be a ruler, with energy and character carrying weight with the different races of India, who see him with something like indignation raised to power. A Mohammedan filled with the traditions of Mohammedan supremacy will feel it no alleviation to subjection that he is governed not by an Englishman, who at any rate has the right derived from might, but by a Bengalee who, if the English armies were withdrawn, would be easily enslaved by some Mohammedan ruler.

That justice and wisdom may meet this difficulty and others is, one hopes, certain; but any intelligent reader of Mr. Wheeler's manual may at least learn that even the attempts to do justice to India may, without supposing any unnatural perversity on the part of the natives of the country, yet inflict real suffering, or, what is very much the same thing, the feeling of injury on the mass of the population. The rule of law should be the rule of justice; but even at its best the rule of law will not excite affection, and it will often appear to be the rule of unsympathizing force.

SCOONES'S FOUR CENTURIES OF ENGLISH LETTERS.*

NOTHING is easier than to quarrel with the editing of Mr. Scoones's book. He has omitted many letters which occur to one as almost indispensable to a work of the scope of this, and he has admitted others whose claims upon our attention seem difficult to discover. But the answer which Mr. Scoones might make to criticism of this sort, that no two persons, however familiar with the treasures of English correspondence, would agree upon the same selection, is a good one, and the most that we feel inclined to say in censure of his work is that he seems to have had no distinct standard in mind by which to measure the availability of different letters for his purpose. Still, we are by no means confident that the application of a standard of any strictness would not have resulted in the exclusion of a good many letters which we are glad to see here printed. Letters have all sorts of value—for the intimate view of the writer which they afford, for the matter which they chronicle, for the importance of the persons by whom they are written and to whom they are addressed, and lastly for the style in which they are written, or, in other words, the quality which makes them literature. There is scarcely one in Mr. Scoones's collection that has not one of these recommendations; many have all of them in some degree. And, in any case, the most conspicuous thing about the book is the happy thought which suggested the making of it, and in regard to which every one will now find it surprising that it occurred to no one before. Such omissions and intrusions as mar it are likely to be remedied in future volumes of the kind, of which we may guess this is but the precursor, or, indeed, in future revisions of this by Mr. Scoones himself.

The first letter given is from William Lorimer to John Paston, 1450, and the last from the late Prince Albert to the Crown Princess of Prussia, 1859; and the 339 between the two are divided into four sections by even centuries—1450 to 1600, 1600 to 1700, 1700 to 1800, and 1800 on—a classification which has nothing to recommend it but convenience, and the difficulty, which certainly might have been to a large extent overcome, of adopting the historical divisions of intellectual and literary development. The ideal arrangement would be, of course, the natural order into which the letters fall as letters; but as it is, the reader will have to make his own study of the progress of English letter-writing, for which he has here plenty of material. To our mind, the art is more accurately to be spoken of as a progress than as the decline which it is commonly taken to be. The error, if it be one, has probably arisen from the change in the letter-writer's environment, which has, of course, been very great in many other respects than those affected by cheap postage and the telegraph, and it has naturally been assumed that, under conditions so apparently unfavorable, the writing of letters with any view but that of conveying intelligence is rapidly becoming a lost art. Evidently, however, there is a law of compensation that operates in the matter, just as the delight in and study of landscape is greater now than ever, though, since the introduction of railroads, it is complained that "we do not travel, we arrive." The letters written in this century which Mr. Scoones prints contrast favorably not only with those written in the days of the Tudors, when, it must be confessed, the art had not been carried very far, but with those of the eighteenth century, when no effort was spared that could contribute to its technical perfection. The truth seems to be that as the distinctive charm of letters consists in the freedom with which the writer unbosoms himself (all others are shared with other departments of literature), there will be good letters as long as there are interesting people who write to each other. It is to be said further that we are apt to be unconsciously prejudiced in favor of the older letter-writers, because it is through their correspondence alone that we get this intimate view of them, whereas since the birth and popularity of the English essay the public works of writers perform this service very nearly as well. In the essay, as it has been known to English literature since the plan of the Spectator was so happily and successfully executed, the author is, as Taine says of Macaulay, "involuntarily indiscreet." Macaulay pleaded the fact to Jeffrey in extenuation of his looseness, by the way (p. 540); and, at least until very lately, it has been a marked characteristic of much English writing. No one, for example, needs a further revelation of Thackeray after reading a 'Roundabout Paper,' or of Lamb after making the acquaintance of 'Elia.' And graver essayists than the humorists have conceived literature in the same familiar fashion. On the other hand, a bundle of Shakspere's letters, one may say, would be worth having.

*'Four Centuries of English Letters: Selections from the Correspondence of One Hundred and Fifty Writers, from the Period of the Paston Letters to the Present Day. Edited and arranged by W. Baptiste Scoones.' New York: Harper & Brothers. 1880.

For this reason it is agreeable to find that Mr. Scoones has made the first half of his volume so large. Its contents do not display as high an excellence; before the Revolution there is scarcely a letter that will compare with those of almost any of the Queen Anne wits, perhaps not even one if we except Howel's, which are also too pedantic to be quite good. But they give one an idea of English character that cannot easily be obtained elsewhere with the same vivid impressiveness. The popular notion that a great inner change for the better accompanied the conquest of political liberty can but be modified to some extent by the earlier letters, which far more than the later ones, even leaving out those of the Restoration period, testify to the innate dignity and integrity of the national character. The sense of the seriousness and nobleness of the England of Elizabeth conveyed by them is as keen, it may almost be said, as the sense of the intellectal greatness of the epoch conveyed in its literature. In this respect Mr. Scoones's book will not fail of doing a service to such of its readers as are carried away by the contemporary stream; it suggests many reflections that occur too readily to need mention here. A letter from Sir Henry Sidney to his son Philip is an explicit illustration of this. Mr. Scoones very justly says it is "a happy contrast to the parental utterances of Lord Chesterfield," and, indeed, it has a canonical tone. Queen Elizabeth's epistles are characteristic, and their number reminds us that the non-literary writers are not neglected, which is, of course, an obvious advantage. There are three from James I., two to his "sweet boys," Charles and the Duke of Buckingham, and one to Prince Henry, written on the occasion of his accession to the English crown. In the last he admonishes his heir in a vein as un-Chesterfieldian as Sidney's:

"Let not this news make you proud or insolent, for a King's son and heir was ye before, and no more are ye yet. The augmentation that is here like to fall unto you, is but in cares and heavy burthens. Be therefore merry, but not insolent; keep a greatness, but sine fastu; be resolute, but not wilful."

A letter of condolence from Jeremy Taylor to Evelyn on the loss of the latter's children is conspicuous for its thoroughly English temper:

"Sir, if you do not look to it, time will snatch your honor from you, and reproach you for not effecting that by Christian philosophy which time will do alone. . . . Sir, by the assistance of Almighty God I purpose to wait on you some time next week, that I may be a witness of your Christian courage and bravery. . . . Sir, I shall pray for all that you can want—that is, some degrees of comfort and a present mind."

Such "condolence" must be called old-fashioned now, we fancy, seeing that books on the value of living at all have a sensational success which imply a different way of looking at consolations. There is not much difference—or, rather, there is a curious essential resemblance—between the tone of it and the postscript of Nelson's on page 369:

"You will have seen Monsieur La Touche's letter of how he chased me and how I ran. I keep it; and, by God, if I take him, he shall Eat it!"

Nelson was a little fierce, perhaps, and the flavor of the old-fashioned English character is sweet as well as spirited—Ralegh's letters are an instance in point. But its fine dignity was, perhaps, the main thing about it, and such a strain as this, we venture to think, is as rare in English correspondence as it is in English literature before 1750:

"I had been writing a tender tale of the sorrows of a friendless, poor negro-girl; and my eyes had scarce done smarting with it, when your letter of recommendation, in behalf of so many of her brethren and sisters, came to me;—but why her brethren?—or yours, Sancho—any more than mine?"

Sterne, however, knew how to write prose as nobody did before Dryden, at any rate, and the letters henceforward have naturally more or less of a literary as well as a personal charm. Nor do we say that the latter grows less as we get further away from Sidney and Herrick and Walton; only that the old-fashioned quaintness displays a character that is agreeable to renew acquaintance with often. Mr. Scoones gives us, of course, many specimens of the master letter-writers—Gray, Walpole, Cowper, Lamb, Byron, Sydney Smith—though the temptation to quarrel with his selection in some of the later instances gets to be considerable. As we come nearer our own time, too, we naturally hold to a stricter standard the explanatory and biographical notices with which he introduces a new writer. Nothing, for example, could well be a more depressing blemish in a work of this kind than such a remark as this about Byron's marriage: "That a union between the sea and a forest-pool, between the most fiery and the most chilly of mortals, could continue long or terminate happily, was scarcely to be expected; yet who could foresee the end would be so near, the agony so intense?" "The following seven letters," he justly says, "the first of which was written at the age of fourteen, are considered to be very characteristic of Lord Macaulay." They are indeed. Speaking of the Rev. F. W. Robertson, he affirms rather obscurely: "No man in our day has exercised greater self-denial in the pursuit of the high function of influencing men for good." In Shelley "we are enabled to see the union of the finest moral nature with poetic genius of exquisite sensibility." And so on. One of the merits of the book is that it gives room to few letters that contain reflections of the value of these.

The following confession of Coleridge's, addressed to Godwin, is well worth bearing in mind, though it seems cruel that it ever got into the pillory of print:

"An idea starts up in my head—away I follow through thick and thin, wood and marsh, brake and briar, with all the apparent interest of a man who was defending one of his old and long-established principles."

The reader of 'The Life of Sterling' will remark that this is the precise figure of which Carlyle makes such good use in his memorable picture of Coleridge in that work. In connection with it we must find room for some "Theses Quædam Theologicæ" which Lamb, whom Coleridge had told he should "be happy to instruct on all points upon which he needed information," drew up and sent to him with an ironical context:

"1st. Whether God loves a lying angel better than a true man?

2d. Whether the archangel Uriel could affirm an untruth, and, if he could, whether he would?

3d. Whether honesty be an angelic virtue, or not rather to be reckoned among those qualities which the schoolmen term 'Virtutes minus splendidæ?'

4th. Whether the higher order of Seraphim illuminati ever sneer?

5th. Whether pure intelligence can love?

6th. Whether the Seraphim ardentes do not manifest their virtues by the way of vision and theory; and whether practice be not a sub-celestial and merely human virtue?

7th. Whether the vision beatific be anything more or less than a perpetual presentment to each individual angel of his own present attainments and future capabilities, somehow in the manner of mortal looking-glasses, reflecting a perpetual complacency and self-satisfaction?

8th and last. Whether an immortal and amenable soul may not come to be condemned at last, and the man never suspect it beforehand?"

In printing the letters of Dr. Arnold and of Constable Mr. Scoones exhibits pleasantly the comprehensiveness of his design; a stricter editor would perhaps have rejected them, and in one sense they are as good as any given. There is an excellent letter from Dickens to T. J. Thompson (page 558), whimsically pretending a lover's devotion to the Queen, not, we believe, printed in the recent collection of Dickens's letters, and, if our memory serves us, altogether more amusing than any therein; though it has the drawback, in spots, of conscious whimsicality run mad, there is far less than usual of the disagreeable, though genial, personal disclosure that Dickens was apt to make when he attitudinized on note-paper. The two letters by Thackeray are doubtless as good as any that were at hand, but a little trouble to get better ones would have been repaid.

MORE SCOTTISH HERESY.*

THAT Scotland, hitherto regarded as ultra-conservative in theology, is passing through a religious revolution, is becoming ever more apparent. For three years one of its large Presbyterian churches has been agitated from centre to circumference with a case involving the foundation of Protestant theology itself. Nor has the wave of revolutionary ideas been confined to the Free Church and Professor Robertson Smith, of Aberdeen, in whose heresy case the last word has by no means yet been heard. The religious mind of the whole country is agitated, and the publication of 'Scotch Sermons, 1880,' affords another proof that religious thought in the Scotch churches is in a transition state. These sermons are the production of ministers of the Established Church of Scotland, some of them distinguished in the domains of philosophy and literature. The volume is edited by Professor Knight, of St. Andrews University, who some time ago seceded from the Free Church, and may be regarded as a manifesto by the Broad Church party, which has made for itself a home in the national church especially. The purpose of the publication, as stated in the preface, is to gather together specimens of a style of teaching which "increasingly prevails" among the clergy of the Church of Scotland, and "to show the direction in which thought is moving." The tone and scope of the collection are indicated when it is added that it is the work of those whose hope for the future lies in "a profounder apprehension of the essential ideas of Christianity, and especially in the growth within the church of such a method of presenting them as shall show that they are equally adapted to the needs of humanity, and in harmony with the results of critical and scientific research."

* 'Scotch Sermons, 1880.' London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880.

The hostile criticism of the present day may be regarded generally from two points of view. There is the great scientific movement of the time, with its fundamental principle of the absolute and universal reign of law, which admits the existence of no sphere for the action of the supernatural, and whose highest category of thought is that of evolution, by which all the phenomena of human life, as well as of the physical world, are to be explained. Religion is thus resolved into an evolution from the human mind itself, like the development of thought in science, art, or social politics; every element of the supernatural is eliminated from it. Closely connected with and growing out of this scientific movement, as a necessary consequence, there is also the new method of the higher criticism—the application to the Bible of the same historico-literary criticism as is applied to any other literature, sacred or profane, no claim to special revelation or infallibility being admissible. The attitude assumed towards these two tendencies of modern hostile criticism is a fair criterion of the condition of religious thought and feeling in any church. Judged by it, this volume affords abundant evidence that the rationalistic spirit has taken deep root in one at least—the largest and most cultured—of the Scotch churches. Indeed, considering its source, the boldness of its utterances is absolutely startling.

In a sermon on "The Continuity and Development of Religion" Professor Knight fearlessly regards the progress of physical science and the results of modern criticism. Every age, he holds, marks a transition from a lower to a higher order; but religion is no more in danger now than it was in the first century. "Its history is the history of progressive development, and of continuously unfolding life." Ecclesiastical and intellectual scaffoldings may be reared round about it and be destroyed again, but the religious "intuition" never dies. To the objection that religion is endangered when its origin is explained by the modern scientific idea of evolution, Professor Knight replies that the validity of any belief is independent of the process by which it may have arisen. He further affirms that if the human mind has grown at all, its religious ideas must have grown along with it. Adopting the purely scientific method, he takes a comprehensive view of religious phenomena as they appear in history, and the conclusion to which he comes is that the human race, not any particular favored people, "has lived in the light of a never-ceasing apocalypse, growing clearer through the ages, but never absent from the world since the first age began." Man is a religious being, possessed of a religious faculty or instinct as an ineradicable element of human nature, from which, as from a common root, all forms of religion have grown. The fetish-worshipper, as Professor Knight admits, is thus as real, if not as articulate, a prophet of religious ideas as the founder of maturer faiths; and the history of religion is the record of a progressive development, the final stage of which has not begun to be reached. Professor Knight concedes so much to the school of Herbert Spencer as to admit that an ultimate mystery surrounds the central dogma of religion, that of the existence of God. Knowledge of every kind must at last merge into the Unknown, and the "theistic" explanation of the universe is no exception to the rule. He contends, however, that it provides a working theory of life, and, although it leaves a score of puzzles unexplained, it yet lightens "the burden of the mystery" which still remains to elevate the worship it evokes.

In "Law and Miracle" the Rev. D. J. Ferguson seems afraid to commit himself definitely. Christianity being based not upon the outward but the inward, miracles to him have no evidential value; power to work a miracle is no evidence of the possession of spiritual truth. He does not, however, maintain that miracles are impossible; nor, though holding that the Gospels took their rise out of a mass of floating tradition distant in point of time from the events narrated, that they are unhistorical. He writes of them as belonging to the poetry of religion, and of nature in her calm uniformity bearing the stamp of a fixed, unswerving purpose; yet he adds that belief in miracles has still its place in Christian thought. Although not basing our faith in Christ upon our reception of his miracles, "we may base our reception of his miracles upon our faith in Christ."

In a sermon on "Authority," by the Rev. W. L. McFarlan, the whole question of the authority of the Bible is raised and discussed with a surprising freedom. The infallible authority which, since the Reformation, Protestant theologians have attached to the Bible, and which has been the fundamental principle of all their systems of theology, the writer of this sermon boldly questions, his purpose being to vindicate the claims of the individual reason to supreme authority over individual beliefs. Those who maintain the infallibility of the Bible and its superiority to reason, he contends, argue in a circle; the theory itself is ultimately dependent for its origin on the authority of individual scholars, or, what amounts to the same thing, the Councils of the Church. The only authority, therefore, which he claims for the Scriptures is that of their "inherent reasonableness." They are not true because authoritative; they are authoritative only because, and in so far as, they commend themselves as true to the intelligence and reason. With such a view of Scripture, of course, the whole system of dogmatic Protestantism falls to pieces. The writer sees this, and, carrying his premises without flinching to their logical conclusion, in another sermon declares that the dogmas of the old theological systems must now be abandoned as no longer tenable. "The whole of that latest development of theological scholasticism, the Dutch covenant theology, with its solemn bargainings between God and Adam, between God the Father and God the Son, must be regarded as a fashion as quaint and artificial as the Dutch landscape-gardening which along with it came into vogue in the British Islands"! From the wreck of the dogmatic systems, however, there rise up, according to this writer, the truths of Duty, God, and Immortality, as "the things which cannot be shaken."

"The Law of Moral Continuity" and "The Renovating Power of Christianity," both by Dr. Mackintosh, are a valuable contribution to the discussion of a subject upon which much maudlin sentiment has been expended. The first deals with the nature of human responsibility and the mode of divine judgment suggested by the words, "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap," and on the lines of thought pursued in Emerson's Essay on "Compensation." The nature of the eternal order of things is such that good action leads to greater good, and evil action to greater evil, the fruit to be reaped being the same in kind as that sown. Good or evil deeds grow into habits, which tend to develop the higher capacities of human nature or to wither up and destroy them. Divine judgment is neither "externally superadded" nor arbitrarily imposed: it is immanent in every action. The popular notion of a "Day of Judgment" on which man's final destinies will be fixed, is, on this view, a purely artificial and anthropomorphic conception. God's judgment on men's actions is only "another name for their natural and inevitable outcome and consequence." Dr. Mackintosh finds no place in his conception of Christianity for an objective atonement. The difficulty with him is not theoretical but practical. The problem of life he defines as deliverance from the sway of our lower, surrender to the control of our higher nature, and "the renovating power of Christianity" is felt as a moral stimulus to man's better nature, by its presentation of a new hope in the infinite possibilities of human nature, and revelation of the love and goodness and "benignantly transforming operation of that Eternal Order which is but another name for God." From this standpoint the writer can see the possibility of the final extinction of evil. Admitting the awful mystery that surrounds the problem, he has a well-grounded hope that "good will be the final goal of ill." For, he concludes, "if for long ages the order may seem to operate indifferently for evil or for good, yet its preponderating tendency in favor of what is good will issue in the transformation of what is evil."

We must not pass over two sermons by Principal Caird, of Glasgow University, which stand first in order as well as in importance in the volume, "Corporate Immortality" and "Union with God." In the former Dr. Caird attempts, by the idea of the organic unity of the race, to explain the standing contradiction between the infinite yearnings and possibilities and the pettiness of attainment of the individual life. The true grandeur of the individual life, he remarks, lies in the very impossibility of individual perfection; for it is taken up and incorporated in the universal and undying life of humanity "to which all the good and great of the past, every wise thinker, every true and tender heart, every fair and saintly spirit, have contributed, and which, never hasting, never resting, onward through the ages is advancing to its consummation." "Union with God" is the apotheosis of humanity. Perfect union with God, Principal Caird remarks, was seen in Jesus Christ, in whom human nature became divinely transformed. But what in him was actually realized exists as a latent possibility in every man. Becoming one with God, like Jesus Christ, men do not transcend, but only realize, their true nature, for human nature possesses divine elements.

Of the remaining sermons of the volume may be mentioned "Home-Spun Religion," by Dr. Cunningham, an earnest, practical discourse; "Individualism and the Church," by the Rev. Thomas Rain, in which the superiority of the former is vindicated; the Rev. John Stevenson's "Religion, Theology, and Ecclesiasticism," which are carefully distinguished from each other, their spheres being respectively spiritual, intellectual, and political; and "Christian Righteousness," which, according to Dr. Story, has nothing to do with the "dishonest" doctrine of "Imputation," but which "expresses in the earthly the principles and spirit of the heavenly or divine life."

It is impossible to forecast the issue of the controversy to which this volume of Scotch sermons must necessarily give rise. The church to which the contributors belong still recognizes the Westminster Confession as its creed, to which all its ministers are required to assent. In 'Scotch Sermons,' however, there is no pretence to orthodoxy. It shows a complete divergence from, in many instances a direct antagonism to, the Westminster Confession. Its standpoint, method, and results are altogether different from the standards of the Church. By its publication a direct challenge has been given to the Church, which must either recognize the new ideas or cast them out. In any case, a crisis has been precipitated. The authors of the sermons may succeed in liberalizing their church, or they may pull it down about their ears. 'Scotch Sermons, 1880,' at least marks a new era in the church history of Scotland.

L'Art. Tome xxi. (Paris: J. Rouam; New York: J. W. Bouton.)—The contrast manifest between the literary quality and the art quality of this foremost periodical of its kind reveals the abnormal position of all such publications. They are picture collections made into books by a more or less slender thread of literary interest, and choosing to present themselves as examples of typography. L'Art has never been very serious in its department of authorship; and its letter-press now exhales into what is as near nothingness as may be, with skittish articles on the young lady copyists at the Louvre, apparently written for Figaro and without a shade of right in a critical journal; with gossamer pages in which the theatres are rallied; and with topheavy efforts to elevate Victor Hugo into a painter. Papers of this degree of value are used as cement for a series of magnificent etchings, in the highest degree attractive to picture-buyers, but which it is proposed to force into the purview of book-buyers. Accordingly there are found, sandwiched into a drossy literary farrago, plates so strong, so novel, so indicative of experimental heights and depths in the art, that the beholder whose attention they catch is lost, and becomes a subscriber. By this means, every three months, a quantity of flashy and airy writing, desperately amalgamated with first-class plates, enters the book-collector's house along with the ponderous and patient literary quarterlies. Why there should be an art quarterly, and what class it is for, is not at first apparent to the experts in fine-arts, but the advantage of book-buyers' money is very apparent to the print-publisher. The literary quarterlies enter libraries as by right, and in attaining a position on the bookshelf there is no intellectual barrier to cross for their reports of the state of passing criticism. But there is a bold bravura and a strategy which cannot but extort admiration in presenting the reports of art in the form of etching-portfolios weakly disguised as books, with such an air of good faith that they can steal from the army of collectors to the army of readers, desert from the experts to the bibliophilists, and revolt from the gallery to get upon the shelf.

Once the joke appreciated of its appearing among the quarterlies at all, L'Art is seen to be possessed of such artistic cunning as to account for the converts it makes among those who only dream of buying books. There is one etching in the present volume justifying any lover of the pure impressional style. The flesh-treatment of Henner, the painter represented, is not exactly sincere, though novel and conspicuous, aiming rather at gleam than penetrability, being lucid rather than translucent, and having little more sense of blood than a curd; the etching by Courtry from his "Fountain" restores to the artist the quality he loses, and has circulating everywhere beneath its surface a tissue of flooding veins; it possesses carnation in addition to the silvery quality which Henner seeks. It carries the interpretation of pure flesh almost into the sacred region of apocalyptic revelation. The texture, as it seems to vibrate and shrink and swell upon the eye, leaves the exact place upon the page of the fluctuating form continually indeterminate. This aqua-fortis, as of a Rembrandt interpreting a Giorgione, strikes by its triumphant attainment of what is aimed at, in defiance of all rules pronounced by pedants about constructive drawing: a hand and foot without divisions, a neck with a goître, an arm with a broken humerus, are set into a composition of fairy-land opulence and penetrating charm. There are others justifying other loves and foibles. Léopold Flameng introduces a marquise in powder and pearls, from a Drouais in the San Donato collection, breathing the modish gallantry of the old pastel; in this etching the fleece of a lapdog is very sufficiently indicated by a space of pure white paper, surrounding a certain arrangement of flesh-tints and draperies. Unger's Protean style, this time applied to a stout old piece of animal-painting by Snyders, gives solidity to another page. "Lucretia," a rich bit of color from Rembrandt; "The Juggler," a saccharine delicacy of Watteau's; "The Meuse," a vaporous Ruisdael; and a "Forest Scene," a velvety Hobbima, are so many examples of the versatility and pliability of etching. "L'Aveugle et Guzman d'Alfarache" is a plate in aqua-fortis, showing the profound resonance and iron positiveness attainable by the needle, when in the hand of such an expert as Masson; it illustrates a painting by Ribot, a positivist of practical force, whose "Sebastian" braces the eye among the sweet inanities of the Luxembourg; the proprietors of L'Art recently arranged an exhibition of the works of Ribot—an indigent laborer who taught himself painting by candlelight in a garret—and the drawings reproduced in these pages do some justice to a man of deep artistic conscience and a painter made up of very stern stuff. In his sketches the language of the hands alone, as evinced in a dozen little dramas singularly fresh and eloquent, gives a new vision of the possible expressiveness of gesture. There are seven etched plates, besides fifty designs in the text, devoted to the Salon of the present year, and going to show that it was not all vanity. Of these the "Makers of Pearl-Beads at Venice," by Ramus after Van Haanen, showing a pretty docile imitation of Velasquez's "Spinners"; "Retrieving," a workmanlike hunting-piece after Philippe Rousseau, by Gaucherel; and "Isle-les-Villenoy," a scrubby landscape with artful catching of lights on the receding planes of distance, by Yon, are the most meritorious where all are good.

M. Burty's article on this Salon is what is called chaff, in two senses: it avoids giving us solid meat of criticism, and it finds irresistible dramatic subject in pointing out the pranks of an inexperienced republican administration. How Deputy Mitchell consented to flutter a handful of clamorous artists' letters in the face of the Chamber, and how Under-Secretary of State Turquet blundered in answering him; how Vollon, Bouguereau, and Van Marcke resigned from the jury, and M. Ferrier cut out his "Salammbô" from the frame and carried it to Goupil's; how the "sympathetic grouping" filled one chamber with Marats and another with Cordays, and had like to have caused the equestrian warriors to straddle in one room and their horses to gallop in a second; how the "grouping by nationalities" offended the colonists, causing Munkácsy to retire altogether; and how, in short, a democratic Ministry of Art had made ducks and drakes of the Salon, and been at once insulting to and insulted by the academicians—all this is too exquisite a comedy to escape M. Burty's keen eye, but he might remember that L'Art sends him to a gallery not as a farce-writer but as a judge, and that the public look for an estimate of what is permanent about a Salon, not what is ephemeral. In this notice, it is to be observed, as elsewhere among the contributions, there is occasional attention to American items: the reward by honorable mention of Messrs. Picknell and St. Gaudens is chronicled, as was last year that of Mr. Sargent. Of Miss Cassatt, a contributor to the exhibition of impressionists, it is editorially remarked that, in her picture of a "Tea-Drinking," "the young girl viewed in profile in front is well modelled in full light, without trick or foil." Mrs. Anna Lea Merritt, wife of the picture-cleaner of that name who recently died in London, receives credit for her goodness and assiduity; but it is hardly correct to mention as "the wife whose intelligence he had formed" a lady who, at the time of her marriage, had social position, wealth, and artistic mastery already acquired, and whose relations to her husband were certainly not those of the protected. The conspicuous American débutant of the year, Mr. Picknell, is thus alluded to by M. Burty: "Of the various Americans we have mentioned, Mr. Sargent and Mr. Picknell are the most highly gifted, and have shown proofs of individual acquirement." This is friendly support, but hardly so enthusiastic as that of Marquis de Chennevières, ex-Director of Fine Arts, who in his last article for the Gazette observes:

"An American, Mr. Picknell, has here a certain 'Concarneau Road,' all white with dust between green banks, which by its illusion attracts you violently; this painting proceeds from the enameller's furnace, perhaps, but it has got out of its pumice-stonings and glazings a certain deceptive effect and a tone-force to which we have not been accustomed since Decamps."

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1880.

The Week.

IT is impossible, of course, for anybody to speak with confidence of the present condition of the canvass. Those who know most are least likely to speak their real mind about it. But it is safe to say that the Republicans have recovered somewhat from the depression caused by the Maine election, and their gains in the town elections in Connecticut would seem to show that their condition is better than it seemed a fortnight ago. The prophecies on both sides with regard to the Ohio and Indiana elections are about equally extravagant. The Republican plan of "scaring the business men" seems hardly successful, as the fears of business men show themselves unerringly in the stock market, which gives no sign whatever of depression or foreboding; and, in fact, the accounts from all branches of business indicate that the country is, for all political purposes, insensible to fear. The chances are that we are on the eve of another great speculative fever—there are manifest signs of it already in England—and that the political uncertainty simply prevents its running its course with greater rapidity. The election over, particularly if there is no danger of a disputed count, we shall probably see the "business man" escaping from the political committees to indulge in the wildest excesses of confidence in the future of his country, whether under Hancock or Garfield.

Mr. Evarts has made his speech in this city last week. He castigated the Democrats at considerable length and with great elaboration; eulogized Mr. Hayes and General Garfield; compared Abraham Lincoln to Servius Tullius and General Hancock to Tarquinius Superbus; twitted Mr. English on being a rich banker, and insinuated that he displayed his interest in the toiling millions much in the same fashion as a certain lawyer in the son of his old friend, by charging him $35 for recovering a debt of $50; "pointed with pride" to what the Republican party has done for the prosperity of the country; pointed out, apropos of Hancock's letters, that letters are all very well, but they are not "transactions"; compared the record of the two parties; commented on and illustrated with figures the extent to which the right of suffrage is denied at the South; made fun of the relations between the South and the Northern Democrats, and also of the piety of the Democrats; worked in a eulogy of General Arthur very dextrously and successfully, considering what a delicate task it must have been, by calling him "our townsman and friend," and by declaring that he never sought an honor, "but took such as came to him," and that "in the lead of great administrations of public affairs he has been trusted and honored." The duty which the members of this Administration seem to feel called on to perform towards General Arthur is so difficult that any of them engaged in it is entitled to our deepest sympathy, particularly as they have failed thus far to placate Mr. Conkling, who treats their efforts with undisguised contempt.

Senator Bayard's New York speech has apparently had an effect which illustrates the difficulty Democratic orators find in treating financial questions acceptably to the various factions of their party. It is considered to have been very inopportune in Indiana, we infer from the fact that Weaver, who is giving unremitting attention to next week's election in that State, has made it a Greenback campaign document, and sown it broadcast to show his followers the folly of fusion with Democrats. Some of them are not inclined to pay much attention to it and express great confidence in the "record" of Landers, the Democratic candidate for Governor. Others go so far as to accuse Weaver of being in league with the Republicans, and one Dyer D. Lum, the Assistant Secretary of the Greenback National Committee, has written a letter in which he "discloses" that the Greenback canvass is "manipulated in the interest of the Republican party, and General Weaver's expenses borne, in a large measure, from the Republican campaign fund." He mentions Senator Jones, of Nevada, as an important individual contributor, and refers to various consultations between his own and members of the Republican National Committee in support of his charge. Transactions of this kind, of course, are conducted with a great deal of delicacy, and in the absence of more proof than he has yet given it seems to be as open to the Republicans to maintain that Lum has been bought as to the Democrats to contend that Weaver has been. In any case Weaver and his alleged allies have the better of their opponents, since it is a necessary premise for the position of the latter that straight voting on the part of the Greenbackers will be worse for them than for the Republicans. In the light of Mr. Bayard's speech this must be taken to be ridiculous.

Mr. Schurz has delivered another campaign speech, this time in German to the Germans of Cleveland, Ohio, which was marked by his usual excellence of method. He did not seek to disguise the shortcomings either of the Republican party or of the present Administration, but maintained that both had somehow brought about the three essentials of good government, viz., "intelligent, economical, and business-like administration; a financial policy based on sound principles, and clear and steady in its aims; and internal and external peace, and a friendly understanding between different sections of the country and elements of society"; and if this were true, asked why there should be any change. The only criticism to be made on this is that the Administration, which has had many and great virtues, is not supported or admired by the men who manage the party machinery. On the contrary, they lose no opportunity of deriding and belittling it, and consequently prevent the party from getting credit in the voters' eyes for whatever good there is in the Administration, and lead many Republicans to make up their minds that no party which does not think such an administration a good one is fit to be entrusted with power. This constitutes the great difficulty of any orator who undertakes to speak for both the party and the Administration. Apropos of the German Republicans, we notice that the German Independent Republicans in this city, in giving in their adhesion to the Garfield ticket the other day, considerably enlarged the "rebel claims" argument, and set down the amount of these claims at "thousands of millions of dollars," making them include the Confederate debt. This shows that the excitement is growing. Some wag is also helping the cause by advertising for Confederate bonds, thus enabling the Republicans to say: "Here is a Democrat who wants to buy Confederate bonds, and of course he would not buy them if he did not expect them to be paid in case Hancock is elected." There seems to be a passion among the Democrats for giving away public money. Would they not probably, if they came into power, sell the United States cheap to France?

The Times has inflicted a bad "beat" on its Republican contemporaries by getting in advance of them the report of a conversation between General Grant and a Methodist minister, in which the ex-President furnishes a frank explanation of General Hancock's character and career and of the famous "General Order No. 40." It appears, according to General Grant, that after getting one vote at the Democratic Convention of 1864 General Hancock was a changed man. The Presidential bee had got into his bonnet and completely bewildered him both as to his rights and duties. A band of robbers in Louisiana, composed of the then Governor and three Commissioners, had entered into a conspiracy to plunder the State by selling or raising money on its bonds below the limits fixed by the act under which they were issued. General Sheridan, finding this out, removed these guilty officials from office; and Grant, as Commander-in-chief, sustained Sheridan, against the entreaties of President Johnson. But Johnson then superseded Sheridan by Hancock, and Hancock, in spite of a forcible remonstrance from General Grant, removed Sheridan's governor and commissioners, and was going, General Grant gives us to understand, to restore the old set when he stopped him, and Hancock thereupon asked to be relieved on the ground that if he was interfered with he could do no good. This, regarding its source, is the best campaign story that has yet appeared, but its effect is much weakened by a little addendum in which General Grant gives his reasons for recently desiring the Republican nomination. These were three in number: first, "the character of the men who urged it" (Conkling, Logan, and Cameron); second, the belief that he could have broken up the Solid South; and third, the belief that he could have brought about certain legislation with regard to consulates which would have "given us control of much desirable commerce, for instance, in Mexico, instead of dealing with people who only use slave labor," etc. There is something almost pathetic in the simplicity of this, especially in the notion that consuls in some manner fix the channels of trade, and can take it away from slaveholders who will only take "sterling in exchange for their goods," but it is not judicious to stick it on as a rider to a campaign story. Must not even General Grant's warmest admirers be a little shocked by his descending to the work of a campaign story-teller for the detriment of a candidate whose competitor he sought to be? Is this fit business for a man before whom a whole continent, according to Conkling, "rose up," and on whom monarchs gazed with envy and admiration.

General Grant has subsequently made numerous corrections in his "story," but admitted its substantial correctness. Most of them, considering that they are corrections in a campaign story, are not worth reproducing. He modified his statement about the men who were urging his nomination at Chicago—that he desired the nomination out of respect to them—by saying that what he meant was that it was only out of regard for them that he did not withdraw his name. He closes, in the second version, with the following tribute to his friend, Mr. Conkling: "I regard him as the greatest mind in public life or that has been in public life since the beginning of the Government. He has the advantage of having been trained from his infancy. He had a father of unusual ability, who early taught him to reason and corrected his errors. He has grown to great proportions." It ought to be said in excuse for this that General Grant owed Mr. Conkling this eulogy on current account; but the affair is, from any point of view, a painful episode in the canvass.

The other stories are, perhaps, on the whole better. One is that General Garfield is going to retire from the contest, and that the late visit of Messrs. Grant, Conkling, and Logan to his home at Mentor was made for the purpose of arranging the details of this touching act of self-sacrifice. Another is that Mr. English is going to retire in case Indiana is carried by the Republicans. The activity of the British Free-Traders in spreading their diabolical literature in the rural districts is something atrocious. Two men, evidently Englishmen, were heard by a correspondent of the Tribune recently conversing about the tariff in a restaurant. One remarked, "If we don't succeed in getting the tariff removed we shall have to retaliate and put a duty on the cheese and butter that America is shipping to us." The correspondent, listening further, discovered that they were "ostensibly agents of English houses." Men of this class ought to be closely watched by the Republican Committee. The threat to clap duties on American cheese and butter could only emanate from desperate adventurers, and their bold utterance of it in a restaurant shows what we may expect from this class in case Hancock is elected.

Mr. Conkling seldom resorts to an historical allusion or parallel without getting things wrong, history, whether ancient, modern, recent, or contemporary, not being in his line. Thus, in his recent comparison of the treatment of the South by the North to that of France by the victorious Germans he says that Germany took from France "a heavy tribute besides the rich provinces of Alsace and Lorraine"; but when "we conquered the South not one farthing of tribute was raised," etc. Now, this does not look as if Mr. Conkling's estimable father had taught him to reason in his childhood with the care reported by General Grant. When we conquered the South we inflicted an enormous pecuniary penalty, probably much surpassing the German indemnity, consisting of the enforced repudiation of the Confederate debt and State debts incurred in aid of the Rebellion; of the destruction of the Confederate currency, which had some value, though not much, and, finally, of the enforced participation in the burden of the United States debt incurred in making the conquest. We do not think all this has the slightest bearing on any of the problems now before us, but we maintain that the first step in real pacification and reconciliation must be a total cessation, or at least a considerable diminution, of the lying and falsification on both sides about the war and its consequences, and in this, as in other good things, the victors are bound to set the example.

Foreign gold continues to flow to New York at the rate of about $3,500,000 to $4,000,000 per week, the receipts since the first week in August having been over $28,000,000. What is remarkable about recent arrivals is that they have occurred when the domestic movement of the principal exportable commodities (cotton and breadstuffs) has been comparatively small. A great deal of foreign exchange has been and is making against the shipment to Europe of railroad bonds and stocks. During the week the rates for sterling exchange were again reduced, and the prospect of large gold imports, so far as the commercial situation is concerned, is better than it was at the beginning of August. The week at the Stock Exchange was one of advancing prices and buoyancy. This condition of affairs was made possible at a time when the public are buying few securities by the fact that speculators had "oversold" the leading stocks to an extent which created a large demand for them when they were frightened into buying them back, as they were during the week by the continued heavy imports of gold and the attendant easy money market, by the keeping up of the receipts of the railroads, and by the disappearance of what may be called the political scare. The October interest on the public debt, amounting to something more than $7,000,000, is coming out. The debt, according to the statement issued on the 1st inst., shows a reduction during September of close on to $9,000,000, which makes the reduction since the beginning of the fiscal year, June 30 last, $26,578,112. The Bureau of Statistics at Washington have issued a statement showing that the debt has been reduced since 1865 nearly $900,000,000—to show, of course, how well the public finances have been managed under Republican rule. It shows also the excessive taxation which has been imposed on a country where everything is abundant except capital, and where money is worth, to use in business, probably an average of ten per cent. per annum.

The Pan-Presbyterian Council, whose sessions closed last week at Philadelphia, was perhaps noteworthy for the frankness of its discussions upon matters of faith, and for the indisposition it showed to do anything beyond discussing them. It is reported to have listened with much contentment and frequent manifestations of individual approval to an ultra-Calvinist exposition and enforcement of the doctrine of eternal punishment; but this was wholly unofficial, and, on the other hand, witness was borne to the existence of the so-called "liberal tendencies" which we noticed last week in a review of that very significant work, 'Scotch Sermons. 1880.' Dr. Robert Flint, professor of theology in the University of Edinburgh, was especially desirous that the church should "be on the alert to keep up with the times" and make "progress in faith." The obvious difficulty in the way of this latter, considering the strict conservatism usually insisted upon in interpreting "the faith once delivered," he did not explain except by alluding to "God's fresh disclosures of himself." But in the debate which followed his paper, and in the course of which he was vigorously attacked for preferring to "confront the irreverence of agnosticism with piety," instead of combating it with "the mere exercise of discipline," he was ingeniously defended on the ground that to assume the Westminster Confession to be final and unalterable was to give it the same sanction as the Bible, and was therefore "idolatrous." As to heresy, the ground generally taken was that a preacher who could no longer hold to the express tenets of the church should leave its communion, though there was enough intimation of "private misgivings" to warrant the inference that there is an increasing number, even in the Presbyterian ministry, who value the evident advantages of harmonious and organized action in their main business of teaching their followers how to live, above a perfect concord in details of creeds.

This view is taken with courageous explicitness by the English colonists who, under the leadership of Tom Hughes, are about to institute a community in Tennessee called Rugby. It was formally dedicated Tuesday, and after various religious services Mr. Hughes made an address of some length in which he explained the objects and scope of the community and announced the colonists' intention of trying the experiment "Whether the members of different Christian denominations cannot agree well enough to use one building for their several acts of worship." There is to be no attempt to interfere with individual freedom on the one hand, and, on the other, the importance to a community of some sort of public recognition of religion is to be acknowledged. It is to be observed that perhaps nowhere else would precisely such a scheme have been as likely to originate as in the Anglican communion, which is more reproached than any other denomination for its variety of views and the looseness with which they are held, at least by the Broad-Church party. As to the social and industrial arrangements, Mr. Hughes remarked that in these they should also endeavor to illustrate the implication of the word "community," and that, though they should all be living in their own houses, they should so far try to have things in common as to modify, if possible, the operations of the law of the survival of the fittest, and in some degree at any rate live for instead of on each other. Practical and material details to this end are, so far as they go, simple and familiar enough both in this country and in England, as Mr. Hughes said. He also took occasion to contradict the impression which has got abroad that the settlement is intended to be an English colony in any exclusive sense; on the contrary, it is open to all who subscribe to the conditions already agreed upon.

The situation in the Levant has not changed. The Sultan has applied to the Emperor of Germany to mediate, but the Emperor has refused, because he is himself a party. The Ulemas are urging the Sultan not to yield to the infidels, and on some days he seems determined to resist to the last extremity, but on others he asks for time for further consideration. He got a postponement until Monday or Tuesday in this way last week, and Prince Nikitka, of Montenegro, is now said to have informed Admiral Seymour that the near approach of bad weather makes prompt action imperative. The delay in the meantime is giving a chance to the Philo-Turks to raise their voices in various places. In Hungary they are so strong as to have extracted from M. Tisza, the Premier, a declaration that the coercion of Turkey will probably not be attempted. In London there is talk of indignation meetings; but the Jingoes are now afraid or ashamed of appearing as friends of the Turks, so it is on behalf of the Albanians that they propose to be indignant. As far as one can judge from the language of the Liberal papers and from the apparent necessities of Mr. Gladstone's position, there seems no doubt that he will, even if left alone by the other Powers, push Turkey to the wall. An impotent demonstration would not simply ruin his whole foreign policy, but bring the fleet, on which England has mainly to rely for weight on the Continent, into contempt; so that he will probably go to Constantinople sooner than resign himself to being foiled at Dulcigno. In any case, he is sure of Russia's standing by him to the last.

The Porte has sent the Powers a fresh note, which, like all the former ones, is dilatory and evasive. It proposes a new Greek frontier line, much further south, and leaving Janina to Turkey; promises to make the "reforms" in Asia Minor in three months and the reforms in Europe as soon as convenient, and invites the foreign bondholders to send delegates to Constantinople to make an arrangement for receiving certain branches of the revenue in pledge for the payment of their interest. All these things, however, on condition that the naval demonstration be abandoned, or, in other words, on condition that the Powers go home and let the Sultan alone for the winter. In the meantime he is reinforcing Riza Pasha at Dulcigno, and a Turkish frigate has been busy landing arms and provisions on the coast. The opinion of the London press seems to be that the note will be treated as simply an excuse for delay. The Russian Noyve Vremya is the authority for the statement that England, as a preliminary to further action, has asked Russia, probably as the only Power likely to go on with her, what her ulterior designs in the East are. It seems unlikely, however, that this information should not have been asked for before now.

The Jingo party in England have been for a good while sufficiently sickened with the Afghan war to give up completely their old programme of a subservient Amir at Kabul, with a British resident to watch him. Even General Roberts, who shared the Beaconsfield fever, expressed his gladness at a dinner recently given him at Kabul that no political officers were to remain behind after the army had left. But they have still clung to the hope that the new Government would at least hold on to Kandahar, for the sake of the prestige and the trade which was to spring up about it. The Cabinet has, however, resolutely decided to quit Kandahar also. Recent events have shown that there is no more security for a foreign force there than elsewhere; that Sir Henry Rawlinson's theory about the superior peaceableness of Eastern Afghanistan is no better than his other theories about Western Afghanistan; that the presence of a British garrison there would be a constant provocative to violence, and that its safety would at any time be imperilled by a rising or mutiny at Beluchistan; and that, in fact, the whole Afghan business is from first to last a crazy adventure, for which nobody but the author of 'Vivian Grey' can afford to take any responsibility. A final touch to the performance is given by the news that ever since General Roberts's defeat of Ayub Khan the mollahs have been preaching another holy war, on the ground that the defeat was due to the misconduct of the regulars, and would not happen again.

The latest step in civil-service reform in England has had some curious features about it. It seems that the female clerkships in the Post-office Department have been reserved hitherto for "ladies of good position"—that is, for the daughters of army officers, professional men, clergymen, and of younger sons of county families—whom circumstances have compelled to earn their bread. Mr. Fawcett has brought this régime to an end by throwing these clerkships open to the competition of all women who can bring certificates of proficiency from any female college, or from the University local examiners. The change has raised a great outcry among the Tories, some of whom are disposed to look on it as another assault of the Radicals on the Constitution, and it has also called out some very odd writing on that side in the newspapers in defence of the theory that well-born women, when forced to earn their living, ought to be shielded in some manner from having to struggle against the kind of women who act as shop-girls and do commercial work. Much of this writing would thirty or forty years ago in England have been accepted as a statement of mere truisms; now it excites great ridicule.

In Ireland nothing more important has occurred than the meeting of the Annual Trades' Union Congress, composed of workingmen from all parts of the country. The Irish Land Question was fully debated, and the effect of the present system on the wages of labor in England, by filling the English towns with dispossessed Irish tenants, was presented in strong terms. Mr. James Redpath continues to be the leading agitator, the flames of his rhetoric making that of Mr. Parnell seem feeble and inadequate. Mr. Froude's plan for the pacification of Ireland does not seem to find much favor with Liberals. The Pall Mall Gazette says the device of repressing crime by abolishing trial by jury is one "on which the crudest politician in a pot-house could have hit," and the writer cruelly points out to the historian that even if you abolish trial by jury in Ireland you cannot go as far as Jeffries and Scroggs and convict without evidence, and the great difficulty in the way of punishing crime in Ireland is that you cannot get evidence. The Carlylean cure for trouble, that you must find a strong man and set up him to rule over you, which is what Mr. Froude is constantly preaching under a cloud of phrases, in fact never in our day seems to suit the situation. It is like French recipes to the Anglo-Saxon "plain cook," who could always make the dish if she had the materials or knew where to procure them.

The French Ministry have apparently done a very foolish thing in refusing Rochefort, Pyat, Blanqui, and other Reds the permission to hold a meeting and perorate about the Eastern Question. Their excuse is, that as the meeting was to be held to protest against war, and requires the Government license, if it were held it would be thought that the Government believed or admitted that peace was in some danger. This has a very Bonapartist sound about it, and is, in fact, the old justification for interference with the press—namely, that as the papers were published by Government permission, the Government would be held responsible for their utterances. The indifference the Ministry has shown to Rochefort's paper, and the ruin which this indifference has brought on the paper, are illustrations of the expediency of letting the Reds talk to their hearts' content.

THE DEMOCRATS AND STATE RIGHTS.

WE print elsewhere a letter finding fault with the small amount of attention paid by Republicans of an independent turn to the State-rights doctrines of the Democratic party, as produced in its platforms for many years back. The writer thinks these doctrines constitute one of the most formidable objections to the return of this party to power, while conceding that there is no danger of their leading to a renewed attempt at secession. We think, on the other hand, that they constitute one of the very least of the objections to the return of the Democrats to power, and this for reasons which it is not difficult to produce. We think, moreover, that the Republican love of parading them, and making much of them, is very useful to the Democrats, by helping to divert public attention from matters on which Democratic theory and practice are both likely to be really dangerous to the Government. What made the theory of State rights which was held and preached by the Southern wing of the Democratic party before the war really pernicious was the right of secession, and the à fortiori right of nullifying Federal legislation which it involved. If this danger, as our correspondent acknowledges, no longer exists, all that remains of the State-rights doctrine is what has been called from the earliest times a strict construction of the Constitution as a list of granted powers. The love of strict construction was a natural outcome both of the Rousseau-Jefferson theory of human nature and of the mode in which the Federal Constitution was framed. What with the belief that man needed as little government as possible, and the belief that the States only parted with enough of their sovereignty to secure them from foreign aggression and make their mutual intercourse easy, and that the new Government was something created by the States out of nothing, the dislike of having this new Government take anything on itself but what was plainly set down in the organic law to which it owed its existence, was natural enough in the old thirteen States. But it is as well known as anything of the kind can be known that this tradition of the early time has never taken root in the States formed since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. They, instead of regarding themselves as the creator of the Union, are forced by the facts of their history to look on themselves as its creatures. They owe it all they have and all they are. There is nothing historical about the State-rights doctrine in these new communities. It is in them simple strict construction, or a very mild form of fondness for and belief in local self-government, such as is found in every country in the world, and puts no Government in peril, and is, in fact, in most countries a useful, if not necessary, safeguard against over-centralization. The activity of the holders of both the strict and loose view of the province of all government is necessary to make any constitutional system work successfully. They form the breeching and the traces of the constitutional harness.

But our correspondent also overlooks the important fact of our recent history, that the view taken by either of the two great parties touching the powers of the general Government depends very much on whether the party itself is in office or opposition. There is nothing very surprising about this; it is what all our experience of human nature would lead us to expect. When the Democrats were last in power —that is, during the terms of Presidents Pierce and Buchanan—they asserted as strongly the power of the Federal Government as the Republicans now do. They tried to make the local State institution of slavery national in every sense of the term; they dispersed legislatures with Federal troops; they treated all assertions of State rights, as against the Fugitive Slave Law, for instance, as treasonable; and if they had remained in power they would undoubtedly have made the Federal yoke heavier every year. They were not in the least dominated or troubled by the Kentucky and Virginia Resolutions of 1798.

On the other hand, the Republican party began its career in 1856 as a State-rights party. Its platform of that year contained as strong an assertion of the State-rights doctrine as any which the Democrats have recently put forward. When it came into power in 1860 the circumstances called for an equally strong assertion of the national or loose-construction theory, and this was accordingly made and has been put in practice until now. Should the Democrats come into power next year—that is, have possession of all three branches of the Government —there can be no reasonable doubt that we shall witness a rapid change of position on their part also. They will claim the largest possible field for the use of their newly-acquired machine; they will take up one by one the devices created or resorted to by the Republicans for strengthening their position against which they have been of late protesting so vigorously, and will probably invent new ones. The notion that they will seek to diminish the authority they will then wield and exalt the sphere of State independence is one to which not only the history of parties in this country, but the history of parties everywhere and all experience of human nature are opposed. Possessors of power, whether monarch, parliament, or party, have everywhere and always sought to magnify their office and extend their jurisdiction. The history of constitutional freedom is, in fact, not the history of a diminution of the powers of government, but of their seizure by a different body—that is, of their transfer from the king to the parliament. The fear that the Democrats will display a magnificent and unprecedented example of self-abnegation in Washington is, in short, a chimera. It would be a chimera even if all the forces of our time, material as well as moral, were not fighting for greater centralization. The rapidly-increasing needs of modern society in every field are forcing on governments more duties than they can perform.

What is to be feared from the Democrats is something to which the Republicans unhappily give comparatively little attention, and for which they have made but little preparation, and that is bad administration. The Democratic party has no distinct policy which it seeks to embody in legislation, and it is bound both by its composition and traditions to satisfy in any way that comes to hand the prejudices and passions of the most ignorant and unreflecting portion of the community. It will seek to do this not by stripping itself, when in office, of any authority which it can exercise without dispute, but by reckless legislation within the sphere of its authority, and by indifference to the public interests in the use of its patronage. The feeling which will dominate the party in office, and against which General Hancock, if he is the kind of man his admirers would have us believe him to be, will have to fight, is that the Federal Government is a mass of good things of which the Republicans have for twenty years had the exclusive enjoyment, and at which it is but fair that the Democrats should now have a chance. The great political problem of our time is no longer the distribution of the sovereignty. That is all settled, and will probably remain settled for ages. What is now needed is improvement in administration—that is, improvement in taxation, in the administration of justice; in the distribution of the results of production, in so far as it is affected by law; in the means of communication by land and sea; in the education of children; in the protection of the poor, the insane, and the criminal; in the promotion of thrift among the improvident. This can only be effected by cautious legislation, based on much enquiry and framed with much forethought and comparison, and by very careful and conscientious management of that great instrument of government called the civil service, in which we include every kind of officer whose duty it is to execute the law. The Republican party has since the war done but little to foster popular interest in these things. The Democrats, unless we greatly wrong them, will do nothing at all. They will, on the contrary, spread and intensify the too-prevalent notion that "politics" is not the art of making the world a pleasanter place for men and women to live and die in, but the art of so distributing offices as to satisfy "claims" and stimulate electioneering activity. We see no sign among them of anything better. The few men in the party to whom government means something higher than numerous elections, count for little when the time for the distribution of power or place comes, and we are unable to recall a single suggestion of theirs that anything can be done to improve this Government beyond turning the Republicans out of office. This is, perhaps, no worse than the Republican contention that the only improvement this Government needs is to keep the Republicans in office —which is, we believe, General Grant's great political discovery. We must repeat, however, what we have already more than once said in these columns: that, on the whole, what is called in the slang of philanthropy "the progressive element" in the population—that is, the portion of the people which believes or can be easily persuaded that there is still much work for reformers to do—is to be found among the Republicans rather than among their adversaries. The United States Government was formed for a small agricultural population, to whom politics was rather an amusement than a business. It has come to be the government of one of the largest, most active and heterogeneous nations on earth, and if it is to be adapted, either in its structure or working, to the vast possibilities which its material development since the war has opened up, we fear it is not the Democratic party or any party of a similar kind which will do the work.

FINANCIAL EDUCATION.

THE success which various crazes about finance have had during the past fifteen years has furnished the text for much unfavorable criticism of the education given in both the common and high schools of the country. There is probably nothing which a young person, who has either to earn money for himself or keep money which he has inherited, so much needs to understand as the conditions on which what is called "business" is carried on. As soon as the arts of reading and writing are acquired, there is no part of a child's equipment for the work of life so valuable both to himself and to the rest of the community as clear comprehension of what money is; of what interest is; of the ways in which money can be made to produce interest; of the ways in which it is lost; of the various apparently honest devices by which sharpers, both political and private, get hold of other people's money; of the functions of banks, and especially of savings-banks, with regard to money, and of the relation of taxation to profits, and of currency to prices. Knowledge of this sort to ninety-nine boys and girls out of a hundred is the first essential of any education intended to fit them for a life of self-dependence, and for the expression at the polls of a safe or even harmless opinion on public affairs. When it was discovered a year ago that thousands of poor Irishmen and Irishwomen had been entrusting their hard earnings to the care of an archbishop who knew nothing of investments, and kept his accounts on scraps of paper, and had been drawing interest from him for years without enquiring or caring how he produced it, there was a great deal of pity expressed for their ignorance and superstition. But they could not have been expected to know better. They had not been bred in a commercial community. Most of them, doubtless, had never been to school, and could not conceive of anybody's being fitter to take care of their money than a person who they knew would not wilfully cheat them. But we venture to say that neither their ignorance nor credulity came anywhere near matching those of the depositors in a savings-bank in Boston, the operations of which the Daily Advertiser of that city has been exposing within the last week. The obvious moral of the affair is, as it seems to us, though the Boston press has not yet drawn it, that there is something sadly defective in the education furnished by the State to the children of the taxpayers when any class of the community intelligent and industrious enough to have savings is capable of being made the victims of so coarse and gross an imposture as this one. A woman named Howe, who now has a third husband—the other two still living—who has passed two years in a lunatic asylum, has been convicted and imprisoned for fraud, for some time followed the trade of an itinerant clairvoyante or fortune-teller, and has once or twice changed her name, set up a savings-bank under the name of the "Ladies' Deposit Company." Of course her antecedents as given above were not known, but this means that nothing was known about her to those who were invited to give her their money. These were single women or widows earning their own living, or the wives of sick or decrepit husbands. No deposit over $1,000 was to be taken. All money was to be withdrawable on call. No name appeared in the prospectus or title of the institution. No guarantee of any kind was offered as to its responsibility or solvency. No explanation was made of its operations, or of the nature of its investments, or of the source from which it was to derive the interest on its deposits. Nor did the founder, unknown and characterless as she was, even take the precaution to offer a moderately high rate of interest, such as is actually paid in some parts of the country on bona fide investments, such as eight, or ten, or twelve per cent., or even two per cent. a month. She actually had so much contempt for her possible clientèle—that is, the working-women of the State in which the standard of female education and intelligence is supposed to be highest—that she offered eight per cent. a month, and three months' interest at this rate in advance, when the deposit was made. That is to say, a woman depositing one hundred dollars received back at once twenty-four dollars, had one hundred dollars placed to her credit, and three months later was to be entitled to twenty-four dollars more. So that at the end of the year she would have drawn ninety-six dollars as interest, or within four dollars of the total amount of her principal.

Mrs. Howe seems to have been correct in her calculations. Deposits poured in as fast as she could take them, and the concern has actually been flourishing ever since its foundation. When the Advertiser's exposure came it had crowds of depositors, and plainly of the higher and more intelligent class of female workers, because only this class can save money. It has been ascertained, indeed, that a considerable number of them are teachers in the public schools, presumably good classical scholars and mathematicians, and full of history and belles-lettres. More extraordinary still, although the exposure of course brought a run on the bank, it did not, and up to this writing has not, stopped the flow of deposits. There are apparently considerable numbers of women who look on the exposure as a device of the State-Street bankers and brokers to get rid of a troublesome rival, whose generous methods brings out their own greed and heartlessness in stronger relief. To crown all, Mrs. Howe, even under the fierce light of publicity, gives no account of what she does with the money beyond the clumsy pretence—probably as clumsy as was ever produced by a pickpocket in a police court—that she has been made the almoner of a huge charity which enables her to lose money for the benefit of the poor working-women who have saved a little. She must, even with her experience of human credulity, be astonished by her success. She cannot have expected to find women so gullible as to enable her to purchase, as she has just done, a house for forty thousand dollars after two years' operations.

Now, consider the childlike ignorance and simplicity which this extraordinary story reveals on the part of a most useful, intelligent, and saving class—many of them, too, the teachers of children—with regard to the commonest phenomena of trade. In the first place, they apparently know nothing of the conditions which regulate the ordinary rate of profit, even in hazardous enterprises. If they did, they would see that a proposal to pay them in Massachusetts ninety-six per cent. per annum for the use of money was either on its face a swindle, or a charity on a scale which nothing but the revenues of a nation could keep going very long. They are totally ignorant of the conditions which make an investment safe, and of the effect of safety on the rate of interest. Moreover, they apparently have no notion of the necessity, which is one of the most prominent facts of commercial history, of exacting security for the return of money lent. They do not know why business men in good standing exact it of each other, and why the Government exacts it of banks, and why banks exact it of their customers. Nor have they enough perspicacity to see that Mrs. Howe is simply paying the early depositors with the funds supplied by the later ones, and that, if there should be any cessation in the flow of deposits, or any extraordinary run on the concern, it must burst at once; or enough acquaintance with financial history to know that this is an old and familiar swindle, one of the most familiar in the history of crime. The new feature which Mrs. Howe has added is the selection of women, and single women, as victims. All the rest is very stale and dull and commonplace.

The Boston papers say the Bank Commissioners and the District-Attorney are studying Mrs. Howe's case to see if they can get hold of her under the law, but thus far without success. To our minds the matter is one which merits the attention of the school boards much more than that of the bank authorities or prosecuting officers. It is the school system which supplies people like Mrs. Howe with their prey. No system of education can prevent all fraud. Many frauds are so ingenious that the most cautious and expert business men are imposed on by them. Others, even if clumsy, will find occasional dupes among the unwary and inexperienced. But here is one of the clumsiest frauds ever attempted, with its true character apparent on its prospectus, with all the old and well-known marks of fraud, indifferent to all the ordinary precautions and disguises, and it finds its dupes among a large and highly respectable and most deserving class, of more than ordinary timidity and thrift, and more than ordinarily weighted with care. What is more remarkable than all is that large numbers of them are said to feel outraged by the suspicions and denunciations of Mrs. Howe by those who have had most experience of the conditions under which safe banking is done, and they have not heard of, or do not attach any importance to, the security for the safe transaction of business which the State exacts of its savings-banks.

ENGLISH JOURNALISM.—VII.

THE EVENING NEWSPAPERS.

LONDON, September, 1880.

THE London evening newspapers which possess any distinct political character are five in number. They are, taking them in the order of seniority, the Globe, the Evening Standard, the Pall Mall Gazette, the Echo, and the St. James's Gazette. The Globe dates from the year 1802. It owed its origin to the revolt of the publishers, headed by John Morley, the first of the dynasty, against the extravagant prices charged by the proprietors of the Morning Post and the Courier of that time for book advertisements, and their tardy insertion. The Globe bears under its main title the words, in small print, "and Traveller." The association is happy, for the Globe suggests the Traveller, but it is merely accidental. It sprang from the amalgamation of a newspaper bearing that name, for the matter-of-fact reason that it was the organ of the commercial travellers, with the Globe. What booksellers and bagmen have in common it is difficult to discern. The Globe and Traveller, however, has long since ceased to have any special connection either with literature or with commerce. It has for many years been a political journal, and at one time occupied a very high place among newspapers. It was the organ, in a stricter sense than is compatible with the modern idea of journalistic independence, of successive Whig governments, and notably of Lord Palmerston. It used, during the long period of Whig ascendency which followed the Reform Bill, to serve the purpose, day by day, which pamphlets issued on rare occasions under the French Empire answered in greater emergencies. It foreshadowed more or less distinctly the intentions or measures of the Government. Now the relations of the press to politics have so completely changed, newspapers have become so much more powerful for purposes of political debate, than either House of Parliament, that a certain jealousy of them exists in official circles. Ministers, instead of being anxious to prefigure their measures through the press, and so preparing the public mind for them, are jealous of being forestalled by it. They do what they can to keep their proposals to themselves, and seem to regard any disclosure of them through newspapers as a violation of copyright, an indecent taking of the word out of their mouths before they have uttered it. The feeling was very different in the time of Lord Palmerston, who used to reply to curious questionings as to what the ministers were going to do or what the Cabinet had discussed at its last meeting—"Look in the Globe, my dear fellow this evening. You will find it all there." There was some evasion in this answer, but there was often a good deal of truth. During its Liberal period the Globe was for a long time edited by Colonel Torrens, who was well known as an economical writer. Its fierce controversy with Mr. Disraeli, who was then in his Billingsgate period, and who heaped upon the editor epithets which O'Connell might have envied, belongs to the curiosities, if not of literature, yet of journalism. One of Colonel Torrens's successors to the editorship of the Globe was Mr. Gibbon Merle, who contributed articles on the press to the Westminster Review. In its best days it was under the direction of Mr. George Hooper, who is now one of the principal leader-writers for the Daily Telegraph. With him was associated Mr. Robert Giffen, for a considerable period the city editor of the Daily News, and now the head of the statistical department of the Board of Trade—a post once occupied by Mr. Albany Fonblanque, the editor of the Examiner in its best days. When Lord Russell's government retired from office, at the close of 1866, the Globe, which had been gradually submitting to the adverse conditions under which evening newspapers exist, changed hands. It became a Conservative organ, inspired, and it is said in some degree owned, by Sir Stafford Northcote. It has had several editors during the past fifteen years, of whom the best known was Dr. Mortimer Grenville, who is the author of several books upon those points in which medicine touches upon psychology and on social habits and usages. Its present editor is Captain Armstrong. The name perhaps most eminent in pure literature which is associated with the Globe is that of Father Prout, as the Reverend Francis Mahony, a priest faithful to the Church of Rome in his belief, though setting aside sacerdotal usages in his habits and life, chose to be called. Among the more recent features of the Globe are scholarly articles upon social and literary topics by Mr. Collins, the author of the articles on Dryden and Bolingbroke in the Quarterly Review, and the selected continuer of Mr. Forster's unfinished life of Swift. The politics of the Globe are mildly and rationally Conservative. It is faithful to the party which it adopted about fifteen years ago without being servile to it, and adheres to its fortunes both in good and in adverse times. It cannot be said to introduce any very new or strong vein of original thinking and writing into political controversy, but it conducts the fight ably enough with the old arguments, in the old methods, and on the old ground.

The publication of the Pall Mall Gazette in 1865 marked a new era in journalism. The characteristics which we have just mentioned as not belonging to the Globe emphatically marked the Pall Mall Gazette during the whole of its career. It has always had a thought and a range of its own, and the influence has been visible from the beginning of a really presiding mind. The editor of the paper from its commencement until the spring of the present year was Mr. Frederick Greenwood, who had previously been known as a graceful, gossiping essayist, an agreeable versifier, and the author of at least one meritorious if not very successful novel. As editor of the Pall Mall Gazette Mr. Greenwood showed great power of origination and of organization, and a very marked literary capacity. He succeeded in impressing his individuality upon the paper, and upon a group of very able and scholarly writers whom he gathered about him. The Pall Mall Gazette has always been more remarkable for its influence upon opinion than for its commercial success. It is a curious illustration of the conditions on which the popularity of a newspaper depends that the stroke which lifted the Pall Mall Gazette for a time into prosperity was the publication in it of an article which might have been thought more suitable to the Daily Telegraph than to a journal affecting a fastidious refinement. Mr. James Greenwood, the brother of the editor of the paper, took it into his head to personate "a casual" at one of the London workhouses. He went through all the disagreeable experiences of that unhappy order of beings—the dirty bath, the rough clothes, the abominable nightly associations—and described them in the Pall Mall Gazette. The impression which the article made was memorable in the history of journalism, and it did for the Pall Mall Gazette more than the best writing of the editor, of Sir James Stephen, of Mr. W. R. Greg, of Lord Strangford, and of any other of its thoughtful and cultivated contributors was able to accomplish. The staff of the Pall Mall Gazette, speaking of it as it existed up to the spring of the present year, has necessarily changed, as young barristers have become judges, young politicians have been converted into middle-aged officials, and struggling men of less degree have acquired the success which tempts to indolence. But Mr. Greenwood has known how constantly to infuse the new thought of rising men into his paper and to keep it fresh with the life of a succeeding generation. The one element of weakness which marked its later days was the overpowering influence which Mr. Gladstone gained over the mind of Mr. Greenwood. The attraction was the attraction of repulsion, the fascination was one of terror, but it was overwhelming. The dread seemed to become a monomania and to draw to it all the forces of Mr. Greenwood's mind and character. What Coleridge says of love appeared to be applicable in Mr. Greenwood's case to the peculiar feeling of mingled attraction and aversion with which Mr. Gladstone inspired him. "All thoughts, all passions, all desires, whatever thrilled" Mr. Greenwood's "mortal frame—all were but ministers" to this peculiar sentiment towards Mr. Gladstone, "and fed that sacred flame." Mr. Greenwood has exhibited himself in the attitude of an avenger. It was his business to expose and defeat the sinister and mischievous policy of the present Prime Minister, who was to him what the Jesuits are to Mr. Newdegate. He saw his hand and spirit everywhere. He did not see, but he himself was involuntarily and unconsciously the most striking example of Mr. Gladstone's magnetic power over weaker minds. This conversion of the Pall Mall Gazette into a paper which was simply anti-Gladstonean, and the treatment of all topics from this narrow point of view of personal alarm, produced, as the public was informed one fine morning this year, a rupture of Mr. Greenwood's connection with the Pall Mall Gazette. Mr. George Smith, the proprietor of the paper, who embodies in his own person the apparently plural firm of Smith Elder & Co. (Mr. Smith being himself Smith Elder as distinguished from a real or supposititious Smith Younger, and there being no "Co."), dismissed himself from the proprietorship of the paper, in order that a means might be found of dismissing Mr. Greenwood from the editorship of it. Mr. Henry Yates Thompson, who was private secretary to Earl Spencer when he was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland under Mr. Gladstone's former administration, who was one of the Liberal candidates in conjunction with Mr. Gladstone in Lancashire, and who—what was more to the point—was the son-in-law of Mr. Smith, became ostensibly the sole proprietor, and in part the real proprietor, of the Pall Mall Gazette. Through his instrumentality the conditions with respect to the line to be taken by the Pall Mall Gazette in politics were presented to Mr. Greenwood—conditions which implied a reversal of the course he had been for many years pursuing, and which, as a matter of personal honor, it was impossible that he should accept. Mr. Greenwood retired, and Mr. John Morley was appointed his successor. The tone and policy of the paper have undergone in Mr. Morley's hands a complete reversal. It is now not so much a supporter of Mr. Gladstone's administration and of the Liberal party as a supporter of that section of Mr. Gladstone's administration and of the Liberal party which has its most prominent representative in Mr. Chamberlain. It is not only Liberal but Radical; not only radical but democratic. Its vigorous and straightforward writing makes it a new element of power in the Liberal party, and its literary ability is likely to find for it an entrance among the cultivated but rather timid classes, who are apt to shrink from plain speaking and forcible thinking in politics. Mr. Louis Sergeant, who was at one time the editor of the Examiner, and who has recently published a valuable work full of information and generous feeling, entitled 'New Greece,' is Mr. Morley's assistant-editor. Among the writers who have been most prominent and active since Mr. Morley's accession to the editorship we may mention Mr. Leslie Stephen, from whose pen the papers entitled "Confessions of an Author and a Peripatetic" have proceeded; Mr. Anthony Trollope, who is the writer of the sketches on "London Tradesmen" which are now appearing in the Pall Mall Gazette; and Mr. William Minto, who, like Mr. Sergeant, was formerly editor of the Examiner, and who is better known as the author of a critical history of English literature. Mr. Minto has recently been appointed to the chair of logic and rhetoric in the University of Aberdeen, in succession to Mr. Alexander Bain, thus passing through the purgatory of journalism to that paradise of Scotch men of letters—a professorship north of the Tweed.

The St. James's Gazette, which appeared within a few weeks after Mr. Greenwood's retirement from the editorship of the Pall Mall Gazette, is simply the old Pall Mall Gazette in somewhat different form and with a new name, with an exaggeration of its antipathy to Mr. Gladstone and its dread of what it calls the latter-day Radicals. It sees these enemies of the human race everywhere, as French alarmists in the early days of the Revolution saw and heard the approach of brigands who were merely the creatures of their own imagination. The intensity of the language and sentiment of the St. James's Gazette has led a profane wit to nickname it "the Twopenny Damn," a phrase derived from a favorite oath of the late Duke of Wellington, who was accustomed to convey in that form of speech his disparaging estimate of persons and things which he held in slight account, occasionally descending to the fractional valuation of "the tenth part of a twopenny damn." Mr. Greenwood's force of character, though wasted upon a sort of craze, and the personal liking which he awakens and keeps, are shown by the fact that he transferred with him from the Pall Mall Gazette to the newspaper which he now edits almost the entire body of writers who had been associated with him on the elder journal. Mr. Greenwood himself is indubitably the most potent influence in his paper. After him the principal political writer is Mr. H. D. Trail, whose articles in magazines have attracted considerable and deserved attention, and who has a faculty of political parody which does not extensively exist or is not much cultivated at the present time. Other writers for the paper are Mr. Gilgud and Mr. Syme, who write of foreign politics; Mr. Frederick Pollock, a very accomplished scholar and lawyer, and also a dextrous if somewhat mechanical versifier; Mr. Grant Allen, who explains the universe in all its minutest details according to the principles of Mr. Herbert Spencer; Mr. Andrew Lang, who has been mentioned already in connection with the Daily News; and Mr. Sutherland Edwards, who is, I believe, the musical and dramatic critic of the St. James's Gazette. Mr. Lathbury, the editor of the Economist, and Mr. E. D. J. Wilson, of whom I have before spoken, were among the writers for the Pall Mall Gazette under Mr. Greenwood's editorship, and have, I believe, transferred some portion of their services to him upon his new journal.

The Echo has had a various history. Started a few years ago by Messrs. Cassell, Petter & Galpin, the publishers, as a Liberal paper, and published at what previously had seemed to be the impossible price of a halfpenny, it acquired under the editorship of Mr. Arthur Arnold, now member of Parliament for Salford, a political influence which its ability and straightforwardness merited. Its political success was not attended with a corresponding commercial prosperity. It was sold to Mr. Albert Grant, the well-known projector and speculator, and shared his declining fortunes. When Mr. Grant's property of various kinds was disposed of, the Echo, which had become Conservative, passed into the hands of Mr. Passmore Edwards, who was returned at the last general election as one of the Liberal members for Salisbury. Its editor is Mr. Howard Evans, and one of its principal contributors is Mr. James Beal, a well-known London house-agent. Mr. Beal is a busy party organizer, who is especially interested in questions of municipal reform in London. The Echo is written with a vigor which commends itself to the artisan class in the large towns, all the more for its frequent disregard of the conventional courtesies of discussion. During Mr. Gladstone's illness it thought it worth while to signalize with two marks of indignant exclamation —thus (!!)—the announcement that Sir Henry Drummond Wolff and Mr. Gorst, political opponents of Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons, had called in Downing Street to make enquiry after his health. "How dare the counsel for the other side," said Mr. Pickwick, "tell my counsel that it is a very fine morning."

The most prosperous of the evening papers is the Evening Standard, which is the satellite and duplicate of its morning namesake, its politics being to those of its principal what moonlight is to sunlight. Its success, however, depends not upon its party connection and zeal, but upon the diligence and completeness with which the latest news of the police courts, of races, and of whatever may happen in the concluding hours of each day is brought to the knowledge of the London reader. It is a favorite paper, I am told, of the workingmen, who in London, at any rate, are not a very political order of beings. The latest murder and the latest race interest them more than the latest ministerial announcement in the House of Commons or the reply of Turkey to the demands of the great Powers. It may be doubted, however, whether the Evening Standard is not more of a drag upon its morning associate than a help to it. Evening newspapers can scarcely ever become great properties or attain any considerable commercial success. The advertisements do not come to them, for advertisements appeal to men in their business hours. They refer very often to things which are to take place during the actual day, and they would in many cases be too late to be of practical service in an evening paper. Before telegraphs were invented and when railways were either unknown or had superseded the stage-coach or the still slower stage-wagon only on the main lines of communication, the evening newspapers brought to country districts the first news of what was happening in London or abroad. They had, therefore, a considerable and lucrative country circulation. All that has been knocked on the head by the altered conditions of locomotion and of the transmission of news. The principal sale of the London evening newspapers is in London. Ability and originality such as mark much of the writing in the Pall Mall Gazette and the St. James's Gazette may acquire for those journals a circulation sufficient for political and social influence and for a moderately prosperous existence. In the case of the two papers just named their mutual antagonism of principles keeps up a certain interest in both which would not exist to the same degree if either of them stood alone. They are stronger in virtue of their rivalry, but the experiment cannot be said in either case to have been successfully made, though it has been hopefully begun.

CURRENT FRENCH TOPICS.

PARIS, September 23, 1880.

IT is decidedly the opinion of the extreme party, who are for immediate action, which now influences the Government councils. I do not pretend to rival the telegraph and give you, properly speaking, political news, but what I believe worthy of interest is an appreciation of the situation, now become difficult through rapidly succeeding events. From every point of view M. de Freycinet's resignation is serious. First of all, it proves that the moderation he wished to show in the application of the second decree respecting the unauthorized religious orders is not acceptable to the majority of the Republican party, for M. de Freycinet only retires because he is convinced that the prudent speech he made at Montauban will not be approved of by the Chamber. This conviction was acquired on finding himself entirely at variance with the three Ministers, who, in the Cabinet, are the representatives of the most influential political group (whose leader is M. Gambetta), "the Republican Union group." M. Constans, Minister of the Interior; M. Cazot, Minister of Justice; General Farre, Minister of War, are the legal representatives of it. Until lately it was thought that M. de Freycinet, the former coadjutor of Gambetta during the defensive war 1870–71, was alike the confidant and more or less the executor of his political ideas. It is certain that on this ground he took the presidency of the Council, and until latterly he remained in accord with the all-powerful chief of the Republican party. The late incidents clearly prove that it was without his consent that M. de Freycinet expressed himself so wisely and moderately at Montauban, and probably began conferences with the Holy See. His retirement entirely confirms what I told you in my last letter about the probability of a secret negotiation with the Papal Court, which resulted in the Declaration of the congregations. I do not pretend to say that the declaration was textually presented to M. de Freycinet, and that its actual tenor was approved by him; but he doubtlessly asked for something similar, and he calculated on bringing forward this document as a reason for delaying the execution of the decrees and thus gaining time to propose a general law on associations. This was opening quite a new political line. M. Gambetta's approval was necessary to its success, and this he would only have given if the plan had originated with himself. It was sufficient that his former friend, placed by him at the head of affairs, appeared for an instant to act independently of him, for M. Gambetta to make him understand, as in 1877 he rightly said to the Maréchal de MacMahon, that he ought to submit or resign. M. de Freycinet has, indeed, endeavored to submit by seeking to agree with the three Ministers who tendered him their resignation, but he soon found too much was required of him; for in the same evening's Agence Havas telegrams the resolutions passed in the Council held were commented on in such a manner as to exaggerate their import to the detriment of the President, M. de Freycinet. In such circumstances, nothing was left but to resign. M. de Freycinet carries into his retirement the esteem and sympathy of all moderate and liberal Republicans. He displayed rare qualities as a parliamentary orator, was perfect master of himself, never carried away by passion, and endowed with the facility of expressing himself in a clear, elegant, subtle way; and he was thoroughly competent in business matters. We regret infinitely that he did not distinctly claim the general law on religious societies, the preparation of which he announced at Montauban, instead of accepting the dangerous policy of the Decrees. He then would have fallen by a vote of the Chamber, but it would have been for a principle and not for a mere question of applying the law. Let us not forget, however, that this question of application had lately become very important, and that in seeking a moderate and wise course the religious dispute might have been stopped or at least confined within just limits. I much fear it will acquire dangerous bitterness after M. de Freycinet's retirement. The exact extent of this political change will only be known after the first few sittings of the Chamber of Deputies. The most serious part in all this is the rôle M. Gambetta plays; he exercises more and more a kind of dictatorship without wishing for the responsibility of power. England has had its "king-maker," Warwick. Our Warwick in France breaks up ministries without consenting to be minister himself. In this there is a great drawback, for it is contrary to the rules of parliamentary government. I think M. Gambetta is mistaken in thinking he thus saves himself for the future. He is using his power up, on the contrary, and the time may come when he will have thus lost the moral credit without which there is no real power in a country where public opinion reigns. A near future will disclose to us the result of these recent events. How much need we have of the counsel and firm, wise guidance of the great statesman whose statue was inaugurated at St. Germain on Sunday, the 19th of September, the town where he died three years ago! On that occasion M. Thiers's memory was honored as it ought to be. M. Léon Say, President of the Senate, who was his last Minister of Finance, retraced with commanding clearness the marvellous operations by which, without check, the liberation of the French territory was effected at the cost of a ransom of four milliards. M. Jules Simon, who was also his minister in the public education department, speaking as representative of the French Academy, threw into full light the great qualities of the historian, writer, and orator, reminding France of those words, so fit for meditation at this moment, "The Republic will be conservative, or it will not exist." It was touching to hear his old friend, his elder and called by Thiers his brother, the illustrious historian Mignet, trace his portrait in the broad, flowing, grand manner still intact with him in spite of his eighty-four years. Thiers remains incomparable, to all those who have known him, for the marvellous and varied gifts bestowed upon him —capacity for work unparalleled, brilliant facility, such natural and lively fluency, and which rose to grandeur when treating of subjects which evoked his patriotism, as during the cruel trials of his country; a knowledge of mankind which did not exclude kindness of heart, penetrating sagacity which made him see the possibility of everything and kept him from the onesidedness of party spirit; lastly, that patriotism which was his dominant passion. Those who were honored with his friendship know all the goodness hidden under such brilliant mental capacity.

A fortnight previous to the St. Germain solemnity a similar one was celebrated at Clermont-Ferrand, not less worthy of sympathy. A statue was there erected to the memory of the man whose birth has honored the town, the illustrious Pascal, one of our greatest writers and most fervent Christians, the truer that he rejected all that altered the real character of Christianity. If he had formed a sect, or rather if his doctrine had triumphed, the national French religion would have been reconciled to liberty of conscience and freedom of thought, instead of prohibiting them. The Sybilline book has been twice presented to France. First, during the sixteenth century, the first page was thrown to the winds stained with the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Then, again, in the seventeenth century, when Jansenism threw off its rude theological exterior in the person of Pascal, untrammelled and lofty genius, at the same time austere and fervent Christian, one of the most authentic representatives of French intellect, with its luminous intelligence, piquant grace, flame without smoke, and its formidable causticity, the real creator of national prose, but the second page was torn like the first. Pascal, admired though he be, is beaten. He was only vanquished entirely ten years ago. The Vatican Council was a complete revenge for the 'Provinciales' and 'Les Pensées.' We think liberty has gained nothing by it. The temple of God is now, as it was eighteen centuries ago, thronged with traders. We are of opinion that they ought to be driven out, but we cannot forget it was Christ who scourged the Jewish ones and overthrew the money-changers' tables. To triumph over a religion of subjection our religion must be free. Mere denial is like the blade of a sword without hilt. Denial is only efficacious when it is the sharp culminating point of powerful affirmation. Such was indeed the shining sword Pascal used to deal Jesuitism blows with, which would have been mortal had they not, after him, encountered adversaries at once more frivolous and more accommodating. That is why we are rejoiced to see this grand and noble figure again placed in broad daylight before the French nation. Pascal always remained faithful to true Christian liberty. Therefore he never positively submitted to the authority of his church, and was to the last a vigorous opponent. Doubtlessly he admitted the authority of councils and traditions, but he made it subservient to that of Christ. Questions of truth with him outweigh those of authority, and he had no scruple in contending against Rome when his dearest convictions were at stake. At the close of his life his opposition to Papacy became stronger and deeper. It is more caustic in the 'Provinciales,' but treats less of the basis of things. Let us judge of it by these words, almost the last Pascal wrote, which may be considered as his religious will:

"Each time the Jesuits deceive the Pope they make all Christendom perjurers. The Pope is easily deceived, on account of his affinity to and belief in the Jesuits; and the Jesuits are very able to mislead him through calumny. All Inquisition is corrupt or ignorant. You yourselves are corruptible.

"'If these are silent the stones will speak.' The saints have never held their peace. Silence is the greatest persecution. When we believe we have written the truth, and Rome speaks, condemns the truth, and censures the books which hold views contrary to her own, we ought to cry all the more loudly that we are censured unjustly, and that the Pope wishes more violently to stifle all speech, until a pope comes who will listen to both parties, and who is willing to consult antiquity to render justice."

"Ad tuum, Domine Jesu, tribunal appello."

The whole of Pascal is in this appeal to supreme authority.

It has seemed to us needful in this season of imbecile superstition and unbridled submission to recall what was the grand Catholicism of the seventeenth century in its most eminent representatives. Let the noble spirits who now in silence lament this universal subjection remember what Pascal thought of such silence, and of the responsibility they incur by allowing the belief to grow that religion is, indeed, what those before the scenes make of it. Montalembert proved himself a faithful disciple of Pascal when he said before dying, respecting the silence of those who protest with bated breath against the triumphs of Jesuitism: "They are prevaricators." The best prayer which can be made for Catholicism and France is to see a reawakening of Pascal's spirit, which was not fettered by the forms of his belief. May the statue just erected in his natal town evoke such a welcome remembrance!

Correspondence.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have read with a great deal of interest the correspondence in your paper in regard to the formation of a civil-service reform society, and wish to add my name as one heartily in favor of such a movement and am ready to subscribe $5 at any time towards that end.

Yours very respectfully, J. D. Cox, Jr.

Cleveland, Ohio, September 29, 1880.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I will gladly subscribe $25 a year for five years to a civil-service reform league. An organization to effect anything should be non-partisan, and should not be a resurrection of a society formed years ago and useless all these years. Moreover, it should not be sectional. If civil-service reform is preached from the seaboard in as foolish a way as the single-standard was, within a year the West will be in favor of rotation in every Federal office six times a week. Respectfully yours, A. B. M.

DEMOCRATS AND STATE RIGHTS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As a reader of the Nation and one who coincides with most of its views upon political topics, yet feeling profoundly the importance of the success of the national Republican ticket in this campaign, may I not ask if the independent element in the Republican party do not, in their attention to other matters, mistake in ignoring to so great an extent the so-called "State-rights question"?

The Democratic party, in its platform, pledges itself anew "to the constitutional doctrines and traditions of the Democratic party, as illustrated by the teachings and example of a long line of Democratic statesmen and patriots, and embodied in the platform of the last National Convention of the party."

What are those constitutional doctrines and traditions illustrated in the long line of patriots and statesmen to which they renew their pledge? The clause "and embodied in the platform of the last National Convention of the party" cannot limit the former clause, their pledge of devotion to the Constitution with its amendments, as stated in the platform of '76, because Democratic fealty to those amendments has been of too recent origin to have become a tradition, and has not been illustrated by a very extended line of Democratic "statesmen" and "patriots." Hence it must refer to constitutional doctrines of long standing and of very frequent exposition by succeeding generations of Democratic statesmen to come within the meaning of "tradition" and to have been illustrated by a long line of such "patriots." What peculiar views have the Democratic party entertained that answer to the foregoing definition, if it be not their adherence to what is commonly known as the doctrine of "State Rights," or "State Sovereignty." Looking into the Democratic platform of 1856 we find the party adopting and upholding the principles of the Kentucky and Virginia Resolutions of 1798 as "constituting one of the main foundations of its political creed," resolutions which are supposed to have been the forerunner if not the parent of nullification and secession, and to have led to all the objections upon constitutional grounds to the rigorous measures adopted for the suppression of the rebellion as well as those for reconstruction. In 1860 we find both wings of the Democratic party affirming the Cincinnati resolutions of 1856. In 1868 they put themselves on record by pronouncing the reconstruction acts as usurpations, unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void. In 1872 they take a new departure and adopt a Republican platform. In 1876, still hoping for assistance from Liberals and Independents, they abstain from advancing any constitutional views further than to recognize the amendments to the Constitution. Is not this further step in renewing (as if they had ever abandoned) their fealty to their ancient doctrines and traditions significant? And is not this significance heightened by the conduct of the party in Congress in reference to the national elections law, the use of troops at the polls, etc.? Has not their opposition been chiefly based on the alleged unconstitutionality of those laws, on the theory that the United States is not a nation, that we have no national elections, no national officers, and no national voters? Did they not vote down every proposition to amend the laws so as to forbid any armed person attending the polling places, on the ground that Congress has no power to legislate on the subject? Did they not pronounce the judgments of the Supreme Court affirming the constitutionality of the acts of Congress a sort of eight-to-seven decisions, and refuse to acknowledge their binding character so far as to require political recognition as a part of the settled law of the land?

Again, we find Hon. W. S. Groesbeck saying at Cincinnati, in his speech of September 17, "The danger now threatening us is centralization or imperialism. The Federal Government has already taken a new name and calls itself the nation, and claims to be our all in all, and the State is remembered with derision and contempt." . . . "Yesterday the State was boastful; its pride has been humbled. To-day the Federal Government is boastful; be it ours to humble its pride also and keep it in its true position." And in his speech at Utica, September 15, Horatio Seymour says: "When, therefore, questions arise as to the authority of the general Government they should be decided by the letter of the law. If this does not solve the problems they should be turned over to the State authorities, if they are competent to deal with them. Instead of this rule we find a disposition to disregard its spirit, and if possible to torture its language, in ways to give power to Congress which is hurtful to the people, injurious to the morals of the legislators, corrupting officials, etc. Here, then, we find the sources of the evils and abuses which afflict our general Government, and through it the people of the country. Until within the last twenty years the executive, the legislative, the judicial departments gave honest construction to the Constitution. They did not seek to usurp power by strained definition; they sought to carry out its spirit. They did not summon crowds of men with schemes, who were pushing, rightfully or wrongfully, to get at the public treasury, by calling this a nation and teaching the false doctrine that we should follow the usages of other and not the constitutional law of our own Government."

We find in the platform, in the attempts of the Democratic party to repeal certain acts of Congress, and in the utterances of the party leaders (and I certainly have not selected extreme exponents of Democracy in citing the words of Mr. Groesbeck and of Mr. Seymour), not a proposed change in the currency or condition of the public credit, but open and avowed determination to change the practices of the Federal Government in its relations to the States, not upon grounds of expediency but of constitutional construction and interpretation conformably to those doctrines and traditions alluded to. And such change of views and practices seems to be the principal change promised in the platform or demanded by the leaders of the party. What may we apprehend, then, in those respects from a Democratic victory? In your last number you speak of the refusal of the party to allow legislation demanded by the amendments. May we not expect a repeal of all legislation already had by virtue of them?

In returning to such honest construction as Mr. Seymour says we had up to twenty years ago by the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, presumably including the construction of the powers of the Federal Government as given on the part of Buchanan and his advisers, will the Democratic party be content with the control of the executive and legislative departments? If the judicial department has also given dishonest and strained construction, ought it not to be reconstructed so as to have all the departments of the Government return to the honest and constitutional expositions which preceded the advent of the Republican party in power? I have no disposition to believe the Democratic party would again countenance secession. I will concede that slavery and secession are dead. But would not Democratic success be the signal for the abandonment of the negro to the mercy of the Southern whites, so far as his political rights are concerned, as well as of the claim of any power or authority on the part of the general Government to secure him in his rights of citizenship? Furthermore, would not such success furnish to the South and to the Democratic party somewhat of a basis for a historical justification of their course in relation to constitutional questions, including secession and their opposition to reconstruction and the federal legislation of which they have complained? Could they not claim with considerable reason that the people and the Government had receded from the ground heretofore taken, and had thereby practically admitted the charges of usurpation and abuse of power? And if this may be so, ought not the questions of the nature of our Government, of the relation of the States to the general Government, to be put prominently forward in this canvass? and is not the prospect of so extensive changes in the conduct and policies of the general Government, for the reasons urged in behalf of such proposed changes, a matter of sufficient gravity to receive our careful attention? It seems to me we may make a deplorable mistake in ignoring these matters, to the recognition of which we may awake too late when we find a Democratic legislature and executive urge such changes as having been endorsed by the people in the election, and the "constitutional doctrines and traditions" approved.

Respectfully yours,

J. A. PARKINSON.

Notes.

THE first number of M. Jules Lévy's Le Français (Cambridge, Mass.) confirms our favorable anticipations of its quality. It is edited with taste and discrimination, and will be read with a lively interest. M. Lévy unobtrusively indicates his intention to avoid the uncleannesses of current French literature by quoting F. Sarcey's account of the genesis of About's 'Roman d'un Brave Homme' and his critique upon it. A delightful trifle, "Circé," by Octave Feuillet, gives the number its specific levity. The "Lettre à corriger," "Correspondance grammaticale," and "Phrases vicieuses" will commend themselves to students. The "Nouvelles de France" is skilfully selected.——'Write Your Own Stories' (Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.) is a little book containing thirty woodcuts on the left-hand pages, the right-hand pages being blank, with ruled lines for writing. Each of these pictures is supposed to be "suggestive of a story." The publishers offer three prizes, aggregating fifty dollars in cash, to the three children under fourteen who shall write the best complete set of stories before July 1, 1881. Considering the pictures, the legends they bear, and the model "story" given, we should say that the money would be earned, and that it is very doubtful if there is any other benefit to be derived from this sort of thing loosely conducted.——A new work by Bancroft, continuing his History of the United States, under the title of 'History of the Formation of the Constitution of the United States, forming a History of the United States from the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain to the Inauguration of Washington as President,' is to be soon published by the Appletons. It will form two octavo volumes, with an appendix containing many unpublished personal and political letters of the public men of that epoch, collected from different parts of the United States and from Europe. The volumes will be published uniform in style and size with the original Little, Brown & Co. 'History of the United States' in ten volumes.——John Wiley & Sons will publish soon a 'History of the Mississippi Jetties,' revised by Captain Eads.——A volume on Troy, prepared by S. G. W. Benjamin, will form the next of Charles Scribner's Sons' 'Epochs of Ancient History' series. The firm is to issue in this country Dean Stanley's 'Christian Institutions'; the biography of Dr. Charles Hodge, of Princeton, by his son; and the final volume of Lange's Commentary.——Scribner & Welford are preparing 'A Picturesque Tour in Foreign Lands,' which is apparently likely to be one of the more elaborate of the holiday gift-books, bound in vellum inlaid with morocco and gold, and printed on Dutch paper, with 250 illustrations on India paper; other announcements by them are 'An Introduction to Historical Theology,' by John Stoughton, D.D., and 'The Chain of Life in Geological Time,' a sketch of the origin and succession of animals and plants, by Dr. J. W. Dawson.——Auerbach's new novel 'Brigitta' forms the latest of the Leisure-Hour Series. We learn from the Athenæum that a new modern English novel, by George Macdonald, called 'Mary Marston,' is to be published in the Manchester Weekly Times. Miss Rhoda Broughton has been cramming at Oxford for a new book about university life, the oddity of which we are justified in predicting from the nature of the subject and the characteristics of the writer. J. & R. Maxwell have in press Miss Braddon's 'Just As I Am.'——Among weightier foreign announcements are a work, by Dr. Chas. Mackay, explaining 'Obscure Words and Phrases in Shakspere and the Elizabethan Dramatists' by Celtic origins and the vernacular idioms of sixteenth and seventeenth-century English, and a new edition in four volumes, by Hinrichs of Leipzig, of Overbeck's 'Geschichte der griechischen Plastik.'——The Oriental Church Magazine for September contains several Russian papers that will convey interesting information to the ordinary reader, but it would be hazardous to say the same of "E. V. B.'s" "Journalism in the United States," and difficult in any case to discover the pertinence of its publication here.——Houghton, Mifflin & Co. issue this week a new form of the "Cambridge" edition of all Longfellow's works down to the present year, the prose in two volumes and the poems in four instead of three each, as heretofore. They also announce Stedman's Scribner essay on Poe, with a portrait; 'XXXVI Lyrics and XII Sonnets,' selected from T. B. Aldrich's poems, and Horace E. Scudder's 'Stories and Romances,' with eight titles.——The success of Judge Tourgee's 'A Fool's Errand' possibly led to 'A Year of Wreck: A True Story by a Victim,' being the account of a business venture made by two Northern men in one of the lower Mississippi States, which is announced as nearly ready by Harper & Brothers; it is written anonymously, and works of this kind, it is to be observed, get credence from an author's signature.——In the September number of the Portfolio Mr. Hamerton reinforces his own "Notes on Æsthetics" by some "Notes on Landscape Painting," by Hubert Herkomer, who executes a suggestion of Mr. Hamerton's to the effect that painters themselves ought to talk more about art, with great modesty but perhaps without succeeding in demonstrating the brilliancy of the notion. It is worth bearing in mind that the great painters who were also great literary exponents of painting were the latter in virtue of being something besides merely the former. The first paper of the number, by the way, an account of Mr. Briton Rivière, A.R.A., begins by calling him "a rare instance of a successful and distinguished artist, who has taken the Oxford degree of Master of Arts."——In the American Art Review for September, Mr. T. H. Bartlett, the Boston sculptor, begins an account of the late Dr. William Rimmer, the enthusiastic general tone of which is more justified by accompanying illustrations than is an explicit exaggeration now and then; the realism, to use the current slang, of the work is very striking, very anatomical, but the conceptions, though large and simple, will seem to the reader who has never seen the originals to display almost an imitative sympathy for Michael Angelo. We may also mention a paper by the editor on Wilhelm Leibl for an incidental allusion to "realism" that is peculiar. He quotes a malicious criticism by Tardieu on Gebhardt's "Last Supper" as follows: "This is not, perhaps, the historical 'Last Supper,' any more than the ideal 'Last Supper,' and still less is it the academical 'Last Supper,' on which score we highly congratulate M. von Gebhardt. It might pass for a conclave of socialistic workingmen, filled with fear by the rigors of late Prussian legislation, and betrayed by a son of Israel in the pay of the Berlin police." And he asks, in protest: "But is not this realism, yea, even this naturalism, which is in such bad odor with the one-sided partisans of idealism, a marked feature of all thoroughly German art? Does it not penetrate every line drawn and every stroke painted by Dürer?" We feel justified in assuring him that M. Tardieu would reply no to this, and explain certain grave points of difference between the realism of Dürer and that of Gebhardt, say.——The November number of Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co.'s Magazine of Art will be enlarged both in the size of the page and the number of pages; its general character is promised to be improved also, and the price will be raised accordingly to forty cents.

—After a "preliminary season" of the character which tradition prescribes as suited to the very untheatrical months of August and September, the theatres have begun their regular seasons with every prospect of a very successful winter. All the causes which last year contributed to fill the various places of amusement during the winter months are still in operation. New York is fuller than ever of strangers and money is abundant, while successful speculation has filled the hearts of the theatre-loving class with the desire for enjoyment, at the same time that it has given them increased opportunities for gratifying their tastes. At Daly's Theatre a new comedy of manners, written by Mr. Edgar Fawcett, has been produced, entitled "Our First Families." It is an American play, in which the author lashes with his somewhat mild satire the follies and absurdities of society as it at present exists in this city. This society, according to Mr. Fawcett, consists of two distinct classes—the old Knickerbocker families of very ancient descent and pure strain, who keep much to themselves and frown upon the new people constantly coming up by means of money, of whom Mrs. Pomeroy Stanhope (excellently acted by Miss Fanny Morant) is supposed to be a type. There is nothing very new about this, but the author has succeeded in introducing a novelty in his ridicule of Anglomania as at present practised in the principal city of the Union. The nouveaux riches in New York are, it appears, passionately fond of marrying their daughters to Englishmen, and to Englishmen who are not the finest specimens of Anglo-Saxon manhood, but generally to broken-down gamblers and rakes, such as the Hon. Plantagenet Handycap. Some of Mr. Fawcett's ridicule of the New York Anglomaniacs is very good. There is a naïveté about Mrs. Stanhope's exclamation on hearing that one of the young ladies of the play is engaged—"I hope to heaven he is an Englishman!"—that is very telling. The best piece of acting in the play is that of Miss Rehan, who plays the New York girl of the half-hoidenish, half-sentimental variety. Miss Rehan is altogether the best actress for young parts in Mr. Daly's company. She has in her acting the germs of real comic power, and it is therefore a pity that she should be made to play the part of Eva to such a lover as Leonardo Tompkyns (Mr. James Lewis). Mr. Lewis, amusing as he undoubtedly is, is always a farce actor, and his part, too, is on a much lower level than that of the young lady with whom he is in love. Mr. John Drew plays the part of Geoffrey Knickerbocker very well, though he plays it in the same way that he does many other parts. A lack of variety seems to be his principal defect. It is needless to say that Mrs. Gilbert played Mrs. Manhattan, "the great, great, great-granddaughter of old Peter Stuyvesant," with all the taste and delicacy permitted by Mr. Fawcett's text. This implies certain limits, for Mr. Fawcett, under some malign influence, has frequently sacrificed taste in the interest of humor. Want of taste is the besetting sin of Daly's Theatre, and we cannot help suspecting that Mr. Daly himself is responsible for such absurdities as the introduction into a comedy of the farcical dance in the third act.

—The Boston "Ideal" Opera Company, which first made itself known by its performances of "Pinafore" last year, has been continuing its success at Booth's Theatre, first in the "Pirates of Penzance" and now in "Fatinitza." The first opera has, on the whole, never been so well given in New York as by this company. Mr. M. W. Whitney, who has a very fine bass voice, must be convinced now, if it never occurred to him before, that he has been wasting his time in singing in oratorio to the Bostonians. Oratorio music is, of course, very much finer and more improving music than that of comic opera, and the cause of culture is, perhaps, advanced whenever "Elijah" or "The Creation" is sung in the Boston Music Hall, but Mr. Whitney, as is now sufficiently apparent, has other qualities besides a fine bass voice, which enable him to appear better on the lyric stage than in singing biblical parts in oratorio. He is really a very good actor, and his conception of the parts of the Pirate King and Count Kantchukoff leaves very little to desire. His voice, too, which is heavy in serious music, gathers life and character in opera, and becomes, what we confess we never formerly thought it, agreeable. Miss Phillips's voice was always delightful in quality, and though no longer possessing its early strength or certainty, it is still one of the most pleasing voices which can be heard in opera. She has steadily kept to the old dramatic fashion of singing operatic music. This involves more expression than it is now in these degenerate days thought proper for highly-trained singers to exhibit, and the music both of "Fatinitza" and of "The Pirates" lends itself to expression. Miss Phillips makes as much out of the part of Ruth as could possibly be made by anybody, and sings it with a seriousness which doubles the absurdity of the conception. In Vladimir she also succeeds admirably, though, of course, in appearance she cannot rival the very extraordinary young actress who last year sang the same part and afterwards that of Boccacio. Miss Beebe and Miss Stone, who alternate in the part of Mabel, have both very nice soprano voices. Miss Beebe sings the part of the Princess Lydia with great taste and delicacy. The Sergeant in the "Pirates" was also a great hit. "Fatinitza" is an opera which ought always to be played in French or German, or at any rate in some language not English. The English libretto is very bad, and fine voices and good singing do not make up for a poor libretto, and that nameless faculty for bouffe which seems to be wholly wanting in the Anglo-Saxon composition. "Fatinitza" had a tremendous run, if we remember aright, in Vienna; but it is almost impossible to imagine it running tremendously here. The music is light, lively, and replete with melody. It just falls short, perhaps owing to the fact that the action drags in places, of being the best opéra bouffe ever written.

—"La Fille du Tambour Major," Offenbach's latest opera, does not appear to draw very well at the Standard. It resembles "Madame Favart" in being half opéra bouffe and half opéra comique. The Drum-major, for instance, is the half-amusing, half-pathetic father of opéra comique, and, although Duplan acts it very nicely, he is essentially a bouffe actor, and ought not to be given anything but bouffe parts. Mezières plays Le Duc Della Volta very much as he played the part of the old General in "Madame Favart," and, indeed, as he plays all parts of similar character. There is not much variety in his conception, but wonderful skill in all the details of the acting. The blindness, the foolishness, the vanity, and the feebleness of old age of a certain kind this actor understands to perfection, and represents it with just that exaggeration which the stage makes necessary. Madame Delorme acts the duchess's part with a great deal of comic force. The opera belongs by common consent to the class of proper French operas. Therefore we shall say nothing more than that Madame Delorme gets all the impropriety she can in a very laughable way out of a part which is perfectly unobjectionable. M. Nigri plays and sings the part of Robert excellently. He has a voice which, without a very extensive register, is quite ample enough for his purposes, and his acting is uncommonly good. M. Tauffenberger makes his first appearance in America as Griolet, and we trust it may be his last. He must at some time have had a voice, but he has one no longer. The notes which issue from his throat sound like the ghostly echo of a voice that is quite dead and gone, and his acting is simply awkward, without being amusing. Mlle. Paola-Marie's voice and acting are very much what they were last year, and Mlle. Merle can hardly be considered much of an addition to Mr. Grau's company. Mlle. Mary Albers has not yet made her appearance. On the whole, Mr. Grau must feel that he has made a mistake in bringing out this particular opera as his first effort. He has a large chorus and increased orchestra, and a very fair company. If he would bring out a number of the old operas, with the music of which everybody is familiar, and which do not require acting of the first order to make them succeed, he could probably fill the Standard Theatre without difficulty night after night. If what he is attempting to do is to make French opera thoroughly respectable, and to fill his theatre with the same sort of audience that fills Wallack's or Booth's, he is altogether mistaken. French opera can never be made in New York thoroughly proper and thoroughly attractive at the same time, and Aimée's former manner of managing the business—that is, giving a large number of well-known and thoroughly-amusing opéras bouffes—was much better than Mr. Grau's plan of giving two or three operas which have got the reputation of being operas to which anybody can go.

—At the Park Theatre "Lawn Tennis," by Mr. Woolf, has proved a success. It can hardly be called a play, and the author calls it a "Peculiarity in Two Acts." To describe what is done on the stage would be an impossibility. The principal parts are those of a dramatist who endeavors to involve the other characters of the play in all sorts of compromising situations, by imposing upon their credulity or vanity, and a recently-married man who afterwards takes the part of a woman. The first of these parts is taken by Mr. Digby V. Bell, who was, if we remember aright, one of the singers at the Bijou Opera House last year, an actor and singer of a good deal of ability. The second is taken by Mr. John Howson, who also has a considerable amount of talent. Owing to the dramatist's manœuvres all the relations of all the characters are continually confused and involved in the most hopeless obscurity. Incidentally what is called a "New and Original Operettina" is introduced, founded on the rhyme of Jack and Jill. Where Mr. Woolf got this from we know; but where he discovered his original score would be much harder to say. As he says the music is new and original, we are bound to believe him; but many of the airs are either strangely mimetic, or else the originality is not that of the author of the "Mighty Dollar." The humor of "Lawn Tennis" is abundant, but generally of a very simple character. The tone of the play may be described as that of the comedies usually performed by the San Francisco Minstrels, and everybody knows that it is a tone which is very popular. The singing is very fair throughout.

—A descriptive paper upon primary public education in Greece contributed by Dr. S. Antinopoulos to the Minerva contains matter of interest for Western readers. It briefly summarizes the laws governing the foundation of state and private elementary schools, and appends a catalogue of societies, of various composition and scope, which undertake to further the cause of education by establishing schools in Greek districts under Turkish rule—schools for the poor, like the London "ragged schools," evening schools for workingmen, and so on. The Royal Decree of 1834 is still in force by which communal schools with a modified system of "mutual instruction" (the teachers instructing the two higher classes and monitors the lower) were instituted. The course of instruction which is arranged for children from seven to twelve includes: "Catechism, elements of the Greek language, writing, arithmetic, explanation of the weights and measures adopted by the legislature, linear drawing, and vocal music; if possible, the elements of Greek geography and history and of the natural sciences"; twice a week gymnastic exercises under a teacher, and practical lessons in agriculture and gardening, with special attention to the cultivation of trees, silkworms, and bees; girls to be "practised in pursuits suitable for women." The constitutional policy of religious toleration is conformed to by a provision which allows parents or guardians of other than the established religion to teach their children at home in the catechism of their respective creeds, unless the number of such children in the schools warrants the appointment of a special teacher; but whether taught at home or at school they are obliged to pass an annual examination before a committee containing members of their creed. Private persons may found schools by obtaining an authorization of the Minister of Worship and Public Education, which must be granted on presentation of a guarantee of capacity and morality from the proper prefect. All such schools and teachers, however, are superintended by the state as directly as the communal schools. According to the decree, education is compulsory under penalty of fine, but this provision has never been executed, chiefly owing to the lack in some instances of any communal schools. The educational societies referred to consist of "The Children's Friends Society," founded in 1837, for girls, and which also supports elementary schools in some of the poorer communes; the "Association for the Propagation of Greek Literature," founded in 1869, which maintains schools in the Greek countries under Turkish rule; the "Friends of the People Society," founded in 1865, which maintains evening schools for workingmen; the "Literary Club 'Parnassus,'" founded in 1865, which does a work corresponding to our Young Men's Christian Associations, besides maintaining "Poor Infant Schools"; and the "Hellenic Professorial Association," founded in 1873, which is devoted to the science of teaching, and has "instituted competitions for the composition of works on teaching," and carries on a Review treating of reform in educational work.

—Those who have read Ebert's 'Allgemeine Geschichte der Literatur des Mittelalters im Abendlande,' the first volume of which, extending to Charlemagne, was published at Leipzig in 1874, will be glad to hear that the second volume has recently appeared. The sub-title is, "History of the Latin Literature from the time of Charlemagne to the death of Charles the Bald" (Leipzig: F. C. W. Vogel. 1880). Another volume will be necessary to complete the history of the Carolingian period—the sixth book containing the history of the national literatures (in this case the Germanic ones alone) to the death of Charles the Bald; and the eighth, the literature of both fields, the Latin as well as the national, to the end of the period. The present volume fully sustains the expectations raised by the first. It is marked by the same profound research and luminous method, and will be found a trusty guide through the tangle of ecclesiastical literature, which is occasionally relieved by an interesting chronicle or life of a saint. The revival of studies under Charlemagne and their decline after his death are treated in two careful introductions. Especially valuable are the elaborate biographies, scattered through the work, of such widely known writers as Alcuin, Paulus Diaconus, Rabanus Maurus, Johannes Scotus Erigena, etc. We can but express an earnest wish that the author may live to complete a work of such inestimable value to all students of the early Middle Ages.

LADY LAURA: AN AGNOSTIC'S TRACT.

"THERE is a religion for us as well as for our fathers. A religion of humanity that will use these things (systems of philosophy, science, art, and industry) as the religion of God used and controlled them in the past. It is much simpler than any system, and at the same time much harder, for like the religions of the past it is made up of devotion and self-sacrifice, of prayer and dependence on the one side, of mercy and help on the other. We have dared to say that man must no longer look to God for help. We must not stop there. We must go on to say: All that man once asked of God he must ask henceforth of his fellow. All that man believed God to be in the past he must himself be in the future. That is the new covenant. We must be gods on earth or we shall be eternally condemned for having hinted that there is no God in heaven."

Thus speaks, preaches, or rhapsodizes Cassandra Gwinn and sums up, if a lady so wordy can be said to sum up anything, the moral of Miss Christie's tract. For after all 'Lady Laura,' though unlike in doctrine to the ordinary religious novel, is in spirit (we speak quite seriously) a tract; and Miss Christie is, whether she knows it or not, a descendant, though an odd one, of the whole line of edifying story-tellers of whom Mrs. Opie, Hannah More, and Mrs. Sherwood were the representatives in the past generation. Indeed, there is something quaint in Miss Christie's family likeness under all apparent dissimilarity to the revered friends of our childhood. She, like them, writes with a distinct purpose. With her, as with them, the moral of her tale is the really important matter to the writer, whatever it may be to the reader. She, like her predecessors, exhibits a singular naïveté in the mode of introducing edifying reflections. She must pardon us for saying that when we hear of Cassandra's "little book," in which she chances so opportunely to have written down for the ultimate use of her cousin a lot of eloquent prayers addressed to no God, we are irresistibly reminded of one John, the pious man-servant of 'The Fairchild Family,' who was so well provided with devotional material that when Master Henry fell (through his innate naughtiness) into the pigs' wash and was with difficulty saved from drowning, the excellent footman at once produced (from his little book, we presume) a hymn and prayer appropriate to the occasion. Nor is the purpose of Miss Christie essentially different, as might at first sight appear, from that of the older writers. She is as much bent as was, say, Mrs. Sherwood on converting her readers to "the truth." She is as earnest as any religious writer in warning men and women against the snares of the world and the flesh, even if she can hardly be said to think much of perils arising from the devil. She, in common with every moral teacher, cautions those who will hear her against falling below their own ideal. Her whole attitude in regard to Maurice Herne, the young free-thinker, who, after an early manhood, sacrificing his prospects to his principles, disappoints, through want of courage and decision, the hopes of his youth, is very much that which Miss Sewell or Miss Yonge might occupy towards some imagined clergyman whose later life disappointed the hopes grounded on the religious fervor of his early years.

* 'Lady Laura. By Mary Elizabeth Christie.' In 3 vols. Strahan & Co.

Miss Christie, again, is very likely to meet with the fate which has before her time befallen religious novelists. She has considerable literary skill and can sketch in outline characters which, if not striking, have yet a certain individuality, and can write a story which, though very defective as a tale, yet contains some impressive situations. Readers will pick out the story and miss the moral reflections. We fear that we used thus to serve the excellent Mrs. Sherwood. We have certainly a far keener recollection of the minor incidents of 'Henry Milner's Life' than of the didactic remarks copiously interspersed with the biography of that child "brought up not after the manner of this world." Yet, though it will doubtless be Miss Christie's fortune to find her novel read whilst her teaching is skipped or forgotten, she is so obviously in earnest about her work, she is so clearly convinced that her message to mankind is of supreme importance, she stands in such a different position from writers who treat the deepest problems of religion and morals as subjects on which to display their intellectual ingenuity or supposed literary deftness, that we intend to deal with Miss Christie's work as it will not be dealt with by one reader in a thousand. We shall dismiss her story and consider what is the worth of her theories, or rather, for we have no inclination to enter into a theological discussion, consider whether Miss Christie's teaching is likely to produce the effect she expects from it. We do not affect for a moment to be horrified at anything she says. We doubt whether many young ladies living in English vicarages and teaching Sunday-schools with ardor are, like Cassandra Gwinn, disbelievers in the doctrines which they teach, but that there are some such persons is more than probable, and we are pretty sure that there is a considerable number of men who occupy intellectually a position not unlike Maurice Herne's. We fully agree, further, with Cassandra and, as we suppose, with Miss Christie, in holding that it is clearly desirable that men and women should act up to their beliefs, whatever these beliefs may happen to be, and, above all, that they should be honest with themselves and with others. We have, further, no wish to start any rival theory, religious or non-religious, in opposition to Miss Christie's perfervid agnosticism. Our only object is to criticise her views, just as we might criticise the opinions of Hannah More or Mrs. Sherwood, or as we have in another number criticised the creed of Bunyan, and consider whether her doctrine is or is not likely to produce any great effect on mankind.

The peculiarity of "agnostic piety," odd as the expression seems, is not precisely that it sets to itself a different object from that of ordinary religious exposition; the enthusiastic if too verbose Cassandra occasionally, indeed, uses expressions which one, say, of Miss Yonge's heroines might conceivably address to some pupil who is the subject of their hopes and fears. "Promise me," she says to Maurice, "that wherever and whenever we meet here on earth or hereafter, if there be a hereafter, promise me that when we meet and I look into your eyes, I shall see the light burning within and know that the glory of God has not departed from you." It would perhaps be wiser if reformers who have thrown off theological beliefs would, even at some rhetorical sacrifice, discard theological expressions; still, we take this language as embodying the truth that Miss Christie is as anxious as any evangelical or Anglican authoress to press on her hearers the obligation of cultivating the highest and best part of one's nature. The essential feature of agnostic teaching is the means by which it proposes to convert or elevate mankind. Its theme is that all that man once asked of God he must ask henceforth of his fellows, and that the motive power by which men are to be stirred and elevated is sympathy. It is not, in short, an unjust summary of Miss Christie's doctrines to say that sympathy with man is henceforth to perform the part of faith in God, and that such sympathy, stimulating men towards the service of mankind, is to form the religion of humanity.

Now, to an outside critic the obvious remark at once suggests itself that the preachers of the religion of humanity stand at a great disadvantage as compared, say, with the Methodists. These religious revivalists appealed to sentiments of which the mass of their audience admitted the force. The language of the reformers themselves is, no doubt, that their hearers were cold, dead, unbelieving, and the like. But such terms, though natural and true in the sense in which they were used, conceal the fact that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the men and women who traced their new birth to the evangelical movement admitted, in theory, the soundness of the principles to which their teachers appealed. The task of Wesley and his friends (and the same thing holds good, in its degree, of all modern reformers) was to give new life to admitted truisms; they were not called upon to establish the validity of doctrines which their audience did not in any sense believe. The agnostic stands in a different position. He cannot appeal to theological beliefs which he has himself ceased to share. He preaches what, to take the most favorable view, is a new religion. Whether he can gain acceptance for the very elements of his faith is open to doubt. At any rate, the preacher who is occupied in establishing the validity of his principles stands on a different and less favorable standing-ground than that occupied by the preacher whose whole efforts are directed to the task, sufficiently difficult in itself, of bringing home to men's consciences principles already admitted by their intellect.

Most men, however, it will be said, feel sympathy with their kind and recognize the duty of caring for their fellows. This assertion is undoubtedly true, and such truth as it contains forms the essential basis for the religion of humanity; but this very assertion, in spite of its partial truth, suggests a further difficulty. Is not more stress laid upon "sympathy" than the feeling—real as it is—will bear? The capacity for sympathy is limited and fitful. To speak the plain truth, there is much in all men with which no one can, one may perhaps say no one ought to, sympathize. Whoever wishes to see the truth should dismiss such terms as mankind, humanity, and the like and turn his mind towards definite human beings, his brother, his nephew, his cousin, his most intimate friends, or his casual acquaintance. Can he candidly say that with such definite, concrete, flesh-and-blood human beings he is, or indeed can be, wholly in sympathy? We all know what must be the answer. Miss Christie herself is like other writers, far nearer the truth in her painting of character than in her moral platitudes. Cassandra, who is the prophetess of sympathy, is on cold terms with her sister, despises her mother, abominates her father, and has a contemptuous affection for the cousin whom she loves, and a sentiment which in real life would certainly not be sympathy for the other cousin who has robbed her of her lover. Is it, again, at all certain that the attempt, even when successful, to extend sympathetic sentiments may not also fatally increase the insatiable craving for sympathy which one may fairly suspect to be rather the weakness than the strength of the present age?

Another feature, and in some respects the most striking feature, of our author's religious teaching is the bold acknowledgment that men need happiness. "People can't do without happiness. To be unhappy is to be maimed, diseased, stunted, to have one's heart soured, to have one's life turned into temptation. People must be happy." This doctrine contains far more truth than most of the platitudes about the good effects of calamity or affliction, but the difficulty at once occurs to one whether this religion of humanity, with all its supposed self-sacrifice and devotion, is adapted to secure happiness, which after all, if it exist at all, must be the private and particular happiness of Tom, Dick, and Harry, and not of any logical entity such as humanity or mankind. Here, again, Miss Christie the novelist is at war with Miss Christie the preacher. Hardly a personage in her tale is happy. Cassandra is miserable, and has caused the misery of those she loves. Her two lovers are, each in his way, unhappy. By what may be termed a fiction of romance Laura is supposed to attain felicity. But even Miss Christie feels the supposition to be utterly unreal. Laura has lost her own faith and has gained no other. She is parted for ever from Cassandra, her bosom friend. She has been once driven to the brink of the grave by jealousy which certainly was not groundless. She knew or must have known that her husband repented of his marriage, and cursed his blindness in not recognizing Cassandra's superiority until it was too late for him to accept her love. Any woman in the position of Lady Laura would feel herself doomed to wretchedness. It is idle to pretend that she could have been happy. It is vain to suggest that existing religions do not secure human happiness. The reply is obvious. They do not profess to secure happiness in this world and they do hold out hopes of it in another. The religion of humanity is intended to secure the blessedness of human beings while living in the only world of which it takes cognizance. If it fails in this it fails of at least half its promise. Nor can it be said that the miseries depicted in 'Lady Laura' are mainly owing to the vicious constitution of society. Some may be traced to this source, but the greater number are surely due to the very nature of human beings. Given the facts of the case, it is almost impossible to see how a man like Maurice could have failed to cause misery both to Laura and Cassandra. When, moreover, you once turn your mind to the question of individual happiness, a doubt arises whether the apostles of the religion of humanity are not really at war with the nature of things? Every sensible person will admit that men do care for the welfare of their neighbors, and that deliberate egotism is not in general conducive to individual happiness. But every one not blinded by a theory must also admit that a care for one's own happiness, one may say a predominant care, is also an essential part of the constitution of man. Is it at all clear that the best or wisest men will, in the long run, adopt the creed, and still more the practice, of arduous self-sacrifice which Cassandra preaches with such fervent confidence? She, in common with teachers of very different schools, does not allow nearly enough for the strength of the position held by men who form no elaborate theory of life, who admit that much is uncertain and that something or even a great deal is due to others, but at the same time act more or less consciously on the view that each person must, avoiding all extreme theories, seek his own happiness through the free development of his talents and capacities, in a world where at the best happiness is capable of but very imperfect attainment.

It's common sense and can't be sin
To take it as we find it;
The pleasures to take pleasure in,
The pain, try not to mind it.

CAMPAIGN BIOGRAPHY.*

AT the time of the last Presidential campaign we endeavored to state the principles on which campaign biographies are now generally constructed. They differ from ordinary biographies from the necessity of the case. Presidential nominations being generally accidental, and the lives of the candidates down to the period of their selection being frequently involved in great obscurity, it becomes the duty of the campaign biographer to make a career out of such materials as are at his command, and to construct it at the same time in such a way that it will appear that the nomination is the natural consequence of everything that has gone before, the goal towards which all the candidate's acts, thoughts, and words have naturally carried him, and not the sudden and unexpected result of a throw of the political dice. The campaign of 1876 did not yield as good a crop of pure campaign biography as the present one seems to promise. Mr. Tilden was not at the time of his nomination either an obscure or accidental candidate, and Mr. Hayes was fortunate in having for a biographer Mr. W. D. Howells, whose literary sense and taste caused him to avoid in his account of the Republican candidate's life playing the part which the assumption of such a task generally involves. In the present campaign General Hancock's position is certainly more accidental than Mr. Tilden's in 1876, but at the same time he has long been looked to as a probable candidate of the Democratic party, and the events of his military career are part of the history of the country. Neither can General Garfield be called anything but a well-known public man. His political life covers a long term of years; his speeches in Congress have dealt with a great variety of subjects; he has for some time been a leader of his party. At the same time he must be regarded as an accidental candidate. He was emphatically a "dark horse" before the "break." For this or some equally good reason campaign biography in his case seems to have run riot. The writers of his life, instead of confining themselves to a discussion of the record he has made as a public man, give themselves up to their subject with a wild exuberance of fancy which shows, if not General Garfield, at least campaign biography at its best. In the case of General Hancock, on the other hand, curiously enough, with plenty of incidents of an exciting character, the authors of the books whose titles are given below seem to have imposed upon themselves a severe restraint.

The first part of Mr. Riddle's book was prepared, as he tells the reader, two years since for a history of Geauga and Lake Counties, Ohio, and has been inserted as it originally appeared. This part covers the life of its subject down to his election to Congress. The second part contains an account of his subsequent career, an examination of the charges against him, and an analysis of his character. Mr. Riddle's style is very peculiar. It may be difficult to say whether it is a better or a worse style than that of Mr. Bundy; but an extract from it will show its character. The following is a description of General Garfield: "Himself a force, simple and sweet as a child to whom God is and the heavens are—one who will never largely depart from the great simples, the spirit, the life, and significance of things." With regard to his intellect: "His is an intellect of great creative power, capable of quarrying a mountain and throwing up a temple in a single day. Every great monolith would be polished and inscribed with classic legend, the whole chastely garlanded by fancy, and bearing rare flowers of poetry."

As Mr. Riddle very justly observes, "one likes to know the methods of such a man," and these are his methods: "He must have plenty of rich, red blood. His power of work can be estimated by the hints and glances, rather than a full survey, we have taken of it. He seldom, almost never, writes a speech. He walks as he thinks, and thinks in words which he speaks aloud, accompanying the expressive parts with the swing of that left hand, the gift of Eliza Ballou."

One of the curiosities of campaign biography is the importance which the writers always seem to attach to ancestry. Of course in ordinary biographies a good deal of attention is paid to the subject's family, ordinary biographies being written upon the theory that birth, parentage, and ancestry have an important bearing in shaping any man's life. In campaign politics, however, this influence is generally ignored or treated as non-existent, because it is important for the magnification of a political career that it should seem to have no adventitious aid from inherited qualities or aptitudes. The motto selected for General Garfield's campaign is generally "From the Tow-path to the White House"; and, of course, the transition is much more startling and impressive if our first introduction to the hero is actually made upon the tow-path. Nevertheless, here the biographer generally fails to meet the requirements of his task and falls into the error of tracing with considerable care the pedigree of his subject. Thus, it is not surprising to find Mr. Bundy devoting a chapter to what he calls General Garfield's "noble ancestry." By this he does not mean, as he distinctly says, that the name of Garfield has been found "in court chronicles or books of the peerage across the water," but that the Garfield family have always been distinguished for noble qualities of one kind or another, and, as he poetically says, that "the most wonderfully developed specimen of American manhood in this country has come to his present commanding position as legitimately by the help of as favorable influences and by virtue of as inexorable laws as the big pines of the Yosemite." The fact is that very little is known about the family or its origin. General Garfield was born in a log-cabin on an Ohio "clearing," and his early circumstances and surroundings cannot have been very different from those of other Ohio boys born of families which settled in the West in the early part of this century. Mr. Bundy says that his father on the occasion of a fire which broke out in the woods fought it "like a viking"; but this is only Mr. Bundy's poetical way of saying that his father did what he could to put the fire out. Indeed, we have some doubt whether he fully understands what the word means, for he afterwards applies it to the son and calls him his mother's "young viking." It is hardly worth while to go over in detail Mr. Bundy's account of General Garfield's childhood and youth. The story is substantially the same in all the lives before us. His adventures upon the canal, at college, and afterwards as a teacher seem to have been commonplace enough; but if the reader wishes to see how commonplace incidents become glorified in the light of subsequent success he cannot do better than study Mr. Bundy's earlier chapters. The volume contains an appendix giving an extract from a number of the Phrenological Journal, from which it may be inferred that the phrenologist and the campaign biographer in their analysis of General Garfield's mental characteristics reach curiously identical conclusions.

General Brisbin's book gives more attention to General Garfield's military than to his civil career, probably for the reason that his service in Congress has not a specially sensational or exciting character. While the record of his speeches shows that he has expressed decided views on most of the subjects which have occupied the attention of the country during the last twenty years, the debates of which they form a part have rarely been of a character to attract attention after the occasion has gone by which gave rise to them. General Brisbin has accordingly fallen back upon Gen. Garfield's military career, and has done his work in a masterly manner. His accounts of the battles in which General Garfield took part are not written in that dry, historical fashion which his other biographers have adopted, but are magnificently picturesque and dramatic. How accurate they may be is a question, of course, of minor importance. His accounts of the battle of Middle Creek, Chattanooga, and Missionary Ridge will be found of great interest, and are full of details which lend vividness and reality to the scene. All this part of the book would be greedily devoured by boys of twelve or thirteen. The story of the Republican candidate's childhood, as given by General Brisbin, reads like the beginning of a novel. "Abram Garfield, worn out with a night of bitter toil, bead-drops of perspiration standing upon his forehead and coursing down his heated, cinder-stained cheeks, walked to his home with a weary step. All night long the fires had ravaged the woods surrounding his little homestead, and all night long, assisted by the stout arms of his neighbors, he had valiantly fought the flames that threatened his all, twenty acres of good wheat growing on land he had himself cleared around his cabin." This volume, like most of those below, contains a picture of the home of General Garfield's childhood. We regret to say, however, that on comparing this with the log-cabin in the other volumes we observe important differences in the construction and details of the edifice, which seem to show that there is some uncertainty as to its exact architectural character. Of the various homes thus presented to the reader, the cabin as reconstructed by General Brisbin is, perhaps, most like an actual cabin in an Ohio clearing. That of Mr. Bundy is by far the neatest and most picturesque, closely resembling, as it does, the log-cabin as we see it at State fairs and centennial exhibitions. General Brisbin adds to his volume a few pages containing an account of Mr. Arthur, from which it seems that his career has been mainly that of a lawyer, though his political life is said to have been begun at the early age of fourteen.

President Hinsdale's biography is the best of those before us. He is an intimate personal friend of General Garfield of many years' standing, and has endeavored, as he states in his "introduction," to present the Republican candidate for President to his readers as a public man. His volume also contains a variety of other political information for campaign use, and a sketch of General Arthur is also included. Our impression as to the somewhat mythical character of the accounts given of General Garfield's childhood and youth, by his other biographers, is confirmed by what Mr. Hinsdale tells us with regard to this part of his life. He quotes Mr. Bagehot as saying, with regard to an interesting political anecdote of Lord Melbourne, "I cannot vouch for its truth; Lord Melbourne's is a character about which men make stories," and suggests that men like also to make and tell stories about General Garfield's early life, a tendency of which plenty of proof will be found in these volumes. Mr. Hinsdale's account of General Garfield's public life will be found interesting and valuable. It is written, however, in altogether too low a key for a campaign biography, and neither thrills the nerves nor stirs the blood. General Arthur comes in for a very slight notice, taken from the New York Times.

Mr. Edmund Kirke is an imaginative writer, and by this very fact well qualified for the task of campaign biography. It seems that in the early part of the year 1863 he passed several weeks with General Rosecrans in Tennessee, and there met for the first time General Garfield, then Chief-of-Staff of the Army of Cumberland. Circumstances threw them together, and "probably no two men ever came to know each other better in six weeks' intercourse than we did." . . . "Thrown thus closely together, it was natural for two men to open their hearts to each other. He opened his to me—told me the story of his life, of his early battle with poverty, his later struggles in securing an education, and his subsequent brilliant career in the Ohio Senate and in the war, which career had just been crowned by his wonderful campaign in Eastern Kentucky. The man's noble nature won my affections and his remarkable story fascinated my imagination, and I determined to write his life as an example and encouragement to other young men who might be engaged in a like hand-to-hand struggle with adverse circumstances." For various reasons the writing of the book was postponed until 1880, and Mr. Kirke states that "it is the result of a careful gathering and sifting of material during a period of fully seventeen years, in all of which time I have intimately known and closely observed the career of this most interesting man among the public men of this country." Mr. Kirke gives the early facts in General Garfield's life in great detail, and we have been particularly pleased with his manner of treating what we may call the tow-path period in his subject's life. It was, it seems, while he was engaged in the job of chopping twenty-five cords of wood for a farmer in the township of Newburg, for which he was to receive the paltry sum of $7, that his imagination was fired by the distant view of Lake Erie. He had already made himself familiar with the contents of such standard works as 'Sinbad the Sailor,' the 'Lives of Eminent Criminals,' the 'Pirate's Own Book,' and Marryat's novels. These volumes had their natural effect, and while chopping his twenty-five cords of wood he began to dream of life upon the ocean, and "determined to go out into the great world and carve out for himself a destiny—where carving is easy—on the breast of the waters." At length he announced to his mother his intention of beginning life as a sailor, and shortly afterwards left home, walked seventeen miles to Cleveland, and, going to the docks, "sat down on the head of a pier and looked out on the great lake heaving and foaming and rolling in broken waves all about him. He watched it creeping up the white beach and gliding back, singing a low hymn among the shining stones or muttering hoarse cries to the black rocks along the shore, and then looked out on the white sails that were dancing about all over its bosom. His mother's little cottage and the lonely woman herself—even then, it may be, seated in the open doorway, looking up the road for his coming—faded from his sight as he gazed, and he stepped down upon one of the tossing vessels." This vessel, it seems, was a "fore-and-aft schooner" with a drunken captain who was probably much more like the pirates that young Garfield had read about than the author of the 'Pirate's Own Book' would have admitted. On the boy's application for employment on board the captain drove him off the schooner with a volley of oaths. But this rebuff, Mr. Kirke says, "did not cure his longing for the sea." He saw that "he must go through an initiatory process," and that "the quarter-deck was not to be reached except by successive steps upward." "As the lake was a step to the ocean, so the canal was a step to the lake, and he would begin with the canal." We are compelled to say, after an examination of Mr. Kirke's volume, that sceptical readers may be inclined to doubt the statement that it is the result of seventeen years' labor; but it is unquestionably an admirable campaign biography, whatever period was occupied in its preparation. The military portion of it is particularly good. The author's military style is only rivalled by that of General Brisbin.

Mr. Balch says in his preface that his book is a compilation of maxims "taken entirely from the public utterances of the Republican nominee for the Presidency." "Maxim" is a much-abused word, and Mr. Balch has permitted himself a very wide latitude in its use. Many of the quotations contained in his volumes are no more maxims than the contents of standard "speakers" are maxims. For instance, at page 9, under the head of "Science," we find the following: "We no longer attribute the untimely death of infants to the sin of Adam, but to bad nursing and ignorance," while under the head of "Railroads" is given this sentence: "The American people have done much for the locomotive, and the locomotive has done much for them." The following can hardly be called a patriotic maxim: "I doubt if any man equalled Samuel Adams in formulating and uttering the fierce, clear, and inexorable logic of the Revolution." The fact is that Mr. Garfield, while having a good deal of oratorical power and effectiveness as a speaker, has not a particularly terse and sententious style, and consequently very few of the things that he has said in Congress have taken the form of maxims at all.

The biographies of General Hancock, as we have stated above, are mainly occupied with his military career. They are written more simply and less imaginatively than most of those devoted to General Garfield, and, of course, a simple account of a fighting general's career is the best. His civil record is still to be made, and it seems hardly worth while to say much about that branch of these biographies now. His biographers, from the way in which they have done their work, seem to have abandoned at the outset all idea of entering into the usual competition with the rival candidate. Perhaps, after looking over all these volumes, the chief feeling left in the reader's mind is that of simple wonder that such a crop should be produced once every four years in any civilized country. They bear to literature somewhat the relation that a stump speech bears to oratory. The audience is large and attentive; the subject is exciting; the interest is intense while it lasts. But it cannot last long. The life of campaign literature can be no longer than the campaign itself. One short month and the stump speeches will be forgotten sound and fury, and the campaign lives will be waste paper. Some one will have been elected, and whoever he is, of one thing we may be pretty certain, that he will not much resemble either of the dolls labelled "Garfield" or "Hancock," whose lives are given in these volumes.

TCHIHATCHEF'S 'SPAIN, ALGERIA, AND TUNIS.'*

THE series of letters addressed by M. Tchihatchef to the late Michel Chevalier, and which under the above title constitute a large octavo volume of six hundred pages, will be heartily welcomed, not only by those specially interested in the countries of which they treat, but by all who are desirous of obtaining ample information concerning a portion of the earth's surface about which they have been hitherto more or less ignorant. The object of the work, it will be inferred from the preface, is to present its readers with the impressions de voyage of a traveller whose mind is free from the preconceived notions which so frequently encumber the observations of tourists, and therefore to present in their natural light the aspects of countries whose historians have been more or less influenced in their narrations by national prejudices. The author's intimate acquaintance with the most recent materials bearing directly or indirectly on his subject, whether contained in published volumes or collected in the transactions of learned societies, together with the desire to impart mainly that which is new, has given his work a vigor and freshness which eminently distinguish it from the large majority of similar books of travel. Chapters i. and ii. briefly summarize personal experiences in the more interesting portions of the Iberian peninsula, and afford us a glimpse of some of the most characteristic traits of the Spanish people. Their reserved and dignified bearing both in public and private life, and the profound sentiment of respect which they entertain toward each other and for strangers, are sharply contrasted with the habits of other civilized nations, and more especially the English, who, in M. Tchihatchef's eyes, represent one phase of civilization while at home in the streets of London and quite another the moment their feet have touched the shores of the Continent. A possible thrust at American manners is contained in the remark, p. 16, "Ce n'est pas en Espagne qu'on verrait dans les réunions parlementaires les députés prendre de telles poses que la salle, vue d'en haut, laisse apercevoir autant de jambes que de têtes presque au même niveau." Chapters iii.–xix., devoted to Algeria, constitute the bulk of the volume, and will be found particularly valuable from the number of suggestive comparisons which the author's careful studies have enabled him to make.

Contrasting the results of British colonization in British India with those of French colonization in Algeria, M. Tchihatchef does not fail to see a very decided advantage in favor of the latter, and therefore repels with some warmth the assertion made by many, and notably by the French themselves, that France is as yet unequal to the task of colonization. The brilliant future of Algeria is to be inferred from the rapid strides which statistics prove to have marked the progress of almost every branch of industry connected with the improvement of the people and the country. The remarkable advance in the state of agriculture, which previous to the French occupation was beneath consideration, is most obvious in the fact that the exportation of grain and pot-herbs, which only commenced in 1871, reached in 1876 the value of 50,000,000 francs. The number of acres devoted to their cultivation (20,000 hectares in 1850) was estimated in 1875 at about 7,500,000

* 'Espagne, Algérie, et Tunisie. Lettres à Michel Chevalier. Par P. de Tchihatchef, Correspondant de l'Institut de France.' Paris: Baillière et Fils. 1880.

(3,000,000 hectares). Although the present mining industry represents but a mere fraction of the total development of which it is capable, the returns for the fifteen years covering 1859–73 show results which, if not quite as satisfactory as those derived from the data of agriculture, nevertheless equally prove determined efforts made to expand the resources of the colony. The total mineral production, which in 1859 was valued at only 860,000 francs, rose to nearly 6,000,000 francs in 1873. The exports of iron, which is mainly derived from the metallic mass of Mokra, were estimated in 1874 at 500,000 tons (460,000,000 kilogrammes). Public instruction is said, on the authority of General Chanzy, to be, as regards the European population, on a par with that in the most advanced of European countries, the total number of pupils in the primary and secondary schools being upwards of 69,000 out of a total foreign population of 353,000, or about seventeen per cent. The indigenous population, on the other hand, numbering nearly 3,000,000 souls, counts but 23,000 students, or about one-thirteenth of one per cent.! An interesting fact in connection with the population of Algeria is that brought out by the Moniteur de l'Algérie (1877), which states that at the present rate of increase the non-French European element will very shortly surpass the French, so that in 1887 the French will number about 221,000 souls, and the other Europeans together about 250,000. The author, who decidedly favors, at least for some short future period, the maintenance of military authority, is a firm admirer of the government of General Chanzy, as well as of the general himself, and deprecates the attempts made by the home government to meddle in the affairs of the colony, more especially in its religious matters.

M. Tchihatchef's scientific observations, which embrace the fields of geology, meteorology, and particularly botany, and which are to some extent summarized in chapters xviii. and xix., and in the pièces justificatives at the end of the volume, will be equally appreciated both by the specialist and by the naturalist in general. Perhaps the only objection that can be raised against the author's numerous and valuable observations, largely derived from his own personal investigations, is the tendency to lay too much stress on the assertions of those whose researches would as yet scarcely entitle them to rank as first-class authorities. Thus, in reviewing the question of glacial phenomena (p. 430), the author, an anti-glacialist, finds ample confirmation of the views set forth by him in 'Une page sur l'Orient' in the observations of Kingsmill ("Inaugural Address to the Shanghai Royal Academy," 1877) and Campbell ('Quarterly Journal of the Geological Society,' 1879), the last of whom rejects the assumption of a general glacial epoch as such at the close of the Tertiary period, and denies in toto a cosmical explanation of glacial phenomena. The alleged absence of direct evidence of the existence of such an epoch in Algeria, China, and Asia Minor ought not to be considered as summarily disposing of the question, and, indeed, it would be difficult to harmonize Mr. Campbell's views as to the restriction of the last glacial period to the European continent with the evidence afforded by the United States. In like manner, in treating of the formation of the Sahara (p. 418 et seq.), it appears as though too much importance were attached to the theory of M. Pomel as to the continental origin of the desert, inasmuch as the discovery in the basin of fossil marine shells by MM. Desor and Charles Martins (cited by M. Tchihatchef) ought, in addition to other evidence, to place beyond doubt the former existence of a sea in that region.

In addition to the purely scientific reflections scattered throughout the volume will be found others of a more general character, which cannot fail to be appreciated by all classes of readers. On p. 362 the author cites in support of the theory advanced in his 'Asie Mineure,' as to the modern origin of hydrophobia, the fact that this affection was unknown in Algeria prior to the French occupation, and calls attention to the equally remarkable circumstance that in Constantinople, par excellence the city of dogs, the canine race enjoyed perfect immunity from rabies up to the time of his visit, twelve years ago. Equally interesting, perhaps, will be found the statement, on p. 442, that the camel was almost unknown in the north of Africa previously to the Christian era, its presence even in Egypt being rendered somewhat questionable by the complete absence of figures illustrating this animal on any of the ancient monuments of the country. Chapter xxi., relating to Tunis, embraces a careful summary of the arguments brought forward in favor of and against the Roudaire plan of submerging a portion of the northern desert. Doubtless many who are in search of a new winter resort, and of a locality where life may be conveniently prolonged, will be attracted, by the enthusiastic accounts of the climate of Algiers, to a city where, according to Dr. Bertheraud, the number of centenarians is comparatively nine times as great as in France, Italy, Germany, Switzerland, Belgium, Holland, and Sweden.

It is to be regretted that a work of such importance as the one before us should not have received a more accurate revision before its final publication; especially ought more care to have been bestowed upon the correct orthography of foreign names. On p. 19 we note "Subaran" for Zurbaran, and on pp. 35 and 36 "Neaper" for Napier. We would also call attention to "Descloizeau [x]," p. 390; "Marsch," p. 412; "Riadorf" for Rixdorf, "Gambridge" and "Bayd Dawkins," p. 417; "Richthoven," p. 430; "Napal" for Natal, p. 460; "Deut[s]ch," p. 463; and "Sizzim," for Sikkim, p. 467. A writer rejoices in the name of Bourjot on p. 94 and Bourgeot on p. 403. The year of the destruction of Carthage is 146 B.C. and not 210, as stated on p. 536; its capitulation to P. Cornelius Scipio Major took place in the year 201. Rome was conquered by Brennus about 391 B.C. ("311" on p. 527), and Ricimer became master of the city in 472 ("412" on p. 527).

Samuel Lover. A Biographical Sketch, with Selections from his Writings and Correspondence. By Andrew James Symington, F.R.S.N.A. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1880.)—This volume consists chiefly of selections from Lover's writings in verse and prose, most of which are to be found elsewhere. Ten of the poems, however, are now first published by Mr. Symington. The biographical part of the volume is very slight, as was necessarily the case with an author who had such an uneventful life as Samuel Lover. Mr. Symington is not particularly well qualified, except by his great capacity for admiration, for the task he has undertaken. His preface begins with what is a fair example of his style of criticism and of biography: "Painter, etcher, lyric poet, musical composer, executant, novelist, and dramatist! Such an enumeration of amateur accomplishments, to say nothing of a formidable array of well-earned and acknowledged professional designations, seldom falls to the lot of one man; yet these were each and all fairly won by the late Samuel Lover, a brilliant, modest, self-reliant Irishman, who, dowered with versatile genius and capacity for work, was every whit as good, genial, and lovable as he was largely and rarely gifted." He adds, "Although not now generally known to the public, his highest art achievements were his miniature portraits." For various reasons, however, it is chiefly through his Irish peasant-songs (with what Mr. Symington calls "their unique blend of love, pathos, and humor") that his name will live. The last statement is undoubtedly true, but it is open to doubt whether fifty years hence it will be known, except to students of literature, that Lover was either painter, etcher, novelist, or dramatist.

Lover was born in 1797, in Dublin, and died in 1868, in the Island of Jersey. He was twice married, and at one period of his life was sufficiently adventurous to cross the Atlantic and make quite extensive travels in this country. As a young man he was a member of the Burschenschaft Club which Lever founded; but he never had been, as Lever had, to Germany; and it may be suspected that the humor which he introduced into the meetings of that association was even more purely Irish than that of its originator. The name of Lever suggests the parallelism which cannot but be frequently noticed between the Irish literary activity of the early part of this century and that which made its appearance at the same time in England. There could not well be two writers more widely different in character and capacity than these two; but if Lever played the part of an Irish Scott, as the author of romances which answered the same purpose in Anglo-Irish literature that Scott's novels did in English, Lover wrote songs which in a certain way bore the same relation to Hibernian literature that Moore's did to English letters. The similarity between Moore and Lover has occurred to many critics, and Mr. Symington devotes a good deal of space to a comparison between the two. To Mr. Symington's thinking, Lover in several respects stood higher than Moore, Moore having more fancy than imagination. "Moore, though polished, bright, and sparkling, seldom dived beneath the surface. He could certainly in 'Lalla Rookh' breathe an outward Oriental atmosphere and disport himself in it like 'a creature native and imbued into the element.' Still, however pleasing, his tales are lay-figure reproductions rather than creations. We often see studied art aim at scenic effect in Moore. He is then somewhat like a fine lady conscious of her diamonds and moving solely with a view to exhibit their sparkling flash. His verse is like Rossini's music, light, airy, and popular, but seldom deep. . . . In Lover's songs imagination fuses the commonplace with the grave or the gay, raising it into the domain of art, . . . and all is borne along in tide of song. His are all natural voices of the heart, tender and true, and speaking home to the heart, instead of merely appealing to sentiment and pleasing the ear. . . . And if Moore be Rossini, Lover is more like Mozart." This comparison, it seems, Mr. Symington communicated to Lover during the latter's life, and he prints a letter received from Lover in reply. Lover agrees with Mr. Symington (in his always modest way) in thinking that there is more feeling in his verse than in Moore's, and that the quality of his songs is much more Irish; but he goes on to point out that with all these drawbacks Moore was keenly alive to the character of a melody, and that in writing verses to be sung, not merely read, he was "matchless." All this is to a very great extent perfectly true, but it seems to us that both Lover and his biographer fail to see what is the important point of difference between the two songsters. Moore possessed, unless we are greatly mistaken, an infinitely greater power and range than Lover. However much we may criticise Moore's lack of nature or genuine sentiment, or object to his artificiality, he is within his own limits a master of expression and of sentiment; and this can hardly be said of the author of "Molly Carew." Lover was always more or less an amateur in literary work. His stories are amateurish stories. His sketches of Irish life are amateurish sketches. Even his songs, as we read or hear them now, sound more like the clever performances of a ready amateur than the melodies of a man who wrote songs because he was born to do so. It is unfair to compare Lover's poetry with Lever's, as it is his prose, for any other purpose than to emphasize this distinction; but if the comparison is made, with what a pale light such stories as the "Gridiron" or once popular songs like "Rory O'More" shine when placed by the side of the vigorous and masculine performances of the rollicking author of 'Charles O'Malley.' Lover's literary fame was undoubtedly greatly magnified during his lifetime by his great variety of general accomplishments. He not only wrote simple, natural, pathetic songs with a real touch of the national humor, he sang them, too, and sang them both with humor and pathos. This of itself gave a reality to his melodies which they necessarily lose now that he no longer lives to impart it to them. It is difficult to imagine his fame lasting for any great length of time. "Rory O'More," which seems at its first appearance to have taken the polite world by storm, is hardly any longer a song which would be sung in drawing-rooms. 'Handy Andy' may be called almost obsolete. Lover had what would have been called in the last century a very "pretty" talent, but pretty talents have a hard struggle for posthumous fame.

Mr. Symington's volume contains, in its sixth chapter, a valuable criticism on English song-writing and an account of Lover's theories on the subject, which it would be well for all English song-writers to take to heart. The leading requisites of good English melody-writing have never been better pointed out than by him. Having a musical as well as a poetical ear he saw very clearly the difficulties which the language presents, and at the same time the way to surmount them. A song, he says, "must be constructed for singing rather than for reading, and hence it should be built up from words having as many open vowels and as free from guttural and hissing sounds as possible; in English this is no easy task." He points out, also, that a song to be a good song should have a thought in it, but, at the same time, not too much thought; that the feelings to be excited should rather be suggested than ostentatiously paraded. The number of English songs which have been spoilt from a want of attention to these principles must be enormous. Lover always adhered to them as far as he possibly could, and it was, no doubt, partly owing to this as well as to the great naturalness and simplicity of feeling expressed in them that he had such a great success. As a composer he had the gift of melody to an unusual degree. His voice was slight, but powerful in its effect from being very sweetly modulated, clear, expressive, and true. Like a genuine Irishman of his day, he gave way without restraint to his own emotions, and is said to have sung the "Angel's Whisper" with the tears trickling down his face. He belonged to a sentimental period and a sentimental race and a sentimental calling. Since his day the position given to sentiment in music has wholly changed. In the effort to reach perfection of execution sentiment has almost been banished. In reading the account of Lover's life we go back to a period in which music without sentiment was for the cultivated public no music at all. We may have gained something which Lover's generation did not possess. On the other hand, have we not lost something as well?

The Life of Agricola. By C. Cornelius Tacitus. Edited by Wm. F. Allen, A.M., Professor in the University of Wisconsin. (Boston: Ginn & Heath. 1880.)—The 'Agricola' of Tacitus, in respect both to subject-matter and literary style, is so wholesome and fascinating a book that the efforts of scholars to establish the correct text and furnish all needed comment must be especially commended. Nor can it be said that the reasonable requirements of American readers have heretofore been satisfactorily met. The editions of Professors Anthon and Tyler, however they may have been judged a generation ago, are certainly far short of what teachers and pupils now look for, while the recent edition of Mr. Stuart is but one in a series of Latin books to which, with little reference to the period or thoughts or style of the particular author, a Procrustean standard of compilation and of minute grammatical treatment has been applied. Professor Allen's superior attainments in Latin scholarship and Roman archæology, his habit of historical research, and his practical acquaintance with the actual needs of pupils exceptionally qualify him to elucidate the 'Agricola,' and, all in all, his book marks a clear advance in the history of classical editing among us.

The introduction contains the life of Tacitus, somewhat meagrely told. The public appearance of Tacitus as advocate for the province of Africa and his appointment to pronounce the discourse at the obsequies of Verginius Rufus are points of too great interest to be omitted. The date suggested for the birth of Tacitus is earlier than the one (54 A.D.) held by most investigators, and the new view is certainly ingeniously supported; but there are too many tantalizing variables in the problem to admit of a conclusive solution. In deciding upon his text the editor has acted with intelligent conservatism, deviating from the manuscript readings only when he felt forced to do so, and in all cases giving reasons for his deviations. The textual condition of the 'Agricola' is so bad that the temptation to offer what Tacitus might have written, or what, as it may seem to us, he ought to have written, is very great, and that Professor Allen has so generally resisted this temptation is one of the positive merits of his work. Two or three times, however, we think he has quite needlessly forsaken the manuscripts. Thus, we cannot justify the insertion of subiit in chapter xvii. As the previous sentence is virtually negative, que after sustinuit may well have the adversative force which it not unfrequently has in such a connection. If any change is to be made it would be less violent and more Tacitean to make an adversative asyndeton by the omission of que. And in chapter xliv. the insertion of non licuit seems to us gratuitous. Are not thought and syntax satisfied by regarding durare and videre as nominatives, and by supplying (mentally, of course) the substantive verb? In the commentary historical and archæological points are treated with unusual fulness, while comparatively slight attention is given to elementary grammatical details. This is certainly a change in the right direction. Whoever needs the many references to the various grammars and the copious translations in the editions above referred to is not yet ready to read Tacitus with much profit or enjoyment. As illustrating the editor's excellent work, we refer to his note on Mons Graupius, chapter xxix., and to his clear version of the somewhat tangled battle-piece in chapters xxxv. and xxxvi.

A minor feature which we have noticed in no other edition is the doing away with the wide typographical spacing which often rudely separates closely-connected chapters. Of course, the division into chapters at all is a modern and often misleading device. Here it is pleasing to the eye that such wholes as the harangue of Calgacus and the apostrophe to Agricola are kept together. The mechanical part of the book is in excellent taste, and the proof-reading seems to have been done with unusual care. On page 3 flores should be floreres. We trust that Professor Allen will speedily carry out his intention of editing the 'Germania,' and that these two treatises, unlike though they are in themselves and requiring very different editorial treatment, may for convenience' sake appear as a single volume.

Catalogue of the Greek and Roman Coins in the Numismatic Collection of Yale College. By Jonathan Edwards, M.D., Curator of the Collection. (New Haven. 1880.)—We heartily congratulate Yale College on having formed the nucleus of what we hope may become in time one of the important coin cabinets of the world. From a résumé of the history of the numismatic collection now at Yale, published under the supervision of the late Henry Champion, in 1863, and reprinted in the catalogue before us, we learn that for many years previous to 1860 there were a few coins belonging to Yale College deposited in Trumbull Gallery in glass cases with little attempt at order or arrangement. "The gem of that cabinet, as well as of the present, is the New England threepence. For a long time supposed to be unique, its value is not lessened by the recent discovery of a similar piece in Boston, which puts the genuineness of the issue beyond a doubt." In 1854 Mr. Thomas H. Johns, of Canandaigua, N. Y., left by will a sum of money to Yale College, the corporation consenting, however, to take over as part payment a collection of between seven and eight hundred miscellaneous coins. A better location being thought desirable, the collection was moved to the college library. In 1860 the collection was arranged by Mr. F. P. Brewer, and at first increased rapidly from contributions. The catalogue first published was a general one of the whole collection, and described 2,402 specimens. This was followed about two years later by a supplement of four pages, prepared by Prof. Brewer, giving a list of the additions made to the ancient coins in the collection between August, 1863, and February, 1865.

The present publication describes the Greek and Roman coins now in possession of the college, making a total of 3,328, and we refer numismatists to the tabulated statements showing the increase of the collection given at page iv. Eckhel's system has been adopted in the arrangement of the Greek coins; in this arrangement the "Greek Imperial" have been included. "Of specimens of the coinage of the early Romans the collection is lamentably deficient, but 82 different Roman families and 175 emperors and empresses are more or less fully represented. The arrangement of the imperial series, in a chronological sequence under the various emperors by whom the coins were issued, is the ordinary method and the one used in this catalogue." We perfectly agree with Dr. Edwards as to this system being preferable to the classification under mint-marks, a system which ought never to be adopted excepting in specimen cases set aside for special study. In the list of authorities mentioned we are surprised not to find the names of either Mionnet or Marsden. An edition of the latter author, re-edited by Mr. E. Thomas, which has recently appeared in London, would prove a valuable addition to the college numismatic library, the "Numismata Orientalia" having never been laid before the public in a better or more valuable shape than in the present edition. We regret also to see that many of the coins mentioned are illegible. These scarcely deserve a place in any catalogue, the most valuable information being naturally that found in the legend. Should Dr. Edwards at any time be called upon to issue another edition of this catalogue, we would strongly recommend to his notice the advisability of adopting one form of nomenclature. The confusion of the names of the Greek with those of the Roman mythology detracts seriously from the merit of this catalogue. We read, for instance, on the coins of Heraclea, "Obv., Head of Pallas. Rev., Hercules kneeling and strangling a lion." In this case the adoption of Heraklês seems self-imposed. On a coin of Hiero we find one catalogued as bearing the head of Zeus; another the head of Neptune. This inconsistency would have been avoided by reference to the exemplary catalogues and handbooks published by order of the Trustees of the British Museum under the supervision of Messrs. Stuart Poole and Barclay Head. The coin of Cleopatra with the head of Marcus Antonius should not have been classified among the coins of Egypt, but among the so-called family coins, and we refer Dr. Edwards for the classification of the series of the Ptolemies to the later works of Messrs. Poole, in England, and Feuardent, in Paris, on this branch of numismatics.

Following the arrangement of Cohen, Madden, and other writers, the Roman coins have been catalogued in chronological sequence. That this collection might be largely added to may be seen at a glance, but it is interesting from its iconographical value. Here it would be well to call the attention of young numismatists to Cohen's note ('Monnaies Romaines,' vol. iii., 512) on the readings of the title Antoninus on the coins of Antoninus Pius, Caracalla, and Elagabalus, and the best method of distinguishing these emperors. The arrangement of the so-called family coins is that adopted by Cohen, and may be considered on the whole the most useful, though the late M. de Salis attempted a chronological arrangement which, unfortunately for the scientific world, he was unable to complete. Cæsar was the first person permitted to engrave his portrait on the current gold and silver coinage, and this example was followed by many others, as may be seen from the coins of Sextus Pompeius. From the time of Augustus it became the exclusive right of the emperors to coin silver and gold; the Senate retaining the right of coining copper, which is usually found marked S. C. This right lasted till the time of Gallienus (A.D. 253–268), when the right of coining became the exclusive privilege of the emperors. As, however, the magnitude of the Empire demanded more than one mint, we find various mint-marks stamped on the exergue of the reverse of the coins, a list of which may be found on p. 235 of this catalogue. To give some idea of the number of mints, we find coins of Maximian Hercules, bearing on the obverse the legend IMP C MAXIMIANVS P F AVG, struck at Alexandria, Antioch, Aquileia, Carthage, Cyzicus, Gaul, Heraclea, Londinium, Lugdunum, Nicomedia, Rome, Sardica, Tarascon, and Thessalonica. Under Diocletian this vast territory was divided as follows: Gaul, Spain, and Britain were handed over to Constantius; Galerius defended the Illyrian provinces; Maximian, Italy and Africa; Diocletian, Asia, Thrace, and Egypt. The arrangement, according to mint-marks of the coinage of that time, will be valuable to students of that period of history, and the list to which we have already alluded will assist those who have not the time to study Cohen's larger work.

The Skies and Weather-Forecasts of Aratus. Translated, with notes, by E. Poste, M.A., Oriel College, Oxford. (London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880. Pp. 71.)—The first half of this book is a description, much more readable and coherent than those in astronomies, of the constellations recognized by the Greeks, which are the same as ours, excepting the smaller, fainter ones and the group named Hercules. The author's style contains just enough of imagery and obscurity to add to a subject otherwise arithmetically dry the fascination of a series of easy puzzles. The second half, the "Weather-Forecasts," are valuable only as curiosities of credulous ignorance. Of the very few which present even a plausible appearance of reasonableness not a tithe are accurate; perhaps as many more are true of the eastern shore of the Atlantic but not of the western, such as "Premonitory of wind are the heaving seas," and "When he [the sun] begins to travel with the Lion boisterous north winds periodic then fall on broad ocean"; but far the largest number of the rules relate to phenomena which are as impotent to affect weather as are the coincidences of astrology to influence human lives—such as the inclination of the moon's crescent, the "changes" of the moon, and the mythical significance of the names of the constellations. It does not increase our respect for Aristotle that it was from a treatise by a disciple of his that Aratus compiled his materials.

That we have thus far been able to speak of the book without discriminating between its Greek author and its British translator is a high compliment to the transparency of the translation. So is the fact that no one would guess that it was not an original English work were it not for a few slips of taste, such as "the sphery globe," "heavenly bears" (instead of celestial), "arm-borne she-goat," and "he safeguards his own fortunes." The form is very odd. The first nine lines are plain prose; then a few metrical lines intrude (seventeen among the first fifty); and the proportion increases steadily till it becomes thirty-two out of the final fifty lines. An example will show that the needlessness of these abrupt transitions proves that the translator attached no importance to the form. We select it from the closing paragraph:

> "Set light by none of these: confirm one warning
> By a second: two pointing to one end
> Strengthen belief; a third breeds confidence.
> And count the passing season of the year
> Among the signs: comparing the forecast with the normal promise of the stars."

Of these five lines the third and fourth are regular blank-verse, and the others could easily have been moulded into the same, with great improvement to the general effect, if ingeniously done so as not to forfeit naturalness. The preface apologizes for this mélange with charming simplicity:

"The monosyllabic character of our language causes even a prose translation to assume more or less of iambic rhythm. A little malice prepense on the part of the translator has aided this tendency. Once courted, however, the iambus intruded more than had been designed, and has prevented the following nondescript from being styled in the title-page a prose translation."

As the habitat of a meteorologist, alone among scientists, affects his doctrines, it is pertinent to add that Aratus, though writing in Greek, was a native of Cilicia in the Levant.

Story of the Thirty-Second Regiment Massachusetts Infantry. By Colonel F. J. Parker. (Boston: C. W. Calkins & Co. 1880.)—Not much need be said of this book. It is rather more readable than most regimental histories, but it contains very little valuable information. It is written throughout in the first person plural, and this gives it an air which hardly belongs to an account compiled by an officer whose connection with the regiment, as with the army, ended in the second year of the war. How far the memory of the author may be trusted is doubtful. He says that when the last hope of junction with McDowell had disappeared, McClellan "hastened to abandon the Pamunkey for the broader and safer James. The movement was actually in progress when Johnston attacked what was already the rear of McClellan's column." This is an astonishing mass of errors; for, not to mention the substitution of Johnston's name for Lee's, McClellan was not hastening to abandon the Pamunkey, but was almost in the act of attacking the Confederate army before Richmond, when the blow came. Of course the movement (of abandonment) was not in progress, and Lee (not Johnston) did not attack the rear of our column, but the right of our line, in position under Porter. It is incomprehensible that a Massachusetts colonel should give such an account of the battle of Gaines's Mills, especially at this late day.

If the book were important enough, there would need to be something said of the author's very singular treatment of his brave successor in command, Colonel Prescott: but the members of the regiment and their friends probably know the comparative merits of the two men, and as for other readers, the fair fame of the soldier killed in action, sixteen years ago, will not suffer from the silence or the slurring mention of an officer who left the service at the close of 1862, without (so far as appears) being either wounded or ill.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1880.

The Week.

THE October elections, at the present writing, appear to have resulted favorably for the Republicans in the main. In Ohio, at all events, their success has been nearly complete, the State ticket having received a plurality which has been estimated at 25,000, but will probably turn out about 10,000. Quite as important as this increase is the gain of Congressmen, the present delegation standing eleven Democrats to nine Republicans, and the next containing probably thirteen and possibly fifteen Republicans. From Indiana there is no definite intelligence as yet. Both sides claim the election of their candidates for governor, the Republicans that of Porter by about 1,000 plurality, and the Democrats that of Landers by 2,000 or 3,000. Such "claims," it is obvious, amount to nothing, and are simply biassed views of probabilities. It is possible that Landers, who suited exactly neither the Greenbackers, for whose votes he was nominated, nor the hard-money Democrats, may have been beaten and the remainder of the Democratic State ticket elected. It should be remembered that in 1876 the Republicans were at first confident of a victory, which the Democrats indeed conceded, but that the ticket of the latter proved to have some 5,000 odd majority. The canvassing machinery this year is in Democratic hands, and wary Republicans already pronounce exultation premature. The Democrats claim the Legislature, which elects a successor to Senator McDonald, a majority of the Congressional delegation, and the defeat of De La Matyr. There is no indicative news from West Virginia, but of course none is needed.

The result is nevertheless unexpected, though it is, of course, not to be considered final, and, in spite of the value attached to "moral effect"—an influence which everybody believes to be potent in the case of everybody else, but impotent in his own—the Presidential contest is still to be decided. The size of the majority in Ohio, however, shows that the "drift" of opinion is as clearly in favor of the Republicans as in October four years ago it was in favor of the Democrats. If it turns out that they have carried Indiana too, it is fair to presume either that there is no "desire for a change," or that the "business men" who control the doubtful States are powerful enough to prevent its expression, which, of course, amounts to the same thing, so far as the result is concerned. It is also plain that the Maine election was a "straw" of no service whatever, and that the West, being in a different material condition, looks upon the party now in power with complacent toleration at the least. Furthermore, the result bears witness to the wisdom of the abandonment of the plan of campaign mapped out at the Fifth Avenue Conference last summer and the substitution of even the parody of economic discussion for denunciation of the Solid South. Such "statisticians" as Senator Conkling are not especially convincing, but when they treat historical and administrative questions they make discussion possible; and if, as now seems not unlikely, the Republicans should regain the lower House of Congress, the final elimination of the "war issues" may be brought about quite as effectually as by the election of General Hancock.

The quiet with which the elections were everywhere conducted puts the terrible stories about the importation of ruffians from Eastern slums in a rather ridiculous light. Very few repeaters were arrested, and these seem to have been distributed between the parties with commendable impartiality. So far as appears there was no concerted attack upon peaceful citizens attempting to vote by Gorham's troop of red-shirted villains, five hundred strong, and we are compelled to believe their enrollment was originally a fiction of a feverish imagination. The size of the vote in both States was unusually large, and in South Carolina would, of course, afford just grounds for suspicion of wholesale frauds. The Democrats made comparatively little effort in Ohio, where, we believe, they conducted the "still-hunt" that Mr. Tilden's candidacy brought into such popular repute, but there was probably never such a campaign as that just closed in Indiana, where the entire population of the State seem to have given themselves up to the noisiest and most excited kind of political demonstrations for weeks. We suppose that "October elections" in Presidential years are as productive to the States in which they are held as the establishment of a dozen new manufactories or the opening of a trunk-line of railroad, but from the point of view of healthful politics it would be an excellent thing if those that have just taken place should be the last.

On Friday last the World published the full text of the correspondence which led to General Hancock's retirement from the command at New Orleans under the Reconstruction Acts in the month of February, 1868. The Times, which had been the first of the city press to publish the Grant-Fowler interview, had already said, editorially, that the statements in that interview relating to the removal of the Governor and Levee Commissioners by General Sheridan and their attempted reinstatement by General Hancock were not sustained by the public records. The main point in General Grant's statement, as given by Mr. Fowler and not materially changed in the subsequent interview, published in the Chicago Inter-Ocean, was that General Sheridan had removed certain officers who were about to perpetrate a great fraud on the people of Louisiana by the issue or hypothecation of levee-bonds and had appointed others in their stead, that Hancock removed Sheridan's appointees and was ordered by himself (Grant) to suspend the orders of removal, whereupon he (Hancock) asked to be relieved. This, we say, was the main point in the statement, for it was the only thing that had any moral bearing upon General Hancock—making him the tool and instrument, knowingly or otherwise, of an intended fraud upon the taxpayers of Louisiana. The remainder of the interview contained nothing but General Grant's surmises as to General Hancock's schemes for the Presidency, couched in language better suited to the horse-play of Barney Biglin and Henry D. Purroy than to grave discussion of important public matters, as, for instance: "At the Democratic Convention of that year (1864) he got a vote, and from that time he had the Presidential bee in his bonnet; when I met him afterwards his smile was so broad that you could almost see it when his back was turned."

The official correspondence as published by the World, far from showing any removal of General Sheridan's appointees, exhibits General Hancock as punishing or attempting to punish the Board of Aldermen of the city of New Orleans for the offence of disobeying one of Sheridan's orders. Sheridan had ordered, under date March 28, 1867, that no elections should be held for State, parish, municipal, or judicial officers until the provisions of the reconstruction acts should have been complied with. On the 28th of January, 1868, General Hancock learned that the Board of Aldermen were about to elect a recorder of the second district of New Orleans, an officer falling within Sheridan's prohibition as he understood it. In an official communication he called the attention of the mayor to the prohibition, and the mayor presented the communication to the aldermen, who nevertheless voted by a majority of one to go on with the election of a recorder; but before voting for the recorder two members retired from the room and left the body without a quorum. General Hancock thereupon removed the majority from office "for contempt of the orders of the district commander" and appointed others to take their places. General Grant directed him to suspend the order of removal, and he replied in the long telegrams which cost so much money. Eventually General Grant directed him to reinstate the removed aldermen, which he did and on the same day asked to be relieved from the command, on the ground that he could no longer be useful there. This is the whole of it, and the case of the Fowler interview may now be considered closed, with the addition that a Herald interviewer has learned from a high army officer that General Hancock received no vote whatever at the Democratic convention of 1864, and therefore did not get the Presidential bee in his bonnet at that time. We have to repeat that this episode in General Grant's career is a very painful one, because, owing to the conspicuous places he has filled, his fame has become to a certain extent identified with that of the country, which thus suffers from the steady process of degradation which he has been long undergoing at the hands of his political supporters. His appearance as a loose and reckless campaign story-teller is the longest step downward he has yet made.

Mr. Edwards Pierrepont, in an address at the Cooper Union, was so indiscreet as to take up this report of General Grant's Fowler interview, apparently without enquiry, and quote its very unbecoming attack on General Hancock, as "ambitious, vain, and weak," as words of wisdom. But his indiscretion did not end here. He informed the mob of New York that "it only needed a resolute leader of the populace, with courage in his heart and brains under his hat, to make the rich men very uncomfortable." This was by way of recommending "strong" or Bonapartist government, which is what all the Grant admirers really desire. But, bad as it was, it was not quite as bad as the respectful quotation of the following extraordinary language of General Grant's in this same Fowler interview, or rather the corrected edition of it. "If General Hancock should be elected," he said, "the North would submit quietly and watch closely. As soon as things begun to go wrong every Northern legislature would be convened and compel their representatives to resign or resist the Solid South." In General Grant's mouth this is the talk of a man who must be charitably supposed not to know his own meaning; but its adoption by an elderly Republican lawyer and politician, at a public meeting called to protest against the alleged secessionist, anarchical, and State-rights tendencies of the South, is certainly extraordinary. Suppose a Southern politician were to call on the State legislatures to meet when they thought "things were going wrong" in Washington and recall the members of Congress, what name should we give their action?

The Republicans have during the last week produced a "story" about Mr. English which appears to be genuine and will hold water. It seems that his grandmother was the widow of a Revolutionary officer, and thus became entitled to about $4,000 as arrears of pension, but died in 1843 without claiming it, leaving six heirs besides Mr. English himself. He became soon after a clerk in the Treasury Department, and while there discovered his grandmother's claim, went out to Indiana and obtained letters of administration in the wrong county, without notice to the other heirs, and drew the entire sum and kept it to himself. The heirs, however, two years later, found him out and claimed the money, but he refused to pay it over, pleading insolvency. They then applied to the Government for it, on the ground that the payment to their slippery cousin was not a legal payment, as he was not entitled to receive it and the amount was still due to them. This brought the transaction under the notice of William L. Marcy, who was then Secretary of War, and Isaac Toucey, who was then Attorney-General, and their letters and opinions seem to place it beyond doubt that it was a fraudulent one. There seems to be some question as to whether Mr. English has since settled with the heirs, but two of them at least were last month in pursuit of him on this account, and their letters make useful campaign documents. The comfort the Republicans are deriving from this affair is very great, as it helps to ease their minds about the Crédit Mobilier and De Golyer matters.

The Republican torchlight procession on Monday night was a great success, as far as numbers and enthusiasm go to make success. About the numbers in line there is a nearer approach than usual to concurrence in the estimate of the various daily papers, though probably no estimate is of much value. The Herald gives 52,000; the Times, 60,000; the Tribune between 40,000 and 50,000. The World, however, cruelly cuts it down to 20,000, and supplies statistics intended to show that of these only 10,000 were legal voters of this city. The Sun magnanimously makes it 30,000. There is thus a difference of 40,000 between the highest and lowest calculation, through which the imagination of the country reader is free to roam. There was much music and cheering, but little illumination. The marching, too, was excellent, and it was whispered about that most of the marchers were substantial business men. General Grant reviewed the procession from a platform in Union Square, and it must be said that he drew most of the triumph and honor of the occasion, leaving little or none for General Garfield. In fact, it was impossible to conceal or disguise the fact that the demonstration celebrated, more than aught else, the victory of the Third Term men over Garfield, and was a formal announcement of the intention to put their candidate in the field again in 1884. General Garfield's surrender to them in his letter of acceptance naturally prepared the way for this, and it is instructive to see how little it has done to abate the insolence of their attitude towards him. Meanwhile, General Grant has thrown aside all the old pretence of modesty or reluctance to serve, and now travels about somewhat in the character of a permanent candidate.

Superintendent Walker accounts for the "extraordinary gains" which the South Carolina census shows by discrediting the census of 1870, which he does with every appearance of reasonableness. It was taken, he says, under the defective law of 1850, besides which "peculiar difficulties" attended the Southern enumeration owing to the disturbed state of the country then recently in rebellion, and to the "supposed necessity" of appointing negro enumerators, who naturally exercised as little intelligence as they probably did industry in the discharge of a function for which their pay was assured in advance. General Walker's language is less pointed in deference, doubtless, to the verbal etiquette of official reports, but this is the gist of what he says. On the other hand, the present census he affirms to be trustworthy for the reason that it could not have erred through negligence or in any way except by positive fraud, and that there are found, after strict investigation, no traces of any fraud whatsoever. The lists returned to the census-office were submitted to the examination of United States officials, or of citizens vouched for by the United States Marshal or Internal Revenue Collector of the district, and, in all but two of the doubtful cases, members of the Republican party. The General concludes his report by urging various statistical confirmations of the results of his investigation, and saying that not only is there neither proof nor presumption of fraud, but proof and a strong counter-presumption of accuracy in the present enumeration. This, we imagine, is the conclusion to which most people familiar with the management of the census of 1880, and of analogous measures of all sorts in the South just after the reconstruction period, had already come. It disposes of another "campaign story."

A convention of shipowners has been sitting in Boston during the week, and has had some interesting discussion of the free-ship question. There was more support for the free-ship policy than might have been expected, but the remission of taxation on ships and shipping materials and stores, or a bounty to vessels engaged in the foreign trade, seemed to find most favor. A resolution was finally adopted asking for a bounty of so much per ton per year, both for sailing and steam ships engaged in the foreign trade, and not over fifteen years old. This is certainly the shortest and most complete remedy for the scarcity of American ships. If the bounty be only made large enough the ocean will soon be covered with them. Captain Osborn, of New York, who was strongly opposed to free ships, called attention to the influence of "British gold" on this subject, alleging that this agency was very freely used in creating opinion favorable to the free-ship doctrine. This, of course, means that it is used to subsidize the press and pay public speakers. Considering how long British gold has been at work on the public opinion of the United States—fully one hundred years—it is marvellous that the recipients of it have never been detected and exposed. No better illustration of the perfection of the corruption machinery both of the British Government and traders could be offered. We doubt very much, however, whether the perpetuation of these degrading practices will be possible in view of the rapidly-increasing detective powers of the press. Quy—Is there no way of finding out in England how much gold goes abroad annually for the seduction of foreign journalists and statesmen? The drain on the vaults of the Bank of England alone must form a very important item in the specie exportation account, because we believe the money for this purpose is always sent in coin, and never by draft, and is delivered in a bag.

The Democrats have made two attempts within the past week to resist the jurisdiction hitherto assumed by "Johnny" Davenport over naturalization papers presented by applicants for registration. The first of these was in the case of one Walsh, who applied to be registered on the 5th of this month. His papers bore date September, 1868, and the State inspector, under the advice of a supervisor, Hilt, refused the application. Hilt then refused to return the certificate, and Walsh made an application to the United States Circuit Court for his arrest, under the provision of the Revised Statutes "that every person who by any unlawful means hinders, delays, prevents, or obstructs, or combines or confederates with others to hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct, any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote, or from voting at any election in any State," shall be liable to fine and imprisonment. Judge Blatchford decided that no warrant could issue, on the ground that the refusal to permit Walsh to register was the refusal of the inspector, that Hilt had nothing to do with this, that his retaining the certificate was no obstruction, and was not covered by the provision of the Revised Statutes above quoted. On Monday an application was made before Judges Blatchford and Choate for the removal of Davenport from the office of chief supervisor, on the ground of unfitness for the position as shown by his instructions to the supervisors. The judges both thought that these instructions did not of themselves show unfitness, and consequently refused to entertain the application. In the course of their opinion, however, they gave Mr. Davenport some very wholesome advice on the subject of retaining certificates assumed by him to have been fraudulently issued. They regard his instructions on this point as "tending to a breach of the peace and totally unauthorized."

Few people will question the soundness of the second decision. The first seems more open to criticism. If taking a man's papers from him by a supervisor is "totally unauthorized," i.e., illegal, it is difficult to see why it is not an illegal act which very effectually obstructs the applicant in his attempt to exercise the right of suffrage. As to Mr. Davenport's unfitness for his position, the lawyers who endeavored to have him removed do not appear to have gone to the root of the matter. His instructions may or may not be right, but the true reason for his removal is his notoriously partisan character. The office which he administers is a judicial one, requiring for the proper discharge of its duties an even temper and a fair mind. "Little Johnny" Davenport, as he is called, is a party "worker" with no pretence to either. It was, in fact, by being a partisan that he got the office. He has done a great deal to prevent electoral frauds in New York, but he has not done it in such a manner as to make opponents believe in his impartiality. Mr. F. R. Coudert, who was, we believe, one of the counsel in the removal case, advises all voters to yield to any supervisor's demands and not attempt resistance; to give up his naturalization papers, or his watch, or anything else that may be demanded. This is sound advice. The efforts of Democrats to "resist tyranny" and to make a bold stand for "liberty" hugely delight Davenport, and to fill a "cage" with them on election day and hear them groan and whine about their "rights" and discharge them when the voting is over is his greatest pleasure.

About three and a quarter millions of foreign gold arrived here during the week, making the total receipts of foreign specie this year $36,770,000 against $47,855,000 during the corresponding time in 1879; since August 1 the arrivals this year are $31,600,000 against $41,700,000 last year. The foreign exchange market was a little firmer at the close of the week on account of the slow movement of grain and cotton, and at the rates then ruling there was no profit in importing gold; but as the reasons for this check in gold imports are temporary they caused no anxiety respecting the money market, which continues extremely "easy" for borrowers at almost midsummer rates. The New York banks lost only $31,350 in surplus reserve last week, and their surplus is now about four times as large as it was a year ago. At the Stock and other Exchanges, as well as in trade generally, business was restricted during the week by the attention given to political affairs, partisan feeling having run about as high as ever known. There were no important changes in the foreign financial markets except a large reduction (5¾ per cent.) in the Bank of England reserve, but this is, at the reduced figures, 45 per cent. of liabilities. The price of silver bullion remains tolerably steady, and the bullion value of the "buzzard dollar" at the close of the week was $0.8739.

The Tories in England have been watching eagerly for weeks for the break-down of the "European concert" before Dulcigno. Anything that would discredit Gladstone would have been delightful to them. They liked a vigorous foreign policy when it was the Beaconsfield Ministry which was carrying it out, but in Gladstone's hands they cannot bear it. The concert certainly has borne the strain on it wonderfully well, but the English Ministry must have had many anxious moments about it during the past few weeks. A threat to bombard Dulcigno seemed as much as it was equal to, but if the Turks had stood the bombardment without surrendering and had repulsed the Montenegrins, it would have been hard to say whether the "concert" would hold out. The contingency of Turkish resistance, however, seems to have been met and disposed of by an arrangement which made England, Russia, and Italy the mandatories of the other Powers, with authority to adopt other and further means of coercion, such as the seizure of some Turkish islands, or the occupation of a Turkish port like Smyrna, and the confiscation of the revenues. There was even talk of a demonstration against Constantinople itself, but the Sultan announced that if the fleets came near him he would abdicate, and abdication would, of course, result in a general scramble for his assets. The news has now come that after another consultation with his "Cabinet" he has agreed to surrender the place without conditions, but, of course, this leaves the Greek question and the Macedonian question and the Armenian question still open, and there is no doubt that coercion will be required for them all.

There is no change in the Irish difficulty which is worth much notice. Mr. Parnell has produced a fresh development of his plan of operations, which is to agitate vigorously during the winter in order to force the Government to make his promised land bill of next session adequate to the emergency; but apparently it will not be easy for the Government to satisfy him on this point, for what he proposes is the purchase of the landlords' interest by the Government for the benefit of the tenants, who are thus to get their land in fee for nothing. If this is not done he recommends a general strike against rent-paying, and promises that if the 500,000 tenant-farmers strike the landlords will be powerless, and the Government will be unable to help them with any military or police force at its disposal. It is quite evident from the tone of the English press that the Government is a little afraid of Parnell and his scheme, and are at a loss for a reply to him. The Spectator has nothing better to promise, in case his plan should be carried out, than that the Government will wait, support the landlords, and let the arrears of rent accumulate until, apparently, the tenants get sorry and pay up, which does not seem a very terrible programme. Mr. Molinari, a Belgian economist of note, has visited Ireland and examined and reported on the situation. He tells pretty much the same story as all the economists. He thinks whatever the Government does in Ireland well done, the taxation very light, and the continuance of English rule an essential condition of prosperity. But he is satisfied that small farmers cannot make a living in Ireland—they might if they had, which they have not, the thrifty habits of the Belgians—and thinks it will be a good thing when they are extinct. At "Home Rule" he scoffs. He has published his observations in the Débats. Nothing is more striking in the present Irish crisis than the absence of all sympathy from France.

THE SILVER QUESTION IN THE CAMPAIGN.

THE tariff question has acquired a degree of prominence in the later weeks of the campaign almost overshadowing the Southern question, and, although very little intelligence has been brought into the discussion of it (except in the speech of Mr. Abram S. Hewitt at Trenton), it is an encouraging sign of the times to find politicians compelled to take cognizance of economic questions on the stump. Some little attention has been given to the matter of legal-tender notes, but scarcely any to silver, the speakers on both sides having generally agreed to ignore it by using the convenient phrase "coin" to distinguish a sound from an unsound medium of exchange. The problem thus sought to be shuffled out of sight is, nevertheless, the one that most engages the thoughts and excites the apprehensions of business men. The Republicans have an undoubted advantage in dealing with it, and now that the Indiana election is disposed of there is an opportunity for them to give it its due weight and prominence in the remainder of the canvass.

According to late reports from Washington there have been coined under the operation of the two-millions-per-month law sixty-eight millions of silver dollars, of which forty-seven millions remain in the Treasury. At the present moment there is a demand for silver dollars about equal to the monthly coinage. This demand is in consequence of an insufficient supply of small notes, and will be soon satisfied, after which the enforced product of the mint will again accumulate in the Treasury vaults. If the coinage were limited to the demand for silver —as it must certainly be after more or less suffering—no great harm could arise from the existing stock. The United States are rich enough to "carry" sixty-eight millions of silver, and that number of dollars might be permanently absorbed in the circulation by retiring all the small notes not absolutely needed for petty remittances. It is the continued mandatory coinage of two millions per month that constitutes the danger to public and private business, and compels prudent men to enquire which political party is most likely to put a stop to such folly before the mischief becomes irreparable.

The Silver Bill was passed over the President's veto February 28, 1878, by the votes (taking House and Senate together) of 93 Republicans and 149 Democrats in the affirmative against 59 Republicans and 32 Democrats in the negative, General Garfield voting in the negative. December 9, 1878, Mr. Durham, of Kentucky, introduced a bill to require the Secretary of the Treasury to receive the existing trade-dollars at par and recoin them into standard silver dollars—in other words, to buy silver bullion from China at six or eight per cent. above its true value as measured by either the gold or silver bullion of the United States. On this bill the yeas were 48 Republicans and 105 Democrats, the nays 71 Republicans and 20 Democrats, General Garfield voting in the negative. The bill did not reach the Senate. On the same day Mr. Fort, of Illinois, introduced a resolution declaring that the refusal of any national bank to receive silver dollars on deposit "shall be deemed a defiance of the laws of the United States." On this ridiculous proposition the yeas were 40 Republicans and 111 Democrats, the nays 73 Republicans and 16 Democrats, General Garfield voting in the negative. February 7, 1879, Mr. Brewer, of Michigan, proposed as an amendment to a pending bill that the Secretary of the Treasury be required to exchange greenbacks for silver dollars on the request of any holder of the latter. It was moved to lay the amendment on the table, and on this question the yeas were 104 Republicans and 25 Democrats, the nays 14 Republicans and 91 Democrats, General Garfield voting in the affirmative. June 27, 1879, Senator Vest, of Missouri, offered a joint resolution in favor of the full remonetization of silver and its free coinage by the mints of the United States. Senator Allison, of Iowa, moved to refer it to the Committee on Finance, on which motion the yeas were 19 Republicans and 4 Democrats, the nays 21 Democrats and Senator Davis, of Illinois. April 5, 1880, Mr. Weaver, of Iowa, offered a resolution requiring among other things that the mints of the United States be worked to their full capacity in the coinage of standard silver dollars to enable the Government to meet that portion of its bonded debt which shall become redeemable in the year 1881 and prior thereto. On this resolution the yeas were 1 Republican (Belford, of Colorado), 9 Greenbackers, and 75 Democrats, the nays 92 Republicans, 1 Greenbacker, and 24 Democrats, General Garfield voting in the negative.

These are all the votes taken in Congress, or in either branch thereof, since the President's veto of the Silver Bill, which can be considered important to an understanding of party divisions on the question. They show that while the Republicans were badly demoralized in the early stages of the controversy (sixty-two per cent. of them voting with eighty-three per cent. of the Democrats to pass the bill over the veto), they have to a large extent recovered their senses, while no improvement whatever has been shown by the Democrats. The latter mustered twenty-two votes in the House against the Silver Bill, and fourteen months later they cast only twenty-four votes against the Weaver resolution, which was a much more objectionable measure. They furnished nine votes in the Senate against the Silver Bill, and only four against the subsequent motion of Senator Vest, which was a much more dangerous proposition. It will be noted that the only Republican who voted for the Weaver resolution was one whose constituents are mainly producers of silver.

The inference to be drawn from this record is, that if either political party may be expected to put a stop to the enforced coinage of silver dollars before disaster ensues, it is the Republican and not the Democratic party which is to be trusted with that undertaking, and that of the two candidates for President we know that General Garfield has been right in every instance, while of his competitor we know nothing in this regard. It is not likely that the Republican party will take the responsibility of coining silver dollars at the rate of two millions per month, or at all, after the Treasury shall have been stocked with say one hundred millions. It is not likely that the Republican party will require the Secretary of the Treasury to force silver upon public creditors who do not want it, or take measures to punish banks which refuse to receive silver on deposit on the same terms with gold. What the Democratic party is likely to do if it has the power can be best deduced from what it has already done or attempted to do.

In the natural course of things, the Silver Bill continuing in force, the Treasury will become gorged with "buzzard dollars" to such an extent that there will be a popular agitation respecting the use to be made of them. The demagogues will demand that they be paid out to the bondholders and other public creditors. At present the Treasury officers draw checks on the depositaries (and principally on the Sub-Treasury in New York) for all payments to public creditors, including those entitled to interest on United States bonds. These checks pass through clearing-houses like other checks, and the balances are settled between the Treasury and the Clearing-house in the same way as between any bank and the Clearing-house. The essence of the matter is that nobody, whether bondholder, mail contractor, or what not, having claims against the Government is obliged to take any particular sort of money against his wishes. He deposits in his own bank the check he has received from the Treasury, the amount is credited in his bank-book, and to him that is the end of it. The agitation, inevitable when the Treasury becomes gorged with silver dollars, will be to compel the public creditors to receive and carry off silver—to receive it at par and carry it off at their own expense. The banks at the two principal financial centres having refused to receive it on deposit (except where the depositors agree to receive it back in payment of checks), and all the banks being driven eventually to refuse it, except upon the same conditions, the relations of the Treasury and the clearing-houses will become involved in the controversy, since nothing but bankable funds can be received at the Clearing-house. The silver fanatics, although not remarkably perspicacious, have already discerned the point of attack. During the recent session of Congress they raised an outcry against the Treasury's connection with the New York Clearing-house, alleging that this connection is part of the Secretary's "unfriendliness" to silver, instead of merely a means for adjusting the vast financial transactions of the Government in the most expeditious and economical manner.

Akin to this agitation, and a necessary part of it, will be the strife against the banks themselves for alleged violation of the law in refusing to receive silver on deposit on the same terms with gold. No formal action has been taken on this subject by the banks outside of New York and Boston, but it is not probable that any solvent bank in the United States would receive ten thousand silver dollars in a single deposit without some understanding with the depositor that he should take it back in payment of his checks, and this is the sole offence of the New York and Boston banks. So long as the silver coinage outstanding is small, and so long as the bulk of it is warehoused in the Treasury, no practical difficulty will arise; but whenever it becomes excessive in the circulation, or whenever its mass in the Treasury is large enough to be an object of popular apprehension, and therefore an inviting theme for demagogues, we may expect the war against the banks to be resumed for the ostensible purpose of compelling them to receive two articles differing in value twelve or thirteen per cent. as of the same value, their customers, the public, being allowed to demand from them silver or gold at their option. Such a demand upon the banks is really a demand that they alone, of the whole community, shall not be allowed to discriminate against silver. Everybody else may discriminate by declining to receive silver in payment of checks, or objecting when tendered to them, but the banks shall not be allowed to refuse it or make difficulties about it when tendered to them.

To break down the clearing-house system, so far as the Treasury is concerned, is the first step toward paying the bondholders in silver and getting silver into circulation in sufficient quantities to change the monetary standard from gold to silver, and make the latter, instead of the former, "money of account." It will be no easy task to accomplish this, the laws of commerce run so counter to it; but if it can be done, either by coercing the Secretary of the Treasury or frightening the banks, the significance of the change will be very great to that portion of the community who have laid up something against a rainy day. All bank deposits, savings and other, will become silver instead of gold deposits. That is, they will fall in value about thirteen per cent. Annuities, life-insurance policies, and all fixed incomes not specifically payable in gold will decline in the same ratio. The savings deposits in the State of New York alone amount to more than six hundred million dollars, and the number of depositors is about nine hundred thousand, which is about the number of voters in the State, of both political parties. Probably one-half or more of these are women and minors; but the number who are voters, and who will one day, if not now, understand the significance to them of such a change is sufficient, not merely to defeat, but to annihilate any political party in New York.

It behooves these and all others who are interested in maintaining the existing value of their savings to give heed to the antecedents and composition of political parties in the present canvass. We have shown what votes have been given by them in Congress. The conclusion is irresistible that, as regards this question, the Republican party is the safer of the two, and, if not wholly trustworthy, is much more so than its antagonist, while the course of General Garfield himself has left nothing to be desired.

THE TARIFF DIFFICULTY OF THE DEMOCRATS.

THE canvass, as might have been expected, has tended more and more from the beginning towards a simple comparison of the character and history of the two parties. The Republicans started off in the beginning with the "Solid South" cry, but without any "outrages." Without outrages, however, the "Solid South" is a little tiresome, and when the Maine election came it was found that it had lost its power to arouse Northern voters. A prompt change of tactics was then made, and the policy of "scaring the business men" was adopted, by predicting the probable course of the Democrats with regard to the "Southern claims" and the tariff. The Southern claims were disposed of by General Hancock's letter, and then there was nothing for it but to bring the tariff to the forefront of the battle, and this we believe has been done somewhat effectively in Indiana and Ohio, partly, if not mainly, owing to the Democratic want of preparation for this sort of assault. There is something very amusing and very characteristic about this want of preparation. The phrase "a tariff for revenue" was inserted in the Democratic platform apparently as a mere phrase intended to describe an article which was not kept in stock at the Republican store, but to which really no definite meaning was attached by the Democratic politicians, and which none of them was prepared either to explain or defend. The Republican attack on it, therefore, took them quite by surprise, both because of its suddenness and because of its simplicity. Far from taking the form of an abstruse economical argument, it consisted in the plain assertion, made to the workingmen, that a tariff for revenue meant the shutting up of all the furnaces, iron-mills, and factories in the country, and the reduction of the American artisans to hopeless destitution. The Democrats could not believe that a revenue tariff was really as bad a thing as this, but they were not ready to deny it with any appearance of intelligence, and had not even prepared General Hancock for any troublesome questions which might be asked him on this subject. Accordingly, when he was overtaken by a New Jersey interviewer, who wished to know what the effect of his election on the tariff would be, he was compelled to answer that "the tariff question would not affect the manufacturing interests of the country in the least," and that "his election could make no difference either one way or the other." He further added that the manufacturing classes "will have just as much protection under a Democratic administration as under a Republican one"; and, further, that the "tariff is a local affair," which is probably the darkest saying which has come from any one in the present canvass. The other oracles of the party are equally puzzled by the tariff question, and probably most of them wish heartily they had never mentioned it in the platform. The Republicans are, of course, delighted to find that they have lighted upon such a strong position and have been fortifying it with appropriate "stories," one of which is that the Cobden Club has sent over $5,000,000 in gold, in five bags, to be used in promoting Hancock's election, not knowing, of course, that his election will not affect the tariff in the least. If he had been consulted he could have told them that they were going to throw their money away. In fact the tariff is to the Republicans what Plevna was to Osman Pasha. When Osman first occupied Plevna he had not, it has been ascertained, the smallest idea of staying there or of doing anything in the place beyond having a street-fight with the Russian advance-guard. But the fight having ended successfully, he then threw up works and determined to save the Turkish Empire on that spot, and came near doing it. The Democrats, on the other hand, are probably thoroughly disgusted with themselves by this time for having said anything about a tariff for revenue, considering that for most of them a tariff for protection would do just as well, and that they could defend and explain the one just as lucidly and successfully as the other. They would have done much better not to mention the tariff at all, or to proclaim their indifference to all tariffs, or, like Horace Greeley's Convention, to relegate the whole subject to "the people in the Congressional districts." It is quite plain, too, that when the Republicans began the canvass the chiefs did not know what was the exact value of the danger with which the country was threatened, and from which they were determined to save it. Their favorite danger, and the one they were most familiar with, was the Solid South; but it was seen, after the first month, that this had lost its terrors. The revenue tariff was then tried in great haste and tentatively, and it was discovered that this was the true peril against which the country needed to be put on its guard, and almost the only danger by which any considerable portion of the community could be scared. But, of course, if this had been discovered sooner much more effective use could have been made of it, and the hideousness of a revenue tariff much more fully depicted. Of the two, however, we confess we have most sympathy on this point with the Democrats. They are really innocent men, exposed, by a very thoughtless and well-meant act, to the most odious suspicions. They would undoubtedly never have mentioned a revenue tariff if they had known it was a bad thing, or that the mention of it would hurt any one's feelings.

The way in which the two parties have at last joined issue at the eleventh hour is a striking and instructive illustration of the mode by which the leaders on both sides prepare their followers for the solemn duty of voting. There is no real interest among the managers on either side in any question of the day, and their debates in the campaign are very like the battles of the Italian condottieri, which were fought under contract, and sometimes lasted a whole day without injury to life or limb. When they rush furiously at each other about the "Solid South," and the tariff, and State rights, it is in order to entertain and move the spectators and earn their pay, and not by any means to give vent to passions or convictions of their own. They are about as well prepared to fight on one subject as another. If the orator thinks the audience would like him to groan over the fate of the poor negro hiding in the swamp, he is ready for that question; but if the audience shows signs of doubting whether the negro is in the swamp, the orator is ready to groan over the threatened extinction of American industry; and he can groan as deeply over the one as the other. Nor is he greatly to blame for this. He knows no more about the negro in the swamp than he knows about the tariff, and he has not time to learn anything. It is not possible to unite the functions or qualifications of statesman and "manager" in the same person. The nominating and electing machinery of the country has gradually passed into the hands of the men who have also to do the legislating and political thinking, and the result is that the legislating and political thinking are totally neglected through sheer want of time. Both parties in this canvass seem really to have gone before the people very much in the condition of two opposing lawyers, who come into court to try a case without any preparation, and beat about to find some topic with which to entertain the judge and jury and divert attention from their own shortcomings. The well-known tendency of gentlemen in this condition is to abuse each other personally, and we find a similar tendency among politicians who spend, in managing primaries and conventions, the time which should be given to the study of subjects. The "stories" about the bad character of the candidates, and the devotion of long speeches to an examination of party history, are too frequently a refuge from the discussion of the real questions with which the Government, no matter in whose hands it may be, will have to deal.

THE LATE PROFESSOR PEIRCE.

THE name of Benjamin Peirce, who died in Boston, October 6, has shed lustre upon mathematics and physics in America for many years. Born at Salem, Massachusetts, April 4, 1809, he was graduated from Harvard College at the age of twenty, and two years afterwards was appointed tutor. For forty-nine years he was directly connected with the faculty of the college. He published a series of text-books on pure mathematics, also a quarto volume on analytical mechanics, and a lithographed volume on linear and associative algebra, besides making numerous contributions to scientific periodicals, the proceedings of learned bodies, and the appendices of the United States Coast Survey Reports. The enthusiastic admiration felt towards him by his intimate friends was due to his moral as well as to his intellectual character. Making the concession that there was occasionally a touch of intolerance in his manner towards pretentious mediocrity, they would allow nothing in him to have been aught else than of the highest quality. Persons who could not understand a word of his abstruse speculations were compelled to listen to his earnest argument, and knew that his conclusions must be important and true even when they did not know what his conclusions were. Successive classes complained of him that he did not make himself plain to the ordinary understanding, that he was not a good teacher; yet they felt a potent influence from him stimulating them to higher efforts of the mind and to a nobler moral stand.

His published works are remarkable for the novelty or originality both of their lines of thought and of their methods. He was singularly direct and clear; the only obscurity which is ever found in his writings is that which arises from the omission of the simpler links in the chain of reasoning. But to a well-grounded mathematician this very brevity becomes an efficient source of perspicuity. No fog is more bewildering than verbosity, which never approached Peirce's writings. His mind moved with great rapidity, and it was with difficulty that he brought himself to write out even the briefest record of its excursions. In a mathematical society over which he presided for some years the contrast between him and the secretary, Prof. Winlock, was as noteworthy as the remarkable talent of both. The society comprised half a dozen other men of some reputation in Cambridge and Boston, who met to discuss purely mathematical topics. Each member would bring forth something novel in his own particular branch of enquiry, and in the discussion which followed it would almost invariably appear that Peirce had, while the paper was being read, pushed out the author's methods to far wider results than the author had dreamed. The same power of extending rapidly in his own mind novel mathematical researches, which ordinary men could have done only by days of labor with paper and pencil, was exhibited at the sessions of every scientific body and every chance meeting of a scientific character at which he was present. What was quite as admirable was the way in which he did it, giving the credit of the thought always to the author of the essay under discussion. His pupils thus frequently received credit for what was in reality far beyond their attainment. He robbed himself of fame in two ways: by giving the credit of his discoveries to those who had merely suggested the line of thought, and by neglecting to write out and publish what he had himself thought out.

Professor Peirce's activity of mind was by no means confined to the special topics of physics and mathematics. He was among the first to read any new and noteworthy poem or tale, to hear a new opera or oratorio; and his judgment and criticism upon such matters was keen and original. His interest in religious themes was deep, but it was in the fundamental doctrines rather than in the debates of sectarians; he was a devout believer in Christianity, but held to no established creed. The quickness of his observation of external things was as decided as was his power of abstraction. The plants and insects by the roadside he observed as a naturalist observes them. To his paper read, in 1849, before the American Association for the Advancement of Science the botanists and zoölogists are indebted for what will, we think, in the future progress of biology prove to be a great intellectual step in physics. He showed in the vegetable world the demonstrable presence of an intellectual plan: that what had been called phyllotaxis involved an algebraic idea; Mr. Chauncey Wright afterward showed that this algebraic idea was the solution of a physical problem. There the matter dropped, but it will not lie neglected for ever; and in future discussions the value of this and of sundry other of Peirce's contributions to organic morphology must be acknowledged.

The higher mathematical labors of so eminent a geometer must, of course, lie beyond the course of general recognition. Among the things which give him a just claim to this title may be mentioned his discussion of the motions of two pendulums attached to a horizontal cord; of the motions of a top; of the fluidity and tides of Saturn's ring; of the forms of fluids enclosed in extensible sacks; of the motions of a sling; of the orbits of the comet of 1843, Uranus, and Neptune; of the criteria for rejecting doubtful observations; of a new form of binary arithmetic; of systems of linear and associative algebra; of Espy's theory of storms; of various mechanical games, puzzles, etc.; of various problems in geodesy; of the lunar tables, and occultations of the Pleiades, etc., etc. When in 1846 he announced in the American Academy that Galle's discovery of Neptune in the place predicted by Le Verrier was a happy accident, the President, Edward Everett, "hoped the announcement would not be made public; nothing could be more improbable than such a coincidence." "Yes," replied Peirce, "but it would be still more strange if there were an error in my calculations"—a confident assertion which the lapse of time has vindicated. None of his labors, perhaps, lie farther above the ordinary reach of thought than his little lithographed volume on Linear and Associative Algebra. In this he discusses the nature of mathematical methods, and the characteristics which are necessary to give novelty and unity to a calculus. Then he passes to a description of seventy or eighty different kinds of simple calculus. Almost no comment is given, but the mathematical reader discovers, as he proceeds, that only three species of calculus, having each a unity in itself, have been hitherto used to any great extent—namely, ordinary algebra, differentials or fluxions, and quaternions. Whether the clinant algebra of Ellis would stand Peirce's tests we have not examined. But what a wonderful volume of prophecy that is which describes seventy or eighty species of algebra, any one of which would require generation after generation of ordinary mathematicians to develop! Besides his labors as professor at Cambridge, Peirce was always of great assistance in the American Ephemeris, and in the Coast Survey, of which he was for a time superintendent. The reports of that Survey and the tables of the Ephemeris have rapidly raised the scientific reputation of America, which, in 1843, stood in astronomy among the lowest of civilized nations, and is now among the highest, a change which was by no means ungrateful to Peirce's strongly patriotic feeling, and which he could not but know was as much due to himself as to any other person.

THE GLOUCESTER FESTIVAL AND PARRY'S "PROMETHEUS UNBOUND."

LONDON, Sept. 18, 1880.

THE festival of the three choirs that took place last week is one of the institutions that England owes to the shelter of the Church; but, unlike many others, it sprang from her poverty rather than her riches. One hundred and fifty years ago one Dr. Blisse, chancellor of the diocese of Gloucester, instituted a special cathedral service with a collection for the widows and orphans of poor clergymen, and thence in unbroken succession is derived the present festival, lasting over four whole days, and collecting performers and audience from all parts of the country. It is a truly catholic festival. Its vitality may be gathered from the programme, which, besides the never-failing "Messiah" and "Elijah," comprised every variety of music from an operatic air out of Hérold's "Pré aux Clercs," sung as only Madame Albani can sing it, up to Palestrina's "Stabat Mater," Beethoven's Mass in D, and a new and remarkable work by a living English composer, Mr. Hubert Parry's "Scenes from Shelley's 'Prometheus Unbound.'"

People have been wont to associate with the name of Palestrina music of an Æolian complexity, destitute of the stability afforded by the modern relation of keys. The performance at Gloucester was a revelation, and wrought by little more than a redistribution of the parts and marks of expression. The credit is due to Wagner, who has edited the work as a double chorus with double quartette, disentangling rhythms and graduating phrases. The score is now accessible to all, as also that of the Beethoven Mass, which was sung unfalteringly by the chorus and by Madame Albani, with a pathos worthy of his "grösstes und gelungenstes Werk."

In spirit Mr. Parry's "Prometheus" is lineally descended from the works of Palestrina and Beethoven. In point of form it is a modification of them in so far as the dramatic aspect of the subject is united to the ideal. The choice of such a subject alone would entitle Mr. Parry to attention, even were we not already familiar with almost every form of instrumental composition from his pen. His "Second Pianoforte Sonata," published in England, and a "Grosses Duo für Zwei Claviere" and a pianoforte trio, both published by Breitkopf & Härtel, of Leipzig, together with his pianoforte concerto played here last May under Herr Richter, are as noteworthy for their independence as for their adherence to classic models. Another smaller work of his, played both in London and Cambridge, a "Fantaisie Sonata for the Violin," in one movement, but which is none the less distinctly traceable to the original dance form than any violin sonata of Beethoven, is worth citing, for it illustrates a leading characteristic of the composer, a certain coherence of form, which, in spite of a rather rough performance, is conspicuous in the present work. Mr. Parry has gathered into his libretto the central ideas of Shelley's poem, endurance under tyranny and torture, the regeneration of mankind, ideal love, spiritual sympathy and communion with nature. Prometheus, as Shelley says, "is the highest perfection of moral and intellectual nature impelled by the purest and truest motives to the best and noblest ends." It is the privilege of Mr. Parry's art, dealing as it does with series of emotions, to be independent of any other vehicle for them than sound and rhythm. Herein Mr. Parry shows himself a follower of the school whose greatest living representative is Johannes Brahms, although in his preservation of the dramatic aspect in the personalities of Prometheus, Jupiter, Mother Cathasia, and the words appropriate to each, and in the continuity of his form, he permits the audience to realize the scene with an almost pictorial distinctness. Thus his mise-en-scène is totally distinct from Shelley's lyrical drama. But the music borrows just so much of Shelley's drama as it consistently can, while it preserves and amplifies the melody of his lyrics. Mr. Parry's own article on "Form," in Mr. George Grove's 'Dictionary of Music,' must be read in order to realize how he has solved his problem of combining absolute with dramatic music, and adjusted the sequence of emotional crises to the old laws of key and figure. The point is worth dwelling on lest it should be lost sight of in so elaborate a work, where every word has its appropriate notes; especially as from insufficient rehearsal the chorus was scarcely at home with the composer's style, and the orchestra, playing with a too uniform forte, missed many gradations of color.

The cantata is divided into four "scenes," each of which is musically continuous. The subject of the first is fortitude.

"No change, no pause, no hope, yet I endure."

It opens, after a short introduction, maestoso ma non troppo lento, with a solo for Prometheus, suffering yet triumphant, pitiful yet disdainful, to the opening lines of Shelley. Throughout the continuous melody and the changing antiphony of rhythm the tonality is never in doubt, and conveys the certitude of Prometheus in his final deliverance. To this, as in Shelley, succeeds the utterance of Nature, that seems to live and feel with his agony. It is one of the most noteworthy choruses in the work, and must be heard for one to realize how, while using the words of the "Voice from the Mountains" only, Mr. Parry seems to have impressed all the elements into his service. The prominent figure is a certain triplet like that twice-repeated triplet at the entry of the allegro of Beethoven's last Sonata, Op. 111, although the trombones and bassoons make them as different as the thunder of nature from the frown of man. After a dialogue between Mercury and Prometheus, which struck us as rather forced, the movement ends, as it began, with the torture of Prometheus, or rather with the revelries of the Furies, heralded by Mercury; a fine, bold chorus, which suggests at the same time the misery of unredeemed mankind, when "cities sink howling in ruin," when the fiends,

"Close upon shipwreck and Famine's track, Sit chattering with joy on the foodless wreck."

Throughout the scene Mr. Parry's rendering of Prometheus's torture is as far removed from physical pain as the grief of Palestrina's Mater Dolorosa. It is a question whether Mr. Parry's principles would permit so literal a transcript, for instance, as Beethoven's blare of the trumpets of war in the "Dona nobis pacem" of the Mass. Or rather, he would have given the notes in question a musical significance by making them enter into the structure of the whole movements, just as Brahms in his song "Verzagen." "Ich sitz' am Strande beim rauschenden See und suche dort nach Ruh" has almost written down the babble of a wave, and conveys by its continuous repetition the very consolation which its first restless murmur denied.

The subject of the second scene is the sympathy of the spiritual world and the love of Asia. It begins with a melodious chorus of spirits for female voices, followed by a solo for Prometheus to the last words of Shelley's first act—

"How fair these air-born shapes, and yet I feel Most vain all hope but love."

The number will bear taking out of its setting, and is a good illustration of the way the composer prevents sequences of feeling that seem to imply gestures at least, if not action, to correspond; just as the quartette which concludes the scene to the words—

"Life of life thy lips enkindle
With their love the breath between them," etc.—

is the purest illustration of his character as an idealist. To lay hands on such stanzas at all is no small boldness. As Shelley's verse dictates, the leading melody, given to the soprano, is in 3-4 time. Underneath, the other voices add new rhythms and melodies, just as the smaller ripples and currents, though seemingly in conflict, yet conform to the set of wind and tide, while the violins rise and fall in triplets through the continuous harmony like fantastic shadows over a sea of light. The effect can be illustrated by the parallel of the last and most ethereal variation of the slow movement of Brahm's B♭ Sextet. The third stanza is for contralto solo in a fresh key. At the closing words—

"And all feel, yet see thee never,
As I feel now, lost for ever"— a tremor seems to run through the structure of sound, and the phrases break up like the Dutchman's Phantom Ship, until a dominant pedal gives a new foundation, and the soprano air, reinforced by the tenor, rises afresh to the words—

"Lamp of earth! where'er thou movest
Its dim shapes are clad with brightness,
And the souls of whom thou lovest
Walk upon the winds with lightness."

The rhythms gather in rapidity, as at the end of Beethoven's Sonata in E, Op. 109, up to the cadence—

"Till they fail as I am failing"— given in yet a new but kindred key, which seems as if it had been kept in reserve for this point. Meantime the even swing of the movement halts for seven bars of common time at the words—and it concludes, as it began, with fragments of the leading melody upon a tonic pedal, with drifts of triplets in the violins.

"Dizzy, lost, yet unbewailing"—

The remaining scenes may be described more briefly. The third is concerned with Pride and its fall. Jupiter is represented in heaven, revelling and vainglorious when the period of his reign arrives, and he sinks with Demogorgon to dwell for ever in the abyss. The part of Jupiter is appropriately assigned to the same voice that took that of the messenger Mercury. The difficulty of Demogorgon's personality is met by giving the part to the tenors and basses of the chorus. Meantime Prometheus is unbound, and the Spirit of the Hour (soprano) begins the fourth scene. The movement contains matter enough for a whole sonata. A certain semitonic progression in the short introduction, and again in the accompaniment to the words—

"As if the sense of love
Had folded itself round the sphered world"—

bears a strong resemblance to a phrase in the introduction to Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." But the treatment of the two is as different as Shelley and Swinburne. The whole scene is full of the joy of mankind at their deliverance, while the busy counterpoint of the last chorus—

"Then weave the web of the mystic measure, Fill the dance and the music of mirth"— seems to assert that life has its work as well as its play, its duties which are at the same time pleasures—

"As the waves of a thousand streams rush by
To an ocean of splendor and harmony."

It is so much pleasanter to appreciate than to find fault that one naturally reserves for the last a few words upon Mr. Parry's orchestration. Great as is his mastery over every instrument, and much as he has profited by Wagner's revelations of color, there seemed a certain monotony in the continual high pressure of the wind instruments, especially of a cor anglais quality of sound. Certainly the instrumentation had not the lightness and variety of Berlioz's "Faust" music, for instance, or his "Queen Mab" overture. It may be, however, that this was due rather to the performance than to the work itself, and will be relieved when it can be more carefully rehearsed for a second hearing. The composition is, at all events, unique in the history of English music. Indeed, it is difficult to find a parallel anywhere unless it be in Schumann's "Des Sängers Fluch" or "Das Glück von Edenhall." But neither of these works, though dramatic enough, embodies to such a degree the idealism which combines the latitude of interpretation peculiar to instrumental music with the precision and point of vocal.

ENGLISH JOURNALISM.—VIII.

THE LONDON WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS.

LONDON, October, 1880.

THE principal weekly newspapers of London—putting aside the Sunday, religious, and class journals, and those which depend rather upon the pencil than on the pen—are the Saturday Review, the Spectator, the Examiner, which may still be included on account of its old reputation rather than its present position, and the society journals. The Saturday Review, indeed, disclaims the title of a newspaper, and it does not directly publish any other news than that which is conveyed, mixed up with comment, in its leading articles. Dr. Charles Mackay claims the paternity of the Saturday Review. He recommended to its original founders the establishment of a journal which should be wholly independent of the pastepot and the scissors. The first editor of the Saturday Review was Mr. Douglas Cook, a man whose astonishing force of character and quickness of perception more than supplied his defects of scholarship and even ordinary knowledge, and a very limited faculty of writing. Without erudition of his own, he knew the men who knew; without any distinct political opinions, he had a quick eye for men of a decisive and strong political judgment; without any literary talent, he recognized promptly those who had it. The Saturday Review in his day did not affect consistency. Strong and striking articles taking, often in express language and more frequently by implication, opposite views of the same subjects used to appear in the Saturday Review, while he edited it, side by side or with only an interposed barrier of other articles dividing them. The Saturday Review in its earlier days was a bundle of clever, incisive essays having little in common but the sheet on which they were printed. The attempt was at first made to withhold the writing in it from the hands of professional journalists and to commit it to university scholars, lawyers, and clergymen, who should be acknowledged masters of the topics which they handled. It was easy to begin in this way, but it was not easy long to go in it, and the Saturday Review presently became a journal like any other. Perhaps there is still a larger infusion in it of writing by men who are not newspaper men by trade than on most other journals. But substantially the principle has been acquiesced in that a journal must be conducted by journalists. Its present editor, Mr. Philip Harwood, who was associated with Mr. Cook as his assistant since the starting of the Saturday Review, had the qualifications which his principal lacked. Mr. Harwood began life, it is said, as a student of theology, and his first publication was a defence of Strauss's mythical explanation of Christianity. He was afterwards the editor of a paper called the League, established to promote the Anti-Corn Law agitation. Mr. Bright is said to have described Mr. Harwood as the ablest leader-writer whom he had ever met. When the long-defunct Morning Chronicle passed out of the hands of the Whigs into those of the Peelites Mr. Douglas Cook became its editor and associated Mr. Philip Harwood with himself in the conduct of the paper. This combination was transferred, as I have said, to the Saturday Review when it came into existence. The political articles in the Saturday Review are marked by a cautious and sceptical Conservatism, such as might have found favor with Gibbon or Hume; and in its discussion of theological and philosophical subjects the utilitarianism of Mr. Mill and the agnosticism of Mr. Leslie Stephen lie covertly and curiously side by side with the High-Church doctrines of Mr. Beresford Hope. The most characteristic feature of the Saturday Review, or one which was characteristic until it was imitated by other weekly newspapers, are the articles in smaller type, which extend over a wide range of non-political subjects, and which are technically known by the name of "middles." Its reviews of books are marked by anomalous and scholarly knowledge which is not often to be found in the hurried judgment of periodical critics. The present assistant editor of the Saturday Review, succeeding in that post the late Mr. Hamilton Fife, who overworked himself into a premature grave, is Mr. Walter Pollock, the grandson of the late lord chief baron. He is also the dramatic and fine-art critic of the paper. Among the political writers who have belonged to it from the beginning are Mr. Gilbert Venables and Mr. T. C. Sandars; the first of them a contemporary and friend of Tennyson and the Lushingtons and Arthur Hallam, at Cambridge; the second known chiefly as the author of a work on the Institutes of Justinian. Mr. John Hill Burton and Mr. J. R. Green contribute scholarly articles upon historic subjects. The Rev. Malcolm McColl and the Rev. H. N. Oxenham, an Anglican convert to the Church of Rome who affects the private heresy of believing in the validity of Anglican orders, write upon ecclesiastical and politico-ecclesiastical subjects. Mr. Andrew Lang's keen and playful wit and refined scholarship light up the "middles" of the paper. Other contributors to the Saturday Review are Mr. Gifford Palgrave, Mr. Lathbury, and Mr. Frederick Pollock, the elder brother of the assistant editor.

The Spectator is in one sense an older and in another a younger journal than the Saturday Review. It was established in 1828 by the late Mr. Rintoul as an organ of the Liberal party, then struggling for reform in Parliament, and speedily obtained a success which made it a great power in political discussion. It had some five-and-twenty years later its period of decline under amateur proprietorship and editorship, and when it passed into the hands of its present owners and conductors, Mr. Meredith Townsend and Mr. Richard Holt Hutton, the best newspaper doctors would have pronounced it beyond hope of restoration to health and strength. To revive and invigorate a seemingly dying journal is more difficult than to establish a new one. This more difficult feat has been accomplished by the literary ability and the political earnestness of Mr. Townsend and Mr. Hutton. They themselves are the principal contributors to their own journal. Mr. Townsend's newspaper training was in India, and he has been described as springing upon his subjects like a Bengal tiger. There is a rapidity and keenness about his writing which justify the comparison. Mr. Townsend, without absolutely restricting himself to political topics, writes chiefly upon them. Mr. Hutton, while not excluding himself from political discussion, puts his chief strength into the theological, philosophical, and literary criticism, which may, perhaps, be considered more than others the distinguishing feature and main excellence of the Spectator. No more subtle and ingenious mind has applied itself during the present generation to the discussion of the gravest topics of thought, to the curiosities of character and of speculation, and to the delicacies of literary and artistic criticism, than Mr. Hutton's. It is perhaps his weakness to see in books and men more than is always actually in them, and to find his own deep meanings and supersensible refinements in the minds of more common mortals; but the interest of craftily-pursued truth overtaken after all its windings, and of curiously ingenious paradox, are never wanting to his writings. Among other contributors to the Spectator we may mention Mr. Malcolm McColl, who is believed to write both on political and literary subjects; Mr. Lathbury, the editor of the Economist; and Mr. Hermann Merivale. Mr. Merivale is the son of the late Under-Secretary of State for India, and a dramatic author and amateur performer of distinction. He writes many of the theatrical criticisms, some of the most delicate of which have, however, been from the pen of Mr. Hutton himself. Mr. Quilter rhapsodizes upon art when the various exhibitions are opened. Mr. George Hooper, who is the principal parliamentary leader-writer of the Daily Telegraph and its military critic, is a contributor to the Spectator. The politics of the paper, which were formerly of the type nicknamed thoughtful or academic Liberalism, seem now to be purely Gladstonean. The passionate hatred which inspires the St. James's Gazette for the Prime Minister is not stronger than the passion of worshipping affection which animates the Spectator. The theological attitude of the Spectator may be described best by reference to the name of the late Rev. F. D. Maurice; its philosophy is that of which the ablest advocate in England is the Rev. Dr. James Martineau. The influence of these two writers and of Cardinal Newman on the mind and style of Mr. Hutton might be distinctly traced and discriminated if a critic could be found for the work as subtle and discerning as Mr. Hutton himself.

The Examiner, although it still has the name of living, may be considered as practically dead. A journal associated once with the names of Leigh Hunt, of Albany Fonblanque, and of John Forster, not to mention others whose literary ability temporarily arrested its decline, has passed through a succession of hands, proprietarily and editorially, since its conversion into Conservatism. The names do not belong to the record of journalism, but rather to that of commercial speculation and political adventure, neither of them crowned with success. Its present editor is Mr. Charles Williams, who is one of the leader-writers for the Morning Advertiser.

"Society journals" stand apart. The most conspicuous of them, and the only two which it is necessary to mention as types, are the World, of which Mr. Edmund Yates is the editor and proprietor, and Truth, which is owned and conducted by Mr. Henry Labouchere. These papers proceed on the assumption that ordinary journalism, hampered by the conventionalisms, and false respectabilities, and decorous reticences of life, talks about anything and everything else than the topics in which men and women are really interested. It is their aim to reduce the conversation and speculation, and the open secrets known to everybody, but not publicly spoken of, into print. It cannot be said that such a record of human life, as it passes in England, is in itself objectionable or immoral; and given the legitimacy of the purpose, no reasonable fault can be found with the manner in which it is executed. Of course mistakes of fact and taste are from time to time committed, and from the very nature of the case these mistakes are often more serious and painful than the errors to which ordinary journalism is exposed. But on the whole, unless the principle is to be laid down that what is innocent in talk is wrong in print, the manner in which the World and Truth are conducted is not open to other than that mingled praise and blame to which every public undertaking must hold itself fairly exposed. Comparing them with the Satirist and the John Bull of an earlier period of journalism, the improvement of the public manners, and conscience, and taste is conspicuous. Sometimes the record of personal doings and sayings seems a little trivial. The Bob Allen of whom Charles Lamb gives an account in his essay on newspapers seems to have some descendants left, for he can scarcely himself have survived to the present day. Bob Allen's business, according to Lamb, was to supply pungent personal paragraphs to the newspapers of his day. Lamb gives an example of them, one which it is fair to say procured his friend's dismissal from the newspaper upon which he was then engaged. "Walking yesterday morning casually down Snow Hill," Mr. Bob Allen recorded, "who should we meet but Mr. Deputy Humphreys. We rejoice to add that the worthy deputy appeared to enjoy a good state of health. We do not ever remember to have seen him look better." This pungent paragraph was not considered sufficiently pungent, and, though Mr. Bob Allen was proud of it, it lost him his place. If Mr. Deputy Humphreys had been a duke or a prince the record would not have differed very much from some of the announcements which are deemed to be pithy and of public interest in the columns of society journals. The principal political writer for the World is Mr. Escott, whose book upon 'England' I have already spoken of, and who is one of the principal members of the editorial staff of the Standard. Its dramatic critic is Mr. Dutton Cook, the novelist. Mr. Louis Engel writes the musical notices. The "Atlas" of the paper, both in the literary and in the literal sense, is Mr. Edmund Yates, a vigorous writer and a hard hitter, a stout enemy and a good friend, a man whose openness of speech and pen have brought him into many collisions, but whose faults are chiefly on the outside, and who has an art of winning cordial and faithful attachments. The studies of eminent persons at home are believed to be most of them written by Mr. B. H. Becker. They cannot be considered intrusive or prying, for they are written with the knowledge and consent of the persons depicted, and never exceed those limits of good taste and good feeling which a guest is bound to show to one who has at any time and under any conditions been his host. Mr. Becker's articles are really a contribution to that personal element of history and society which is often thought to be irrelevant and even impertinent when it deals with living notabilities, but which is treasured as inestimably valuable when it embalms the slightest detail of men of note who have passed away.

Of Truth it may be said that it is Mr. Labouchere, and of Mr. Labouchere that he is Truth itself. His social and political position and his diplomatic training, his opportunities of knowledge, and his cynical fearlessness and frankness of speech give him perhaps completer personal qualifications for the office of a society journalist than any of his rivals. Probably no newspaper is so clearly the work of a single hand as Truth is the product of Mr. Labouchere's mind. Beneath all his seeming triviality and indifference a keen common sense and rectitude of intelligence are discernible. Mr. Labouchere affects to mock at the world, and especially at himself, perhaps on the principle avowed by Jacques in "As You Like It." But there is more good both in it and in him than he admits. Mr. Voules is his managerial right hand. The gossiping letters which narrate how things are passing in Paris are from the pen of Mrs. G. M. Crawford. Miss Kate Field, I believe, discourses on fashions and other things specially interesting to lady readers in the columns of Truth.

THE SEQUEL TO CALIBAN.—II.

PARIS, Sept. 9, 1880.

WE left Prospero witnessing, on the bridge of Avignon with his disciples, the "Dance of Death" of the ancient world. The fourth act of the "Eau de Jouvence" shows him in his laboratory, which, strangely enough, is concealed in the back corner of the Papal residence. The Pope has, indeed, become his protector, and given him a quiet place where he can continue his experiments. Renan has always felt a singular curiosity towards the sciences, and, though he has received no scientific training, he has learned much in his conversations with the first scientific men of France. Science, however, has a little on him the effect which the "new water of life" discovered by Prospero has on the people on whom Prospero tries it: there is a sort of intoxication produced in many minds by the discoveries of science.

"The apparent variety of matter," says Prospero, "will be reduced to unity. We shall do better, then, than to make gold the insipid dream of those who only see in science a way of satisfying their coarse desires. Fools! not to see that to change everything into lead would be the same as to change it into gold. As for myself, I should like to do the one just as much as the other. But I should prefer to make light with mud, to make spirit with matter. This will be done some day; life will be understood, a higher reason will govern the world, and perhaps a little justice will penetrate it in the end. We will correct, at least in some details, what there is of injustice and cruelty in the general lines of creation."

In vain does Gottescalc object that man is made to suffer, and that it is a crime to change the order of things as established by God. Prospero opposes the human intellect to the divine intellect:

"By science man will not indefinitely prolong the number of his years; but in forty years man will live a hundred times more than he did before in eighty years. Man will die nobly at the moment fixed by himself. In each city numerous little palaces, adorned with ribbons and with flowers, will furnish to the tired man what the state owes him above everything—the means of procuring for himself a sweet death, accompanied with exquisite sensations."

This theory of pleasant suicide, encouraged by the state, may perhaps be found among the various "utopias" of antiquity; it is strange to find it in the mouth of Prospero, especially as a moment afterwards he explains that science is the privilege of the "happy few." He tells his disciples that the world is governed by brutality; that the peasants are as ignorant as the lords; the Pope is the most intelligent of kings, as he allows them to make their experiments and "forces good rustics to do their part of working, while the others speculate." Nothing is more legitimate, in his opinion, than prayer—"prayer, or, rather, mental speculation is the end of the world; material work is the serf of spiritual work. Everything must help the man who prays—that is, the man who thinks. The democrats, who do not admit the subordination of individuals to a general work, find this monstrous, and when they lose the wise and liberal Caliban I don't well know what will happen." The wise and liberal Caliban means clearly a democracy which would recognize the high attributes of science, give it a place, a privileged place, in its organization, and consent to be led by it. Such a democracy would look upon scientific men as the Christian world looked upon the monks and the priests; the "savants" would, in fact, become the priests of a new religion, and not only the savants, but all the thinkers—the artists, the poets.

The experiment goes on while Prospero is talking; he makes a furious onslaught on the principle of individual property in intellectual matters. A member of the "Society of Letters" is introduced into the laboratory, and speaks in favor of "copyright" and of "patents." "Take Christ, for instance," says Trossulus; "if he had taken a copyright in the gospel, what a fortune he would have made for his heirs." Prospero gets very angry:

"The true thinker," says he, "ought to desire that those who for a venal reason embrace the profession of letters should be discouraged by the prospect of dying of hunger. Injustice is the principle of the working of the universe. Jehovah is, they say, just par excellence. Remember what happened to the oxen who, moved by a divine impulse, brought back the ark from among the Philistines. According to our ideas it would have been well to pension these oxen, and put them to grass in a fine meadow for the rest of their days. Yet an altar was constructed with the wood of the mysterious car which had brought back the sacred coffer, and on this the oxen were offered in sacrifice. . . . Such is the recompense of the benefactors of humanity."

It is clear that Renan does not approve of such men as Claude Bernard, Broca, Pasteur being made "sénateurs inamovibles," and put to grass on the budget of the state. Two men are now introduced while the distillation of the "Eau de Jouvence" goes on: Léolin of Brittany, the erring knight and poet, with a Celtic harp on his shoulder, and Siffroi, the Palatine, who comes as ambassador of the King of Germany. They both wish to drink of the mysterious water. The poet longs for visions, the diplomat for some sort of title, and wishes Prospero to resuscitate the man who can sign it. They both drink of the miraculous water. Siffroi, who is a Junker, talks horridly in his drunkenness, and the scene in which he plays the most conspicuous part might well have been altogether omitted. It is not in harmony with the rest of the play. Siffroi is too vulgar, too brutal, and, I would say also, too transparent. His utterances savor too much of the painful remembrances of late years. Siffroi dies in his drunken fit, while the poet Léolin merely has pleasant dreams. "Each finds in this water what he bears in himself. The spring of youth is our heart. . . . The force which resuscitates is the purity of our soul." So Prospero bears with the greatest equanimity the death of the heavy and material Siffroi.

The Pope also drinks of the miraculous water. We see him in the fifth act under its influence, in company with the young Brunissende. He would make Prospero cardinal if the Holy Inquisition allowed it. While he converses with Brunissende a clerk enters with a letter from the King of Germany. The King complains of the horrible assassination of his envoy, Siffroi, in the Pope's own palace. Other letters come from Milan denouncing the ambitious and dangerous Prospero. Prospero is denounced by the nobles, he is denounced by the people. The Pope sends for him, and reasons with him. "You will have with you," he says to the doctor, "neither the church nor the school. The people is your constant enemy. On what will you live?" "First, on the crumbs which fall from these two fat tables. As we are sure of being in the right, we can easily be humble. . . . Then, in a few centuries, the school will be with us." "And the Church?" "Ah! that is different. The Church and ourselves start from absolutely contrary principles." Here begins a long dissertation upon the principles of Science and the antagonism of Science and the Church. Prospero will not admit that the Church has ever helped Science. The philosophy of Abelard seems to him "without any value." He maintains that the only progress made in the sciences since the time of the ancients has been owing to the Mussulman doctors. Prospero foresees that the Popes, after having helped the revival of sciences, will afterwards oppose it.

Then follows a scene in one of the chambers of the Inquisition which cannot well be analyzed, and which seems utterly incomprehensible. Cardi- nal de Cabassole, instead of torturing and cross-examining Prospero, introduces two young nuns, Euphemia and Celestina, who represent his "Eau de Jouvence," which he tries on Prospero. I will not dwell much upon this improper scene. Nothing can revive Prospero, his end is near; he hears Ariel approaching; but before the last moment comes he receives a visit from Caliban. Caliban has really played no part whatever in the drama, and his "profession of faith" and "platform" are a real superfœtation. "The movement which has put me in your place," he says to Prospero, "was fatal. A revolution, when it is accomplished, is always passionate. The field of battle does not tolerate impartiality; but it costs us nothing to recognize the fact that what we are we are through you. Ingratitude is the vice of slaves. The day after the victory one is still unjust; the second day after it one is generous." It will not be necessary to explain how these aphorisms are a direct application to the present situation in France. Caliban is made to furnish a theme to the moderate Republicans. The delicate Prospero answers very politely; he proves that "tout est pour le mieux dans le meilleur des mondes," as Candide said. We want variety. The world needs aristocrats; it also needs democrats. It needs activity; it needs also idleness. It needs Ariels and Calibans. The world is a great circle—all is in all. "As for myself, I have accomplished my destiny. I have been a rare combination in the lottery of the creation. Now the atoms which comprise me claim their liberty."

Enter the Pope and Brunissende, Ariel, the nun Celestina; all gather round the dying Prospero. He recommends Ariel and the nun to the powerful Caliban. He falls into a pleasant dream, from which he will never wake. His body is brought to the shores of the Rhône by Cardinal Philippe, in the costume of a simple clerk, and confided by him to a boatman. "When you are in the midst of the river you will sink the boat, swim ashore, and say nothing to anybody. If the body is found we will tell the people that in a moment of madness he drowned himself; if it is not found, we will say that the devil has carried him away." And we still hear in the distance—

"Sur le pont
D'Avignon,
C'est là que l'on danse;
Sur le pont
D'Avignon,
Que l'on danse en rond."

Correspondence.

THE CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: At a critical time in Hebrew politics one of the old prophets likened the tribe of Ephraim to a "cake not turned." It seems to me that some of your civil-service reformers are reformers of the Ephraimite pattern—cakes not turned, and therefore baked on only one side. They write as if the abuses of the civil service had but one aspect, and are so much occupied with threatened abuses attendant on a "clean sweep" of Federal offices—the apprehended consequence of a Democratic triumph in the pending election—that they take small note of the flagrant abuses which are going on before their eyes. So true is this that one of your correspondents extracts a hope for the cause of civil-service reform from the enormity of the menaced "clean sweep," when it shall become actual and shall impress the public mind with the deterrent force of an awful example. Such a spectacle, he adds, "would afford the younger generation of voters an opportunity to observe the practical operation of the spoils system."

To quiet observers residing in this city it does not seem necessary to wait for a Democratic triumph in order to witness the "spoils system" in full "practical operation," and if an "awful example" be all that is needed to work a salutary reform, your correspondent has but to cite the conduct of the Republican managers in the present campaign. The Republican Congressional Committee has levied requisitions on all Federal officeholders in this city, from the greatest to the least in subordinate place, with a persevering industry and an inquisitorial persistence that are without precedent in our political history. The Federal offices are treated as the "spoils" of the Republican party by right of former and acknowledged conquest. No "clean sweep" is here necessary, for the clean sweep has been already made, and the party is simply "battening on its plunder," enjoying the "usufruct" of its conquest, and making its raids on the public offices support its war against the Democratic enemy.

This aspect of the spoils system seems to some minds even more repulsive and oppressive than a "clean sweep" of the offices, detestable as the latter is. It enthrones the odious system as a permanent ruling force in our politics; it arrays the public patronage against the unbiassed and unbought sentiment of the people; it demoralizes the incumbents of place by making them the voluntary or involuntary stipendiaries of parties; and, finally, by making the abuses of the civil service organic, it tends to render a reform impossible, because justifying, as men are, the retaliation of the opposite party as soon as it comes into power. There is to-day no Democratic spoilsman who is not in favor of civil-service administration on present Republican principles—that is, with all the offices parcelled out among Democrats and tied as an appanage to the Democratic "machine."

Hence, in the eyes of some civil-service reformers, it seems their first duty to attack the abuses of to-day, and to strike down the party which is practising them. It will be in order to strike down the Democrats when they fall into the same abuses, but it is always the existing abuses which must be struck, until, by the method of exclusions, we find a party which no longer needs the cudgel. The maxim of Donnybrook Fair, "Wherever you see a head hit it," is a good one for reformers, so long as it is the head of an audacious abuse which invites attack.

The present election is not likely to do very much for civil-service reform, because the result of the election will probably depend, in the main, on other issues; but, regarded in the light of this issue alone, the civil-service reformers for whom I venture to speak would have little difficulty in preferring General Hancock to General Garfield, not only for the broad reason already adduced, but also from a consideration of the prospects set before us by the candidature of each. Mr. Secretary Evarts recently travelled all the way from Washington to New York to maintain the thesis that General Garfield is "no better than his party"; that General Hancock is a great deal better than his party. It must be admitted that Mr. Evarts made out his case with his usual felicity, and hence it follows, as a necessary corollary of his argument that, since General Garfield is no better than his party, civil-service reform has no more chance under him than it has under his party, and what that chance is we can read in the party's management to-day. On the other hand, in view of the conceded fact that General Hancock is better than his party, there would seem to be some hope of reform under him. In either event, it is more than likely that the Armageddon of this great conflict for a purified civil service will be postponed to a future, let us hope to an early, day, when the reform issue shall come distinctly to the front, and when both Republican and Democratic spoilsmen shall be converted from the error of their ways, not by the awful example of civil-service abuses, on which they subsist, but by the awful example of some crushing defeat administered to the party which is caught in flagrant delict of its perpetuation of an infamous system. This is the only kind of logic which spoilsmen can understand.

W.

Washington, October 4, 1880.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The suggestions and correspondence in your recent numbers on the subject of civil-service reform have excited the liveliest interest in your readers throughout the country; and nowhere more so than here in Virginia, where the success last autumn of the Repudiators, or, as they are pleased to call themselves, the Readjusters, gave us a fresh home-taste of the pernicious rule of unscrupulous, ignorant, and bigoted partisans, with which the Republican Federal officials in the State had already made us familiar, though there are some very good men and excellent officers among them at this time.

We believe that this evil in State matters would have been lessened had there been a wholesome instead of a corrupting example in national affairs, had the Republican party lived at all in accordance with its profession of civil-service reform faith declared in 1876, and had President Hayes been man enough to carry out his avowed intentions in spite of the "Stalwarts" of the Conkling and Blaine stripe.

The President and his party repelled by their bad faith thousands of voters throughout the South, from Maryland to Texas, who occupy a position precisely similar to the Independents of the North, being heartily disgusted with the corruption of both parties, and yet eager to go with that one which gives the best promise of honest and equitable government. These men are Democrats chiefly because they have had honest and equitable government denied them for three successive Republican administrations, and they no longer hope to get it from that party.

They are using their influence and will cast their votes for General Hancock, and with all the greater zeal because they believe him to be precisely the man to disappoint the pretensions of selfishly interested politicians, whether of his own party or not—a class of men whom, it seems, Mr. Garfield now regards as the only proper persons to advise the Executive in his appointments, Mr. Garfield's views having changed marvellously in that particular since he became a candidate for the Presidency.

But this class of voters desire above all things to have the civil service of the country fixed upon some permanent and common-sense basis, so that in future they may not have to choose between the unknown views but known and honorable character of the Democratic candidate on the one hand, and the declared anti-reform views of the Republican candidate on the other, and they desire to have this matter put beyond the range of choice, and put there at once. I, for one, would like to join a club for the diffusion of proper ideas on this subject, which I believe to be more vital to our permanence and prosperity as a nation than either the tariff or the finance problem.

And after the din and confusion of the coming election is over I think it will be easy to form civil-service reform associations or clubs in this State. For I am sure that the people of Virginia, and particularly the post-bellum generation, to which I belong, have seen enough of bad government to make them exert themselves to secure honest and efficient officers in every department of the public service.

Efficiency and honesty, and not political belief, should be the test for public officers—that I believe to be the creed of this whole generation of young Southern Democrats (and of older ones, too, if we can judge by General Randall L. Gibson's declaration to that effect in the New York World of October 1), and on that ground they are ready to meet and act with good men and true of any political faith and from any and every quarter of the country. Respectfully, WM. TAYLOR THOM.

HOLLINS INSTITUTE, VA., October 5, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you allow one who conceives himself to be as "independent" in his political action as most of those who claim that distinction to give some of his reasons for voting for General Hancock at the coming election.

The great obstacle to the general discussion of civil-service reform, currency reform, and tariff reform before the people, and getting their attention to specific measures to accomplish either of such reforms, is the preoccupation of the public mind with what we may call "the sectional issue"—the imaginary conflicting interests of the North and South. The people divide into parties upon but one question, real or imaginary, at a time, as may be seen in the position of the parties to-day, both of them including in their ranks those who differ radically on all subjects except upon what is an old war issue. They will remain so as long as that issue is the dominating one, and that issue will remain or be kept the predominating one by the Republican party as long as it can carry the country upon it. That is human nature, and politicians are very human in this respect. Not until the Republicans are beaten upon that issue will it be buried and cease to distract the people from the effective consideration of questions which really need attention. This reason seems sufficient to my mind to induce any Independent who would take the most effectual methods of getting a hearing before the people upon questions he considers of more moment than arraying the sections of the country against each other and keeping alive the animosities and passions engendered by the war.

The second reason is that the moral integrity of General Garfield has been strongly impugned in several distinct transactions, and that there can be no more demoralizing blow aimed at the perpetuity of our institutions than in accustoming voters to the idea that lapses from official integrity do not injure a man's chances for official preferment, or will be condoned by any considerable number of people honest themselves. The step from familiarity and condonation of official dishonor to the justification and admiration of it is a short one. It may be said the charges are not proved; but the answer that the candid supporter of General Garfield invariably gives to the question whether General Garfield would have received the $5,000 De Golyer fee if he had not been a Congressman of great influence shows that there is too much occasion for the accusation. Anyway very many people honestly believe that where there has been so much smoke there must have been some fire.

Again, it is desirable to stamp out the heresy that but one party can be trusted with the Government, and that the country would go to the "demnition bow-wows" if a party comprising full one-half of its citizens are in power for even one term. * * *

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Touching the "spoils" system and civil-service reform I send you the following, embodying as it does the views of no small number in the "Solid South," "fifty years behind the times" though we be. It is part of an editorial from the Richmond State. The State is one of our leading newspapers, and the editor, a so-called "Bourbon Virginia Democrat," a man of prominence and influence in his party. After praising General Hancock's letter on "Southern Claims," the editor continues:

"And now, having written so many ringing things and given us so many unmistakable proofs of his independence and of the force of his character, from which the politicians have so little to hope, the General might go still further and reassure the country upon another point which at present fills many minds with fear and doubt. If he would come out and proclaim, as one other general did once upon a time memorable in our history, that he had 'no friends to reward and no enemies to punish,' and that he should utterly repudiate the pernicious doctrine that 'to the victors belong the spoils,' we believe the announcement would electrify the whole country and lift him up on the crest of a wave that nothing could withstand, but which must sweep the country from end to end. Let him give assurance that the Democratic party is a great political power and not a petty ring of place-hunters, with no higher aspiration, no nobler ambition, than the displacement of a few thousand miserable drudges who are earning their daily bread in Washington and elsewhere by small clerkships and other underling places. If it were understood that in case of his election the only changes made in the offices would be in the heads of departments, and in the more important posts abroad and throughout the country, necessary to place the officials of the Government in full rapport everywhere with the views of the Administration, and that no merely clerical position should be disturbed except for cause, it would be a tender of assurance to the people they have so long sought for in vain, yet so ardently desired, that 'a civil-service reform' had been begun in earnest and would soon be an accomplished fact, which would inspire them with a respect for the party and its candidate while confirming their faltering faith in the stability of the Government as nothing else could serve to effect that purpose."

We of the South have fully accepted the results of the late war; we are more than satisfied with the abolition of slavery; we feel an interest in maintaining the national credit; we are not affected by the "greenback craze"; we desire a pure civil service; have no war claims to present, and take the liveliest interest in national prosperity. We are even prepared to acquiesce in negro suffrage; but so long as the "bloody shirt" continues to wave, and abuse and vilification of the South form the chief stock-in-trade of the Republican orator, self-respect forbids us to be Republicans.

Let me add that the debt-payers of Virginia, who are in favor of upholding the credit of our State and paying our debt (though apparently a minority of the voters), represent the bulk of the property and pay nearly all the taxes. But for the large mass of illiterate negro voters forced upon us by the Republican party repudiation would never have been heard of. A powerless minority as Republicans, in the debt contest the negro vote possesses a terrible capacity for mischief. Very respectfully, T.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: With many of your readers I have rejoiced in the admirable letter of "F. W. H." and the strong, practical turn given to his suggestions by "J. B. M."

I agree, however, with "E. B.," that the alliance of the society with either of the established political parties not only is unnecessary but would prove detrimental to its usefulness. For any direct influence upon political action the power of the society must lie in the public support of so many men of weight from each of the two parties that neither can afford to neglect it, while neither can claim it. For the education of public opinion, which must be the present object, the hindrance from party prejudices would probably be greater than any gain from party alliance.

I should be glad to enter my name for an annual subscription of twenty dollars to such a society, independent of both parties, and secured in that status by the composition of its executive committee or body of officers.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CARL F. PALFREY,
Lieut. of Engineers, U. S. Army.

ADULTERATION OF NEWS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As an illustration of one of the facts noted in the Nation's article on "The Adulteration of News," vide New York weekly Times of September 1. The head-line brush is used for "coloring." The editor gives the Hancock-Sherman correspondence, heading Hancock's last letter in small caps:

"TILDEN'S CHANCES IMPREGNABLE."

This is what Hancock says:

"I have considered that Mr. Tilden's chances were impregnable. . . . Now it seems to me that Gov. Hayes has something more than an equal chance." H.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO. announce the completion, after eight years of preparation, of Knight's 'American Mechanical Dictionary.' It is to be had by subscription only, in forty-four parts of sixty-four pages each, or in three bound volumes. The same firm announce that the 'United States Official Postal Guide,' of which they are the official publishers, is now issued monthly, revised and corrected by the Department. They recommend subscribers to remit through their own postmasters, which may be done without risk or expense.——James J. Chapman, publisher, Washington, D. C., will issue this week a 'Manual of Heavy Artillery Service, prepared by the authority of the War Department for the use of the Army and Militia of the United States, by Major J. C. Tidball, U.S.A.' The book is approved by General Sherman, and will be used as a text-book in the Army.——J. W. Bouton's list of fall books comprises 'The Schools of Modern Art in Germany, by J. Beavington Atkinson'; 'The Complete Works of Rembrandt,' being a reproduction in fac-simile of all his etchings with description and notes, by Charles Blanc; vol. ii. of the new edition of 'Don Quixote,' with thirty-seven original etchings by Lalauze; Jackson and Chatto's 'History of Wood Engraving'; a new edition of Bryan's 'Dictionary of Painters, Engravers, Sculptors, and Architects'; and a fac-simile reproduction of the first edition, 1496, of 'The Treatyse of Fyshyng wyth an Angle, by Dame Juliana Berners.'——Charles Scribner's Sons issue as a supplementary volume to Lange's 'Bible Work' an edition of the Apocrypha, revised, with critical and historical introductions and explanations, by the Rev. Dr. Edwin Cone Bissell; also vol. ii. of 'The Popular Commentary' relating to the Fourth Gospel and the Acts; and a new and revised edition of Professor Josiah P. Cooke's 'Religion and Chemistry,' which has been some time out of print. ——The publisher of The Voice, "a monthly devoted to voice culture, musical and elocutionary, with special attention to stuttering, stammering, and other defects of speech," sends us from Albany a copy of his paper for October, which we find to be of a varied character, accurately enough described, however, by the title just quoted. Its most valuable paper, perhaps, is the beginning of a translation of Chervin's treatise on stuttering. At the other extreme, it may be, is the continuation of a serial story called "The Unspeakable; or, A Stutterer's Tribulations and Triumphs, as told by Himself." Various grateful readers testify to the usefulness, in their several cases, of the magazine, and it has expert approval from many sources, from professional elocutionists to the Rev. Dr. Talmage.——A new work on the United States, 'Der Spaziergang nach Nordamerika,' by C. Stangl, a Catholic priest, is attracting attention in Germany. Its remarks on the condition of the Church in this country are said to be specially valuable.——'The Minor Arts,' by C. G. Leland, is the latest of the Messrs. Macmillan's "Art-at-Home" series. In so far as it relates to the work of the artisan rather than of the artist it qualifies the opinion we expressed some weeks ago of the essential inutility of art text-books. The subjects treated are Porcelain-painting, Wood-carving, Leather-work, Stencilling, Mosaic-work, Repoussé-work, Silver-chasing, etc. "It is offered to the public," Mr. Leland says, "with much more serious intention than that of affording amusement to idlers," and it certainly appears to be very specific and comprehensive in its directions. Doubtless it will also succeed in one of its aims, which is "to awaken a desire among the young and unpractised to do something in art"; whether or no this, however, is a crying need of the times is perhaps open to doubt; at all events, the book may be said to illustrate Mr. Leland's versatility, and—a decided merit in works of the kind—it is direct and free from eloquence.——'Botany for High Schools and Colleges, by C. E. Bessey, Ph.D., Professor of Botany in the Iowa Agricultural College' (New York: H. Holt & Co.), is a useful addition to the American Science series. The parts of the volume devoted to histology and physiology are based upon the 'Text-Book of Botany' by Professor Sachs, and constitute an excellent introduction to that work. But the most valuable portion of the treatise for a large number of American students is that which deals with the affinities, structure, and economic plants of the different orders. The work is exceedingly well done throughout.——A 'Text-Book of Botany, by Dr. Prantl, translated from the German, the translation revised by Dr. S. H. Vines, of Christ's College, Cambridge' (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.), is also based upon Sachs's 'Text-Book,' so far as its chapters on histology and physiology are concerned, and the treatment of the orders follows much the method selected by Professor Bessey. But we are sure that if Dr. Vines had made changes in the text to adapt the German work to English classes he would have materially improved the excellent treatise of Prantl; Professor Bessey has kept in mind the wants of a large class of American students, and his work therefore must naturally have the preference. Except in minor details of treatment the two works follow nearly the same course and cover about the same ground.

—It is difficult for the candid and reflecting critic not to be a trifle perplexed by such a work as 'Hints for Home Reading,' just published by Putnam. To whom, precisely, is it addressed? with what notion, precisely, is it prepared? are questions one asks himself inevitably and invariably in such cases, and in the great majority of instances we suspect the answer to the first is, "To everybody in general and no one in particular," and to the second that its origin is altogether moral and only incidentally concerned with the intelligence. The disadvantages in both cases are perhaps about equal, and, though those of the latter are very likely less obvious, in few things is the necessity of intelligence (the best that can be got) greater than in the manufacture of popular text-books. In this country, at all events, this is at present conducted much as statues are presented to public parks or pictures to public galleries, the moral motive of patriotism and public spirit being a very fair analogue of the moral motive which seeks the literary or æsthetic benefit of the mass of people, in the sense that both are supposed to be self-justifying and to be somehow above criticism. The result is, for example, the present condition of the Central Park monumental gallery and the old-masters' collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, say, and a kind of smattering as a substitute for training in the things of the mind generally accessible that is becoming, impartial observers testify, almost an American characteristic. The analogy may be considered whimsical, and we use it only as an illustration, but it certainly illustrates a point that is made as soon as it is stated, one would say, were it not for the abundant witnesses of the practical ignoring of it. No one, clearly, deserves more of his fellows' gratitude than any one who helps to pave the royal road to learning; nevertheless, something more than the generous desire to do this is a necessary qualification for its accomplishment without positive detriment. Just now, indeed, there seems more "danger" from the spreading notion that such a road is of the easiest possible construction than from the opposite and apparently obsolete notion that it is axiomatically a chimera. It may be said that to make such a book as the one before us a text for a sermon is taking the matter very seriously, but we believe the truth to be that it typifies very well an order of educational philanthropism whose gravest error is in considering its work, though morally serious, really intellectually light.

—As we say, however, the point is evidently not one for demonstration if statement proves insufficient, and beyond describing 'Hints for Home Reading' it is needless to pursue a critical examination of it. The title-page gives the following account: "A series of chapters on books and their use, by Charles Dudley Warner, M. F. Sweetser, F. B. Perkins, Cyrus Hamlin, Hamilton W. Mabie, Edward Everett Hale, Joseph Cook, Henry Ward Beecher, and Lyman Abbott; edited, with an introduction, by Lyman Abbott; with which is included a new and revised edition of Suggestions for Libraries, by George Palmer Putnam; together with priced lists of suggested selections of five hundred, one thousand, and two thousand volumes of the most desirable and important books." In the introduction we find the sentence, "The best libraries are not made; they grow"; and the reader of the book may be advised to keep it in mind in view of the temptations to forget it which follow. The "chapters" were originally communicated to the Christian Union, and not unnaturally it is "hinted" that there is a good deal of good "home reading" to be found in that periodical, which is certainly true. "If, now, there could be combined," says Mr. Perkins, "the merits (so far as they differ) of the New York Tribune and the Christian Union the result would about suit me"; but he acknowledges elsewhere that tastes differ. Mr. Perkins contributes a large portion of the book. He writes about "What to Read," and says you can't read everything—should read "the great books if you can (it is not every one who can do it the first time he tries); the great poets, historians, philosophers, even theologians"; advises one to "employ the co-operative methods"—that is, to use the libraries, and to "use amusing reading with moderation." As to "Plans of Reading" read "Literary; by masterpieces," "Religious; by sacred books," and so on. It will be seen that Mr. Perkins is generally pretty sound. So is Mr. Cyrus Hamlin in advising "Make yourself familiar with De Quincey's distinction between 'the literature of knowledge' and 'the literature of power,' and Ruskin's between 'books of the hour' and 'books of all time.'" Mr. Beecher's "method" is described in "an exact stenographic report of an actual conversation" between Mr. Beecher and "Laicus," who seems to have been an earnest and ingenuous enquirer. It is more difficult to describe than "methods" usually are, but it is interesting reading in itself. Mr. Beecher "don't believe much in history. It is very imperfect testimony of men's natures and thoughts. . . . I never had the power of retaining sentences; I seldom lose thoughts. I absorb the thoughts. . . . I do not know a hymn in the English language I could recite." He "got fluency out of Burke very largely," and "obtained the sense of adjectives out of Barrow, besides the sense of exhaustiveness." But it is not easy to find a great rhetorician who has so little to conceal as Mr. Beecher, and for the rest we have less personality and less vivid interest. Mr. Hale, for example, falls at once into generalities with: "In the first place, we must make this business agreeable," though his manner is individual—e.g., "Eternity is before us if we only begin promptly—now—as the archangels do." Joseph Cook, with characteristic courage, attacks the problem, "How to Make Dull Boys Read"; he says "the problem is different in country and city"—a distinction that betrays a grateful desire to add an ab extra interest to the discussion, but it does not seem to go to the root of the matter. Number 3 of Mr. Abbott's "Hints for People that do not Read" is "Buy a dictionary, an atlas, and, if possible, a cyclopædia. If you have not the money make over an old bonnet. No harm will be done if it cultivates a habit of making over old bonnets." This is rather in the vein of the answer, "In the evenings; get your husband to read to you," to the question "How and When to Read," discussed in "A Symposium by Many Contributors," which contains the gems of the work. The detailed "Suggestions for Household Libraries" we can make nothing of, except that we feel sure a different publisher would have made a different list.

—Beginning with this week, Thomas will succeed Aronson as leader of the orchestra at the Metropolitan Concert Hall. It is not underrating Aronson to say that Thomas is a better conductor; and it is a matter for general congratulation among all lovers of good music that he should at last be provided with something that can take the place of, and be even better than, his old "garden." Whether the attempt to give really good music the year round at the Metropolitan will succeed is, of course, a matter which is open to dispute, and experience alone can settle it; but there are many reasons for thinking that Thomas will be sufficiently supported to ensure his concerts being continued through the winter. The success of Koster and Biall's garden in Twenty-third Street seems to show that there is a very large musical population in New York which may be relied on to furnish audiences if they are sure of music that is worth hearing. The music in the Twenty-third Street garden is really excellent of its kind, but it cannot be compared with that which used to be heard in the Central Park Garden. Again, the great difficulty with that place of amusement was its remoteness. Since the building of the elevated railroads a vast population has been brought within easy reach, while Forty-first Street is much more near the centre of the city proper than Fifty-ninth Street. There seems to be no reason, therefore, why the Metropolitan's experiment should not succeed, if such an experiment is at all capable of being made a success. On the other hand, we trust that Thomas will steer clear of two rocks which always have seemed to threaten serious peril to his musical ventures—we mean his excessive love of technique and his (in itself) very commendable ambition to educate the musical taste of his audiences. With regard to the last, so much has from time to time been said by the newspapers that it is probably not necessary any longer to insist upon the fundamental truth that the primary object of music, like any other art, is pleasure, and that if the public is once made to feel that it is being taught instead of being pleased, it develops a tendency to play truant, except, of course, in Boston, where art has always been regarded as valuable chiefly for the purpose of teaching people to be artistic. It is certainly possible to go to the other extreme, and Aronson has sufficiently shown what the other extreme is in concerts which have seldom risen above a musical-box level. With regard to technique, Mr. Thomas, as a thoroughly competent conductor, knows better than any one the difficulties of instrumentation, and consequently has a great admiration for the work of masters of instrumentation like Berlioz and Wagner. But he should not forget that it is only a very small portion of the public who care to hear or are capable of appreciating tours de force in the way of instrumentation, and also that instrumentation is after all the means and music the end. Wagner may have been given to the world, as Mérimée said, to reconcile it to Berlioz, but to the average man this still leaves open the question why the author of the 'Damnation of Faust' was given to it.

—The death of Offenbach can hardly be called an important artistic loss, for his music was never serious enough to count for much as music; he wrote to tickle the ear of a very light-minded public, and if he succeeded that was enough. Nevertheless, his scores will probably live for a time, by virtue of the abundant melody which pervades them, and if music of the Offenbachian sort outlasts its author by a decade, he may be said to have achieved a considerable posthumous fame. It is by his earlier operas that he will be longest remembered. Bands will, no doubt, continue to play the music of "La Belle Hélène" and "La Jolie Parfumeuse" even after the taste for the operas themselves has quite died out. This taste already shows some signs of decay. Offenbach himself, in his later operas, has attempted to revert to opéra comique, and if he has not altogether succeeded it is because his whole mind had become so thoroughly saturated with the spirit of bouffe that it was impossible for him suddenly to revert to the purer and more poetical level from which he had assisted the comic muse to descend. Other composers, such as the author of "Le Petit Duc," have appeared, who are likely to prove more successful; and if comic opera can ever be thoroughly re-established, it will be their task to do it. We fear, however, that the taste for opéra bouffe is very much like the taste for strong drink. People once overtaken by it may save themselves by total abstinence; but moderate conviviality is out of the question for them. Opéra bouffe, as we know it (and as we know it it is essentially Offenbachian), is not merely opéra comique made extravagant; its humor is largely founded upon an inversion of the moral and social order closely allied to the spirit of ribaldry. It is not ribald, because French wit is never ribald, but its popularity must in a sense be held to mark a distinct coarsening of the public taste. It is noticeable that, musically, the bouffe school is more nearly allied to the old comic school than any other. No attempt was ever made by Offenbach to do what Sullivan has so successfully done in English opera—to write a score which should be a musical burlesque of the serious Italian school. Apart from the comicality of the libretto, the music of "Pinafore" and the "Pirates of Penzance" closely follows the forms of classical opera, and a large part of the absurdity of the effect is produced by this. It is, of course, a trick which, once learned, can hardly be repeated with profit, and Offenbach was probably right in refraining—if, indeed, the idea ever occurred to him—from making use of it. The author of the "Grande Duchesse" was very fortunate in his librettos, some of which were, we believe, written by himself. A few years ago, it will be remembered, he came to this country to lead a band, but as a conductor he was not very good. He is said to have detested the United States because he derived no benefit from the representation of his operas here—a natural feeling which must, among dramatic and lyric authors in France, be quite common.

—Björnstjerne Björnson, the well-known Norwegian poet, novelist, dramatist, orator, and leader of the Liberals in politics, now visiting this country in company with Mrs. Ole Bull, of whose husband he was a warm friend, is a man in the prime of life, having been born December 8, 1832. Tall, erect, and elastic, broad-shouldered, deep-chested, blue-eyed, and auburn-haired, he possesses a magnificent presence, which, together with his clear voice, is one of the secrets of his great influence over his audience. It is his intention to visit places and persons of interest in this country, to witness a Presidential campaign and election, to make observations in regard to the practical results of republican institutions, and then, after having spent some time among his numerous countrymen in Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota, to return to his northern home next summer. Mr. Björnson is the son of a priest in a remote and dreary parsonage in the northwestern part of Norway. He did not distinguish himself at the Molde Latin school, nor did he take a full university course, turning his attention from boyhood to poetry and journalism. Twice he has been director of a theatre; the first time in 1858, when Ole Bull put his Bergen theatre into his hands, and again in 1865, when the management of the Christiania theatre was entrusted to him. He filled both positions only for a short time. His first novel, 'Synnöve Solbakken,' published in 1857, at once established his reputation as a writer of extraordinary power. Indeed, it became the corner-stone of a new school of literature, which had for its object the description of peasant life in Norway, and modern Norse literature may be said to have begun with it. Since then there has been no interruption in Björnson's literary activity, and he has produced, besides "Synnöve Solbakken,' the novels 'Arne,' 'A Happy Boy,' 'The Fisher Maiden,' 'The Bridal March,' 'Magnhild,' and a number of short stories; the dramas, 'Halte Hulda,' 'Mellein Slagene' (Between the Battles), 'King Sverre,' 'Sigurd Slembe,' 'Maria Stuart,' 'De Nygifte' (The Honeymoon), 'Sigurd Jorsalfar' (Sigurd the Crusader), 'En Fallit' (A Bankrupt), 'Redaktören' (The Editor), 'Kingen' (The King), 'Leonarda'; and now recently 'Det ny System' (The New System). He is also the author of an epic, 'Aruljot Gelline'; of a large volume of national and lyric poetry, and several other miscellaneous volumes. His numerous articles and addresses on the political and social, literary and artistic topics of the day would make even a larger library than the works above mentioned, but they are scattered all through the Scandinavian and German press and have never been collected. Many of his novels and dramas, especially the later ones, deal with the burning questions of the day. His latest novel, 'Magnhild,' and one of his last dramas, 'Leonarda,' present the author's views on the subject of woman's rights in a manner that would please the hearts of the most enthusiastic advocates of that doctrine in America. In his drama, 'The King,' published in 1877, he makes the king himself present the author's political tenets, which are thoroughly and radically republican. It may be added that several of Björnson's dramas, such as 'The King' and others, have been rejected by the royal theatres, and that on account of his outspoken liberal political sentiments he has been ostracized by all royalists in his own country.

—In 1873 M. Ludovic Halévy reprinted from the Vie Parisienne a volume of outlines of Parisian "existence," called 'Madame et Monsieur Cardinal,' from the chief characters in the opening two sketches. The garrulity and, so to speak, bonhommie of the wife and the dignity of the husband recall the somewhat similar figures of M. and Mme. Pipelet in Sue's book. But M. Halévy's touch is lighter than Sue's and his humor is less oily. He succeeded in giving M. and Mme. Cardinal more color and less monotony than Sue gave to M. and Mme. Pipelet. The type is common enough in Paris, we fancy, and the comparison of the studies from it made at such an interval is not uninstructive. The Cardinals have a depravity from which the Pipelets are free. We recall the subject because M. Ludovic Halévy has just published a second volume of similar sketches, of which the first six are in continuation of the couple of Cardinal studies in the earlier volume. 'Les Petites Cardinal' (Paris: Calmann Lévy; New York: F. W. Christern) are not intended virginibus puerisque, but they are very clever and at bottom not without an ironical morality. That they are full of dramatic surprises and not wanting in wit is, of course, to be expected from M. Halévy's participation in the "Belle Hélène," the "Périchole," "Fanny Lear," and "Froufrou."

INSTINCTIVE PHILOLOGIZING.*

TO assert, as Mr. White does, that "usage is not all the law of language" is to write very idly, seeing that no sane man would make the assertion which is contradicted. The "normal speech" to which we are introduced, a nondescript alleged to be dictated by "reason," and a rival of usage, is the newest invention in anything claiming to be sober philology. As abundantly illustrated by Mr. White, it is clearly indistinguishable from the offspring of pure whim. "There goes something besides the mere repetition of a word in a certain sense to the making of normal language," he says; and we are ready to believe it. A happier phrase than "normal speech" or "normal language," to blind and confound the half-literate, could not easily be devised. Nor can we doubt that "formal grammar," as impredicable of English, or otherwise considered, will cease to be a topic of hostile discourse with the essayist, as soon as he attains to something like a definite idea of the genuine form of the thing he turmoils about. "The fact that formal grammar is at war with common-sense is shown by the history of language," is one of the strange positions which Mr. White takes up. On his motto, Ratio imperatrix supra grammaticam, the stricture is inevitable, that, not, as is implied, true grammar, but only false, can be reformed by reason; this being reformable because unaccordant with the sole aspect of reason here in place, that is to say, because it is not, as true grammar is, the reflex and the record of good usage. Moreover, the passage which the author quotes from Sir Philip Sidney does not aid him in the slightest degree. Sir Philip, adducing the objection to English, that "it wanteth [i. e., is without] grammer," replies, "Nay, truly, it hath that prayse, that [i. e., because] it wanteth not [i. e., does not require] grammer; for grammer it might have, but it needes it not; beeing so easie of it selfe," etc. Just like the objector aforesaid, the predecessors of Sir Thomas Wilson might have said that English "wanteth rhetorike and logike." The first Rhetoric and the first Logic in English appeared during Sir Philip's infancy; and the first English Grammar proper was not published till long after his death. The clause, "for grammer it might have, but it needes it not; beeing so easie of it selfe," etc., is sheer nonsense, if construed as Mr. White construes it in his chapter entitled, "How it is that English has no Grammar," where he erroneously fathers on Sir Philip "the recognition, nearly three hundred years ago, of the fact, in philology, that English is a grammarless tongue."

Many home-staying dwellers in regions remote from those of refinement will, doubtless, be inspired with confidence on reading Mr. White's declaration: "I have heard English spoken by well-educated and well-bred Englishmen more or less all my life, but chiefly after [read since] I reached full manhood." "Less," however, we are compelled to infer, rather than "more," if we leave out of account the alternative of treacherousness of memory on his part. For he speaks, adverting to our own time, of "the very frequent use of you was among people of education"; a use which, of itself, now suffices to stamp a person as very far from educated. And he has it that profile and oblique "are now pronounced with the English i by the best speakers," and also that "people in general . . . say pho'togra'phy and te'legra'phy," or do not accent them on the antepenult. Further, according to him, truths and youths have the th of the, "in the best English pronunciation of this generation"; the fact being that the former, in such pronunciation, very often has the th of thin. The first syllable of suggest he makes to rhyme with the ug of ugly, whereas the word is, in the mouths of all but most affected elocutionists, sujest, with the u like that of nut. Of lieutenant we read: "The pronunciation of this word, by all good English speakers, has, for centuries, been leftenant. That is its pronunciation now in England and in Ireland, and by the best speakers in America." Can Mr. White suppose that no one has access to Dr. Worcester's dictionary, where six ways of pronouncing the word are registered? At the present day the best speakers in England, above all in military circles, pass so rapidly over the first syllable of lieutenant, that a vowel-sound is hardly heard there at all, and what is heard is i rather than e. That cultivated Englishmen are beginning to follow the vulgar, in the way of pronouncing hearth, clerk, and nephew, is his opinion, but is not ours. Nor can we go along with him as regards the pronunciation of girl, which, he says, is g-yurl; "a little evanescent grace of speech which is beginning to pass away"—as we are very happy to hear. The combination yurl must match hurl; and g-yurl is even worse than gurl, as adding coarseness to affectation. Let the ir of girl be sounded like the er of error, and one will not go far astray. Of either he gives ī-ther as the pronunciation followed by "many English people of the best education and social culture." He has discovered, then, his mistake of a few years back, when, in 'Words and their Uses,' he reviled ī-ther as "a second-rate British affectation." The character of h, at least in one word, he seems doubtful about, inasmuch as "a historical" and "an historical" appear at pp. 155 and 159, respectively. His self-estimate, "I have been led to believe that my sensitiveness to sounds is somewhat more than usually delicate," we can hardly accept, considering, among other things, that he records it in connection with his expression of belief that, during upwards of fifty years, he has never heard any educated New-Englander call none anything but nun. We have heard scores of them give its o the sound which that letter has in crone. And here is an enigma: "The right pronunciation of English means the right pronunciation now; and the best pronunciation has almost a conventional meaning, that is, the pronunciation of the best society. But, as we have seen, the pronunciation of this society may be really bad; affectation and fashion may change it for the worse." How pronunciation which is "really bad" can, nevertheless, be 'right," we are not shown. Iron Mr. White cannot abide to hear called ī-urn, as all the world calls it. The pronunciation of "educated Irish gentlemen and ladies" is that which he declares himself in favor of, and for the reason that he believes it to be that which obtained in the time of Queen Elizabeth. It is doubtful whether the public will set much store by this view.

His "discussions on language" he announces "to be chiefly on the grounds of taste, judgment, and reason." One such discussion we give at length; and it must serve as a sample out of scores which we could show to be every whit as misleading as to facts and reasoning:

"Every once in a while is a phrase most often heard from ladies' lips, but too often from men, and sometimes seen in print. In this phrase, every qualifies all that comes after it; and what is once in a while? The nonsense is apparent. This phrase is, I believe, an Americanism of indisputable origin and usage [read by origin, and in use, indisputably an Americanism]. At least, I have never heard it except from American speakers, or met with it except in American writers. It is a perversion, by transposition, of 'once in every little while,' which, although not a very good phrase, being itself a perversion of 'once in a little while,' is yet comprehensible [sic]. But a moment's reflection will show any one who can understand the use of words, that 'every once in a little while' is an absurd and meaningless phrase,—an illustration of the absoluteness of logical position in the English language."

Now, once in a while is often heard in the English provinces, and every once in a while is heard there occasionally; and neither of them is reckoned so much vulgar as odd. The origin assigned to them is, also, sheer fancy. Further, first we are told, that, in every once in a while, every qualifies once in a while; and then, to explode it, every once, in the supposititious every once in a little while, is assumed to qualify in a little while. Once in a while is the same as now and then; and every once in a while is the same as every now and then, —instead of which we had, long ago, ever now and then, now and then among, ever among, ever between, and the like,—and there is an end. Nor is it overwise to insist on "the absoluteness of logical position in the English language." Our ancestors once said little and little, a little and a little, by little and little, etc.; and the last of these we have changed, in contempt of "logical position," into little by little, which runs very slight risk of being stigmatized as bad English.

"Avocation," he writes, "is a word very much misused, in the sense of work, business, occupation, even by writers of intelligence and education. The examples at my hand [sic] are very numerous." And then follow two pages on avocations, in the sense of "pursuits," "duties," with several quotations for it, but not one for avocation, "work," etc., a use very rare indeed in the pages of good writers of any age. He has done as one would do who, setting out with a proposal to discuss pain or part, should spend himself on pains, "labor," "care," or on parts, "qualities," "talents." As to avocations, in the sense of it which Mr. White abhors, it has the sanction of the best English literature of centuries; and that is enough to legitimate it. Lord Macaulay's 'Essays' might be appealed to six times for it. In passing, if the reader would smile at the indecision of a lexicographer, let him look at Dr. Worcester's remark on avocation, and then at his definitions of employment and engagement.

Etymology is a branch of learning in which Mr. White is not strong. In "ge-ógraphy" and "bióg-raphy," according to him, "the only stress is laid upon a syllable which has no proper or significant existence as such; it being composed of the last letter of one word and the first letter of another, each torn away from a place where it sounds well and means something." Is geo-, then, a "word," as bio (s) is one? Scientist is, to him, "intolerable, as being both unlovely in itself and improper in its formation." Geologist he puts up with. "But I can find no lawful instance corresponding to scientist, which might [read may] well go with drinkist and shootist. If we would, we could [read might] say sciencist; and let who will say it, and hiss himself properly in the saying of it." We see his method; and a ludicrous one it is. It would yield us fablist, not fabulist, as the correct word; and the French ought, on their part, to say fabliste. If, further, we had not yet adjectives of globe, joke, muscle, etc., we ought to have, to match his sciencist, delights like globar, jokar, musclar, and so on without end, including influence-al, mars-al [for martial], palace-al, and so on and so on; since, by his ruling, "we cannot break up the sibilation with a t." It is hardly necessary to add that scientist tallies, as a strictly normal derivative, with artist, aurist, deist, dentist, indifferentist, jurist, legist. Another perfectly good and extremely useful neologism which he derides is physicist. The base on which to build being physics, he holds—though, at p. 222, he uses phonetist—that "we should make the word physics-ist." By this style of reasoning, substantives in -ian from optics and politics, and adjectives in -al from ethics and tactics, if we wanted them, ought be optics-ian and politics-ian, ethics-al and tactics-al. We have no room to refute Mr. White's untenable arguments against the proposed verb evolute and against canalize, and that urged in behalf of the verb juxtapose.

On shall, will, should, and would there is a chapter of twenty-eight pages, which it might call for the same amount of letter-press to criticise minutely. To give an idea of its false lessons, such things as the following are found in it: "Expressing willingness, we say 'I would grant your request'; but, if we introduce willingly or with pleasure, we use should, and say, 'I should willingly, or with pleasure, grant your request,' not, 'I would willingly,' [!]

etc. In like manner we say, 'I will see you to-morrow' [as if we never said 'I shall see you to-morrow'!]; but, if we add an expression of pleasure, 'I shall be glad, or happy, to see you to-morrow,' not, 'I will be glad,' etc." Mr. White's own use of some of the words is defective. "To speak and to write good English it is necessary only to choose proper words, and place them in such an order, in such a relative position to each other, that they will set forth our thoughts logically," p. 316. "Here was a man who endeavored to upturn the written English language, and who thought he would do so," p. 162. Other like instances are found at pp. 55, 142, 146, and 172.

Premising mention of his 'Words and their Uses,' Mr. White proclaims, in his Preface: "The views taken, in the book in question, of the use of particular words, and of their perversion from their proper sense, even by writers of repute, seem also to need no apology or modification; at least, I have none to offer." Not invariably, however, do the judgments there expressed now have weight with him. Or has he, in some cases, forgotten them? In the work just named, gratuitous, for "unfounded, unwarranted, unreasonable, untrue," is described as "an affected use" of the term; ratiocination is ranked among words which "should not be recognized as members of good English society"; it is enunciated that, "for the use of ill—an adverb—as an adjective, thus, 'an ill man,' there is no defence and no excuse, except the contamination of bad example"; and partially is expressly restricted to the sense of "with unjust or unreasonable bias." Yet, in his latest production, that which we are engaged with, we find, at pp. 70, 139, 143, 251, respectively, "'guilt' is gratuitously confounded with 'gild'"; "subjects of study and ratiocination"; "with an ill grace"; and "universally or partially." At p. 419 he grieves over the Scotch "on the street," for in; and, at p. 489, having recovered from his grief, he writes of an "adolescent vendor [!] who stands on the street-corner, and cries," etc. If the decrees which he issues are undeserving that he himself should heed them, how can he suppose that others will attach a higher value to them, practically, than his own?

The Englishman's Critical and Expository Bible Cyclopædia. Compiled and written by the Rev. A. R. Fausset, M.A., Rector of St. Cuthbert's, York, sometime University Scholar and Senior Classical Moderator, Trinity College, Dublin; joint author of the 'Critical and Experimental Commentary.' Illustrated by six hundred woodcuts. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 4to, pp. 753.)—This is a monument of diligent compilation, of pious and reverent exploitation of the Bible and Biblical literature. The author's aim was "to put within the reach of all Bible students, learned and unlearned alike, the fruits of modern criticism and research, ..." and to present these fruits in a shape calculated to strengthen belief in the truth and authenticity of every word of Scripture. He finds that "in an age prone to scepticism God has given remarkable confirmations of the truth of His own Word in raising men who have been enabled to decipher the hieroglyphics of Egypt, the cuneiform inscriptions of Babylon and Assyria, and the archaic characters of the Moabite stone." The confirmations he collects and emphasizes with great knowledge and zeal; the simultaneously deciphered contradictions of Scriptural statements he piously explains away or ignores. He finds treasures of information available for hermeneutics in the lately unearthed lore of hoary heathen antiquity, and he displays them unhesitatingly, without the least regard to the rationalistic critic's "O sancta simplicitas!" The plagues of Egypt, he tells us, for instance (p. 187), "were all directed against the Egyptian gods," and he explains this thesis very learnedly: "The turning of the Nile into blood was a stroke upon Hapi, the Nile god. The plague of frogs attacked the female deity with a frog's head, Heka. . . . The third plague of dust-sprung lice fell upon the earth, worshipped in the Egyptian pantheism as Seb. . . . The fourth plague, of flies, was upon the air, deified as Shu, son of Ra, the sun god, or as Isis, queen of heaven. The fifth was the murrain on cattle, aimed at their ox worship. The sixth, the boils from ashes sprinkled toward the heaven, was a challenge to Neit, 'the great mother queen of highest heaven,' if she could stand before Jehovah." We omit the rest, as less clear and convincing than the foregoing, though displaying a still higher flight of critical ingenuity.

Mr. Fausset's work is also remarkable for the decision with which he propounds his own views of disputed matters: he generally ignores all other opinions, and thus spares his unlearned reader both pains and doubt. Here is an instance of that decision: Passing over in perfect silence all the other conjectures concerning the locality and the four rivers of Paradise, he gives us this one as a fact, s. v. "Eden"—"The primitive E. was somewhere in the locality containing the conjoined Euphrates and the Tigris (= 'Hiddekel'), which branch off northward into those two rivers, and southward branch into two channels again below Bassora, before falling into the sea, Gihon the E. channel, and Pison the W. Havilah, near the W. channel, would thus be N. E. Arabia; and Cush (= 'Ethiopia'), near the E. channel, would be Kissia, Chuzestan, or Susiana." This is all. Nor does the author waste much labor and space on the refutation of doubts smacking of systematic unbelief in miracles. A quotation from Matthew fully suffices to him to prove "the personal existence, miraculous fate, and prophetical office" of Jonah (s. v.): is it not distinctly stated, 'As Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth'? In the dove of "Gen. viii. 8, 9, seeking rest in vain, fleeing from Noah and the ark," he finds a kind of type of Jonah, whose name signifies dove, and similar types and anti-types he discovers everywhere. Thus, Ahitophel, who "combined shrewd sagacity with intimate knowledge of David, which he turned against David," becomes the type of Judas Iscariot, "in relation to Christ, knowing His favorite haunt for prayer, Gethsemane" (p. 405).

With the same ease with which our author defends the most extraordinary miracles he also establishes the contested authenticity of Scriptural books. The Song of Songs, he says (s. v. "Canticles"), is "the most excellent of songs; even as the antitypical Solomon, its subject and its author (by His Spirit), is King of kings, i. e., the greatest of kings. . . . Its Divine canonicity and authority are certain, as it is found in all Hebrew MSS. of Scripture; also in the Greek LXX. version; in the catalogues of Melito, bishop of Sardis, . . . and others." Nor does it cost him more to defend single facts assailed as unworthy of divine inspiration. That Elisha, f. i., called out bears and had forty-two boys torn to pieces for sneering at his baldness, is justified (s. v.) in this plain way: "The profanity of the parents, whose guilt the profane children filled the measure of, was punished in the latter, that the death of the sons might constrain the fathers to fear the Lord, since they would not love Him." Besides, Mr. Fausset contends that one of the words by which the mockers are designated in the original Hebrew does not mean 'little children,' and also—though this rather extenuates the crime—that "quereach" did not designate Elisha as really bald, but as a man "with hair short at the back of the head, in contrast with Elijah's shaggy locks flowing over his shoulders."

The Hebrew word quoted will show the "learned" reader how queer our author's way of spelling Semitic words is. Unfortunately, his spellings are as inconsistent as they are queer. According to his rule, the word quoted ought to be stranger still, queereeach; cf. his "bereekah" (p. 652), "seemel" (p. 303), "jobeel" (p. 297), etc. "Bereekah" again conflicts with "masse-cah" (p. 304), both with "melech" (p. 481), "melech" with the quoted "quereach," "quereach" also with "kophim" (p. 307), "kophim" with "tukki" (p. 674), "tukki" with "thucciim" (p. 307), and so on. This carelessness is, however, due chiefly to the author's indifference to minor points, while his attention is fastened on topics admitting of exhortative observations, and we are far from inclined to question the extent of his knowledge or his ability as a compiler and condenser. The mass of information pressed into this Cyclopædia—by one hand—is really prodigious.

Deutsche Hypothekenbanken. Kritik und Reformvorschläge von Dr. Julian Goldschmidt, Rechtsanwalt in Berlin. (Jena: Gustav Fischer. 1880.)—The mortgage companies of Germany, instituted for the purpose of making loans on real estate, and taking the Crédit Foncier of France as their model, are the subject of this volume of over two hundred pages. The book is written in an involved style of the traditional German type, and many of the questions which it discusses have only a local import; still, the searching analysis to which the author subjects the fundamental relations between mortgagor and mortgagee invest it with interest for the general reader, and its account of the recent real-estate crisis in Berlin suggests a curious analogy with the catastrophe which, between the years 1874 and 1876, overtook dealers in New York property and threatened to impair the stability of some very conservative financial institutions.

The mortgage-companies, or, as they are technically called, Hypothekenbanken, are, in a measure, the outgrowth and complement of another class of institutions, peculiar to Prussia, and formed by Frederic the Great after the Seven Years' War, when he was laboring to raise his kingdom out of the depths of misery and poverty by fostering trade, manufactures, and agriculture to the utmost of his power. These institutions are known as Landschaften or Ritterschaften, and are a number of corporations, each of which is composed of all the land-owners of one particular province, who combine for the purpose of obtaining loans secured by mortgages on their land. They are formed on the principle of unlimited liability, each member being responsible to the entire amount of his personal and real estate for the debts contracted or guaranteed by the company. There are two distinct methods of procedure in use by these corporations. In some of them, if a member wishes to obtain a mortgage-loan, he executes a first mortgage on his property (it is a matter of course that all of these mortgages are first liens) and issues one or more bonds, which his corporation then guarantees, contracting with the lender that in case it becomes necessary to foreclose, and a deficiency ensue, he may have recourse against the property of any other member of the company—which is equivalent to saying, any other land-owner in the same province. In other cases, it is the company itself which issues its bonds to the public, some particular member receiving the proceeds, and his particular property being primarily the lender's or bondholder's security, with recourse in case of need as already described. Whichever method is followed, the bonds are generally for round sums, are negotiable like our coupon bonds, and are regularly quoted at the Berlin stock exchange. They enjoy a high degree of credit, and are in demand among investors at prices ranging from 91½ per cent. for 3½ per cent. bonds to 103½ per cent. for 4½ per cent. bonds. These figures, however, are sufficient to show that the companies are extremely conservative in their valuations and in the proportionate amount of the loans which they guarantee, and that, consequently, the relief which they afford to the landed interest is not as thorough as their founders anticipated. Another circumstance to be noted is that they never make loans on city property or mere dwelling-houses, but only on country estates under cultivation.

To fill this aching void the Hypothekenbanken sprang into existence. They are joint stock companies with limited liability, their capital being simply a guarantee-fund for the holders of their bonds. They sell their bonds to the public and lend the proceeds on first mortgage. The difference between the interest they pay and the interest they charge constitutes their profit, to which is sometimes added a commission or bonus which the mortgagor is required to pay. The amount which they may lend on property is kept within certain limits by their charters, which also prescribe, in the case of the Prussian companies, in what manner they shall arrive at the valuation of the properties on which they accept mortgages. The condition of twenty-six of these banks, at the end of 1878, was as follows: their combined capital was (in round numbers, roughly reducing marks to dollars), $48,000,000; they held mortgages for $346,000,000; the amount of their bonds in circulation was $302,000,000; their expenses were $825,000; they earned a net average dividend of nine per cent. and declared an average dividend of seven per cent. During 1879 a great change took place in their condition, or, at least, in the condition of the Prussian banks. The loans of the latter are chiefly on houses and lots in the city of Berlin, and especially in the newly-built portions of the city, where the last three years have witnessed a staggering fall in values. Foreclosure sales have been the order of the day, and in most cases the banks which held the mortgages have been compelled to bid in the property, which they still hold. Instead of deriving their income from interest, unvarying in amount and regularly paid, they are compelled to derive it from rents and to adapt themselves to a species of business foreign to their organization. Many of them have been unable to declare any dividends on their stock for 1879, and the only consolation they can offer their stockholders lies in the hope that at some time or other they will be able to dispose of their holdings without loss, and perhaps even with a profit. The bondholders, however, get their interest regularly. The limits of this notice will not permit us to follow the author in his very interesting discussion of the causes which have led to such results, his exposition of the evil effects of the best-meant legislative enactments, his description of the methods employed to float the bonds, of the sharp practices of the brokers who made a market for them, and of the unhealthy stimulus given to the building trade, resulting in panic and bankruptcy. Suffice it to say that every feature of our real-estate crisis of 1875 is here reproduced and intensified.

Joan of Arc. By Janet Tuckey. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1880. 16mo, pp. 224.)—An intelligent résumé of its subject will be found in this reprint. Its materials are in great part derived, like the materials of other recent lives of the Maid, from M. Jules Quicherat's important work, the 'Procès de condamnation et de réhabilitation de Jeanne d'Arc' (Paris, 1841–1849, 5 vols. in 8), a nearly exhaustive collection of the contemporaneous documents, both historical and literary, which belong to the subject. Mrs. Tuckey makes no claims to original research, but she has used her material with good judgment and feeling, and has given as good an account of the Maid's campaigns, imprisonment, trial, and fate as could be permitted to a strictly popular treatment, which must pass over some of the most touching details of the martyrdom. Students of the subject will remember, for instance, the testimony of Martin Ladvener, Guillaume de la Chambre, Manchon, and Petrus Migecii (in Quicherat, vols. ii. pp. 7, 8; iii. pp. 50, 147, 148). The present work, though it is upon a smaller scale, recalls the manner of M. Henri Wallon's excellent life of Joan of Arc (reviewed in the Nation of June 29, 1876).

"NOT

written for a political purpose."

A Private Chapter of the War.

By GEO. W. BAILEY,

Late of Second Division Staff, Fifteenth Army Corps.

Cloth, 12mo, price $1.

FROM THE WISCONSIN STATE JOURNAL.

"The recital in this book of experiences such as these is too realistic to allow any charge of romancing or exaggeration; the reader feels it to be true. The illustrations in these pages of the extent and character of the Union sentiment among certain classes of the South, and the different feelings, motives, and purposes of different classes of the people concerning the Union and the war for its preservation, are so graphic and instructive as to suggest that those who have read the 'Fool's Errand' will do well to re-read it, and peruse this little volume in the same connection, as a means to a better understanding of the Southern political question. It is but proper to say, however, that Lieut. Bailey betrays in the writing of his reminiscences no political purpose or object whatever."

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1880.

The Week.

THE unofficial but nearly complete returns from the October elections substantiate the Republican claims made on the morning after the contest, though they seemed at the time extravagant. With one county only estimated, the plurality for the Ohio State ticket is 22,000; Townsend, who headed it, having a trifle less than 19,000, and running behind because of his strict temperance views. In Indiana Porter's plurality is 7,545, with the entire State heard from. We have seen no evidence that Landers ran very largely behind his associates, by the way, which argues, of course, that his unpopularity was either fictitious or condoned, or that it affected the whole ticket. The Ohio Congressional delegation will stand 15 Republicans to 20 Democrats, and the Indiana 9 to 4—a gain of 6 in the first instance and of 3 in the second. The Indiana Legislature shows a Republican majority of 14, instead of the Democratic majority of 26 in the last body, and will elect a Republican successor to Senator McDonald. The Democrats lost some ground in West Virginia also, though probably not as much as the Republican assertion that the majority is but 8,000 implies. A "straw" of some significance, perhaps, as to New Jersey, is the Newark charter election, which took place the same day, and resulted in a Republican majority of 2,200 and gain of 5,700. It seems probable that the next Congress will be Republican in both branches, by very narrow majorities.

General Hancock's first deliverance on the tariff question was so dark, not to say mystical, that it not unnaturally alarmed his supporters, and probably contributed in some degree to the Republican victory in Indiana. Mr. Randolph, of New Jersey, therefore felt it necessary to ask him for an explanation of it, on the ground that it was misreported or "imperfectly understood." To this General Hancock has made answer that he is "too sound an American to advocate any departure from the general features of a policy which has been largely instrumental in building up our industries"; that "we must raise revenue in some way or other"; that "the necessity of raising money for the administration of the Government will continue as long as human nature lasts"; that the best way to raise revenue "is largely by the tariff," and that, therefore, "so far as we are concerned, all talk about free-trade is folly." He then suggests that "some such bill as Eaton's" will probably treat the tariff question with "justice to all our interests," and he recommends a revision of the present tariff by a "commission of intelligent experts." We need hardly say that this is nearly as mysterious as the interview. The revenue which will be called for "as long as human nature lasts" might be raised, as in England, on four or five articles, none of them products of native industry. This would be a "tariff for revenue only," such as the Democrats call for, but would not be a "tariff for protection," such as the Republicans call for; and the only indication we get of General Hancock's preference in the matter lies in his assertion that he is "too sound an American to advocate departure from the general features of a policy which has been largely instrumental in building up our industries." But then the convention which nominated him was either composed of unsound Americans or did advocate a departure from what we suppose he means by "the general features of the policy," etc. But why go farther in analyzing what defies analysis? The general's views on the tariff are not, we firmly believe, to be got at by any purely human agency, and his second utterance needs explanation fully as much as the first.

Any how, the tariff is what seems to have done the work for the Republicans in Indiana. There were other agencies, but the tariff was the principal one, and the "Solid South" was apparently not among the number. In fact, the "Solid South" has been virtually returned to the arsenal as a useless weapon. The gain of this to the country, no matter what one's views about the tariff may be, is immense. The continual denunciation of the South, to the neglect of all other topics, was a sort of political hypochondria, like that of a man who passes his time considering and talking about his own ailments. Nothing will do more to promote the cause of order and law at the South than the growth of healthy interest at the North in other subjects than Southern wickedness, because in this interest the Southern people will soon come, through the force of events, to participate. They cannot, however, join any party in any common pursuit whose orators make denunciation of the whole Southern community the staple of their speeches. We commend to those who have, during the past four years, been disposed to condemn our incredulity about "outrages," the total disappearance of them from this canvass. They must surely see now that if the state of the South had been what the Republican orators represented it in 1876, 1878, and 1879, it could not have so changed for the better that in 1880 there is no need to speak of outrages at all. There has been no mention in this canvass even of the Chisholm murder, or of the assault on the postmaster at Blackville, both good old seasoned outrages which have been in use in two canvasses without a sign of wear, and could very well have done good service in this one. We therefore advise every Stalwart to retire to his closet and ask himself why it is there was so much uproar about Southern atrocities down to last year, and why it suddenly stopped this year. If he answers this question candidly, truthfully, and after thorough heart-searching, not only will a great light come in on his mind, but he will issue forth a much more cheerful, agreeable, and useful Republican than he ever was before, and a more satisfactory person in all the relations of life.

We beg to call attention to an interesting letter on the evolution of the Indiana campaign which will be found in another column. It is very instructive in more ways than one, and both illustrates and corroborates our remarks on the same subject last week. One reason why both parties avoid financial and economical topics is that discussion of them would involve the loss of the services on the stump of many of their great men. It is, moreover, to be said for General Harrison, whose course our correspondent criticises in the Indiana campaign, that a man of sense who takes the stump has to follow the lines marked out by the committees for others. The same "thunder" is served out to all, and failure to use it is not well received at "headquarters." Mr. Schurz, whose speeches are always those of a rational man addressed to rational men, is notoriously not in favor in committee-rooms, and is freely sworn at by every Republican blatherskite and trickster. We have little doubt the present campaign, however, will result in the purchase by the Republicans of an entirely new outfit and the sale of the "Solid South," with other condemned stores, to the junk-dealers.

The result in Indiana has excited a great deal of sympathy, even among the victors, for such recent converts to the Democratic party as General Butler and Colonel Forney. General Butler's case is the sadder of the two, because his object in going over was, he says, to enable him to give more effective aid to the suffering negro. His disappointment, therefore, must reach his very vitals, and we fear may permanently sour a very rich nature. Since his return, however, from Indiana, where he has been stumping, he has, with characteristic cheerfulness and philosophy, ascribed the defeat to frauds which cannot, he thinks, be repeated in November, when the State will surely be carried by the Democrats. Colonel Forney's case is not so pathetic, both because he does not mix philanthropy with his politics, and because, like the cheerful man that he is, when he finds he has taken a wrong road he always comes back to the fork and tries the other, so that his happiness is assured in any case. Now that he finds the Democrats are not going to win he will doubtless join the Republicans once more. The Colonel is a good man, too, loves righteousness, and thinks the big battalions always have the best stock of it on hand.

Both National Committees have issued addresses. That of the Republicans is of course a whoop of triumph. That of the Democrats is more interesting, as giving an explanation of the disaster by those whom it has overtaken. They acknowledge "surprise" and "disappointment," but say the Republicans were as much surprised as they were. The "causes" of the calamity were: the "Africanization" of the State by the Republicans; the corrupt use of money; the importation and use of repeaters; and the aid derived "from the use of the Federal machinery of elections, under pretence of supervising the election of members of Congress." Still, they take a hopeful view of the future. The "corruption fund" will now have to be divided among many States; the repeaters will go home, and those who were arrested but discharged by the United States marshals on straw bail will not care to come back, and the Federal machinery will not be at work. In fact, they seem to expect that the Republicans will in November find no way of carrying out their wicked designs. This, however, is almost too sanguine a view, and we do not see how men so familiar with the variety of forms taken by human depravity, and with its persistence and ingenuity, as Messrs. Barnum and English must be, can look for any such sudden triumph of virtue.

The latest returns of the Georgia election indicate that the total Democratic vote cast for the subordinate officers on the State ticket was 75,000; that Mr. Norwood, the anti-machine candidate for governor, received 50,000, and that Governor Colquitt owed his majority of 55,000 and upwards to white and black Republican votes to the number of at least 30,000. The Columbus Enquirer conjectures that Norwood had the greater white vote, but of course cannot argue the point and admits the existence of an opposite belief. Whichever view be the right one, it is certain that thousands of negroes voted for Colquitt for reasons best known to themselves. The Times correspondent at Atlanta says fully 65,000 black voters took advantage of the split among the Democrats to resume the privilege of voting with safety, and at such a price as the Colquitt faction was willing to pay for their support. What is remarkable is that the volunteering and bargaining in Colquitt's favor went on in face of the circulation by the Norwood party of a so-called "Convict Catechism," intended to reach and deter this very class of voters by reminding them of the cruelties of the convict chain-gang system in Georgia, of Governor Colquitt's indifference to them, and of Senator Norwood's lively sensibility to the disgrace which the system brings upon the State. It also held up Governor Colquitt's pardon of white murderers of unoffending blacks, and neglect to see justice done when the victims were poor, but it strikingly failed of its end. The incident shows that in the breaking of the color line lies the guarantee of negro suffrage, as we have always contended, and that there is no predicting how this suffrage will be bestowed in any election from which exotic distinctions like "Republican" and "Democratic" are eliminated.

Mr. Conkling has been "supporting the ticket" with so much zeal and energy, though on the tariff issue mainly, in Indiana, and in this way is making his conduct in this campaign so much of a contrast to his conduct in the Hayes campaign and to his sulky attitude when Mr. Garfield was in New York, that it is reported that he must have concluded a satisfactory "bargain" with the Republican candidate. Even his own most devoted followers do not pretend that he would work in this way from a mere sense of the importance of Republican success to the suffering negro or to the country at large. Mr. Garfield has, however, given emphatic assurances that he will make no bargain or promises of the kind which Mr. Conkling most delights in; so that we have before us the alternative of believing that Mr. Garfield has been making false representations, or that Mr. Conkling's friends do him injustice when they admit that he never really "works" in a canvass until he knows what his pay is to be. Of course, the latter is the conclusion to which we must all joyfully come. What has roused Mr. Conkling must be his sympathy with the black man, his dread of a "Solid South," and his anxiety about the future of American industry.

The process of freeing the editorial mind, which always follows a Presidential contest, has already begun in consequence of the Indiana reverse. The New York Sun has restrained itself a good while, but at last it sees no use in "a public journal in a political canvass that discusses everything save the real, live issues before the people," and it gives way to its long-time "irresistible impulse to handle this Hancock and Garfield campaign without gloves." What it means by this figure presently appears when it calls its party an ass for dispensing with Tilden, General Hancock "a good man, weighing two hundred and fifty pounds," and English an odious skinflint, who has, however, "generously given his name to the ticket." Still, the Sun is bound to see a final ray of hope, and urges Democrats to fresh exertions, on the singular ground that "our candidates, then (!), will answer." The same paper puts another load off its conscience by asserting with double-leaded bluntness that the rebels will never rule if General Hancock is elected, and that the Unionists who conquered in the Rebellion "will for ever hereafter control and conduct the American Government." These truths it has evidently suppressed too long, for the Independents and Democrats yet under the spell of the brigadier bugbear are vigorously exhorted to vote for an Administration which "will be as fre from the rule of rebels as from the rule of the Czar of all the Russias.'

Another admirable speech from Mr. Schurz at the Cooper Union on Tuesday evening confirmed his eminence in this campaign for genuine political oratory. The most valuable portion of it was his review of the Southern question as affected by the October elections, which was couched in the ideal language of the "Republican emissary at the South." His words deserve to be reproduced in every Southern paper, and pondered by every Southern politician and voter. He denied the existence of any peculiarly Southern grievance, and advised the people of that section that if power is their object "the only way for them to obtain it will be for them to look at the interests they have in common with the rest of the country more than at the interests which they erroneously think to be peculiar to them as the South." Sentences like these it is a pity to shorten:

"The people of the South may be sure that the people of the North cherish no ill-will towards them. . . . If by Republican politicians demonstrations of such feelings seem to be made it is mere stage-thunder. . . . In fact, the Southern people have had no greater enemy than the Democratic party. . . . It is my candid opinion that nothing better can happen to them than another striking demonstration of the futility of all the efforts of the Democratic party to obtain the possession of national power as long as that party is constituted and managed as it is now. That demonstration, sweeping away those disturbing illusions I have spoken of, will be apt to bring the South to a clear sense of the actual state of things."

A curious correspondence between Senator Wade Hampton and Mr. John Sherman has been published. Mr. Sherman was reported to have said in a speech that the North was asked to "surrender all it had done into the hands of Wade Hampton and the Ku-klux, and the little segment in the North which is called the Democratic party." Wade Hampton asked if he meant by this "to connect him directly or indirectly with what was known as the Ku-klux Klan." By the Ku-klux Klan Mr. Wade Hampton evidently meant the armed organization known by that name some ten years ago, which committed outrages by night on political opponents, and accordingly thought he had "cornered" Mr. Sherman. But Mr. Sherman was much too smart for him. On being called to account he acknowledged that Mr. Hampton had not been personally connected with the Ku-klux Klan, and that he knew that "he [Hampton] had, in one or two instances, resisted and defeated its worst impulses." But he then enlarged the term "Ku-klux Klan" so as to make it cover actual crimes of every grade in the code of crimes, from murder to the meanest form of ballot-box-stuffing, committed since 1870 down to this date in South Carolina, and then based the power of the Democrats at the South on these crimes, and by making Wade Hampton as Senator the product of this power, proved him substantially a member of the Ku-klux Klan, and the triumph of Hancock a delivery of the United States Government to the Klan. Mr. Sherman's letter is an amusing piece of conglomerative argument, and was evidently too much for Wade Hampton, for his reply was that the Secretary of the Treasury "had uttered what was false, and what he knew to be false." This is stupid. If he had had a little patience and ingenuity he might have worked out a beautiful counter demonstration, showing that Mr. Sherman was the partner and confederate of a large gang of Louisiana cheats and swindlers and perjurers. The literary and rhetorical weakness of the Democrats in this canvass is pitiable.

The managers of the "Ladies' Deposit Company," the Boston swindle of which we spoke a fortnight ago, have been lodged in jail, and the sheriff is in possession of such assets of the concern as can be found. The suffering caused by the bursting of the bubble is probably very great, but in most cases will be concealed. The "President" now weeps and says there were a number of men behind her whom she does not know, and who paid her one hundred dollars a month for her management, and used to come every evening and carry off the day's deposits in a basket. That this story has some foundation is not unlikely. The affair has been very remarkable, for reasons we recently gave, but it has been made more remarkable still within the past week by a passionate defence of the "bank" from Gail Hamilton, addressed to the Boston Advertiser. This lady's contention is in substance that the swindle, if swindle it be (which she does not admit), is no worse than those which men, including managers of savings-banks, are every day perpetrating, and that those who exposed it are responsible for the loss which has overtaken the depositors, inasmuch as it was owing to this exposure that the institution for the first time failed to meet the demands upon it. She therefore calls upon the editor to give his note of hand, with interest at eight per cent. a month, for two hundred dollars, with which she had been entrusted by a poor Southern woman, and which she invested in the "Ladies' Deposit." The letter reads a little like a burlesque, but is evidently seriously meant. It would form an interesting appendix to the series of letters against civil-service reform which Gail Hamilton published in the Tribune three or four years ago. But bad as those were they did not prepare one for this defence of Mrs. Howe's bank.

Colonel Higginson has apologized for the depositors in the bank on the ground of their ignorance of financial matters—ignorance which is fostered both by the kind of education women receive and by the way in which their male relatives treat them in all money matters. This is doubtless in the great majority of cases a sound plea, but it cannot be made to cover Gail Hamilton's. It is hardly possible that a woman who has for some years pursued political and social essay-writing as an occupation, and who has recently in a book advocated the abolition of the public higher education, can be ignorant that there is no honest banking which can pay 96 per cent. per annum on deposits. It is consequently difficult to avoid the conclusion that she knew that the earlier depositors in Mrs. Howe's bank would be paid out of funds supplied by the later ones, and that when she invested her Southern friend's money in it it was with the hope of getting it out again at the expense of other speculators before the inevitable crash came. Undoubtedly plenty of male essayists and politicians are capable of making investments of this sort, but we have not yet heard of one who has had the audacity to come out in print in defence of such a speculation and in denunciation of those who exposed it. Gail Hamilton's performance is important as touching the expectation of many that the entrance of women into the political arena would exert a purifying influence on politics, and we wish Colonel Higginson would discuss it from this point of view.

The Democratic factions in this city have, after long deliberation and a good deal of wrangling, agreed upon the candidates for county offices to be chosen next month. Their conferences have been conducted on the lowest plane of politics and in the main by a vulgar order of politicians, and of course a common self-distrust quite as much as any interest in the good effects of their union upon the party at large has produced their concert. The mayoralty was naturally the chief office in dispute, and the withdrawal of Mr. Schell, whose close intimacy with John Kelly rendered him especially objectionable, affords matter for congratulation. But whether the nomination of Mr. W. R. Grace is in this respect much better seems extremely doubtful. Of all the names presented by Irving Hall to Tammany he seems to have been by far the most satisfactory, and he is reported to be an intimate friend of Cardinal McCloskey, who is a near connection of Mr. Kelly. So far as we are aware, nothing is known to his discredit, though the Times refers to his connection with the receivership of the bankrupt Continental Life Insurance Company, and says significantly that it "will be investigated and reported in due time." He is a "business man," no politician, has made a reputation for philanthropy, and is an Irish Roman Catholic. The city has never had a Catholic mayor, nor since colonial times, we believe, one who was not a native, and both these circumstances are likely to be heard from on the local stump.

We trust no more weight will be attached to them, however, than campaign necessities absolutely demand, not only because in this city such an argument would be sure to prove a boomerang, but because hostility to what is perfectly constitutional and, superficially at least, perfectly safe is sure to affect the sensitiveness of those thus attacked in a way to intensify whatever tendencies they may have that are objected to. If the history of the Roman Catholic question proves anything it is that aggressive Protestant timidity is certain to be taken for bigotry, and resisted with all the force of a sincere sense of wrong. There is, moreover, abundant reason for opposing Mr. Grace on other grounds. The hope of improved administration in local government here rests almost wholly in the chance of the election by hook or by crook of some thoroughly independent mayor, as the first beginnings of reform must proceed from better appointments. Talk of a mayor with a responsible party behind him is idle, there being no "responsible party" of any sort in the city. The Times's suggestion that the Republicans select some good Democrat to run against Mr. Grace seems sensible to us; but after our experience with Mr. Cooper—a mayor of conspicuously good intentions and of conspicuous ill-success in executing them—this needs to be supplemented by advice for the selection of fit aldermen; otherwise, the Republican machine, which is to the full as bad as either of the Democratic ones, may be relied upon to balk all the reforming efforts of the mayor by a Common Council alliance, as it has done in the case of Mayor Cooper.

Following the elections in Ohio and Indiana, United States 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds advanced in market price about 2 per cent. As the outstanding issue of these bonds is about one thousand million of dollars the advance represents an increase in the market value of this form of the public credit of about $20,000,000 in a single week, and for the most part in the two days after the result of these elections became known. Railroad securities of all kinds also advanced in price largely, and Stock Exchange speculation was buoyant. In the trade markets there was also some improvement in prices, and the reason generally given was a restoration of public confidence. Foreign specie continues to flow to this country, although the receipts during the last week were smaller than of late, namely, $2,831,799, making the total since the beginning of August $34,451,556, against $44,400,417 last year; and $39,600,429 since January 1 last, against $50,571,695 during the corresponding period in 1879. The business of the country—general trade and transportation—continues large, so that it may be said that at present there is a good prospect of an abundance of money.

The news from Europe is unusually meagre. The Porte has agreed to surrender Dulcigno unconditionally, and commissioners were appointed on the part of the Porte and Montenegro, respectively, to arrange the matter; but when they came together it was found that Riza Pasha raised new difficulties, touching not simply the form but the substance, and at this writing the surrender has not taken place and the Montenegrins are still in doubt as to whether when they proceed to take possession they will not be attacked by the Albanians. It appears to be certain, however, that when the surrender does take place the German and Austrian and French fleets will go home; and if Mr. Gladstone chooses to menace the Turks on the Greek question he will have only the co-operation of Italy and Russia to count upon. Germany is said to be more and more nervous about the consequences of pushing the matter any further.

In France the decrees against the religious orders are being steadily executed. The Carmelites have just been ousted and the evil day is not far off for the others. The Bonapartists have begun again to show some signs of life by asking Prince Napoleon to receive a deputation which is to request him to resign the succession in favor of his son Prince Victor; but he has answered by refusing to receive it and requesting the concocters of the movement to mind their own business,

THE LESSON OF THE OCTOBER ELECTIONS.

THE October elections have not absolutely settled the result of the Presidential election, but they have made it almost certain. Even if the Democrats carry New York, it now seems in the highest degree improbable that they will be able to get the twelve votes which will still be necessary to give them the Presidency. If they cannot get them from Indiana they are still less likely to get them from Connecticut or New Jersey, the remaining two doubtful States. Moreover, the majority in Ohio is not only large but unexpectedly large, and the majority in Indiana is also very large, considering that the Republicans had very good reason to fear that they would there have no majority at all, or, at best, only as many hundreds as they actually have thousands. They are, of course, very exultant, and with good reason, and will go to the polls in November with a well-founded assurance of victory. In a time of exultation men are naturally enough not much disposed for reflection, and yet the occasion is one in which a little reflection on some of the facts which the late State elections have made prominent may be very profitable, even in the short interval which now separates us from the Presidential election.

The most prominent of these facts is this: that during the eight years of General Grant's Presidency, which all the practical politicians of the Republican party highly approved of and considered, from the party point of view, admirably conducted, the party went on steadily losing ground at the polls until, in 1876, it had ceased to control the House of Representatives, and was aware that it would in the next Congress cease to control the Senate. It would have lost the Presidency but for practices in three Southern States which most people now admit to have been at least questionable. It lost at the Presidential election New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Indiana, and Mr. Hayes only carried his own State of Ohio by the very small plurality of 7,516. It must be borne in mind that during the previous eight years the machinery of the Federal Government was managed just as Messrs. Conkling, Blaine, Morton, Logan, Chandler, and the other Republican chiefs thought it ought to be managed. General Grant was, in fact, their ideal President, and his policy, in all that concerned the party interest, was in their eyes hardly capable of improvement. Mr. Conkling had control of the New York Custom-house, and General Butler, during the latter part of the Grant Administration, of the Boston Custom-house. The civil service in all its branches was freely and undisguisedly used for the furtherance of the party interests. There was nothing "goody-goody" in the management of it. The South, too, was kept in the condition which Mr. Blaine thought most important—that is, the States were governed by bands of Northern politicians, whose authority was supported by the interference of the Federal troops.

When Mr. Hayes came into office this policy was changed. All Federal interference, or threat of interference, or assertion of right to interfere, at the South was abandoned. In his distribution of patronage at the South there was much to condemn, of which we have often spoken in these columns. But this first fault committed, the system of using the Federal patronage for the purposes of active electioneering was abandoned. Mr. Conkling was deprived of his custom-house; General Butler was deprived of his. As a general rule the use of the offices for partisan purposes was taken away from members of both Houses. There have been exceptions to this rule, and some perhaps rather flagrant ones, but on the whole there was a marked change from the Grant régime, a change so great as to disgust and alienate every politician of much prominence in the party, and cause the two most prominent—Messrs. Conkling and Blaine—to break off all relations with the President and Cabinet, and to refer to them in public only in terms of reproach or contempt. Pains were taken at Republican State conventions to make all reference to the Administration in the platforms either slighting or cold, on the ground that it had in some manner betrayed the party or proved indifferent to its interests, and the eulogies on General Grant were often so worded as to serve the purpose of a condemnation of his successor. Nor was there any sign of an abatement of this hostility as time went by. It is only three weeks since Mr. Conkling opened the present canvass in this State by a speech in which a carefully-framed insult to President Hayes was a leading feature.

We have not been backward ourselves in condemning President Hayes's policy with regard to the reform of the civil service. We have considered it, judged by the standard set up in his letter of acceptance, both inconsistent and vacillating, and as regards the use made of the offices at the South after his election as something worse than inconsistent and vacillating. But the fault we have found with it is that he has not gone further towards fulfilling his own promises. The fault found with it by Messrs. Conkling and Blaine and the other "practical men" is that he should have made any such promises at all, and have gone any distance whatever towards fulfilling them. They do not judge him by the standard he set up, but by their own standard—that is, the Administration of General Grant. They have held that in so far as his principles and practice differed from those of General Grant he was wrong, and wrought injury to the party; that his Administration was, in short, an evil for which the proper cure was another term of General Grant, or of a man such as Mr. Blaine, who would follow General Grant's methods.

Now, how do we know whether an administration is injurious to the party or not? How do we know what the party feels, or thinks, or desires, or, in short, in what condition the party is? Solely by the elections. All indications, as has been proved a hundred times, except the vote at the polls, are deceptive. The opinions and prophecies of newspapers and individual politicians are at every election shown to be erroneous. In fact, it may be said that for all practical purposes the party exists, is visible, and submits itself to examination only on election-day. What Mr. Conkling says, or Mr. Blaine says, or Mr. Logan says is of no sort of consequence unless it is confirmed by the vote. The vote shows whether the party is gaining strength or declining, and nothing else does show it conclusively. Judged by this test, and judged, too, from the managing politicians' point of view, Mr. Hayes's Administration has been curiously successful. It found the Republican party so weakened and discredited that it had lost fourteen States and the control of Congress, and only succeeded in retaining its hold on the Presidency by what its adversaries considered a fraud. Under it the Republicans have been gradually regaining their ascendency in Congress, and the last election of Mr. Hayes's term will probably, indeed almost certainly, restore it completely. It has increased the majorities in the States in which under General Grant it barely escaped defeat. It has "carried" Indiana by the largest majority since 1872, a problem to which General Grant gave much attention but to which his tactics were never quite equal. It has caused Ohio to pronounce for General Garfield by a plurality three times as large as that which it gave Mr. Hayes himself. Of the revival of prosperity in all branches of industry, and of the restoration of order to the finances, and of the rapid reduction of the public debt under its rule we do not need to speak. The Republican politicians have been describing these things with much fulness during the last three months on every stump in the land. In short, from the material point of view, the contrast between the United States as Mr. Hayes found them and the United States as he leaves them is prodigious. Wealth, population, exports, imports, manufactures, agriculture, immigration have all grown under him with marvellous rapidity. "Oh!" but it will be said by the Stalwarts, "it is not to the Administration we are indebted for all this; it is due to the wise legislation of Republican Congresses and the industry and enterprise of the people." To which we reply that every Stalwart is compelled, by the language used by him during the present canvass in describing the mischief which would be wrought by Hancock's election, to acknowledge that it is due in the main to Mr. Hayes's Administration. General Hancock, if elected, could not legislate. He could, like Mr. Hayes, only veto and recommend, and take care that the laws were faithfully executed. Nevertheless, a thousand orators and a thousand newspapers have been assuring us ever since July 1 that on General Hancock's conduct within this narrow sphere it would depend whether our credit was destroyed, our industry wrecked, and the Treasury emptied by jobs, and that this conduct would probably justify the worst fears of his enemies. In fact, the happy condition of public and private affairs, which has for this reason been used as the strongest and most effective argument against him, must, if he can destroy it and if General Garfield can preserve it, have been largely the work of the President whom one or the other of them will succeed. The triumph of the party in the election of General Garfield, which now seems likely if not certain, will be a sort of crown or seal of Mr. Hayes's policy if the reasons given by Republican orators for not electing General Hancock have any force whatever.

All this points irresistibly to a conclusion which we trust General Garfield will take to heart, and which he seems to have overlooked when he wrote his letter of acceptance. This conclusion is that the professional politicians, of whom Mr. Conkling is the type and head, are not skilful politicians in any but the narrowest sense of that term. They manage conventions dextrously, but they do not manage a party so as to give it victory at the polls. Their tactics are not adapted to the battle-field, however strong on the parade-ground. They are very like the Russian grand-duke who objected to war because it spoiled the "set up" of the troops. The things which these men admire and advocate are, in short, whatever merits they may have, not the things which give majorities to the Republican party at the polls. They might suit some party, but it is evidently not the Republican party. There may be a country which could be successfully governed according to Mr. Conkling's ideas, but apparently not this country. When he thought things were going beautifully the Republican party was rapidly losing the Government; during the last four years, when he has thought it was going to the devil, it has been rapidly regaining the Government, and is finally achieving victories long unknown in behalf of a candidate whose nomination almost made him sick, and whom he cannot name without signs of disgust. So that the true policy for the next Republican President would seem to call for not less Hayes and more Grant, but a good deal more Hayes and no Grant at all; and to indicate not that the advice of the professionals ought to be more closely followed, but that the complete loss of it, such as Mr. Hayes has had to put up with, is the surest guarantee of party triumphs. If the ordinary rules of prudence are of any use in politics, nothing which has not come to pass can be more certain than that if the persons who have been foremost in reviling Mr. Hayes had had their way during the past four years, General Hancock's election would to-day be assured beyond peradventure.

GENERAL HANCOCK'S ESCAPADE ON THE TARIFF.

WE ventured, on the 12th of August last (No. 789), to maintain the desirableness of having Presidential candidates take the stump on their own behalf in the canvass, on the ground that the practice would tend to improve both the nominations and the platforms. We said:

"The great flaw in the working of the governmental machine in our time is the absence of any direct responsibility to the public on the part of officers, and the absence of any direct means of communication between them. If Presidential candidates had always been expected to justify and commend on the stump the party nomination, there is very little doubt that the practice of nominating obscure and mediocre men and keeping them in strict seclusion till the election, would never have sprung up; and the candidate, on the other hand, would not have been able, as he is now, to protect himself against all responsibility by taking shelter behind the party. His position towards the public, in short, would have undergone an assimilation, in many ways desirable, to that of the chief of the cabinet in England. The party would not venture to nominate a man who could not make a good figure in the public presentation of his views on the leading questions of the day, or who had no views to present on such questions. Knowing well, too, that if he took the stump he would have to explain the party position on these questions, not vaguely or evasively but explicitly, they would probably be more careful to furnish him a platform which would bear being expounded. In expounding it, too, he would necessarily commit himself distinctly on all matters of importance, and would thus furnish the voters with very valuable memoranda to be used in watching and criticising his Presidential career."

We had little idea when this was written that General Hancock would, by this time, furnish a striking illustration of the soundness of our position. But this he has done. He was nominated on the old system. As a politician he was both "mediocre and obscure," and we concluded that of course he would be kept in "strict seclusion" and silence until after the election, both because the Democratic platform would not bear exposition, and because, if it would, he was not competent to expound it. His letter of acceptance strengthened this impression. It was the letter of a man who wished well to his country but knew nothing about its political business, and it might, in fact, have been written by any well-wisher of the country—the Emperor William, for instance. It must, therefore, have caused his supporters a genuine and by no means pleasant surprise when he escaped from custody by telegraphing his congratulations to Mr. Plaisted, the newly-elected Fusionist Governor of Maine, for these congratulations, if they meant anything, must have meant approval of Plaisted's views on finance, and were therefore, pro tanto, an exposition of the Democratic position on the currency. Plaisted and his supporters favor the issue of all currency by the Government, and the abolition of all banks of issue; and if General Hancock is glad of their triumph at the polls it is not unreasonable to conclude that he favors an increased issue of greenbacks, and the withdrawal of the circulation of the national banks. This is a very startling proposal, particularly when unaccompanied by any plan for making and keeping Government paper redeemable in coin. It would produce, if carried out, an extraordinary disturbance in the business of the country and make the financial future, already disagreeably uncertain, more uncertain than ever.

General Hancock, however, did not stop here. There were probably few things for which the public was less prepared at his hands than an exposition of the Democratic position regarding the tariff. We took occasion a few weeks ago to point out the ambiguity of the phrase "tariff for revenue only," used in the Democratic platform. There is now no doubt that this was inserted without any thought of its importance, and without any intention of dwelling on it or acting on it. No Democratic orator has interpreted it on the stump, and the conclusion is irresistible that the party did not mean to make it an "issue" in the canvass. But if they did not mean to make it an issue they ought not to have said anything about it. If they did mean to make it an issue they ought to have explained fully what they understood by it, and in what manner, if they got into power, they meant to act on it. Nothing can well be more important to the business men of the country than information of this kind from any party which is asking to be entrusted with the government. We have made no secret in these columns of our objections to the tariff now in force, but we have no hesitation in saying that a proposal to convert the present tariff into a revenue tariff at one stroke, considering the enormous investments which have been made under the former within the last twenty years, sounds to us like the suggestion of an insane person. It is hardly possible any rational and intelligent Democrat can have had anything of the kind in mind. A revenue tariff, whenever resorted to, must be introduced very slowly and with ample notice to manufacturers, and any one who advocates it is bound to tell people within what period and by what processes he proposes to make the change. If the Democratic platform had been a sincere expression of party policy, as it ought to have been, this duty would have been assigned to competent orators, and the halls would have been ringing all over the country during the past three months with tariff discussions, and General Hancock would either have been instructed to keep dead silence about the subject and leave it to be treated by the experts, or have been crammed so as to make a respectable deliverance to the interviewers. All these precautions, however, were neglected. The tariff plank was apparently not intended for exposition by anybody, and then perhaps the least competent man in the party, the candidate himself, was allowed to expound it.

Of his exposition made to the reporter of a New Jersey newspaper, and subsequently revised and amended in a letter to Mr. Randolph, written with the view of doing away with the unfortunate impression the interview produced, we do not need to speak in detail. In fact there is nothing in it to discuss. The General's talk about the tariff is that of a man who knows nothing about it, and who apparently, until he began to talk, had never thought about it. There is nothing discreditable to him in this ignorance. He is a soldier, and soldiers, as a general rule, know nothing, and are not expected to know anything, about tariffs. The soldier's business is to smash people who will not get out of the way, and to the successful performance of this duty no knowledge about tariffs would contribute anything. General Hancock was nominated because he held the Cemetery at Gettysburg against the rebels, and this feat he might have performed without ever having heard of the tariff. Moreover, those who nominated him knew he had no knowledge about tariffs, but they expected to get him through the canvass on the old plan without having this fact brought prominently to light. His indiscretion has betrayed them. He has not only made himself somewhat ridiculous, but has brought home to the public with much force the charlatanry of the way in which platforms are made up. And yet he has done the very thing which he ought to have done had he been the right man in the right place, and had the platform been what it ought to have been. Had he been the right man in the right place, the kind of man we had a right to expect from the Democrats in view of their criticism of Republicans during the past twenty years, he would have known all about tariffs. He would have understood what a tariff for revenue meant, and how it differed from a tariff for protection, and would have been prepared to explain how it should be brought into use, and he would have taken care that there was nothing in the platform on which he could be caught napping. Had the Convention meant to nominate such a man, too, they would have been careful to put nothing into the resolutions which their candidate could not defend or explain, and the Presidential canvass would have been a solid and instructive discussion of living subjects.

The incident is likely to be most useful in putting an end to the hallucination by which so large a portion of the community has been afflicted during the past fifteen years, that a professional soldier can successfully, or even creditably, administer the affairs of a Government such as that of the United States has become since the war. The revival of this hallucination by the Democrats in the year 1880 is one of the most singular events in their very singular party history. The vastness of the revenue, the multitude of conflicting interests, the complexity of the laws, the heterogeneous character of the population, and the recent enlargement of the sphere of the Federal Government have combined to make the Presidency an office which ought either to be filled by a trained and experienced civilian or abolished as a public danger and nuisance. The Republicans put a soldier in the place at the close of the civil war, when the great problems of the Government were still in part military, but his ignorance of civil affairs and insensibility to purely political considerations were just as great as General Hancock's. His messages during his eight years abounded with recommendations which were for the most part puerile and to which Congress never paid any attention. His treatment of the Cabinet as a personal staff gave rise to innumerable scandals and abuses. No great soldier has succeeded as the head of a constitutional government. Cromwell failed; Napoleon failed, or made no pretence of trying; and the Duke of Wellington failed—how lamentably, the latest volume of his letters has more fully revealed. Washington succeeded, but Washington was an exceptional character, and, indeed, was not a real or great soldier; he was bred a civilian. It is to be hoped the defeat of General Hancock will be the end of an experiment which has reached the ridiculous stage of failure; that it should have lasted so long is not creditable to us as a great commercial and par excellence civilian people.

THE LYRIC CAMPAIGN.

FEW things American, it is to be creditably said, perhaps, are less characteristic than what may be called, in virtue solely of its quadrennial inspirations, the patriotic muse. We seem to lack the lyric quality so utterly that popular attempts at lyrical expression have almost no significance, and are too spiritless and perfunctory to strike one as bad even, or at least as anything but the atrocity of platitude. It is obvious that Fletcher of Saltoun had no prophetic vision of the direction of the course of empire, and that his famous aphorism applied in our instance ludicrously falls short. At all events, great occasions are needed to stimulate the national muse to any sincerity of utterance. The Revolution and the rebellion produced several respectable songs now rapidly becoming memories, but other crises in our history have been barren in this regard—unless, which is manifestly stretching a point, we are to ascribe the popularity of, say, "The Seminole's Reply" to popular lyrical appreciation. Neither the war of 1812 nor the Mexican War, so far as we know, gave rise to anything that had currency. The anti-slavery songs, save that which celebrates the progress of John Brown's spirit, perhaps, were expository and polemical poems rather than truly lyric; and the mass of the Southern verses born of the war, with two or three exceptions such as "The Bonnie Blue Flag" and "My Maryland," and a few fine things of Henry Timrod, are hardly to be termed literature at all. The patriotic muse is in the main shut up to Presidential campaigns, and upon only one or two of these have her utterances left any decided mark. Perhaps that of 1840 remains most distinctly thus stamped in the popular mind, but probably quite as much because now and then one of the passing generation found "Tippecanoe and Tyler Too" effective as a nursery lullaby as because of any real popular hold the song obtained. Since then, at any rate, if we except the war period, even Presidential campaigns have not been lyrically prolific. We have had nothing answering to the "Jingo" ballad. The "situation" four years ago, it must be acknowledged, was unfavorable. To justify a great lyrical outburst either "principles" or "men" are a prime requisite, and in 1876 it was impossible to feel a really lyrical enthusiasm for the candidates and platforms. "Tilden and Reform!" was a watchword, a slogan, it will be remembered; but for some reason the idea it embodied was of a distinctly prose nature, and never, that we recall, had more than a fugitive success when elevated into verse. Mr. Hayes, on the other hand, also represented nothing that was not too temperate and straightforward for the heightened ecstasy of song. Doubtless, too, the one tuneful element of our population, the Southern negroes, was intimidated, and, upon the whole, perhaps no more prosaic and unmelodious canvass has ever been conducted.

Some signs of a reaction are, therefore, natural during the present contest, aside from the fact that the martial element is more positively present and enthusiasm thus easier to excite. The Democrats have in this respect an obvious advantage, but with the fatality which renders their best efforts grotesquely inadequate they have not made much out of it, whereas, here as elsewhere, their opponents have taken the bull by the horns, and in newspaper poetry, as well as on the stump, the glory of Gettysburg is made successfully to pale before that of Chickamauga. Colonel John A. Joyce, of St. Louis, for instance, celebrated in prosaic rather than poetic works—he was Macdonald's companion in suffering for the Whiskey Conspiracy—sets to the air of "The Bright Light in the Morning" some stirring verses in honor of the hero of the latter conflict, of which a stave runs:

> "When the war began with a Rebel row,
> Children, children, won't you follow me?
> He took the front, put his hand to the plow—
> Halle, halle, halle, hallelujah!"

The Albany Journal caps this with a masterly effort, of which we can give but one stanza and the rollicking chorus:

> "He early learned to paddle well his own forlorn canoe;
> Upon Ohio's 'grand canal' he held the helm [pron. hellum] true.
> And now the people shout to him: 'Lo! 'tis for you we wait—
> We want to see Jim Garfield guide our glorious Ship of State."
>
> "Chorus—Jim Garfield's at the front!
> Jim Garfield's at the front!
> 'Twould be a sin to fail to win
> With Garfield at the front!"

There was a marked contrast between his conduct, too, after taking the front and that of his rival, which Mr. Wm. O. Stoddard thus subtly emphasizes in the Tribune:

> "He was not quite so fast to cuss
> And swear around as some be;
> And all he said was, 'Come on, boys,
> We'll give 'em Hail Columby!'"

Inspiriting incidents of General Garfield's career, antedating his martial experiences, are, of course, not difficult to find. "Immediately after the announcement of his nomination" Mr. O. D. Haven, of Cleveland, O., "penned" a song whose chorus, "Garfield rang the bells at Hiram," refers to his service as janitor at Hiram College. He > "— rang them loud, he rang them long,

> He rang them sharp, he rang them strong," and he is now about to "wring a victory, 'mid the battle's roar," from the nation's foes. The levelling necessities of the campaign muse are naturally imperative; nothing has been accomplished in this way in General Hancock's case, so far as we have seen, but in General Garfield's we have not only "Jim" but "Jimmie," one refrain running—

> "And we'll all rejoice when Jimmie goes marching home."

At a meeting in St. Louis it is reported that "the entire assemblage rose and sung with great warmth and technique a song entitled 'Columbia's Call,'" of which the chorus is:

> "Then hip-hip hurrah! Welcome be the fray,
> For we know we'll win the day.
> See, Garfield leads, and Arthur, too, the dauntless,
> Our cause is God's and He will light the way"— and which is attributed, as others of a like sort are, to the pen of Postmaster Filley, with evident malice and probably no truth. Of course, no difficulty is found in invoking enthusiasm for the "dauntless Arthur," and at the elevation upon which the campaign song subsists differences are harmonized and the exactitude of ordinary prose standards becomes trivial and impertinent.

> "Garfield and Arthur are the men > To guide us in the right," sings one confident bard, presumably not a Hayes Republican, and he in turn seems to be rivalled in animated optimism, though not in precise prosody, by another who declares—

> "We'll send forth a starter for Garfield and Arthur,
> The men whose record is free from blight";

Still another issues the challenge:

"Garfield and Arthur! there they stand, Match their worth in all the land."

The Springfield Republican, we have observed, is disgusted at this loose association, and says "It isn't a good sort of mixture to carol about," but we fancy the effect will not be disastrous, and in any event it is clearly unfair to censure the campaign harper for following the score written for him by the Convention. Moreover, the party opponents of General Arthur have had a very free fling at the wing with which he is known to sympathize most acutely, and can afford generosity. His closest friend was thus referred to before the nomination by an Ohio balladist, who, like General Garfield, was a warm supporter of Secretary Sherman. The latter, he says,

"— may not gush in rhetoric,
Like the 'Senataw from New Yo'k,'
But he don't o'erflow with bile and chic
And airs, and poppycock!"

This writer continues—

"He may not have the 'magnetism'
Of the 'plumed knight' of Maine:
But he also lacks some other isms
Which seem to stick to Blaine.
He's not perhaps as great a man
As our great soldier, Grant;
But he'd not have round him such a clan
As for the 'third term' pant."

And the said clan fared badly, one and all, at the hands of other singers of their own household as soon as it was clear they were beaten and subjects for satiric or elegiac verse instead of odes and pæans. A ribald burlesque thus refers to both Blaine and Grant:

"What is that, mother?
A goose, my child;
His eyes are aflame and his tail aslant,
His squawk is loud and his flight is wild—
He speeds to Chicago to vote for Grant.
But he's not the only goose, my dear—
There are other geese in the squawking train,
And the rabid, frantic squawks we hear
Are the squawks they squawk for the man of Maine,
And he's got the goose and his name is Blaine.

"What is that, mother?
A crow, my child";

—the rest is easily anticipated. An abandoned and licentious Philadelphia poet exults over the defeat of Logan and the clan Cameron in this wise:

"I hear the pibroch sounding, sounding,
The wail o' despair from Chicag!
'Tis the (s) Logan o' sorrow that's wounding
My heart for yer tauntin' and brag."

And, to crown all, an equally reckless rhymester, of whose residence we are ignorant, embalms a humiliating incident of the Grant "boom" in the following fantasy:

"'It will be a damned shame,' cried Fred,
'If father is not nominated.'
And so when the shame
Came about through Jim Blaine,
Our Fred
Bowed his head,
Wept like a water-cart, it is said,
And howled like a bull-dog under a shed.
He said, with eyes red,
'The empire is dead,
They ain't got any use for our anointed head.'"

It savors of hypercriticism, of course (and we have designed only a cursory not a critical review), but we cannot help suggesting that the last line would have read better "They hain't got no use," etc. This, however, is a detail, the main point being clearly divorced from diction and of sufficient explicitness to be very effective. The Chicago Inter-Ocean's "Stalwart Three Hundred"—

"But they were not dismayed;
Not a man was afraid—
Noble three hundred!
Forward the boom brigade;
'Vote for Grant,' Conkling said;
With a will all obeyed—
All of three hundred!"

—sounds very feeble in contrast, despite the inspiring view taken of the courage required to obey Mr. Conkling; reflecting on Balaklava, too, one can but attribute the parody to one of the noble band of Irish Republicans of whose cordial praises the Republican press has of late been full.

The Democratic bards seem to us, as we say, to have been less successful in glorification of their candidate, but they have "got in" some good blows in the way of satiric verse. Even here, however, they have been greatly assisted by Republican maladroitness, which, possibly owing to the greater amount of mental activity among Republicans, has been more abundant than Democratic ingenuity. None of the stanzas pointed with choral allusions to "329" and antistrophes chanting references to "back-pay," "Crédit Mobilier," and "De Golyer" that we have seen, for example, are so effective as this cheering adjuration:

"Wake, O Republicans! wake!
Wake and be active once more!
Fear not the gale—
Crowd on the sail—
Head the old ship to the shore!"

This is only equalled by the "war-cry" uttered after the Maine election by another Irish Republican: "To your tents, Republicans! Give them the bayonet, boys!" Either, we think, should be worth hundreds of votes to the Democracy and must be set down as campaign blunders. Indeed, a stranger to this department of the national literature might, assuming the common sense, not to say sanity, of its audience, believe it a coarse kind of satire in which, by the reductio ad absurdum of magniloquence, the politics ostensibly favored were really intended to be ridiculed. It is certain that the animation and vigor expressed are wholly factitious and perfunctory, and without the check of sincerity abler men than we conceive the average campaign bard to be have come to grief from the manifold varieties of protesting too much. A distich from the St. Louis Republican recalls us from speculation of even a superficial gravity, however—though the poetic staff of the Republican is owlishly grave, it should be said; nothing better than "mere statesmanship" has come under our notice in the campaign lyra:

"His [Hancock's] proud form attracts, but his pure, loyal soul Gives a grace that mere 'statesmanship' ne'er can control."

The party bards get some provender out of the circumstance that the General and John Hancock have the same surname.

"From the old Declaration we follow its fame—
'Twas then honored, unsullied; to-day still the same," sings one, rather incoherently. There is something poetically antithetic, too, in the civil record of the soldier Hancock, and something is now and then made of it:

"Hurrah for him, the stainless chief Who wears the civic wreath," and so on; but there is not an abundance of Hancockana. On the other hand, the Government "pampering" the General has received gets abundant attention in the songs of the other party, and the disgrace with which he covered himself by going to West Point while General Garfield "rang the bells at Hiram" is painted as vividly as the inconsistency illustrated thus:

"In the Union war I fought so well
That my name is greeted with the rebel yell."

The rebels really furnish the material for the best songs. The last verse of one by Mr. Sykes, written, says the Tribune, "to give the Solid South a chance of adapting a favorite air to modern circumstances," is as follows:

"We'll repudiate our debt, boys, we've borrowed from the North,
Shouting the battle-cry of Freedom;
We will burn the 'public schools,' and we'll drive the niggers forth,
Shouting the battle-cry of Freedom.
Chorus.—'Tis slavery for ever, hurrah, boys, hurrah!
Down with the Yankees, up with the 'bars,'
While we ostracize the loyal and murder thousands more,
Shouting the battle-cry of Freedom."

Wade Hampton's Staunton speech, of course, provides what is styled a "paraphrase," of which two lines are:

"Vote as you shot when Fort Pillow howled;
Yes, vote as you shot when Lincoln fell."

And a contributor to the Philadelphia Bulletin derives a cruel delight from the melancholy discovery that Forney's first two initials are the same as those of Wilkes Booth, and that

"General Scott Hancock, whose first letter's W, Can't be pulled through by a double John W."

The whole situation is, perhaps, best summed up by the Stalwart Indianapolis Journal in the following "Rhymes for Young Democrats":

"Sing a song of shotguns,
Pocket full of knives,
Four-and-twenty black men,
Running for their lives;
When the polls are open,
Shut the nigger's mouth,
Isn't that a bully way
To make a solid South?
Northern sympathizers
Making speeches chaffy!
Major-General Hancock
Eating rebel taffy;
English in a quandary
How to save his dollars!
Along comes a solid South
And fits them all with collars."

We must, in conclusion, say a word in favor of the superior political excellence and spontaneity, slight as they are, of the casual newspaper bard over those of the 'Campaign Songster.' The songs in the latter are indubitably the work of triflers who have nothing at stake in the contest, and are written to order in the most unblushing manner. A disillusioning instance is a song which we find both in the Garfield and in the Hancock 'Songster,' entitled in the one case "The Democrats must Die" and in the other "The Republicans must Die," written by the same unscrupulous poet and with identical truculence.

FRANCE AND HER FOREIGN RELATIONS.

PARIS, Sept. 30, 1880.

SINCE the visit of the King of Greece to Paris France has abandoned the policy of absolute non-intervention which had become a kind of dogma for all the men in power after 1871; all the ministers who had in succession directed foreign affairs invariably following this policy of total passivity. A new feeling seems to have pervaded a portion of our political world; the fear of war is the beginning of the love of peace: "Initium sapientiæ timor Domini." The memories of the late war, of the occupation of so many cities and villages by foreign troops, are still so vivid that the country at large may be said to be almost frantically pacific. The Republicans have missed no opportunity of saying to the people that the right of making peace or war must no longer be left to the arbitrary will of one man, that the essence of the Republic consists in leaving to the country the choice of its own conduct, that the Republic will for ever protect it against such adventures as the Mexican war or the fatal war against Germany. These doctrines have sunk very deep into the conscience of the nation; whenever there is the slightest fear of a European complication there is at once a feeling of uneasiness which no internal question can produce. In all matters of interior politics the country has become absolutely optimistic; it fears no more the dangers which the political Jeremiahs denounce, it does not even dread the Commune; and the ruins of the monuments burnt in 1871, and not yet reconstructed, seem to teach Paris but one lesson—a new siege of Paris must not take place, the "obsidional folly" must not again be felt by the faubourgs. All the ravings of the Rocheforts, the Félix Pyats, and others fall on indifferent ears; their articles are but the pickles which are thrown every day into the political dish. Paris is happy, Paris is amused, Paris makes money. The great houses of finance are as optimistic as the Republicans in power, and for the last few years our monetary market has only known buyers; immense fortunes have been made by the speculators who understood the temper of the country. Our 5 per cents, which were issued after the war at 82, have now reached the price of 120, and you meet people everywhere who prophesy that they will still continue to rise. The dream of a new war has been dismissed like a nightmare. The German Government has done everything in its power to convince the French people that it is completely indifferent to the form of government in France—every minister of foreign affairs, in his turn, has been treated as "persona grata," every ambassador to Berlin the same; and the French are now thoroughly convinced that they can do anything they like at home without giving offence to their neighbors.

The attachment to peace is so great in the country that the most dangerous weapon which was used against the "16th of May" was the rumor, spread all over France, that MacMahon and the monarchical party were not as completely tied to a policy of peace as the Republicans; that the Duc Decazes had been coquetting with Prince Gortchakoff; that a strong Conservative Government in France would find alliances in Europe, and would in consequence sooner or later be tempted to interfere in European affairs. This belief was the deathblow to the enterprise of the 16th of May; and, whether Europe believed sincerely or affected to believe that the Duc de Broglie and his friends had warlike designs, the triumph of the Republicans in the general elections of 1877 was hailed with joy by the old monarchical governments of Europe. The Eastern war had broken out shortly before the beginning of that great party struggle in France; it ran its course while France was considered as sequestered in Europe. To be sure, her representatives took part in the diplomatic conferences—in the Conference at Constantinople, afterwards at the Congress of Berlin; but it was generally understood that we were there only "for ornament," like furnishing pictures in an apartment. Much courtesy was shown us, and we were even allowed to make some sort of incidental and immaterial propositions. We spoke for the Greeks, but it seemed to us as well as to Europe that our love for the Greeks was essentially platonic. Time went on, and the famous alliance of the three Emperors was dissolved. A sort of political imbroglio began, in which it was not the Duc de Broglie, but his principal opponent, who began to give signs of an intention of dragging France out of her isolation. Our policy has become more active, and finally we have tied our action to the European concert in Eastern affairs. There are now two politics face to face—one official, the other more occult. It is understood that the République Française is the mouth-piece of the occult power, the minister-maker, the President of the Chamber of Deputies. From his palace of the Élysée-Bourbon Gambetta directs the occult diplomacy, while close by, on the Quai d'Orsay, the Minister of Foreign Affairs directs the official diplomacy. These two diplomacies have ceased to be in thorough accord, and the results of this disagreement are already apparent. At the great review of the fleet at Cherbourg the President of the Chamber of Deputies allowed himself to be carried away by a passion which he had long seemed to suppress; his mysterious and oracular words about the "immanent justice of things," about the injuries done to France which would sooner or later be repaired, produced a great impression in Germany. It was the first time that something real was said, something which was not the conventional talk of the diplomatic drawing-rooms. The lion did not quite roar, but he felt his claws; and this half-conscious, half-unconscious outburst of patriotism and of national pride took place after France had reviewed her army, given to the regiments their new flags, and immediately after the fleet had been inspected by the President of the Republic.

Since Mr. Gladstone has taken the Premiership in England the relations between some of the men who are in power in England and the President of the Chamber of Deputies have been incessant. While the struggle between the Liberals and the Conservatives was going on, Lord Granville took great pains to explain that the English Liberals could not help the Government of the National Defence in 1870, but that they had no hostility towards the successors of the Empire. On the contrary, the English Liberals offered to the French Republicans a sort of new "cordial alliance." They were quite ready to recommence the Crimean war with them. They tried in every possible way to draw the French Republic away from other alliances, and to incline them on their side. The English alliance is at no time a thing to be despised, and it cannot be very surprising if some of the leaders of public opinion here, remembering of what value the English alliance was to Napoleon III., imagined that it could still be of value now. The whole history of the last few months has been a gradual resserrement between France and England. This work was done entirely outside of the Chambers, but the result is now apparent. A line of common action has been adopted against Turkey, but the leaders of this common action have been all along France and England. The other Powers joined in the movement, but their spirit was different from the spirit of France and England. Dulcigno has been the first objective of the common action. But the difficulties have already begun. It was imagined that Turkey would give way at once before a demonstration of all the great Powers, and if this demonstration had been successful other demonstrations would have been tried. The frontier of Greece has been drawn by diplomacy, as a diamond cuts a line on a pane of glass; give it a simple knock and the glass is divided.

Public opinion is now fairly alarmed by the Dulcigno demonstration. It is felt that the great Powers cannot remain in a ridiculous situation. Something must and something will be done. But France is not in a warlike mood; she feels that her occult diplomats have engaged her more than she likes to be engaged, and her official diplomats are trying to undo the work of the occult diplomacy. The more some men are showing an adventurous spirit the more it becomes necessary to be humble. Freycinet has denounced officially the policy of "jactance"; his successor has been chosen because he wrote for German reviews articles with no trace of "jactance." It is dangerous to be proud to-day and modest to-morrow. Successive fits of "hauteur" and of supineness are not as dignified as a constant attitude of reserve. The Eastern Question has been again opened, and it is impossible to predict how the European union will be dissolved, and how the forces which are now at work will group themselves in the end. The situation is all the more obscure because in England as well as in France a sudden change is always possible. The triumph of Mr. Gladstone was a surprise to the world. Who knows who will triumph in France, the friends of "peace at any price," the partisans of absolute non-intervention, or the politicians who are ready to use the strong arms which ten years of peace and of prosperity have now placed in the hands of France?

THE PIUS-VEREIN AT CONSTANCE.

PARIS, Oct. 4, 1880.

THE parliamentary vacation is now approaching its close. We shall soon judge of the course of policy to be pursued by the new Ministry. One thing is certain: it will be as pacific as M. de Freycinet's. The name of the new Minister for Foreign Affairs is a sufficient guarantee of this, as has been already observed by M. Gambetta's paper, the République Française. That is evidently the reason why M. Grévy considers it a duty to burden M. Barthélemy Saint-Hilaire at his age with such an onerous post, but it also proves how necessary it was to reassure Europe. There was no better way of showing how unwilling France was to adopt a venturesome policy, for M. Barthélemy Saint-Hilaire is the personification of the policy of M. Thiers, of whom he was the intimate friend and private secretary at the time of his presidency. There is no man more respected in France, and deservedly so, for his entire disinterestedness and austerity. A translator of Aristotle, he is the true stoic of our Republic. The chief business and great difficulty of the new Ministry is the religious dispute; it remains to be seen how they will contrive to settle matters satisfactorily to the Left without causing dissension throughout the country. To appreciate the gravity of this struggle we must not confine ourselves within the frontiers of France; it is going on everywhere in Europe. The Ultramontane party is identically the same in all countries: it forms a single army under one flag. Consequently, it is interesting to mark how it has behaved on those battlefields where it has encountered the bravest and most powerful enemies—I mean in the German Empire, pre-eminently the country of the Culturkampf.

An important meeting has just been held at Constance, from which we may gather information respecting the principles and disposition of the Ultramontane party throughout the world: it was the general meeting of the German Catholics, who are also designated as the Pius-Verein. I particularly wished to be present, under existing circumstances, and was able to convince myself of the strict solidarity which unites the German and French Ultramontanes, so that in speaking of the meeting at Constance I remain on French ground, for, as its name indicates, Ultramontanism is international. Allow me, then, to give you a brief account of what I saw and heard at Constance, as it will be useful, I think, in order to understand better the vicissitudes of the religious struggle in my country as they are disclosed, and perhaps may be a sure means of foreseeing their issue. I must acknowledge having heard at Constance more than one speech really eloquent and even piquant with humor and originality. On an average, the German-Catholic conferences appear to me superior to analogous assemblies in France. I attribute this superiority in the clerical orators to their contact with university men during their studies. For the most part they have not lost there a single one of their narrow doctrines, but they adopt more the language of the world.

A word first as to their origin. These German-Catholic conferences date from the year 1849, the commencement of the formidable religious reaction which followed the return from Gaëta. They took the name of the Pope, and were called Pius-Verein. At that epoch this name was significative of their programme: it meant the most unbridled Ultramontanism. The society which adopted it as a symbol engaged itself to work for the triumph of the Pope's infallibility and whatever is implied in that doctrine. Men had not then, as now, arrived at universal subjection. The truly Christian spirit which distinguished Dalberg, and especially Wessenberg of Constance, was not extinct in the German episcopacy; the university men maintained the same principles. It may be said that the élite of German Catholicism was influenced by the same spirit. The Pius-Verein, the beloved offspring of the Roman Gesù, had but one aim: to crush this opposition. They found no better means of obtaining that end than by organizing a sort of democratic agitation, provoking the masses to overwhelm in their excitement the recalcitrant notabilities of the Church. A preponderant rôle was everywhere assigned to laymen in France and Germany, not for the purpose of increasing the liberty of Christian people, but in order, by popular pressure, to annul the rights of the episcopacy, which looked upon the Pius-Verein with coldness. To borrow from liberty its mode of action was a master-stroke of Jesuitism, for thus they more effectually suppressed it. We know these terrible laymen, more fanatic than monks of the Middle Ages, who, with insult upon their lips, rule the Church. They are violent, like revolutionists; but their disturbances are similar to those of the ancient Russians, who rebelled only to give greater force to the despotism of their czars. Such are the laymen who presided at the formation of the German-Catholic general assemblies.

The first meeting took place at Mainz in 1849, and in 1854 the jubilee of Boniface VIII. was there celebrated with great pomp. The society then established a prosperous offshoot in Switzerland. Its influence in following years became considerable in spite of the protest of many eminent men, such as the learned Hirscher, who complained bitterly against these irregular, incompetent, and insubordinate gatherings, whose object was to secure for papacy a blind adulation. None the less they continued to develop, silencing all opposition and triumphing over episcopacy. It will be seen by what has just passed at Constance how far they have triumphed over the regular authorities of the Church. It seemed that when once the doctrine of Papal infallibility was established the Pius-Verein had no further object, but the political results of the Council, the serious conflicts it excited, again opened a fresh career for it; hence its periodical meetings. It must not be forgotten that the assembly survives in a permanent organization; numerous committees work unceasingly during the interval of the sessions. They endeavor to envelop Germany in a network of innumerable works designed to reach the different classes of society, workmen, students, and trades-people. Other committees are engaged in the development of religious art, the publication of good books and newspapers. One cannot help admiring this great zeal, but unfortunately there is only a single thought in all this varied activity; it is always the Ultramontane crusade, the constant effort to bring back the ancient social order—in short, war without truce throughout their line upon modern states, war which is above all defensive now, for Prince Bismarck is not the man to await the enemy in his intrenchments.

The Catholic assembly at Constance is the seventeenth of the Pius-Verein. Constance is one of the most delightful towns of Southern Germany, with its fine lake and the snowy heights of the Alps on the horizon. It has also the prestige of historical associations. Great religious lights have illumined it, the brightest and purest arising from the stake at which John Huss was burnt. One of the most famous councils of the Middle Ages took place here—one which must be execrated by the Ultramontane party, as it condemned beforehand their favorite doctrine. We shall see how they got rid of this inopportune remembrance. The assembly took place in the magnificent Hôtel de Ville, which possesses fine rooms for both private and general meetings. The Salle des Fêtes serves for public assemblies. The inconvenience of this arrangement was that the dinner-bell rang loudly and interrupted the finest perorations. It even drowned the tocsin an alarmist orator was sounding with both arms about our accursed society. We had a fine escape. The assembly was composed of more than a thousand persons, in the main country parish priests and members of the middle classes. A few white-robed Dominicans were conspicuous among the black gowns. The Catholic nobility of Southern Germany was largely represented, as well as the Ultramontane youth from the universities, who uttered their complaint in the language of St. Thomas Aquinas's invocation. The first object of the Congress was to present an account of the different works pursued by the society. The principal one bears the name of St. Boniface; its purpose is to maintain the Catholic faith in countries where its adherents are in a minority. I ascertained in listening to these accounts, in general well drawn up, to what a degree the master-thought of the Pius-Verein pervades the smallest detail of their proceedings. They make use of the most powerful engines of modern democracy to spread their theocratic ideas. Judging only by outward appearance, it seemed as though one were in the midst of modern society. Journalism, societies, social questions, art and science are discussed; but one aim alone is pursued—to "Romanize" the world. The orators who ascend by turns the tribune at the Congress are entirely dissimilar, but nothing could be more uniform than the principles they unfold. One of the favorite subjects treated at the Constance Congress, as, indeed, at all Catholic meetings, was the use to be made of the press for the benefit of Ultramontanism. Pope Pius IX. formed at Rome a congregation for this purpose, having under its direction more than five hundred Catholic journals. At Constance they engaged themselves to do their utmost to increase the circulation of right-thinking journals. All that I heard there proves the Ultramontane party to be organizing themselves more actively than ever for the political struggle, as appears from a much-applauded speech of Dr. Monfang, of Mainz. He concluded: "Be men; conduct yourselves bravely. Enter courageously into the struggle. Take your own affairs in hand. Fight along the whole line. Rally to the Centre of the Reichstag, which bears your banner so valiantly, to overcome the Liberalism which will ruin us." The last speaker heard at the Congress attacked still more violently Bismarck's policy. Having been assigned the subject of education for his speech, he cried, amidst the enthusiastic cheering of the assembly: "No reconciliation so long as we have not recovered our schools, so long as the Church has not regained the right of educating and bringing up children." At times the speaker seemed only to claim the liberty of teaching, but in reality it was the monopoly of instruction he demanded for his party, among the foremost of whom are Leo XIII., as may be gathered from his recent declarations, wherein he does not allow of any division of the right to educate the Catholic youth. The great success of the speaker was his furious outburst against secular teaching, in which he saw a hideous minotaur ready to devour our youths. Secular teaching does not succeed in their instruction more than in their moral education. In consequence of its presiding over public colleges folly and immorality are being developed in alarming proportions, whilst the standard of learning is lowered. This discourse was terminated by a veritable war-cry summed up in the formula: "The state is our enemy." This found its echo in the final resolutions of the Congress, which contain the most energetic protests against all religious legislation in the German Empire, especially in what concerns the schools. The assembly, by a formal vote, supported the policy of the Centre, and finally expressed the liveliest sympathy with the Belgian bishops in their resistance to their Government, as well as with the Catholics of Italy and France.

All that I saw and heard at Constance confirms in my eyes this fact, that after ten years of Culturkampf, the party Prince Bismarck wished to suppress by persecution is stronger than ever, although it had against it the cleverest, most energetic and unscrupulous adversary one can imagine. In short, everything this power has done in excess to annihilate the Ultramontanes has turned to their advantage. This lesson deserves to be carefully meditated by all Governments engaged in a contest with the most dangerous, skilful, and persevering of adversaries. Not that they should disarm when justly defending state rights, but that their prudence should see the point where they ought to stop, under pain, not only of deviating from the rules of justice, but of increasing the moral power of a party which, sooner or later, would end by exciting against itself in the Church the opposition of whoever is not disposed to deliver up his mind and conscience into the keeping of an unbridled authority without any just right or title, at least in its new form. THE FOX-HUNTING AT NEWPORT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The "reportorial" mind has been much exercised in its struggles with the incidents, and especially with the terminology, of the drag-hunting at Newport. As a consequence the newspaper public has hardly gained a very clear idea as to the character of the sport. The runs have been described with such a mixture of mistaken technical expressions, and with such evidence of a "buggy" point of view, that little knowledge of what actually took place could be gained from the reports.

Public comment, even in Newport, was rarely appreciative, and not seldom ridicule had its full fling. The suggestion that to chase "a poor little fox" was not a manly occupation was perhaps the most usual form of disapprobation. As a "drag" is sometimes a red herring trailed over the fields, the pack was called "The Queens County Fish Hounds," and the kennels "Herringhausen." Other uncomplimentary comments and expressions were common. As a matter of fact, they may have been justified by exceptional incidents of the season. In reality, it seems to me, when we consider the conditions under which it was carried on, the hunting of the past two summers at Newport must have commended itself to those who know the sport in England, as a very successful adaptation of the processes of that sport to our very different conditions. The "fox" element was its feeblest feature—a feature which might with advantage have been omitted here, as it is in the celebrated drag-hunt of the Life Guards at Windsor. The fact that the foremost riders could rarely say at what point the fox was let out of the bag indicated that the running was as interesting before as after that event. Since the trophies of the chase were given not to the first persons in at the death and as tokens of success, but quite at the discretion of the master of the hounds—as often to ladies who came late on to the field as to men who had come in the front flight—the sentimental objection to the cruelty of the pastime could not be offset by the technical need for a prize to be run for. In reality the fox was a very small and unimportant part of the whole affair, and his entire absence would have done no harm.

The modus operandi may be thus described: A little time before the hour for starting, the drag (an anise-oiled rag or other strong-scented substance, videlicet a red herring) is trailed across the country by an attendant, who lays the course according to his judgment and according to his instructions—easy or difficult, as the case may be—for a distance of five or six miles. At the hour for the "meet" the roads in every direction in the vicinity are crowded with all manner of vehicles, and with such a gathering of mounted men, women, and children as America sees on no other occasion. Equestrians of all degrees—down to the farmer's boy on a plough-horse in blinder bridle and up to the latest thing in English outfit—fill the roadsides. Presently the master (Mr. Griswold), a couple of whippers-in, and a half-dozen others of the Hunt, all in red coats, appear on the scene with the hounds. Of these there are from twenty to thirty. They are English fox-hounds, but not of the highest type. After a short halt, they are led to a field at some distance from the crowd of carriages, where the drag has been started, and are soon away on the scent. Sometimes nearly a hundred riders follow to the point of starting, and perhaps half of this number as far as the first fence—the others taking to such roads as are most likely to lead in the direction of the run. The first stiff jump generally thins out the crowd of horsemen to from thirty to forty, and of these only fifteen or twenty succeed in keeping reasonably close to the pack. The others often await their turns at the gaps and breaks, until they fall farther and farther to the rear. The fifteen or twenty who pretend to ride straight do ride remarkably straight. There are always some young women among them and some little boys, and they all show a nerve in taking their fences and a boldness and coolness in all their work that cannot be too much admired. Indeed, I have seen a dozen persons in the field here who would ride in the front rank in any hunt in England—where the difficulties are rarely greater.

The horses are quite worthy of their riders, and it is really astonishing to see how naturally the American horse of good blood takes to cross-country work. On several occasions I saw green Virginia and Kentucky horses, actually out for the first time, going among the very best quite to the end of the run—taking the stiffest fence, like old stagers, and with as much enthusiasm for the work as though they had been regularly trained to it. Before the run is half over, the real field rarely numbers more than twenty, but most of these keep their place through the whole of it.

When the hounds near the end of the course of the drag a fox (usually a young one) is let out of a bag, and is soon run down. The farce of distributing the brush, the mask, and the pads among the riders—with no regard to the fact of straight riding, and with no especial reference to the route by which or the promptness with which the field has been reached—is then gone through with, and the hunt is over. The carcass is torn and devoured by the hounds, and all hands turn toward home. There is generally a muddy coat or two, and a cut or scratch on a horse's leg to tell of falls and blunders; but there has not been a serious mishap this season, nor is any one now the worse for a fall in 1879.

The inference would seem natural that such immunity from injury must indicate an easy country; but this is far from being the case. A stout stone wall, four feet high, with a firm, broad capstone, is never an easy jump. No man ever rides at such a fence with a certainty of a safe landing. These fences are by no means frequent, yet there is rarely a day when from one to half a dozen such, or worse, are not taken by a dozen or twenty riders. I saw three such stone walls, fully four and a half feet high, jumped in quick succession by eight or ten horsemen. Five-feet walls are rare, but I have seen one such wall successfully taken. It is said that one leap was made over a wall five feet and seven inches high, measured from the taking-off place, but this I did not see. I have seen horses in the field here that I think would be equal even to that.

It is frequently asked, "What is the good of it all? Why not be content with a brisk ride on a Christian road? Why risk life and limb and horseflesh in such madcap cross-country racing after fox-hounds and 'a poor little fox'?" It seems to me that the answer is easy to find: Simply because life and limb and horseflesh never feel their full power and value and delight until they come to the hunting-field and are put to their most vigorous and most exhilarating use. The saddle is infinitely better than the buggy, but the saddle is only half enjoyed until it turns from the roads and takes to the fields and fences in hot pursuit, not of a poor little fox—he only leads the uncertain way—but of the quick recurring adventure and hazard which no other peaceful exercise affords.

Nor does the good of it all stop here. It takes men, and women too, out of their arm-chairs and their carriages, and teaches them a lesson they never forget—the lesson of fresh air, vigorous effort, thrilling physical excitement, quick and cool judgment, and all else that comes of the best development of horsemanship. More than this, it gives a new ambition to the young and affords a most wholesome substitute for the usual aims of sedentary American youth. Even the farmers' sons of Rhode Island are getting out their grandfathers' saddles and are joining in a revival which promises to grow into a reform. Three years ago, after the summer population had gone, a horseman was a rare sight at Newport. Now men and women and boys and girls are riding in every direction, and horsemanship is promising to become general here as it is in England. Then, again, this is a good centre for the infection: we send our influence back to all the cities, and New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore are feeling the effect of the interest in riding that the Queens County Hunt has awakened here.

ARCHÆOLOGY AND THE GREEK GOVERNMENT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am glad that Mr. Ludlow, in his note in the Nation of Sept. 16, agrees in the main with my strictures on the Archæological Society of Athens; but as the defence of the Society is that it has no means, I have only to reply that if it cannot undertake the work to be done it should not prevent others from doing it. The outcry in Greece about the exportation of the works of art now buried in the earth or already excavated is the outgrowth of pure ignorance of the commonest laws of political economy, and chauvinism of the very narrowest and most reprehensible kind. Suppose all the nations of Europe had made the same law, and Greece, in the course of its civilization, wanted to form a gallery of pictures for the education of her people, where would she get them? Venice would refuse her Titians, Florence her Giottos and Angelicas, Holland her Rembrandts, and France and Germany their modern masters, and Greece would have no gallery. But fortunately no other government in the world is so imbecile as to deny its art treasures the quality of property. Italy is the only country, besides Greece, where any legal restriction is placed on the sale of art treasures, and there the Government reserves the right of buying at a fair valuation, in default of which it permits exportation with an export duty. What the Greek Government does is first to levy a discovery duty of fifty per cent.—i. e., the half of all that is found goes to the Government; but the other half, not being permitted to be exported, has no mercantile value unless it is portable enough to be smuggled out of the country. The consequence of the first provision is, that if antiquities are discovered they are, if possible, concealed from the authorities and smuggled out—the civil service, of which that of our own country is so tolerable a copy, giving immense facilities for contraband operations; and where they are too large to be moved easily they are commonly broken up and sold as fragments, a head here and a hand there (the peasant finder caring nothing for his ancestors but a good deal for his family), so that many things are broken, many exported without any clue to connect them with their original localities, and many most important archæological data are lost to us because the peasant who finds them dares not offer them to any archæological authority, but sells them to little dealers who sell them out of the country. Not one-tenth of the excavation is done that would be done if the digging were left free, under reasonable supervision and conditions; and, in the present state of Greece, the Government ought to do everything to encourage excavation by competent and honorable persons.

I can give two or three cases of the working of the present law which I came across in my late visit. I found by the merest accident, in a pile of stones coming from some chance excavation, an extremely interesting inscription (noticed in the Nation some months since). This had been on a tomb, to the contents of which I could get no clue whatever, every one in the place denying that there had been anything found—which was simply impossible—as the law punishes severely evasion of the restrictions on excavation (and this even when a man digs in his own garden), or neglect to render half to the Government. Now, as this inscription is one of the oldest known of the Greek language in Greek characters, a fragment of the pottery or other objects which must have been found in the tomb would, even if broken, have thrown light much wanted on the relation of art to letters, comparative dates, etc., but no one would confess to having found even a tile. In another case, the villagers having struck the site of an early temple of Apollo, found many objects which had belonged to it. The Government, getting a hint of the find, sent soldiers to search the village; and the people, aware of the penalty of having transgressed an absurd law, simply removed all evidence by throwing the objects found over the cliffs into the sea, which being there one hundred feet deep, they are lost to archæology for ever. I could recount scores of instances more or less similar, either of destruction, partial or entire, or removal in such a way as to destroy the evidence of location. The laws on the subject are conceived in the most childish spirit and carried out with the most disastrous stupidity.

What the Greek Government should do in the interest of the ancient history of the country and of its archæology is, firstly, to make excavation as extensive and easy as possible—which is impracticable while exportation is forbidden, because the prohibition to export keeps prices down in proportion to its effectiveness; secondly, to remove all impost on the results of excavation, so that no one may have an object in keeping these results secret to avoid the tax; and, thirdly, to levy an export tax so reasonable as to make smuggling not worth the risk, and then, retaining the reasonable right of prior purchase, to devote the proceeds of the export tax to the purchase of such of the articles found as may be deemed of importance to the archæology, history, or glory of the country, with a provision for special rewards to any peasant or other excavator who may bring in an inscription of value as such. With such provisions there is no danger that Greek students would be obliged to go abroad "to study the antiquities of their own country," or any other, as the amount of excavation to be done in Greece is so great that the proceeds of vigorous and wise excavation would soon fill the Greek museums and give funds for other things, and such excavation will never take place under the present laws. I know that practical archæologists in Athens complain of the restrictions as I do, as making research almost impossible.

As to the notion which Mr. Ludlow advances, that the return of the Elgin marbles to Athens would advance the interests of art, it is only necessary to say that they can only be properly studied in their position as part of a great series, side by side with what went before and came after, and that they can only be at London, Berlin, or Paris; and if every government were as absurd as the Greek no such comparative study of art would ever be possible either at London or Athens. Great museums are the indispensable basis of artistic and archæological science, but no great museums would ever exist if such chauvinism as prevails at Athens were to obtain generally. The best indication of the unwisdom of the Greek policy is that if Greece were rich she would resent as an injustice the adoption by other nations of laws like hers, which would compel her to send her students abroad to study art in its largest and most applicable forms; for, after all, so far as modern life is concerned, Italian and Flemish art are of more importance than Greek as Art or as application of the arts.

Yours truly,

W. J. Stillman.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE INDIANA CAMPAIGN.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Republicans of Indiana have won a great victory, at which no one is more surprised than themselves. The late Senator Morton left the machine in good working order, and the men who have manned it are such as he liked; from the chairman of the State Committee down, as a rule, they had no thought of moving voters by an honest discussion of principles, but by arousing their selfish interests and their prejudices. Before the nominations Governor Hendricks and General Harrison made speeches to their respective party clubs, and both failed utterly to give evidence that political discussion was this year to be upon a higher plane. I asked a politician of his party why General Harrison did not speak of some things which the Republican party at least ought to do in the future, and was answered that no one would presume to do that until the National Convention had "made up the issues." But the bold and effectual stand against Grantism which Indiana, under the lead of General Harrison, took in the Chicago Convention was an intense gratification to every Independent, and the Republicans have received practically their unanimous support. The Democrats have stood upon the "Electoral Commission Fraud," the United States marshals in the South, and General Garfield's personal shortcomings, and they have been led by a State organ which probably has no equal in political corruption and dishonesty. On their side the Republicans had a superabundance of excellent questions for discussion: the civil service, the silver coinage, the greenbacks, tariff reforms, and business prosperity were national issues of the highest order. There were State questions equally good: the removal of the outrageous burden imposed by the fees of our county officers, the purification of our elections, and the riddance of the State from the curse of an October election, had all been defeated by the action of the Democratic party. An equally strong argument against that party was its criminal and barbarous application of the spoils doctrine to our extensive benevolent institutions, filled with unfortunate and helpless wards of the State. Mr. Schurz delivered one of the first speeches. The thousands who crowded to hear him and the thousands who tried but were unable to get within hearing seemed a clear indication of the desire of the people to hear a candid discussion of our real political problems. But any hopes that the managers would take high ground were not realized. Why General Harrison, in no sense a politician, never courting popularity, despising bossism, loving good government, and able to do much toward giving a proper bent to the campaign, did not do so I cannot say. His speeches in no way rank above the average campaign speeches of the last fifteen years. On every hand the Chicago platform was kicked aside and a fishing operation begun to find something which would stir up the people. I have heard of civil service being mentioned in two cases; the silver coinage and the retirement of the greenbacks not at all. Financial discussions were discouraged. One member of the State Committee remarked in my hearing, "The less we say about finance in this country the better we are off." After Mr. Schurz no one who held independent opinions was put forward, and the class of orators who did find favor with the committees, after floundering awhile, took to the only subject to which they had ever given any serious attention, and fell tooth and nail upon the South. Mr. Logan gave us his peculiar views in his peculiar manner, the campaign became thoroughly Stalwart, and speakers brought in from the South added their fuel to the pile all were attempting to light. For weeks the State resounded with hoarse cries and falsetto shrieks to the effect that the Democrats of to-day were "the same old party we had to fight in 1861."

But it began to be apparent, and especially so after the Maine election, that the Solid South issue was not going to avail to carry this State. The great body of voters had scarcely looked up from their work, and the soldiers failed to "rally" in satisfactory numbers. Then the managers began to declare their intention of buying enough votes to accomplish the end. The State Committee gave a good indication of its attitude when it answered a man, who asked for funds to bring home voters who were out of the State and not able to come at their own expense, that it could buy three voters on the spot for what it would cost to bring home one. But against the purchasing policy the better Republicans cried out so decidedly that their State organ, owned by the chairman of the State Committee, felt compelled to say that while then if ever the Republicans would be justified in buying votes, yet it was not their intention to do so. At last they got General Grant to issue a call for the "Boys in Blue" to meet in Indianapolis, and Mr. Conkling condescended to be the speaker. Then they were frightened at what they had done, for they remembered the thousands of Republicans here who, at the time of the Chicago Convention, openly declared this pair an unsightly object. In absolute despair they were driven to the discussion of new questions, and the machine deftly changed its gearing to run in the new direction. The cry against the South was in great part dropped. The good times were lauded on every hand, and business men were thoroughly frightened and got to active work by awful pictures of the results of "a change." High tariff was extolled and explained to the workingmen, just as it would have been denounced had that been necessary to get votes. The fact that Mr. De Pauw, the glass manufacturer at New Albany, and a lifelong Democrat, had come over to the Republicans for fear of Democratic free-trade, suddenly became of vast importance and probably changed more votes than any other influence. General Grant never appeared, and the great reunion of the "Boys in Blue" turned out to be a very large procession of business men and citizens of Indianapolis and its neighborhood, in which were mingled a few soldiers' organizations; in the preparations beforehand and in this crowd Mr. Conkling was allowed to be forgotten.

Toward the close of the campaign each State organ began to accuse the other party of bringing into the State classes of persons of which the following names, taken from the issues of the same day, represent part: repeaters, blood-tubs, plug-uglies, murderers, thieves, cut-throats, desperadoes, jailbirds, garroters, felons, hounds, ruffians, shoulder-hitters, bullies, and shoulder-strikers. Each charged the other party with intending violence, until, judging from these two papers, we were on the verge of anarchy. Two days before the election a man named McCorkle, the Democratic sheriff of an adjoining county, died of wounds received in quelling a drunken brawl. The next morning the State organ of that party appeared in mourning, holding this death to be caused by the Republicans, and in several tragic editorials dwelling upon McCorkle's memory and untimely end. On the same day, in the Republican organ, there appeared two editorials, one of them, at least, written by Mr. George C. Gorham, Secretary of the Republican National Committee. These editorials together stated that the Democrats had formed a military organization; that their plan was to go early and vote, and then meet at a rendezvous; then their "imported bullies" were to get up a riot with the Republicans; then the Democratic military organization, armed with the State arms, was to be called out by the Governor, and the ballot-boxes in Republican wards were to be seized and "rifled or changed." The Republicans were called upon to organize, and were told that "the way not to be shot was to be able to shoot," and a meeting of all citizens was called to meet at ten o'clock that morning. To that meeting came Senator McDonald and Mr. English, and both disclaimed all knowledge of any such organization. But to that meeting did not come a representative of the paper making the charges, nor was any proof of the charges produced, nor has there been up to this time. A professional newspaper correspondent naïvely stated that, speaking for the class who get up these stories, he would say that three-fourths of them were lies, and he thought they had gone in this manufacture about far enough. Adopting a harmless resolution advising public officers to look to their business, the meeting adjourned in the best of humor, disclosing the fact that the wild raving of the papers had gone completely over the heads of the people; but two more incendiary publications cannot be found than were those organs on the day before the election.

The 10,000 votes, or thereabouts, which the Republicans have gained are made up in the main (1) of Independent votes, (2) of the votes of the bulk of the business men and of votes which they gained by great activity during the last three weeks, (3) of the manufacturers and hundreds of their workmen whom they influenced, (4) votes due to the unpopularity of Mr. Landers, especially with the Greenbackers, whom he deserted for the Democratic nomination, (5) votes due to the unpopularity of Mr. English, and (6) votes of Democrats dissatisfied with the overthrow of the constitutional amendments. The Republicans had such a righteous cause that they won almost in spite of the machine. Down to the time when it was driven to talk of something beside the Solid South it was worthless. The only votes it has gained were gained in the last three weeks and after it began to discuss, even in its selfish way, questions which pertained more to the economic interests of the country. The campaign in Indiana has given another demonstration of the total lack of principle of the Republican machine, and of the hopelessness of ever securing through its agency an honest discussion before the people of things necessary to good government in this country. CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The somewhat protracted discussion to which you have so courteously opened your valuable columns on the subject of civil-service reform agitation, seems to me to have settled several questions upon which there was up to this time more or less doubt in the minds of even the most sincere friends of the reform. These are, first, that there is all over the country a large and powerful element in both parties in favor of civil-service reform agitation by means of an education of the masses through publications, broadsides, etc. Furthermore, that very many of these gentlemen are willing to join a society having this object in view, and that sufficient money can easily be procured to pay the necessary expenses. Second, that it is absolutely essential to the efficient working of such a society that it be entirely non-partisan, and that its management be entrusted to gentlemen respected even by the enemies of the movement. The unanimity of sentiment on the part of all your correspondents leaves no doubt as regards this subject. A necessary consequence is that nothing can be done towards the organization of such a society until after the election. Third, that the basis of organization must be modelled somewhat after that of the "Honest Money League" of Chicago—with a central executive committee in New York, and a local auxiliary society wherever there is a sufficient number of members to warrant it. The work of the executive committee should consist in the issuing of broadsides, tracts, and possibly of a separate quarterly organ—though in my opinion, at least, the society would do well to use the columns of the regular press as far as practicable. Auxiliary organizations should receive the publications of the central committee in quantities for distribution, and could, moreover, work for the cause by arranging lectures, meetings, etc., as far as would seem expedient. The basis of membership should be the payment of an annual fee, to be determined upon hereafter, and members should receive the publications regularly and free of charge.

I think I am not far wrong if I take the above as the average result of this interesting discussion. All will agree that it would be a great mistake to let this occasion pass without doing something; and I think that it can be confidently predicted that soon after the election a call for a preliminary meeting, such as was suggested in the first hasty letter on the subject, will be issued, either under the auspices or independently of the old Civil-Service Reform Association of New York. "A. B. M.'s" suggestion, that the Publication Society should not be merely the new edition of a fossil organization is well worthy of attention, but with regard to the association in question his fears seem groundless. The support of the eminent gentlemen whom this body numbers among its members will be invaluable, and indeed indispensable, for a new society.

That the latter will have to begin by educating some of its originators seems to be indicated by the letter of "W.," in number 798 of the Nation. This writer thinks a "clean sweep" may do away with party assessments, while "all experience hath shown" that the latter are secured only by the fear on the part of the officials that there might possibly be a "sweep." If an officer were secure of his place as long as he remained efficient and honest, he would certainly not submit to any forced taxation on the part of a "machine."—Very truly yours, F. W. H.

MOUNT VERNON, N. Y., Oct. 15, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have heard so much in commendation of the proposed Civil-Service Reform Publication Society that I am convinced that four out of five of those who are interested in the subject underestimate the hold which the reform has in the minds of the people. The defeat of the Grant and Tilden bosses in the recent nominating campaigns was something more than a choice between men—it was a popular reaction against the politician as such; and whatever the result of the coming election, many thousands of voters are being made civil-service reformers by the logic of the positions of the two parties. Most of these converts must come from the Republican party, which, with the aid of Mr. English's demand for a "clean sweep," is now engaged in painting in high lights the peril of a system it has failed to amend. Such adherents, being largely moved by alarm, are not now to be counted as more than a reserve force to be called upon at the proper time to do the voting. The initiative can only be taken by those who believe the reform to be not a mere incidental desideratum, but a fundamental condition of political health. Fortunately, a large proportion of its present advocates have no party sensibilities to be treated gingerly, and can therefore work heartily for a movement which of necessity must assail the record of both parties. It would hardly seem wise or desirable for any one to cast in his lot with this movement who has any expectation of being either a Democrat or a Republican in 1888.

For these reasons—and not for those I see given in the correspondence of the Nation on this subject—I favor a non-partisan organization, with officers whose characters are vouchers that the funds will neither be squandered nor misapplied. To such a leadership I can pledge at least five supporters, with an annual contribution.—Respectfully yours,

R. U. J.

NEW YORK, Sept. 30, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If you will allow a woman to become a subscriber to your Civil-service Reform Publication Society, I shall be glad to send you a subscription of five dollars. Any movement which will tend to make politics an honorable and honored occupation may well be supported by women as well as men. Surely the desperate struggle for party spoils is the worm gnawing at the heart of our public life and making our fair republic more and more a mass of corruption at the core. H.

NEW JERSEY, October 14, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I will give $20 a year for five years to a society formed for the purpose of purifying the civil service. If any section of the nation has felt the want of an upright and impartial administration of the civil service more than any other, it is that part of the nation which believed so strongly in the defunct doctrine of State sovereignty as to risk life and fortune to maintain it. I agree with "A. B. M." in believing that a new and non-partisan society will be most likely to succeed.—Respectfully, O. H. COOPER.

HUNTSVILLE, TEXAS, Oct. 12, 1880.

[We are able to announce, as the result of all this discussion, that active steps are being taken for a reorganization of the old Civil-Service Reform Association in the direction indicated by "F. W. H." We believe the work will be completed and the result announced immediately after the election, and those who have already expressed their willingness to contribute money receive notice personally of the readiness of the Society to receive it. A public statement will be made of the objects of the organization and of the means by which it proposes to accomplish them. As we understand it, no direct political action or influence by the Society is contemplated, or, indeed, would be possible on the part of a non-partisan body. It will confine itself to efforts to create a public opinion favorable to such a change in the administrative machinery of the Government as will take the subordinate offices "out of politics."—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

D. APPLETON & CO. announce among their fall publications a new edition of 'American Painters,' largely extended by engravings after the works of artists not included in the first edition; a companion volume of contemporary 'British Painters'; the Memoirs of Jefferson Davis; Sir Charles Gavan's 'Young Ireland'; Jennings's 'Anecdotal History of the British Parliament'; and, in the International Scientific Series, 'Sight,' by Prof. Joseph Le Conte.——Lockwood, Brooks & Co., Boston, have in press 'Literary Remains of the Rev. Charles Henry Brigham,' late of Ann Arbor, Michigan, edited by Messrs. Livermore and Wilson; and an 'American Poets' Calendar,' being selections for every day in the year, with chromatic and other designs by the Misses Hyde, of Norwich Town, Conn.—Harroun & Bierstadt, 58 Reade Street, send us a specimen of their series of eight artotype views of the several stages of landing and re-erecting the obelisk now nearing its resting-place in Central Park. They are valuable records of a great undertaking.——In the Popular Science Monthly for November Herbert Spencer begins a series of articles on the "Development of Political Institutions."——The Cincinnati Art Museum Fund has been fully subscribed, and amounts to $300,000, enough for the beginning of a building on a plan capable of extension.——The Metropolitan Museum of Art was reopened yesterday, with a new loan exhibition of paintings. The free days will be, as heretofore, those following Tuesday.——The University of Virginia is endeavoring to raise $8,000 to ensure a gift of $25,000 from Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt for an observatory, and a fifty-thousand dollar telescope promised conditionally by Mr. Leander McCormick. Mr. Vanderbilt's condition is the raising of an endowment fund of $50,000.——The Worcester correspondent of the Salem (Mass.) Gazette makes an appeal for funds to print the MS. remains of the late Dr. Bentley, who died in 1819, and whose papers are said to be "rich in information of a most various nature" in relation to old Salem, its family and municipal history, manners, etc.——The Newport Historical Magazine for October continues its valuable reprint of the records of births and marriages in that town and in Middletown, and begins the publication of Dr. Turner's paper on Governor Jeremiah Clarke and his family, who have held a singularly prominent position in the government of the colony and the State of Rhode Island.——Parents who have already found in Miss C. M. Hewins's Bulletin of the Hartford Library Association valuable suggestions how to teach children to like good books, will find a valuable page on "How to teach the right use of books" in the October issue.

—Mr. M. D. Conway pursues, in the November Harper's, his demonologic journey through Touraine, dealing this time with the St. Mexme of the town of Chinon under cover of a chat about "Rabelais at Home." There is a readable summary, in another paper, of the St. Cecilia legends, garnished with specimens of what inspiration the artists and the poets have derived from them; Dryden, Addison, and Pope being thus brought into juxtaposition at full length. Mr. W. H. Gibson's "Autumn Pastoral" has the usual qualities of his pen and pencil, and Mr. John W. Chadwick's "In Western Massachusetts" tells pleasantly of the town of Chesterfield and its vicinity, in which the writer made the discovery that "New England is dotted all over with homesteads going to decay, which can be purchased for a song, and made habitable and even charming for a few hundred dollars." It is well to remark, for the benefit of those who prefer the shore to the highlands, that this holds good of the inexhaustible coast, and not of New England alone; for example, we dare say, of that region concerning which Mr. Gaston Fay is prudently reticent of names and direction when treating of certain "Saline Types." The peculiar characteristics of a population of small farmers, fishermen, sportsmen, and wreckers withal are grotesquely and pungently described with sufficient freedom of imagination, and Mr. Fay in conjunction with Mr. A. B. Frost supplies the pictorial representations of his "types." Apart from the artistic merit of these, which in some cases is very great, they deserve to be studied by foreign artists who attempt to illustrate American works of fiction. We have in mind particularly the designs in the Cornhill for Mr. Henry James, jr.'s "Washington Square," which in the current Harper's is approaching its crisis, happily before the heroine's ruin is complete. Mr. Walton's report upon the Norfolk County schools furnishes Mr. C. F. Adams, jr., a text for a discourse on "Scientific Common-School Education," which turns on the production of professional superintendents, through the universities, by means of "another and distinct post-graduate course, with chairs occupied by professors of pedagogy, as it is called, but which is in reality nothing but the familiar science of psychology." In closing its sixty-first volume Harper's has many announcements to make, but none more interesting than that the magazine will with the next number begin to be published in London as well as in New York. This means, of course, that the "contraband" literary features in which it has hitherto indulged will be dropt, or else maintained by some international comity. Liberty in the choice of illustrations must also be curtailed.

—Mr. Henry James, jr., begins "The Portrait of a Lady" in the November Atlantic (and also, by the way, in the October Macmillan). It is apparently to be another study in spiritual dissection, and as such promises well, though the work is hardly more than cut out in the five chapters here printed. It is a return to the "international" plan, and argues that "Washington Square" may be regarded as in this respect a momentary aberration. Prof. N. S. Shaler has a paper on "The Future of Weather-Foretelling," to which we may recur hereafter. S. J. Barrows writes enthusiastically of "The Silk Industry in America," and the rest of the number is rather light. We ought perhaps to except from this characterization an indescribable series of detonating observations by Miss Phelps, entitled "What is a Fact?"—which divulges the truth—or shall we say fact?—that "the MENTAL SCIENCES EXIST," and that their phenomena are as much facts as any of the facts of baldly material science. There is a weak point in the argument, it will be anticipated; but we owe Miss Phelps a phrase which, considering its setting, is nothing less than a stroke of genius—namely, "the marked uselessness of discussion with the initial moods of 'emancipated minds.'" Mr. G. P. Lathrop discourses with every intention (and not unsuccessfully upon the whole) of lightness on "Philosophy and Apples," meaning the Concord School; Mr. Higginson conducts prettily enough "A Search for the Pleiades," which we will not further describe; the Washington gossip is entertaining as usual, if, indeed, it does not grow in interest now that the writer feels more certain than he did at first, perhaps, of the copiousness of his material; Mr. Richard Grant White, in "Letters and Notes from England," makes the mistake, we think, of supposing extracts at hap-hazard from his own letters "home" popularly interesting, and seems unmindful of the risk of spoiling an excellent series by tapering off into garrulity. The poetry of the number calls for no special mention, and this is not a good review month, though there is plenty of evident effort after excellence, and one or two of the graver notices have the merit of exciting in the reader a desire to know more of the work noticed.

—Colonel Mapleson opened his third season of Italian opera in New York on Monday night before a delighted and crowded audience. Donizetti's "Lucia," which had been selected for this occasion, seems to possess unfading attractions for the popular mind, and the reappearance of Madame Gerster in one of her favorite parts, and the début of a new tenor, Sig. Ravelli, made the performance particularly interesting. Madame Gerster was received with a great burst of applause, and several minutes elapsed before she could begin her part. Nothing new can be said about this charming artist. Her voice is as rich, pure, and sympathetic as ever, her method is perfect, and her acting thoroughly artistic. Such rounds of applause as rewarded her efforts after the celebrated duo with the flute in the third act have seldom re-echoed within the walls of an American theatre. The new tenor cannot be called a great singer, but he is, nevertheless, a very desirable acquisition to the Mapleson company. His voice is very even and sympathetic and of pure lyric quality. He sings in tune, is young and good-looking, and, like most of his countrymen—he is a Frenchman—an excellent actor. Signor Galassi, as Ashton, has never failed to delight his audience, and was again as satisfactory as ever. The orchestral performance under Signor Arditi was in every respect successful.

—Mr. Constantin Sternberg, a Russian pianist, made his first appearance in America under particularly unfavorable circumstances. In the first place, he had been very imprudently advertised as one of the most eminent of living virtuosos, while it became evident before he had played many bars that he is a young artist possessed of some very desirable qualities, but having as yet no claim to rank among the distinguished pianists who of late years have been heard in New York. Mr. Sternberg has very considerable powers of execution, but his interpretation is cold, conventional, and without intelligence, wanting in fine effects of light and shade, and in delicate and artistic phrasing. This became at once evident in the concerto by Scharwenka in B flat minor, with which he introduced himself. The three "Scenes from Norway," by Grieg, which he selected for solo pieces, are really too unimportant to require comment. They are little drawing-room pieces within comfortable reach of an ordinary amateur, and to choose such music for a début was most unfortunate before an audience accustomed to the wonderful programmes which artists like Essipoff, Bülow, and Joseffy have introduced here. In his last number, Liszt's "Rhapsodie Espagnole," the artist's technical powers were decidedly at fault. He was unable to master the great difficulties which this most uninteresting composition presents. A serious drawback to Mr. Sternberg's success in any event was the choice of a hall. The Academy of Music is not a place for pianists of his stamp. It requires the strength of Rubinstein to fill it, and whatever effects Mr. Sternberg might be able to produce were lost in the great building. The artist was not much more fortunate in a concert which he gave in Madison Square Theatre, where he played compositions by Liszt, Chopin, Saint-Saëns, and Moskowski, and a polonaise of his own.

—Ferdinand Hiller, who is much more favorably known to music-lovers as a good conductor and prolific writer on musical topics than by his numerous but very commonplace compositions, contributes to the Rundschau for September an article on the attitude of different classes of society towards music. Where so many individual differences prevail it is somewhat unsafe to hazard general statements, yet it is of interest to know what conclusions forced themselves on an observant mind during a long life of varied and rich experience in musical circles. A body of French scientists once voted that music occupied about the same level as smoking. Between the class represented by these savants and the musical enthusiast whose eyes gather tears every time he hears an adagio, there are intermediate stages. What is most universally appreciated in music is the rhythmical element, as is attested by the popularity of dance-music, in which rhythm is the predominant feature. Variety and richness of tone-color as given by a full orchestra stand next in the estimation of the multitude, while musical ideas pure and simple, as in a string-quartet, where most of these embellishments have to be dispensed with, appeal to the smallest circle of hearers. From absolute music of this sort the executants themselves derive the greatest amount of enjoyment, while a majority of the audience listen in a dreamlike state from which they are only aroused by the recurrence of very distinct melodies which they may greet as acquaintances already met with. As to the sexes, the votaries of music, as of religion, are more numerous among females than males, for reasons apparent to all; but women are very apt to transfer their love from the music to the musician. In regard to professions, Hiller found in his personal experience more love of music among physicians than among lawyers, more among philologians than among philosophers. The former is easily understood, while the latter must have been purely accidental. Theologians are divided into two camps, to one of which, whatever may be its personal tastes, is prescribed an abhorrence of all music except that which is distinctly sacred, while the other is at liberty to follow its own inclinations. Music gains many recruits from theological students, while the reverse is seldom the case. When professional men and men of science do take an interest in music they usually prefer the better kinds. Between men of letters or poets and musicians there is a certain rivalry; their products often appear united before the public, and each is apt to regard the share of the other as subordinate to his own. But it must be observed that a bad poem set to good music has a much better chance of success than a good poem wedded to poor music. On the whole, Hiller thinks men of letters are less accessible to the influence of music than men of science, because the latter find in music a source of emotional nourishment which the former derive from other quarters. The representatives of the plastic arts, and especially painters, are frequently enthusiastic admirers of music. Hiller might have added that at the Bayreuth festival in 1876 the list of famous painters present was larger than that of the representatives of any other art. Finally, as to the musicians themselves, whose attitude towards their art varies very much with their position, each has his personal equation which prevents him from looking at a composition from a purely objective point of view. Singers are apt to approve or disapprove of a piece accordingly as it affords them opportunity to display their good points; and to some extent this is true of orchestras and their leaders, who may also become prejudiced against certain works by excessive repetition, especially in the opera. The disadvantage of the critic is that he must always be on the lookout for points and think of what he has got to say, which prevents him from enjoying a work in that naïve and purely receptive state of mind for which it was intended, while composers often succumb to the weakness of opposing altogether too violently works written on principles they do not approve of. This last remark is evidently introspective.

—We have several times commented upon the extraordinary German tariff legislation of last year, and our Berlin correspondent, in a letter published in No. 795, again calls attention to the motives of this tariff and to some of its mischievous results. One particular point of special interest to Americans—the question of lumber, as exported from our Southern States—seems to have escaped general observation. It appears that, thanks to its intrinsic worth, so considerable quantities of American hard-pine lumber have been imported into Germany that the producers of wood in that country took alarm and rallied to exclude the intruder. One of the most curious features of the effort to check the importation of the wood was the presentation of a petition by the timber merchants of Berlin to the Chancellor of the Empire, in which is set forth the value of German oak and pine (Kiefer) as contrasted with that of American yellow pine. This petition, which is a somewhat lengthy document, has every appearance of having been "inspired" by some one in the Chancellor's office; but the ostensible ground on which it is based is that the lumber dealers have been pained to see American yellow pine used in the construction of certain public buildings at Berlin to the prejudice of domestic woods. They therefore humbly pray that no more of this American wood shall be used upon any public work. The petition goes on to name some of the advantages which are commonly claimed for the American wood, and strives to rebut them one by one; the burden of the argument being that there are German woods good enough for all practical purposes, that the hard-pine is not well fitted for many uses, and that the continued importation of it will seriously depress the price of domestic lumber. The point is taken that inasmuch as the American wood is imported in a partially-manufactured condition, many German laborers must suffer as well as mill-owners and the proprietors of forests. Prince Bismarck maintained in the Reichstag that American wood was inferior, and professed to be mystified at the preference manifested for it. The duty now in force upon sawn lumber imported into the German Empire is but a small fraction less than $2\frac{3}{4}$ cents for 100 lbs. avoirdupois. That is to say, in order that the owners of the German forests may find a ready market for their trees, the construction of the best possible buildings in that country is hindered, hampered, and made difficult to the extent which this sum represents.

—The Royal Library at Stockholm has published two remarkably well-printed numbers of its "Handlingar"—Transactions, or, as libraries here usually say, Bulletin. The first contained the yearly report for 1878, and a list of Sweden's older liturgical literature; the second gave the report for 1879, and an account of the epistolary collection in the library. Each correspondence is described in a general way in from half a page to a couple of pages, and a list of the correspondents' names is given, with the years covered and the number of the letters. At the end of the volume an index refers to every writer's name. Of course many belong to persons known only in Sweden. We see, however, the names of Axel Oxenstierna, Hugo Grotius, Charles XII. and several other of the kings, and among the writers of one or two letters Beaumarchais, Frederic the Great, A. W. von Schlegel, Tegnér, Voltaire, and Oehlenschläger. It will be an excellent thing if libraries which have valuable collections of manuscript letters get into the way of publishing such lists as this. We remember only a single similar one issued by a library in this country, the list of manuscripts at the end of the catalogue of the Prince collection in the Boston Public Library. We might add the catalogue of President Sparks's MSS., which are now deposited in Harvard College Library, though that was published by Mrs. Sparks and not by the Library. In both these catalogues the subject of each letter was briefly given.

RECENT NAVAL REPORTS.*

THE three books named below may be said, without exaggeration, to form a complete though concise summary of the condition of naval science and naval affairs throughout the world at this date. The authors are well qualified for their respective tasks: Chief Engineer King has been chief of a bureau in the Navy Department, and is well known to all naval men by his admirable report, published in 1877, on "European Ships-of-War"; Professor Soley has for several years been at the head of the department of English studies at the Naval Academy, and is the author of a history of that institution; Commander Chadwick is an officer of twenty years' service, of high standing in his profession, and identified with the training system in our own service. One book tells us of ships, engines, guns, and dockyards; another of the education of officers; and the third of the training of seamen: taken together they form an encyclopædia of naval knowledge. The greatest practical value of such knowledge—which doubtless always exists in various pigeon-holes of the Navy Department, but has not previously been laid before the world in such a comprehensive and intelligent form—is to enable not only naval experts, but every intelligent reader, to form a just estimate of our own position among the naval powers of the world, and to learn whether we receive an adequate return for the sums of money, ranging from fourteen to twenty millions of dollars annually, which we bestow on our Navy in these times of peace.

Mr. Soley describes in detail the courses of study and the management of the various schools of different grades devoted to naval education in England, France, Germany, and Italy. Among these details there may be many valuable hints to naval officers, but the general bearing of the whole subject is mainly interesting to lay readers. From the experience of Germany and Italy, whose navies have been created within the last twenty years and have yet to prove their merits or defects, but little is to be learned. In the English service the author finds that boys are taken at the age of thirteen, placed on a stationary ship for two years, during which they are crammed with a course far beyond their age and capacities, and which, in fact, they do not acquire; then sent to sea on regular cruises for five years; at the end of which time they are brought home and set to work for six months, at the naval school at Greenwich, on a course which it would be impossible to acquire in so short a time, but which in reality is the same course they were supposed to have learned five years before. Professor Soley is therefore "led to the conclusion that the high scientific and professional acquirements of many English naval officers are not in consequence, but in spite, of their early education." On the other hand, he found everything to admire in the French system, which takes boys at sixteen from the lycées, where they have received a thorough elementary education, and devotes two years to their professional studies in the naval school at Brest, followed by a year of service at sea on a practice-ship. Yet by common consent the English are more skilful sailors than the French. As our own system of education, which has now been in existence for thirty-five years, has produced a body of officers who are not surpassed by those of any other nation in professional acquirements, naval aptitude, or uprightness of character, it may fairly be presumed that we have little to learn, except in minor details, on the subject of education.

If we pass from the officers to the men, however, we find no such flattering picture. Mr. Chadwick mentions incidentally that the last ship in which he served "had, in a crew of three hundred and one men, the representatives of seventeen different nationalities," including natives of Finland and the Sandwich Islands. Nor was this an exceptional ship. A few years ago a large portion of the "landsmen" who manned our ships-of-war could not understand the language of the country they were serving! Such a state of affairs is certainly in glaring contrast to the condition of England, which has nearly twenty thousand educated seamen ("blue-jackets"), which annually turns out three thousand educated boys, bound to serve until their twenty-ninth year; where, by means of the training system, "the sailor has been made a man of high respectability, instead of the drunken, careless fellow of some years since"; and where "the men who man her ships are a body of whom England is justly proud." The training system, in brief, consists of taking boys at the age of sixteen, and giving them an elementary education on board ships employed for this special purpose, at the same time that they learn their practical duties as sailors. After three or four years of instruction they are sent to sea on regular cruisers. They are bound to serve for a certain period, and in the English service special inducements are offered for re-enlistment. The advantages of the system are too obvious to need enumeration, and its cost is very slight. It has long been in vogue in England, and was introduced in our own service a few years since. Its details are specified with great minuteness in Commander Chadwick's report. He also gives an account of the training systems for the merchant service, the necessity for which is apparent from the following facts: "In 1877 the losses of the English marine comprised 560 sailing vessels and 68 steamers, representing a value, with cargoes, of $18,000,000. With these ships were lost 2,700 lives. Two-thirds of these wrecks are set down by the British Board of Trade as the result of ignorance and incompetency. There would thus (taking the losses of England alone) be a saving of $12,000,000 if the masters were better fitted for their duties." Although there is one school-ship of this class maintained by the State of New York, it does not meet the demands of even a portion of our mercantile marine. The system might well be extended, and this portion of Commander Chadwick's report could be studied to advantage by the shipping interest.

Of Chief-Engineer King's book it is hardly possible to speak too highly. When his former report on European ships-of-war was published it was at once recognized by all naval authorities as so comprehensive and so original in method and treatment as to constitute a novelty in naval literature; it quickly found its way to every war-ship afloat, and has since retained its place as a standard book of reference. The present volume is much larger, being a stout octavo of over six hundred pages; it brings the subject down to date, and in general bears about the same relation to the previous report as a treatise to a school text-book. More than one-third of the book is naturally devoted to the English navy, which has been the battle-ground of all the opposing theories about naval architecture and naval artillery that have been evolved during the twenty years in which both of these sciences have been completely revolutionized; but the navies of other nations—twenty-two in all—are fully described in proportion to their importance. For each of the twelve most important of these nations is given a table showing the name of each ship, and its dimensions, character and thickness of armor, kind of engines, number and size of guns, speed, displacement, etc., etc. For the modern ships a type of each class is selected and described in great detail, with drawings showing all its essential features. There is also a full discussion of modern great guns, of torpedoes, of marine engines and ship-building. The appearance of trustworthy and well-digested data on these subjects, from an author who has visited nearly every great dock-yard and arsenal in Europe and inspected every type of modern ship-of-war, is most timely; for, as we showed the other day in reviewing Lieutenant Very's work, the ships in our Navy have been steadily degenerating in comparison with those of other powers, until now they have reached such a state of inefficiency that a thorough reconstruction must be effected or we must cease to be considered a great naval power, and this in spite of the fact that the sums expended on our Navy in the last fifteen years have been far in excess of those expended by any other nation except England and France. In number of armored ships we stand sixth on the list, in tonnage eighth, in number of guns tenth. We have not a single sea-going iron-clad of the character possessed by eleven other nations, not a single iron-built ship sheathed with wood, only one fast cruiser of modern type and effective size, only sixteen rifled guns afloat, and these not larger than eight inches in calibre. Our Navy, in short, consists of a few monitors left over from the war, equally incapable of venturing to sea or meeting in action the modern armored ships of other powers, and of about forty wooden cruisers, three-fourths of which are of the type which excited the admiration of the world twenty-five years ago, but which are now almost as much inferior to the rapid cruisers of European nations as sailing ships are inferior to themselves. Moreover, the average cost of repairing our wooden hulls during the five years from 1870 to 1875, as stated in an official table quoted by Mr. King, was little less than $300,000 per vessel; whereas the cost of repairing an iron or composite ship of the modern type is but $70,000 in ten years.

These are a few of the facts which attract attention in perusing this admirable book. They warrant the statement that our naval expenditures, which amount to one-fourteenth of our revenue, are so misdirected that it may almost be said that they are wholly wasted. Under existing laws the naval officials are obliged to expend enormous sums in patching up old ships in order to make some show of a force afloat. We cannot have iron ships because the lumber interests are opposed to it; we cannot have proper guns because the iron interests are not agreed among themselves who shall construct them. Between the upper and nether millstones of these conflicting interests the Navy is being ground to pieces; and this state of affairs is likely to continue until the public takes some interest in the matter, and compels these rival industries to subordinate their private advantage to the public welfare. When the public mind, as represented in Congress, is ready to demand that we shall have efficient ships and guns in place of the antiquated affairs for which we are now paying so heavily, the data contained in Chief-Engineer King's book, comprising as it does the costly experience of the whole world in building up modern navies, will be simply invaluable. It is to be hoped that the book itself will hasten the arrival of that time.

FROM CHINA TO INDIA OVERLAND.*

CAPTAIN GILL'S book is the latest and most important of recent works on China, though the author gives us simply his diary written from day to day during a journey of some four thousand miles and extending over a period of thirteen months. Its bright, vivacious style, and the occasional graphic pictures of the country and its inhabitants, their peculiarities in habit, dress, and agriculture, render it very attractive. True, it adds little to our knowledge in these respects, as only in a single instance did Captain Gill pass over ground untrodden by previous travellers. His claim to a high rank among travellers, however, rests upon his contributions to our geographical knowledge of China. For over a thousand miles, to quote the words of Sir R. Alcock on the presentation to the author of the gold medal of the Royal Geographical Society last year, "he made a traverse survey of all the remote westerly region, and took a careful series of hypsometrical measurements, the result of which is that we have now an accurate knowledge of the elevation and configuration of that great extent of mountainous country, besides a clear idea of its geography, from the admirable map in forty-two sheets which Captain Gill has presented to the Society." He landed in China, very opportunely, in the fall of 1876, just as the convention known as the "Agreement of Chefoo" was concluded with England. To a clause in the convention "enjoining the local authorities to give protection to foreign travellers" is due the fact "that Englishmen may travel in comfort throughout the vast empire." No doubt the uniform courtesy with which our author was treated was owing in great measure to his personal courage and tact in dealing with the people, and especially the petty officials. His testimony, however, is amply confirmed by that of Mr. McCarthy, an English missionary, who preceded him over the most dangerous part of his journey through the province of Yünnan to Burmah. In a paper read before the Royal Geographical Society this gentleman says: "I was not once called upon to produce my passport, nor had I once to appeal to any official for help or protection. From the people everywhere I received only civility and kindness."

In the first chapters of his work Captain Gill gives a brief account of his journey to Peking and a trip which he made to the province of Pe-Chi-Li, to the northeast of the capital and beyond the Great Wall. A great part of the country visited was under water, and the scenery was monotonous in the extreme from the wearisome alternations of swamp and level plain. After a lively description of Shanghai and a shooting excursion on the Grand Canal, we are fairly launched on the great river which gives its name to the book. The Yang-tze-kiang, the largest river of Asia and the fourth in size in the world, unless the Congo should be found to supplant it, has different names in different parts of its course. The name Ocean River, by which it is known to Englishmen, is applied only to that part nearest the sea. From the borders of Tibet to Fu-chu, in the province of Szr-Chwan, much the longest part of its course, it is called the Kin-sha-kiang—river of golden sand. In the steppes of Tibet it receives the name of Mu-rui-ussu, or winding water. Its source is one of the yet unsolved geographical problems of the day, but is probably to be found not far from lat. 36° and long. 90°. The river journey of 1,500 miles to Chung-Ching, in an American-built steamer as far as Hankow, 680 miles, in a junk for the remainder of the distance, calls for no particular remark. It is only when the author leaves this city that his narrative has the charm of novelty. In making his arrangements for his transport into the comparatively unknown territory to the northwest he refers to a very elaborate agreement which he made with a coolie-master as to the most minute details of the journey :

* 'The River of Golden Sand. The narrative of a journey through China and Eastern Tibet to Burmah. With illustrations and ten maps from original surveys. By Capt. William Gill, R.E. With an introductory essay by Col. Henry Yule, C.B., R.E.' In two volumes. London: J. Murray. 1880.

"But, unlike English documents," he adds, "this charter, once drawn up and verbally agreed to by the coolie-master and myself, required neither witness nor signature, but, being confided to the depths of my pocket, was as valid, according to Chinese usage, as the most formal document that ever issued from Lincoln's Inn. This confidence that people have in one another is a feature in the character of the people that has been strangely unnoticed by foreign writers. Merchants in China rely implicitly on one another ; indeed, if they did not, all business would come to an end at once. In my position I was over and over again compelled to trust the Chinese with large sums of money without receiving any receipt, and in other ways to rely on their probity to a far greater extent than I should have trusted Europeans, or Chinese if I could have avoided it. But I was never deceived in the smallest degree, nor did I lose anything during all the time I was travelling."

At Chung-Ching the river was left and the remainder of the journey was made on foot or pony back, the baggage being carried by coolies. These men carry enormous loads. Captain Gill mentions overtaking a "somewhat slenderly-built carrier freighted with twenty-two of the Ya-chau packages [of tea], which must, at the lowest computation, have exceeded 400 pounds in weight!" Their pay is as small as their burdens are great. For carrying six packages 150 miles, or twenty days' journey, over an exceedingly mountainous country a coolie receives 1.8 taels, or about $2.59. The province of Szr-Chwan, through which Captain Gill now passed, is "one of the most beautiful, perhaps the richest, and for foreigners certainly the most pleasant, in the empire." The roads and inns were good. Village schools were numerous, and the country everywhere bore witness to a long-continued peace and prosperity. Ching-tu-fu, the capital, was thronged with candidates for the examinations and it was difficult to find a lodging. Here, as frequently afterwards, our traveller received cordial and efficient aid from the French missionaries. From this point he took what he terms a "loop-cast" to the Northern Alps, a region the greater part of which had never been visited by any European. His route lay among the mountains which run parallel with the vast range separating China from Tibet. In some of the remoter valleys he found villages of the Man-tse, people speaking a Tibetan dialect, who are supposed to be the descendants of the original inhabitants. "The houses are of stone, and the lower part is like a fort, with a few narrow windows like loopholes ; there is a flat roof, and on part of this a kind of shed is erected, also flat-roofed and open to the front. There is a high tower in each village. These are usually square ; but I once saw an octagonal one." The Man-tse appear to be independent, but are gradually disappearing before the irresistible advance of the Chinese. In one of the larger towns of this district Captain Gill saw for the first time the Margary proclamation. This was in accordance with the Chefoo convention, by which the Chinese Government bound itself to post throughout the empire a document reciting the facts of Mr. Margary's murder, dwelling upon the gravity of the offence and charging upon officials to protect travellers, "and to study the treaty of Tien-tsin." This proclamation was afterwards seen at almost every stopping place. The next town of importance which he reached was Ta-chien-lu, lying at the foot of the mountains in a district in which the government is administered by both Chinese and Tibetan officials. Here the tea is prepared for the Tibetan market, and it is estimated that about ten million pounds pay duty annually, and in addition a large quantity is smuggled over the border. Between this place and Batang, the frontier town, the road at but a single point descends below 10,000 feet above the sea-level. Four of the passes are over 15,000 feet and one is 16,568 feet. Yet even at this height there was no snow, and just below the summit "wild flowers of every color were growing." At this season—August—"a carpet of luxuriant grass covered the whole surface of the hills and dales ; the richness of the pasture was astonishing, and thousands of yaks and sheep were feeding on the magnificent vegetation." At Batang Captain Gill's progress westward was barred by the determination of the Lamas to prevent any foreigners from entering Tibet, and the traveller turned to the southward along the banks of the "river of golden sand." The country bore a poverty-stricken appearance, chiefly on account of the oppressions of the Lamas, who have possessed themselves of most of the arable and pasture land, but pay no taxes. These are levied without abatement on the dispossessed people, who are either becoming Lamas themselves or are emigrating into the neighboring province of Yünnan. At Shik-ku, where the river turns to the eastward, 2,500 miles from its mouth, it "was so swollen by the constant rain that it was more like an immense sea than a river." Yünnan, though naturally one of the richest of the provinces of the empire, had not yet recovered from the desolation consequent upon the Mohammedan rebellion at the time of Captain Gill's visit. Ta-li-fu, the capital of the rebels and formerly a very important place, was then "little better than a ruin." A somewhat wearisome journey of thirty days through a comparatively uninteresting country brought our author safely to Bhamo, the border town of Burmah, thus accomplishing successfully, what till recently has been impracticable, the overland passage from China to India.

The work is edited by Colonel Henry Yule, who contributes a valuable introductory chapter on the geography of Tibet, together with a brief account of the various expeditions which preceded that of Captain Gill.

A History of Classical Greek Literature. By the Rev. J. P. Mahaffy, M.A., Fellow and Professor of Ancient History, Trinity College, Dublin. (New York : Harper & Bros. 1880.)—Mr. Mahaffy, whose 'Social Life in Greece' made him, if not celebrated, well known, has given us in these two volumes a very readable and interesting account of the classical writers of Greece. The scope of his work did not allow him to include the post-classical period ; hence, the first volume, which discusses the poets, terminates with Menander, while his second does not extend beyond the lost historians of the fourth century B.C. Hitherto a kind of fatality has attached to English histories of Greek literature. O. Müller's admirable sketch, written expressly for English students, in a transparent and most un-German style, was cut short by his premature death, and rather unequally supplemented by Donaldson. Colonel Mure's work is disfigured by a vicious redundancy of words, as well as by a standpoint which, with Mr. Mahaffy and most sane critics, we cannot but regard as too often uncritical. Moreover, the size and costliness of both these works place them beyond the reach of ordinary students. Thus, there is not only room but an actual demand for a work which, like the present, aims at giving with an account of each writer a condensed summary of modern criticism upon them.

Mr. Mahaffy starts with one great advantage : he is thoroughly readable and lively. His History will be read through by those who begin it, and is rarely, if ever, fatiguing. Hence it is likely to be popular with younger students, whether in schools or universities, whether male or female. It might easily be got up for an examination, and is sufficiently learned to flatter those who read it into the belief that they are masters (or mistresses) of the subject. We recommend it in particular to those who combine the sexes in mixed classes and teach both together. Yet light and unpedantic as it is, it contains the result of long and laborious study, and this not merely of the authors themselves, but of the literature, in some cases enormous, upon them. Thus, the discussion on Homer, without affecting to be learned or exhaustive, is a really admirable résumé of the fluctuation of opinion on the origin and composition of the 'Iliad' and 'Odyssey' from Wolf to our own time. The chapter on Euripides, a poet on whom the author has written a special monograph, is thoroughly adequate and appreciatory ; that on Sophocles will please most readers less, for Sophocles, in Mr. Mahaffy's judgment, has been overrated. Few will agree with him that the "Antigone" is not a very great tragedy, albeit a most brilliant and beautiful dramatic poem. And though he may be right in stating that many of the faults ordinarily supposed to belong to Euripides alone—e. g., the altercations of the characters and the occasional irrelevance of the choral odes—are anticipated by Sophocles, it remains true that Sophocles did not lower the tone of tragedy and that Euripides did. This degradation or decadence was no doubt inevitable ; the germs of it may be in Sophocles ; yet Aristophanes was not wrong in associating it almost entirely with Euripides. It is indeed clear that the accident of time or the hostility of monks has destroyed some dramas of the two elder tragedians which must have exhibited scenes of very Greek morality ; and it may be true that, from a modern point of view, if we still possessed all that Sophocles produced, we should judge him more harshly than the extant specimens justify. But on the evidence of those specimens we hold by the ordinary belief, not by Mr. Mahaffy. He is, we think, carried away by the limpid clearness of the younger dramatist, as indeed were the Athenians themselves, and has hardly sufficient sympathy with that wonderful subtlety of suggestive diction which places Sophocles on a level with the greatest poets, a Virgil or a Goethe. Again, when Mr. Mahaffy, after an interesting criticism of the "Œdipus Coloneus," sums up by declaring it "for vigor, for variety, and for poetic beauty" equal to any of Sophocles's plays, and inclines to rank it first of all, the strangeness of the particular verdict is in too direct antagonism to received belief not to make us pause about accepting his generally unfavorable estimate of the poet's genius.

The remark may be taken as applying to a great deal throughout the book : its general soundness of judgment, especially in dealing with the over-destructive criticism of the Germans, is apt to be marred by freaks of individual caprice—such, e. g., as the author's preference of the "Trachiniæ" to the "Medea" ; his tendency to underrate Thucydides, involving as it does a denial of the great historian's belief in virtue per se, and a quotation which we could well spare of Mure's absurd criticism of the famous passage (vii. 71) describing the emotions of the crowd that watched on land the battle in the harbor of Syracuse (vol. ii. p. 112). To some readers the most objectionable part of Mr. Mahaffy's work will be the two pages on the 'Phædon' of Plato, where he draws a most uncalled-for parallel between the last interview of Socrates with his wife and of Jesus Christ with his mother; and finds a "singular analogy" between Plato's discussion on the immortality of the soul and Mozart's Requiem. It seems to us a very unfortunate circumstance in this analogy that much of the famous Requiem is not certainly, we had almost said is believed to be certainly not, Mozart's. But faults like these are inconsiderable if compared with the far greater merits of the work. Few points on which criticism can be raised are neglected by Mr. Mahaffy, and the discussion on any one is never long enough to become wearisome. Every reader will be grateful, too, for the judicious use of foreign works either little read or not as much as they deserve, such as M. Patin's 'Tragiques Grecs,' or Blass's 'Geschichte der Attischen Beredsamkeit.' Such flaws as the iteration of particular words, e.g., "splendid," or Hibernicisms like "along with" and "except" in the sense of "unless," are the excusable emergencies of haste, and will no doubt be removed in another edition.

Health and Health Resorts. By John Wilson, M.D., late Medical Inspector of Camps and Hospitals, U.S.A. (Philadelphia: Porter & Coates. 1880. 16mo, pp. 288.)—Dr. Wilson's book is chiefly taken up with descriptions of the leading European watering-places—Italian, Swiss, German, and French—while an early chapter on "Expatriation" is given, somewhat contradictorily, to the dispraise of foreign as contrasted with American watering-places. But the patriotic physiologist is in danger of neglecting a great many facts; and when Dr. Wilson claims "equability of temperature," either in winter or summer, for any of our health resorts either on or near the Atlantic coast he claims what observation does not bear out. Those of the Florida Keys, which lie nearly on the inner edge of the Gulf Stream, have, indeed, a climate as equable as that of the Riviera; but the popular health resorts of Florida cannot compare in equability of climate with those of the Mediterranean. Thus, in Jacksonville the monthly ranges or variations of temperature during each of the seven months from May to September, 1874, were 50,° 49°, 46°, 31°, 24°, 34°, and 36° Fahr. respectively, with a maximum of 100.° The climate of St. Augustine, with extremes of 21° and 103° during a period of seven years (we give the Fort Marion observations), showed extremes for the months of January during a term of years of from 21° to 84°, and of 58° to 103° during the month of June. We cite these figures as sufficiently illustrative of our climate's racking changes, and yet they are, if we may use the expression, the most moderate of our extremes; the range of month and season variations increasing as we go northward.

Dr. Wilson writes in apparent ignorance of American climatology. His account of foreign watering-places has a certain popular value, but is marred by a diffuse and trivial style. It must be added that the book is a museum of misspellings and misprints; we have marked the following within the compass of three pages: Lepey, Comballel, Ormund, Litlis, Schiedeck, Remermont, and Guardmer (pp. 126–128).

A Short History of the Norman Conquest of England. By Edward A. Freeman, D.C.L., LL.D. (Oxford: Clarendon Press; New York: Macmillan. Pp. 156.)—In this little volume Mr. Freeman has given, in his graphic style, a sketch of the Norman Conquest that will serve well as a continuation of his 'Old English History.' It is in no sense, he says, an abridgment of his great work; for example, the period following the Conqueror's reign is dismissed with a single short chapter, quite in contrast to the thick fifth volume which is devoted to this period. But the introductory chapters, narrating the causes of the conquest, are sufficiently full, and the chapter on the results of the conquest is in due proportion. On the whole it seems as if he would have done well to give more space (not much over a page as it is) at least to the Norman kings William II., Henry I., and Stephen; for this is a particularly good part of his larger work, and these reigns would fairly come in with a history of the conquest. The volume would be a very thin one even then. It may be noted that in this volume Mr. Freeman tacitly gives up the contest as to the spelling of Anglo-Saxon names: we have Edmund, Edward, and Alfred.

PUBLISH THIS WEEK:

A New Book by the author of 'Constantinople.'

HOLLAND AND ITS PEOPLE. By Edmundo de Amicis, author of 'Constantinople,' 'Studies of Paris,' 'Morocco,' 'Spain,' etc. 8vo, with 18 full-page plates, $2.

In this volume, of which editions are appearing at once in Florence, Paris, London, and New York, the brilliant author of 'Paris' and 'Constantinople' has turned his steps to a land abounding in picturesque effects and whose history is full of dramatic interest, and his vivid descriptions of the Hollanders and their homes show that his pen has lost none of its eloquence or delicacy of touch. His analysis of the traits and characteristics of this sturdy race, which has played so important a part in the history of Europe, is most interesting and valuable.

A Book of Unique Character.

THE LOYAL RONINS. A Historical Romance. Translated from the Japanese by Edward Greey and Shiuichiro Saito. 8vo, with 38 full-page designs by a famous Japanese artist, and with a very striking and attractive cover from a Japanese design. $3.

This volume possesses not only a strong dramatic interest as a romance, but is especially valuable as presenting a vivid and trustworthy picture of Japanese ways of thinking, living, and dying. The translators were thoroughly well qualified for their task, Mr. Greey having passed a number of years in Japan, and Mr. Saito being a native of the country, though a graduate of Boston Law School. The translation is, therefore, accurate and idiomatic, while also graceful and readable. The interest of the reader is facilitated also by the translation of the significant proper names of the characters, and the "Sir Great-Hearts" and "Sir Long-Spears" recall at once the "Pilgrim's Progress" and Cooper's Indians.

A Book for Art-Students and Teachers.

ART SUGGESTIONS FROM THE Masters. Selected from the Works of Artists and Writers of Art, with Reference to their Practical Value for Art Students. Compiled by Susan N. The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1880.

The Week.

BEFORE our next issue reaches our readers the Presidential contest will have taken place and the result been made known. It would not be quite true to say that the Democratic prophets are as loud or as confident as the Republican, and it would be still less true to pretend that the chances, at best or at worst, are even. All the precedents, that are real precedents, in our political history, and all that we know of the temper and behavior of the American voter, assure the Republicans of victory in this as in the five preceding national elections. The causes, however, for discouragement which affect the general ticket are less potent in the Congressional districts, and no one can exactly forecast the gains of the Republicans in the lower House. At the South the present hopelessness of the election of Hancock is evidently serving as a fresh incentive to efforts to maintain and extend the "brigadier" representation. Success in this direction we should regard with indifference if, as some Republican orators believe and assert, the approaching defeat of the Democrats means the end of that party. There can be no doubt that such a catastrophe would ensue if the Solid South seceded from an organization which has been nothing but a hindrance and an injury to it since April, 1877. While we also look forward to this, we will not undertake to fix the date of its happening. The one thing certain, since both sets of prophets agree in proclaiming it, is that, whether Hancock or Garfield be the next President, the Solid South will never be heard of again.

The canvass closes without a single speech having been openly made to and on behalf of the Republicans of the South under the auspices of the National Executive Committee. They have received in lieu of such aid and comfort an address by Marshall Jewell, the chairman of that committee, transmitted through the Associated Press. It is, in brief, an appeal "to the Republicans of the Southern States" to stand up in the sight of the whole country and cast their votes for the candidates of their choice. It hardly deserves notice as a serious document, for it has a squint northward rather than southward, or, in other words, is intended for general political effect. It says "the Republicans of the North are fully aroused to the truth that the Democratic party conquered" half the Southern States "by violence, and now proposes to retain them by fraud." The force of this, for those who have long memories, is greatly weakened by the fact that the address is countersigned by the secretary, an Arkansas carpet-bagger who is largely responsible for the Democratic recovery of supremacy in that State, as well as for its present disgraceful repudiating attitude, and whose relation to the Baxter-Brooks civil war at Little Rock in 1873, as described in a Congressional report, should put him to the blush and this manifesto to ridicule in what relates to violence and fraud.

The campaign story of the week emanated from a basement on Nassau Street, and was to the effect that General Garfield had written in January last to one "H. L. Morey, Employers' Union, Lynn, Mass.," a short letter giving his opinion that "the question of employees is only a question of private and corporate economy," and stating that he was not in favor of abrogating the treaty with China "until our great manufacturing and corporate interests are conserved in the matter of labor." The letter, together with its envelope, was printed in fac-simile, and was heralded as Garfield's political death-warrant. Diligent search was at once made for Morey and for the Employers' Union, but, with all the aid afforded by the telegraph, he has not yet been discovered, and the Lynn manufacturers deny any knowledge of the Union. The letter, of course, has not been exhibited, even under a glass case. Meantime Gen. Garfield has published several denunciations of it "as a bold forgery, both in its language and sentiment," while newspaper and post-office experts have picked flaws in the handwriting, the orthography, and the cancelling-stamp, Mr. S. B. Chittenden has offered $5,000 for the arrest of the forger, and detectives are said to have caught up with him already. Genuine fac-similes of Mr. Garfield's manuscript have been scattered broadcast through the press, and the interest manifested in the way he makes his loop-letters and dots his i's has been equal to that displayed in the case of Whittaker's note of warning. The Morey letter represents the writer as spelling companies "companys," thus showing what simple precautions the forger omitted in the midst of so much elaborate apparatus for deceiving.

Another Democratic "bombshell" was the publication by Mr. Barnum of two telegrams sent from the Republican headquarters to Florida by Mr. Jewell, one promising to "provide as requested two hundred each for Callender and yourself as compensation," the other announcing that certain steamers "took" 150, 100, and 100, and that the "men on dock [had been] instructed to say nothing about it." This clearly meant bribery and the importation of "repeaters"; yet Mr. Jewell had the assurance to explain that Mr. Charles J. Noyes, the recipient of the first despatch, and Mr. Callender were simply Republican speakers now in Florida, whose expenses were guaranteed; and this does appear to be confirmed by a Florida letter which we print on another page, and which is a voucher for the dearness of Mr. Noyes's services at any price. As regards the three hundred and fifty men shipped to Key West, he produced a despatch in which he warned the Collector of that Port that two or three hundred workmen had been sent out, ostensibly to labor on some railroad, but that it looked to him "as though they were sent to Key West to vote." Subsequent enquiry had resulted, in spite of the reticence of the men on the dock, in ascertaining the exact number and the ships on which they had taken passage. This is, probably, the whole truth so far as Mr. Jewell is concerned, but explanations and contradictions have no discouragement, in the last week of a canvass, for the industrious exploders of bombshells.

General Grant has during the week fairly enrolled himself among the Republican campaign orators, and has presided and made speeches at meetings in Connecticut, New Jersey, and New York, not to mention sundry receptions to dispel ennui, and his testifying before the Warren court of enquiry in regard to Five Forks. In Jersey City he spoke three times in different halls in the course of the same evening. What he said was quite up to the level of campaign oratory, and some of his remarks had a force derived partly from their terseness and partly from the truths which they contained. Thus, of the rebels he said he had always contended during the war that "they were as much interested in their own defeat as we were interested in defeating them," and he now held, for a similar reason, that "the Republicans are just as much interested in the success to-day of the Republican party as the Republicans of the United States." So there was a certain felicity in his saying: "The beauty of the system of free ballot is that if an Administration is not a good one the next will be of a different sort. If you are going to control elections by the use of a shot-gun and by intimidation and assassination, if you get in a bad government it might perpetuate itself by simply being worse." But there is scarcely any speaker now on the stump from whom such words, addressed to the South, would be more irritating or more futile. His appearance, too, on the same platform with Conkling, and the "magnanimity" of these two men in working for Garfield, will naturally seem to many to impose on the latter an obligation which augurs ill for his Administration. We believe Mr. Garfield has made them no pledges and will make none, but that may not save him some day from the charge of ingratitude.

The Democratic National Committee has at last taken a hand in the local quarrel in Virginia, and in a manifesto issued last week calls upon the Democrats of "the Old Dominion" to support the regular—that is to say, the Funder—electors. This was, of course, the only shape that interference on its part could take. The Funders are indisputably regular, and the only reason for "recognizing" their opponents consisted in the possibility that the Mahone faction had the most votes. The tardiness of the Committee's action is natural and consistent, and in view of the nature of political management it is entirely defensible. At one time there was a prospect of a union between the Funders and Readjusters, and as questions of paying indebtedness had evidently nothing to do with the proper conduct of a campaign, it behooved the national as well as the local managers to postpone a decision until it should appear either that one of the two factions was clearly the stronger, or that all hope of harmony was to be abandoned. The latter having been demonstrated, all that Mr. Barnum had to do was to support the faction which was least to blame for the failure of the attempt at union. Accordingly, he throws upon the Readjusters, very justly, "the responsibility for perpetuating the existing divisions," and pleads with Virginia Democrats to postpone to a State canvass the differences which now divide them, and at the present crisis to vote for the Funder electoral ticket.

Of course General Mahone has been in nowise cast down by this pronunciamiento. The results of Presidential elections doubtless seem rather trivial to him, considering the special task to which he has devoted his energies of reforming Virginia politics by repudiating the State debt and generally introducing more vigor into local administration. He has issued a counter-proclamation, saying that Barnum's address "is no surprise to any Readjuster in Virginia," and adding the neat remark that his party have "anticipated it for months, and wondered why it was delayed." He proceeds to say, in a defiant tone, which is probably very disconcerting to the Funders, that his party have never expected, sought, or claimed recognition from the National Committee, and that they "are fighting for a higher prize than any abstract title to Democracy." Whether or no he was wise in this last phrase it is impossible for any one north of the scene of controversy to decide. The Funders jump upon it with vigor as an unconscious unmasking of Mahone's treacherous intentions. "Read that honest confession, ye deluded people of Virginia who have innocently followed what you supposed was a Democratic leader," the Richmond Dispatch exclaims in triumph; and there are numberless other untimely indications that fidelity to "Democracy" is regarded by even those Virginia Democrats who object to the title "Bourbon" as the first of political duties, in no matter what exigency. This is what renders it doubtful, at least to people who have no intimate interest in the honor of Virginia, whether Mahone is not performing a public service in exploding the nonsense and antiquity of Bourbon notions, even at the expense of cheating the creditors of the State. As to the effect upon Garfield's chances of carrying Virginia, it is enough to say that the Republican party there is, of course, mainly composed of negroes, and that if these vote for the Garfield electors the Funders will have a substantial plurality over Mahone, whose party is largely made up of blacks. It is perhaps safe to say that he will look to their allegiance.

We expressed last week our opinion that the tariff tactics of the Republicans at the eleventh hour had turned the scale in Indiana. A better authority than ourselves, the editor of the Indianapolis Journal, divests the victory of any national significance whatever, and says "the election only made apparent what existed months before—a firm resolve on the part of the people to rebuke the outrage on their decree confirming the amendments to our State constitution." The Journal must be well informed, because it was bought out by the manager of the Republican canvass, Mr. John C. New, in order "to put it in harmony with the campaign plan." Its course throughout has been noticeably quiet and dignified, and we were struck by nothing more than its sudden lack of interest in the efforts to secure a reversal of the Supreme Court decision denying the adoption of the amendments. We felt then that a secret confidence in the Republican advantage made an October election perfectly acceptable to the leaders, with all the appearance of a special providence. Our impression has been that since the petition for a rehearing the amendments have figured but little in the Journal's warfare, and our surprise is therefore great when we find these produced as the chief, if not the sole, cause of "the late political revolution." We do not, of course, doubt the Journal's sincerity when it deplores the fate of the amendments as a loss to honest government in Indiana, apart from the abolition of the October election, which was, after all, of secondary importance. Men of all parties shared and share this feeling.

If we had any reason for doubting the Journal's interpretation of the Democratic defeat we should find it in the smallness of Judge Porter's plurality and the largeness of the Journal's phrase for the rebuking party—"the sovereign people." Here, we will agree, was a despicable conspiracy on the part of the Supreme Court and the adherents of Mr. Hendricks to nullify the adoption of the amendments, which, in the popular view of both parties, had really taken place. We should, therefore, have expected the juggle to receive a crushing condemnation, especially if the sovereign people had had any hand in it; but, as a matter of fact, the sovereignty appears to reside in 7,551 male voters, or thereabouts, who are all that remain if we pair the Republican and non-Republican ballots until the latter are exhausted, and constitute less than two per cent. of the total poll. This does not seem to be withering to evil-doers, or to indicate that the sovereign people, of whose absorbing and universal interest in stump-speaking we had such vivid accounts, had their eyes fixed upon the same object; or that Mr. Schurz, when he opened the campaign at Indianapolis, and confined himself wholly, unless we are mistaken, to national considerations, was talking beside the point.

Secretary Sherman made a speech, as usual both able and adroit, at the Cooper Union on Tuesday night, largely in defence of the financial measures of the Republican party since it came into power, but without a word of reference to silver, except as a portion of the currency which, like the restored gold and the redeemed greenbacks, was a monument of the party's wisdom. He undertook to meet again Senator Bayard's characterization of the Resumption Act as a "juggling measure," and complaint that Mr. Sherman would not allow him to offer an amendment to retire and cancel the greenbacks, by saying that Mr. Bayard "must have known" this would defeat the bill and increase the hostility to it of his Democratic associates. Now, the Senator from Delaware and every one else knew at the time that Mr. Sherman's refusal to put a precise construction on the terms of his measure was dictated by his desire to pass the bill with the aid of all the doubtful votes he could secure, and this is a kind of statesmanship which has its excuses at least. But it is odd to find in the Times's report (the Tribune's is quite different) Mr. Sherman saying in one breath: "If his [Mr. Bayard's] idea had been adopted it would have defeated resumption, and there would have been an end of it. That is what I complain of in respect to the Democratic party. In political life they are not frank and manly. They don't meet a question fairly."

Instead of putting an Opposition local ticket in the field the New York Republicans have nominated a straight Republican ticket, which would be all very well and very wise if there were any principle for which they were contending. But there is nothing of the kind, and can, in the nature of local politics here, be nothing at present, certainly, but hostility to the dictatorship which John Kelly exercises over the taxpayers. To nominate, therefore, men whom the many Democrats opposed to Kelly have no sort of interest in voting for is plainly idle, except in so far as it may serve to help the national ticket, which we believe was the openly-assigned reason for nominating Mr. Dowd instead of a Democrat. Of course Mr. Dowd has no chance of election, and it is perhaps his own business if he enjoys the sacrifice to which he has been called. As to the minor nominations, no one can apparently go wrong if we are to judge by the popular and non-partisan "endorsement" which notoriously it has long been possible to obtain in New York for candidates of almost any description. The registration now closed has been the largest ever known in the city—216,929 against 167,837 last year. The increase in Republican districts is said to be the larger, but it is to be remembered that the Republican districts bear but a small numerical proportion to the Democratic; and besides that, this is one of the statistical instances in which "anything can be made out of anything."

We print this week a number of interesting communications from writers deeply concerned in the result of the impending election. They happen to be adverse to the view which we have maintained in these columns, but we commend them to such of our readers as are accustomed to survey the whole political situation before deciding how their votes shall be cast. We do not remember a campaign in which we have received more evidences of rational deliberation among the class which the Nation reaches, and we have not felt it necessary in each case to accompany with a comment letters to which it would not be difficult to take exception. There would, for example, be something to remark this week on the probable readiness of the Republican advocates of the Civil-Service Reform Publication Society to vote for a Democrat who challenged their support on the ground of his superiority to his rival on this issue. But perhaps it would be better, since the Society will need and ought to have Mr. Wheeler's name and hearty support, to observe that his joining it will be the surest way of raising an issue which is not a practical one in the present canvass, but which can promptly be made so long before another Presidential election occurs if the public are meantime thoroughly enlightened, and the candidates for Congress duly catechised, by an organization or organizations above the suspicion of partisanship. We do not know why the Society now in hopeful process of reconstitution should be suspected of being a "side-show to the Republican party," unless the most active civil-service reformers, whether in or out of Congress, have been and are Republicans. But of course a publication committee (which will be the working power of the Society) composed only of Republicans would be suspected, even if a mixed committee were out of the question. Such, however, is not the case, as will appear shortly after the election, till when no specific announcements of aims or organization can be made.

The arrivals of foreign gold during the week reached the unprecedented total of $6,940,399, which makes the foreign specie receipts since the beginning of August $41,391,955 against $49,347,804 last year, and since January 1 $46,540,828 against $55,519,082 last year. These figures show that the receipts this year exceed the most sanguine expectations formed early in the season, and are close upon those of the remarkable year, 1879. A considerable part of the gold now arriving is to pay for securities; the prosperous condition of general business in this country, and particularly of transportation, having again attracted to a large degree the money of European investors. At the New York Stock Exchange, prices of first-class securities and of dividend-paying shares are in many cases higher than ever before, owing in good measure to the fact that the large purchases of bonds by the United States Treasury for the sinking fund have driven and are driving investment money out of United States bonds into choice railroad securities. Moreover Wall Street assumes that General Garfield will be elected President, and that refunding operations will be begun early next year with bonds to replace those maturing, which will bear not more than 3½ per cent., and possibly only 3 per cent., annual interest. The effect of this reduction in rate of interest on what are regarded as standard bonds on all classes of investments would be to make buyers satisfied with a smaller income, which is another way of saying that higher prices would be paid in the market for first-class railroad investments. The rise in the prices of railroad bonds ranged during the week from 1 to 5 per cent., and in stocks from 1 to 13½ per cent.; and it took place without the excitement which usually attends such great changes in prices. The money market continues very easy at 2 to 4 per cent., and although the surplus reserve of the banks is now less than $4,000,000, it contrasts favorably with that of last year, when there was a deficiency in the legal reserve of $82,700. General mercantile trade is active for the season and may be called prosperous. Railroad receipts show an increase of 20 to 30 per cent. over the large business of the autumn of 1879. The price of silver bullion in London has declined to 52*d.* per ounce; and here the value of the "buzzard dollar" has fallen to 87 cents.

The Irish difficulty has assumed alarming proportions. The resistance to legal process in all suits relating to land, and the intimidation of landlords claiming rent, of tenants paying rent, and of persons occupying farms from which others have been evicted, by assassination, assault, arson, and the killing and maiming of cattle, have spread so widely as apparently to amount in many districts to the total loss of security for life and property. The pressure of English opinion, roused by this state of things, has therefore driven the Government into prosecution of the leading orators of the Land League, Mr. Parnell at the head of them, of course, and among them Mr. Redpath, the correspondent of the Tribune, who says, however, that some of his utterances have been misreported by the venal and licentious English press. The charge on which the prosecution is to be based is, it is said, conspiracy, which is difficult to prove anywhere, and in Ireland would be impossible. Moreover, it is not probable that any conviction could be secured in Ireland without packing the jury in a manner that would convert the trials into a farce. Indeed, it is doubtful whether any juries could be found in the present state of the country who would consent to be packed, through fear of subsequent assassination. It is, therefore, alleged that the Ministry propose to avail themselves of some provision of the Judicature Act which will enable them to change the venue to any other part of the kingdom, and have the trials conducted in England, where conviction would be certain. It is difficult to see, however, what advantage this plan will have, as far as the effect on Irish opinion is concerned, over the passage of a coercion bill suspending jury trials altogether. A trial before an English jury will be in Irish eyes no trial at all, and will stimulate the hatred of Englishmen, which is now one of the worst elements in the Irish problem. There is no doubt, however, that the language of the Land League orators does stimulate and suggest violence, and the readiness of the peasantry to resort to it as the legitimate mode of expressing dissatisfaction was only too well exemplified in the Molly Maguire outrages in Pennsylvania, for which twenty were hanged a few years ago. No government, whatever its ideas or policy on the land question, can help putting down such a state of things with the strong hand.

Action is, in fact, forced on the Ministry by the rapid approach of civil war, for the landlords are beginning to hire armed bands for their own protection, and the Orangemen of the North have begun to take steps for active operations. Curiously enough, the most ferocious preacher of the policy of "bullet for bullet" is a Protestant minister named Kane, who has made several speeches calling for battle and offering to take a hand in the fighting himself. It would be cruelty to let matters go any further in this shape, as the Land League disciples would of course, as a hundred times before, get the worst of it in open encounters. The Catholic clergy, too, have come out against the folly of the hour. The priests are either disappearing from the meetings or making very moderate speeches, and the bishops have begun to denounce the movement in pastorals, that of the Archbishop of Dublin being very vehement. But there is much reason to fear that it has got beyond the control of the clergy. If we can judge by what happened in 1843 and 1848, the conviction and imprisonment of the orators will take the life out of it. The Repeal agitation never amounted to anything after O'Connell was put in jail, and the "Young-Ireland" movement collapsed after the arrest of Meagher, Mitchel, and O'Brien. There is in all Irish agitations a considerable element of what, for want of a better name, must be called fun, and they are consequently apt to droop when the other side seems to be taking it in earnest. This was well illustrated in the Fenian invasion of Canada. Everything went well until the invading force came on a British regiment which seemed inclined to shed blood, and then the whole Fenian army dispersed to its homes.

The disorder in which Afghanistan has been involved by Beaconsfield's policy of a scientific frontier appears to have reached a climax in a fresh rising at Kabul, where Abdurrahman Khan is reported to have been murdered. If the news prove true, the impolicy of attempting to make him the ruler of the whole country, when he was unable to control even the northern part of it, becomes manifest. There can be little question that his obligations to the British Government were a fatal legacy, but there will be no more going to Kabul to avenge his death. The field is now clear for the country to work out its own destinies without interference, but not without interested spectators to the north and to the south of it.

THE SOLID SOUTH AND THE NATIONAL TREASURY.

THE question of the power of the South over the conduct of national affairs, in case the Democratic party should be reinstated through its aid, has played a very prominent part, as every one knows, in the opening of the Republican canvass. It is an important question, and it has been frequently discussed in these columns. The older Republicans who participated in the anti-slavery struggle and in the war, and are still strongly influenced by the traditions and prepossessions of the long conflict, see nothing, or next to nothing, in the triumph of the Democratic party but the triumph of the South, and insist upon it that the methods and aims of the South when in power will be substantially what they were before 1860. They therefore refuse to give much attention to any vices or defects in the Democratic party which cannot be considered to be peculiar to its Southern wing, or which, if the party got into office, would not be likely to result in the realization of peculiarly Southern aims. Their interest in civil-service reform, for instance, is due wholly or mainly to the fact that the present system, which the Republicans still cling to, would in Democratic hands be used for the benefit of the South—that is, to keep the South in power. To its use by the Republicans for the purpose of keeping the South out of power, therefore, they do not object at all, or only object very faintly. We might furnish numerous other illustrations of the same thing if we had space. They maintain, moreover, that the South has not, for political purposes, undergone any material change during the past twenty years, but is still ruled, and is likely to be ruled, by an oligarchy who are still slaveholders all but in name, heavily in debt, and with loose notions about financial obligations, both public and private, and eager to use the Treasury for purely local ends. The growth of railroads, the springing up of manufactures, the opening of the South to the Northern press and therefore to the public opinion of the civilized world, the education of the negro children, the pressure of white population around the whole of the old slave States, the immense changes in public sentiment everywhere since 1860 on the subject of human equality and the rights of the laborer, the awfully impressive example of the physical force of a free democratic society afforded by the war itself, of which, previous to 1860, the world, and least of all the South, had no conception—all these things count in the eyes of the class of Republicans of which we speak for nothing or for very little. They, therefore, in the presence of what seems to them this frightful danger, refuse to give attention to any of the numerous reforms which the Independents have been trying to urge on them.

There is a striking historical parallel for their state of mind to be found in the condition of English opinion towards the Irish Catholics during the eighteenth century. From the date of the Spanish Armada down to the death of Louis XIV. the English people were engaged in a struggle, which at times was almost desperate, against Catholic supremacy, which then meant ferocious religious intolerance and the suppression of intellectual freedom. The struggle lasted a century, caused one domestic revolution and a succession of bloody and costly wars, and created a terror, half religious, half political, which burnt itself into the national hearts and conscience and, curiously enough, found expression in a popular phrase which is not unlike some of those with which Stalwart Republicans describe Southern domination. "Popery, brass money, and wooden shoes" during the hundred and fifty years before Waterloo meant to the plain Englishman that if the Catholics got the upper hand not only would he have to partake in idolatrous worship, but would have to put up with an adulterated coinage, and wear the clumsy sabots of Louis XIV.'s French serfs. This feeling did not pass away with the danger. There was not after 1715, certainly not after the defeat of the Young Pretender in 1745, the smallest danger of a Catholic invasion or revolution. But the impression left by the conflict was so profound that it was not until 1790 that it was thought safe to admit Irish Catholics to ordinary civil rights, and not until 1830 that it was thought safe to admit a Catholic to a seat in Parliament. What the civilized world thinks of that chapter in English history everybody knows. The lesson it conveys is the danger and injustice of legislating or judging men in great classes or categories, or concluding that with great classes or categories there are such things as permanent and unchanging motives, either political or religious, on which the roll of time and the new and growing forces of civilization make no impression. There are no such classes, or categories, or communities, or nations anywhere in Christendom, and there are no such motives now at work wherever the railroad runs and the newspaper is read and the telegraph works and the schools are open. Everything changes in our day with extraordinary rapidity; every generation, too, and in our day more rapidly than ever. Who, in the name of common sense, is the Southern planter, or brigadier, or oligarch, that in him only, of all civilized men, the shock of war, the flight of time, the remorseless rush of industry, the loud drum-beat of opinion, the resistless rivers of population, and, though last, not least, the destruction of wild hopes and the explosion of cherished illusions should make no impression?

Naturally, this class of Republicans fear that the younger generation, who remember nothing of the long and bloody fight by which Southern domination in American politics was overthrown, and who are now about to vote for the first time, may not share their apprehensions or rightly appreciate the meaning of a Democratic victory. The consequence has been a greater number of really earnest and able appeals to this class of voters than we remember in any previous canvass since the war, containing what seems a very alarming account of the use "the South" will make of such a victory. One of the most prominent of these appeals is a little book in Harper's "Half-Hour Series," by Mr. Alexander Bliss, addressed to the five hundred thousand young men who, it is estimated, have this year attained the age of twenty-one years, and will, therefore, vote for the first time. Mr. Bliss begins by a very useful sketch of the history of the two parties in relation to the slavery question down to the outbreak of the war. He then predicts the things the South, when it finds itself in possession of power, will seek and perhaps obtain. These are: the assumption of the rebel debt; the pensioning of the rebel soldiers; compensation for the losses incurred in the war, and "perhaps" for emancipated slaves, which, Mr. Bliss suggests, will add "another billion or two to the national debt." These are the substantial objections to Southern ascendency; the others produced by Mr. Bliss are sentimental only.

One of the most respected of the Massachusetts Republicans, Mr. John M. Forbes, has also addressed the young voters through the columns of the Boston Advertiser, and in doing so controverts some of the Nation's views about the dangers to be apprehended from the return of Southern ascendency. These dangers, as described by Mr. Forbes, are that the "leaders of the South mean now to attempt to rule through the North, as before 1860, by a coalition with the Northern Democracy," feeling that in that year they made a mistake in resorting to the bayonet; that the success of the Democrats would "mean a return to ante-bellum principles and generally to the same methods, sharpened by the teachings of experience"; that once in power, with no scruples as to the use of the spoils, "it may take three Presidential terms to turn them out, as they would have the entire use" of 80,000 office-holders, and of "any needful parts of their salaries—say, in the whole, $24,000,000 per annum"—and would also have the 138 votes of the "Solid South" always at their back; that though human nature in the South may be the same as elsewhere, there are certain conditions peculiar to the South which modify Southern human nature, viz., poverty, leading to financial unscrupulousness and recklessness, financial ignorance and long familiarity with private debt.

Now, there is one answer to all this, which relieves us from the necessity of examining the question whether all these charges against the South are true. Granting that they are true, it is evident that those who produce them believe that their effect on the Northern mind will be such, even in the form of prophecies, that they will tend to the defeat of the Democratic party at the polls, no matter how "solid" the South may be. That is, they think that the mere rehearsal of things which the South may do if it gets into power will of itself suffice, all other business being laid aside, to cause a majority of the American people to vote against putting them into power. If mere prediction of such things is likely to have so much influence on the Northern imagination, what would their actual occurrence have? Suppose the Democrats to win and at once proceed to satisfy Southern expectations by measures adding (to follow Mr. Bliss) $2,000,000,000 to the national debt; the immediate effect of this on the national credit would undoubtedly be a rise in the rate at which the United States could borrow to, say, five per cent., thus increasing the debt charges by $100,000,000 annually; and this, be it remarked, not for the benefit of the whole people, but for sixteen of the States, containing 17,000,000 of population, or about 36 per cent. of the whole. This would be a sufficiently startling use of power, but it would be supplemented, according to Mr. Forbes, by the use of the Treasury "in a thousand ways" for the exclusive benefit of these same States, "even after throwing out of the account the danger of unjust and vexatious taxes." It is hardly too much to charge to account of these "thousand ways" $50,000,000 per annum more; so that, on what all must admit is a moderate estimate, the immediate result of the advent of the South to power would be an addition to the national burdens of $150,000,000 a year for the benefit of a small minority of the people belonging to the States lately in rebellion. We must add to this the extraordinary financial and commercial depression and derangement which would result from this strange and, indeed, monstrous legislation. The loss from this source would not be palpable and calculable like the increase of taxation, but it is safe to set it down at $300,000,000 per annum. All this would fall on the States which have 231 electoral votes against the 138 of the "Solid South," and return 187 members to Congress against 106 of the South. What would be the effect on the people of these States of the mere introduction of bills looking to this astounding and unprecedented levy of partial taxation? We will not answer this question. It would not be respectful to those who think the mere prediction of such performances is sufficient to rouse the North. Mr. Forbes maintains, however, that if through a feeling of false security we let the South into "power" we shall not be able to oust it under twelve years, when the mischief will be done. There is an ambiguity about the use of the word "power" here, however, which leads to confusion. We shall, if the Democrats get hold of the Presidency, perhaps not be able to get them out short of twelve years. But even if the Presidency gave them a majority in Congress, and even if the Northern section of the party was so demented as to follow the South in Congress in piling up these astounding liabilities, assuredly the next Congressional election, unless popular government at the North be a total failure, would result in returning to the House at least a large majority of members of both parties utterly hostile to all such legislation, and the Southern claims and expectations would disappear like a balloon before a gale of wind. This is true, whether it ruined the Democratic chances at the next Presidential election or not. We believe it would; but we also believe that the Southern claims would be dead and buried long before the Presidential election came. They would have perished under that popular disapproval to which the Stalwart Republicans now appeal through prophecy, but to which they could then appeal through proof.

Do we, then, advise the young voters to vote the Democratic ticket? By no means. As so many people are addressing them, we have taken the liberty of composing a few remarks to them ourselves, which will be found below, and which we take leave to say will be found to contain reasons for voting with the Republicans which are more solid and enduring than prophecies about Southern wickedness or dishonesty.

A SHORT ADDRESS TO YOUNG VOTERS.

YOU have received appeals from large numbers of Republicans to vote for the Garfield and Arthur ticket in order to prevent what is called the "Solid South" from saddling the country with an enormous addition to the public debt for the exclusive benefit of sixteen States, and from working great confusion in the finances through ignorance and indifference to the public credit. No other reason of nearly equal weight, so far as we have seen, has been given you. No inducement is held out to you in the shape of improvements in legislation or administration, in methods or in men, on the part of the Republicans, should you aid in giving the party a new lease of power. But you must remember that, although the South might like an enormous grant from the public Treasury, no money for any such purpose is in the Treasury now. It would have to be raised by loan and taxation from the whole country, by an act of Congress passed after full debate; and you know very well that there is no such love of the South among men of any party at the North as to make them willing to submit to an exaction so extraordinary that there is no precedent for it either in the history of your own country or that of any country in the world, except as the result of military conquest. Though, therefore, it is not impossible that a Democratic majority in Congress should propose such a thing, it is so improbable, according to all experience of human nature, that you would be very unwise to be influenced by it in casting your present vote. Politics is the art of dealing with near probabilities; it is only the political speculator who is called upon to provide for remote possibilities. Your concern as practical men is with the things which are likely to happen, not with those which might happen.

As regards the financial ignorance and recklessness with which the South is charged, it is no greater than, if so great as, that with which the Democratic party at the North—which, you must remember, comprises nearly, if not quite, half the Northern population—may justly be charged. These Northern Democrats are as poor as the Southern Democrats—are just as eager to get money out of the Treasury for their own benefit, and just as ignorant of, and indifferent to, sound finance. In fact, there is abundant reason for believing that the Northern division of the party is, on the whole, more dangerous to the public credit and to the currency, and has less conscious interest in the wise management of both, than the Southern division. Our good friends at the North, therefore, who ask you to single out the Southern Democrats as the principal or sole object of your distrust, are probably influenced rather by the traditions of the conflict with the South, of which you remember nothing, than by the facts of the existing situation. They tell you with much vehemence that the South is substantially the same now as it was before the war; but when you hear this, you will do well to ask: "What, then, was the use of abolishing slavery? Did the half million of men who died on both sides die in vain? Were the billions of dollars the war cost merely wasted on a fight of savages?" This question, however, you can answer for yourselves. The war was a success. Slavery was not abolished in vain. The dead did not die for nothing, and the national debt was not spent in senseless and fruitless slaughter.

But you will also say: "Since you, too, urge us to vote the Republican ticket, what difference does it make whether we vote it through fear of the South or through fear of the Democratic party in general? The motive of the voter in a political contest is of small importance if the result is satisfactory." It makes a great deal of difference, for two reasons. The first is, that the habit of regarding the inhabitants of one geographical division of his country, en masse, as evil-disposed persons, to be constantly distrusted, denounced, and voted against as public enemies, is probably the worst habit a young man can form in entering on political life. Habitual hatred and contempt, even for the people of a foreign country, are a state of mind of which every young man who seeks to be useful to his kind in our day should hasten to rid himself, even if inheritance have fastened it upon him. An attitude of hopefulness, of confidence, and of kindliness towards all, no matter of what race or antecedents, with whom he has to live under a common government, and with whom he has perforce to join in the pursuit of happiness through common political action, is the one which best befits every voter, whether young or old, in a free country. It is not unnatural that some of your elders should dislike and fear the South as long as they live, and refuse to make peace with it. But, happily for you, you do not share their passions or memories. If the generations which carried on the great wars of history had not died off, the world would never have seen as much peace as it now enjoys. All the neighboring nations of the globe would still be cutting each other's throats. Happily they give place to generations who have nothing to forgive or forget, and who can enter on the fruits of their fathers' sacrifices without bitterness or heartburning, and with a wider experience of the healing powers of Time.

The second reason is, that the concentration of your attention on the wickedness and shortcomings of the South will inevitably prevent your following the course of your own party with the wholesome criticism which is necessary to prevent even the best party from falling into bad hands and bad ways. As long as you think of the Republican party and vote for it as simply a defence against the South, all you ask of it is to keep the offices and pay election expenses out of the salaries of the office-holders. You make no call on its leaders for any attempts to improve the Government by adapting its legislation and administration to the growth of the country, or to instruct the public by intelligent discussion of the thousand new problems by which all societies like ours are every day vexed. You help to produce, in fact, total stagnation in the party mind and to convert elections into a mere trial of the comparative efficiency and unscrupulousness of "machines." You deaden your own interest and that of those who are still younger than you, and will only vote next year or the year after for the first time, in all that Government can or ought to do for the happiness and prosperity of the thirty millions of your countrymen who do not live in the South. You discourage from entering on public life every man who sees a wider sphere of activity for his party than merely standing guard over the Government, and who believes in other tests of statesmanship than implacable dislike of whole classes of his countrymen and unfailing remembrance of their faults and shortcomings.

There is, however, no lack of reasons for voting the Republican ticket at this juncture. At every election the voter's duty is to make his choice between the parties which offer themselves for his approval. If he refused to vote for any party which did not in all respects merit his approval constitutional government would soon come to an end. The Republican party and its candidates are open to many and weighty objections, but they have the enormous merit of being the best there are in the field. To young men who seek to purify politics and promote reform of all kinds the party is in many ways a most unsatisfactory instrument, judged both by its history and by the men who manage it. But then it cannot be denied that there is more likelihood of getting good out of it and through it than out of or through the Democratic party. It has a policy of some kind, and its conduct during the last twenty years enables us to ascertain what this policy is. Its candidate may not be a perfect man, but he has a career behind him which enables us to form some idea of what he will do in the future. Finally, the party contains the larger part of that portion of the American people whose opinion in the long run governs the country, manages its industry, directs its material and intellectual progress, and to which every one who wishes for purer manners and nobler laws must sooner or later appeal.

With the Democratic party it is, on the other hand, very difficult for a young man to throw in his fortunes, because he cannot find out what road it is going to travel. There is no mode of ascertaining what its principles are. It is in favor of a high tariff if that seems likely to command most votes, and a low tariff if that seems likely to command most votes. It deals with the currency question, and indeed all other questions, in similar fashion. In fact, it stands for no known political doctrine. Its candidates are equally uncertain. Since the nomination of Greeley and Hancock there is no knowing whom it may nominate. It might, in 1884, nominate Grant, or Babcock, or Senator Edmunds or Senator Hoar, or Mr. Plaisted, or Cardinal McCloskey, or Colonel Bob Ingersoll, or even Smalls or Elliott, the South Carolina thieves. There is no American citizen whose nomination for the Presidency by the Democratic party seems to be out of the question. So that there is hardly any young man, to whom it is worth while to take politics intelligently, for whom the party at present can be considered serious enough. It will be time enough to join it when it appears that it has a creed, and that there is some article in the creed for which it is prepared to suffer defeat.

ARE THE GERMAN UNIVERSITIES DECLINING?

A WRITER in the July number of Macmillan's Magazine answers this question with an emphatic affirmative. Centralization, Governmental interference, compulsory military service for students, the small pay of the younger teachers, he urges, have combined with other and minor causes to restrict the rôle which the universities formerly played in the national life and thought. These conclusions, based on observation of one of the smaller universities, do great injustice to the larger ones, of which this writer confessedly has known but little. The question is of vital importance for an increasing number of our young men.

In the first place, it is well known that many of the German universities were founded by petty principalities in a spirit of rivalry. A century ago there were nearly fifty of them. Patriotism and local pride bound teacher and student each to his own university. The corps which kept alive these sentiments have decayed or changed, and the attractions of the large centres have increased. At the smaller universities are now found impecunious students from the neighborhood, young professors in training for better places elsewhere, together with a few older men, some of whom, like Lotze at Göttingen, have made it a point of honor to decline calls to larger auditoriums. Students are sometimes allowed to serve their year in the army and to attend lectures at the same time. Hence the withdrawal of a regiment which had been stationed at Heidelberg diminished the number of students there. The professor who has but a handful of students often gives very poor lectures, and spends most of his time and energy in writing. In every case of advancement he knows that he will be judged solely by the amount and quality of his publications; hence the quantity and often the immaturity of them. One who has written little or nothing is almost never promoted. Again, the Government has in most cases transferred the authority to punish students' misdemeanors from the old university tribunal to the police or civil courts, but has left the ancient system unaltered in the larger universities. This measure deeply incensed the students, who thought it so slight a disgrace to be convicted by a Pedell that their corps badges might often be seen displayed behind the bars of the university prison-room. Why Berlin and Leipzig should retain the old system of legitimation and matriculation cards, while Giessen and Erlangen are not allowed to do so, is not clear. With inferior laboratories and libraries, with their productions often slightingly referred to or wholly ignored by professors of their own department in the larger centres, the faculties of the smaller universities can compete in no way save by lowering the requirements or the price for degrees and examinations. Even the facility with which the student can now migrate from one university to another is unfavorable for the smaller ones. For the latter the "decline" is thus evident enough, and is likely to continue with increasing centralization. They must eventually become gymnasia or real-schools, training young men either for business or for entrance into the large universities, or else cease to exist altogether. Their probable fate in this respect is not unlike that of many of our own rural or Western colleges. However much may be said, and however truly, about the advantages of a country location, it is now pretty clear that the large universities of the future will be in or near the large cities.

When restricted to the larger universities the question of decline is harder to determine. The professors, so numerous and so authoritative in legislative bodies a few decades ago at the beginning of parliamentary life in Germany, are now for the most part excluded from political and administrative affairs. The chief party leaders and journalists, with a few conspicuous exceptions, belong to no faculties. So far from the heads of departments being influenced in their policies by professors, as was common fifty years ago, in the age of the great systems of philosophy, the state now regards the universities as one of the means for the accomplishment of its ends, which they are too unpractical to be trusted to determine without guidance or even dictation. Hence no complaint is more common in university circles than that of the absoluteness of the state, which, although generally leaving the universities to manage their own affairs as of old, has not scrupled on several conspicuous occasions of late to assert its supremacy, reversing the decisions of academic senates, and even deposing professors and suppressing their works. Teachers of political or philosophical subjects who show their loyalty by zealously espousing the cause of the Government are generally promoted rapidly. At the same time academic freedom, even here, is not seriously or unwisely restricted.

Nepotism is a more real though not yet alarming danger. This occurs more often than elsewhere in the large laboratories, and usually somewhat as follows: The chief professor of a department lives in the building where he experiments and lectures. He has the power to appoint his own famulus to wash crucibles, scour up his instruments, etc. The salary for these duties is little or nothing beyond, perhaps, free tuition; and his own son, who is just beginning to hear lectures, takes the position without objection, and perhaps later even assists the father in experimenting before a lower class. After graduation he is regularly appointed assistant, and, on passing the examination of a docent, can begin to lecture, using the apparatus of the father, who leaves him one choice examination-topic after another till students of the department must hear him. We know one professor who has thus three members of his own family under him in various stages of advancement. Away from the patronage of a large laboratory, and hence throughout the academic department, this evil, though by no means unknown, is less liable to exist. The son is prone to seek to follow the occupation of the father, has the advantage of superior parental discipline, and should, of course, have the benefit of every such fair prestige.

The social attractions of a great city like Berlin seem making themselves felt unfavorably upon the younger professors there. To be introduced at court, to receive visits in the laboratory and lecture-room from members of the royal family, to be invited to conferences about the education of princes, and to receive honorary titles and medals; to be elected to active membership in various societies and administrative bodies, to superintend the construction and furnishing of hospitals and laboratories, to give popular lectures, and to be urged by publishing houses to print something, anything—premature or popular though it be—these are some of the often too seductive incidents of professorial life in Berlin. It used to be shocking enough to a German savant to be called popular, like his Paris confrères ; it is less so now. Indeed, he loves to be the first to popularize his own discovery. Yet the competition for place and preferment in the capital is so intense that even these untoward influences affect for the most part only those who feel their positions tolerably well assured. For these the fact that a reputation once made lasts longer without effort to keep it up than elsewhere only aggravates the evil, while the remuneration attached to these positions is now so ample that the old stress of necessity to eke out an income by writing is removed.

In the department of philosophy, in the technical sense, there has been an unquestioned decline. The history of philosophic thought is likely to remain one of the most popular and important university topics, but the taste for original speculation is gone. There is no metaphysics to speak of, save in the new sense which embraces the theory of the constitution of matter and the nature and laws of force. Physiological psychology has recently assumed an almost supreme position in the philosophic curriculum. The other philosophers devote themselves to the theory and history of education, Culturgeschichte, æsthetics, free-religious exposition, or else represent special past schools of thought. Of eight nominal professors of philosophy in Leipzig but two can be called very strong or influential men. For many centuries philosophy was devoted to rationally determining and exploring the foundations of religion ; it now performs the same function for science. The old idealism, which used to be the dominant influence in the universities, is gone. Since the death of Rosenkranz not a single Hegelian professor lectures in Germany. While these old systems prevailed, science—even the medical sciences, the most practical of all—was in a lower condition than in France, England, or even Italy. When, however, its doctrines began to be tested by observation, as those of Schelling and Hegel were in the old Natur-philosophie, and by experiment, as those of Kant were and still are by physiological studies of sensation, then the impulses generated by speculation began to animate scientific research. The peculiar and increasing pre-eminence of the German universities is now in the field of experimental science. Archæology, philology, history, law, etc., have had their great triumphs and have their great monuments already completed, and are doing, perhaps, as valuable work as ever ; but the cultivation of science during the past twenty years has increased far faster. Five-sixths of the many new buildings which the universities have erected during that time are for scientific work or collections. Here all talk of decline is simply preposterous. In the above interval the number of scientific instructors has more than quadrupled, and seems likely to continue to increase in the future.

In this, then, perhaps even more than in other respects and than heretofore, the universities both lead and reflect the national, and we might almost add modern, life. The severe inductive methods, the thorough departmental organization, the weekly meetings for discussion of new discoveries, and the often perfervid ardor of investigation in the scientific field have not been without stimulating influence upon the other departments. One of the grandest things about the German universities is that they are devised, unlike ours, as much for the education of the professor as for that of the student. Another is that, unlike ours, they are pure republics, with perfect academic freedom for all who can pass the required examinations to lecture upon any subject, and, with the slight political qualification mentioned above, from any standpoint. The result is that the student is brought into the close contact of the laboratory with the best professors, learns to feel through them the genial warmth with which new creations or discoveries arise in the intellectual world, and thus is saved from the danger of losing enthusiasm without gaining insight—a danger to which all young men are liable, particularly if their teachers are drill-masters, instead of being educators in the broader sense. The writer has spent more than four years in four of the principal German universities, and is convinced that in each of these latter and essential respects and upon the whole they were never so influential or so truly prosperous as to-day. May they never be less so!

ENGLISH JOURNALISM.—IX.

ENGLISH PROVINCIAL JOURNALISM.

LONDON, October, 1880.

"THE note of provincialism" is one of those phrases to which Mr. Matthew Arnold, adopting and adapting it in part from Cardinal Newman, has given a currency which is apt to become a little wearisome. Provincialism has many notes, and among them we may remark a certain lack of cultivation, a swaggering overestimate of one's self and a vulgar depreciation of other people. The larger provincial towns are almost always comparing themselves with airs of supercilious superiority to London, and their political courtiers minister to this somewhat vulgar feeling by the most assiduous flattery. That Birmingham or Manchester is the real centre of the political life of the country, and that Edinburgh is the headquarters of its literary cultivation and intelligence, are statements which Birmingham and Manchester town-councillors and Edinburgh doctors and lawyers are never tired of making. The disposition to say in so many words "I am as good as you, if not a good deal better," is a marked feature of this vulgar provincialism which characterizes much of the political and social thought of England at the present time. It arises from there being no received standard of education and ability, by comparison with which local communities and local notabilities can measure their shortcomings or find an ideal to which they ought to endeavor to raise themselves. This feature and mental habit are abundantly reflected in the provincial press, which is always vaunting its superiority to that of London. There can be no doubt that the provincial press of England is a striking example of commercial intelligence and enterprise, and that its intellectual and political level is a high one ; but in so far as it reaches a lofty standard it ceases to be provincial. The writers who maintain its intellectual respectability are derived from London, and even to a great extent reside there, furnishing the leading articles and the literary and other criticisms from the capital. In a great part of their contents the leading provincial newspapers are simply detachments of London in the provinces. The writers of their "own correspondence" show that, in contradiction to noisy professions of an opposite kind, the chief interest of men living in the great provincial towns is fixed on London. Not merely reports of the proceedings of Parliament, but the doings of what is called Society, the movements and intentions of statesmen, the plays produced or about to be produced at the theatres, the books which have just come out or are about to come out—all that London is doing, and thinking, and saying furnishes the materials of these letters. The typical London correspondent of an older generation was not a literary character of the highest class. His letters were generally made up of startling fictions, of outrageous scandals, of pretended interviews with great men, and generally of the merest lying gossip. The London correspondent of the great provincial newspapers of the present day is a being of a very different order. He is a man of education and political knowledge. He frequents the lobby of the House of Commons and the ante-rooms of public offices ; he has interviews now and then with the heads of departments, and more frequently with private secretaries and confidential clerks, and he manages in this way to pick up a good deal of information that is often interesting and sometimes valuable. Things can be said of people in London by a Manchester, or Leeds, or Edinburgh newspaper which cannot be said of the same people by a London journal. Guesses can be stated as facts without bringing upon the correspondent instant contradiction, and what is highly probable can be set forward as absolutely certain, with the chance that the adventurous journalist will not be contradicted if he should turn out to be wrong, while he will obtain immense repute of accurate and positive information if he should prove to be right. These conditions give provincial newspapers now and then an advantage as regards priority in the statement of facts, or of what it is hoped may turn out to be facts, over their London contemporaries, just as people out of society can talk with more freedom and with less likelihood of being called to account of people in society than those who are mixing in the same circles and may come face to face with the persons whose designs and future conduct they have been speculating about. The London correspondence of the better class of provincial newspapers is, therefore, always worth studying by people engaged in political affairs, whether as writers or as actors. It must be studied sceptically and with much reservation, as rather giving hints for future enquiry than as stating what is absolutely certain ; but in this point of view it has a value which it would be unfair not to acknowledge. Still, it remains a fact that what is most valuable and interesting in the provincial papers is simply an infusion of London life. They are interesting precisely in the degree in which they are not provincial except as regards the places of their publication.

In one sense it may be admitted that the provincial newspapers existing in large centres of population are a better indication of political sentiment than the London journals. When an overwhelming impulse, a passion of reform or of resistance, an absolute devotion to this or that statesman seizes hold of the public mind it is likely to be more strongly felt outside London than in it. London is the centre in which all the currents of thought and feeling mingle, and this blending makes it impossible that any one of them should acquire an absolute and overmastering ascendency over the others. It is the centre of a various cultivation in which scholarship and art, science and literature, in their various forms, the presence of men habitually concerned in the conduct of political affairs, mastering their principles and conversant with their smallest details, interpose a thousand checks and qualifications to a single overwhelming impulse. The varied opinion of the country is more accurately and delicately reflected in London than in any other place. The dominant passion of the moment, carrying away average minds, almost every one of which is exactly like every other, finds no resistance, or finds little resistance derived from the presence of variously cultivated classes and highly developed individual genius, in the larger provincial towns. Therefore it happens that the provincial press at great crises of party struggle, being carried away by local feeling, claims to have formed and directed, or, at any rate, to have interpreted it. This subjection to the dominant impulse, so far from being a credit and distinction, is rather a mark of inferiority. In proportion as the great provincial towns become real centres of varied intelligence and cultivation, instead of being mere seats of commercial activity and speculative enterprise—hives of industry, in which capital and labor are almost the only two factors of their mental and moral life—just in this proportion will the characteristic reserve and qualification of opinion, which are now made a reproach to London, show themselves there. The establishment of colleges at Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, and Newcastle, the foundation of a northern university which bears the name of the Queen, the effort to open local galleries of art, and the tendency generally to convert large provincial towns into the capitals of the districts of which they are the centres, these things will do much to deprive them and the newspapers which are their organs of their extravagantly provincial character. It will introduce into them a rational and temperate qualification of opinion, a disposition to judge men and measures upon their own merits, and to estimate the forces which are at work in society not merely by their strength but also by their worth, which mark the thought of London as it is expressed in its journals and in the tone of its society. Perhaps a compromise might with advantage be effected. London requires the infusion into it of a certain element of provincial directness and robustness; the provinces need a more ample and liberal education, and nicer powers of discernment and appreciation. When this exchange of good qualities has been effected the differences which mark the London and provincial press will gradually disappear, or will, at any rate, be less glaring than they are at present.

The great provincial newspapers do not belong solely to the towns in which they are published. Their circulation and influence extend over large areas of country, and are limited chiefly by their facilities of delivery at an early hour to the different towns with which railway communication brings Manchester and Liverpool, Birmingham and Leeds, and Newcastle into communication. Yorkshire, Lancashire, and the northern and midland counties are the battle-ground on which the great journals of Manchester, Leeds, Newcastle, and Liverpool contend for supremacy. The stations which are most easily reached from Leeds fall within the province of the Leeds Mercury; those which can be got at by an early hour from Manchester are divided between the Manchester Guardian and the Manchester Examiner. The Scotsman, of Edinburgh, not only wields paramount political authority north of the Tweed, but it makes raids south of it to contest with the Newcastle Chronicle its influence and circulation in Northumberland and Durham, Cumberland and North Yorkshire. The northern and midland districts of England are divided by the provincial newspapers of other great towns into a sort of heptarchy, octarchy, or even decarchy. The editors of these journals are men who find in local influence and authority a sufficient field for qualities which might have their legitimate field in London. The pleasures and advantages of various kinds attending a residence in the capital of England are compensated by a greater individual power, or rather by that greater recognition of individual power which accompanies the political monarchy of an ascendant provincial newspaper. The late Mr. Alexander Russel, probably the most successful and variously accomplished journalist of his time (if exception be made of the late Mr. Delane), as the editor of the Scotsman was almost the dictator of political opinion in Edinburgh and in North Britain generally. Mr. Henry Dunkley, the writer of the letters under the signature of "Verax," which discussed with a freedom and ability that roused general attention the relations of the Court to the Cabinet and to Parliament, and the influence exercised by the Crown through the Prince Consort upon the conduct of affairs, is the editor of the Manchester Examiner. Mr. Wemys Reid, the author of some interesting political sketches of living statesmen, the memorialist of Currer Bell and the Brontë family, and a frequent contributor to the magazine literature of London, brings qualities trained in metropolitan journalism to the conduct of the Leeds Mercury. Mr. Thomas MacKnight, who edits the Northern Whig, makes the large knowledge of English history and politics which is displayed in his biographies of Burke and Bolingbroke, and other writings, an instrument of much political enlightenment in the north of Ireland. These are instances which could not be indefinitely multiplied, but which do not stand alone in showing that the provincial press of the United Kingdom competes now and then with that of London in knowledge and intellectual power and influence.

Correspondence.

EX-SENATOR HOWE AND INFLATION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Senator Bayard, of Delaware, is reported to have used in his recent Tammany Hall speech language like the following:

"In 1873 the bubble burst, and then came from ruined speculators a cry for more money—more brandy to keep up the intoxication. The majorities in the Senate and House were overwhelmingly Republican, and well do I remember the countless and vigorous speeches in favor of increased paper money issues by the Government by Senator Morton, of Indiana; Mr. Ferry, of Michigan; Gen. John A. Logan, of Illinois; Senator Howe, of Wisconsin," etc.

The Nation of the 30th ult., to which a friend calls my attention, improves upon the text of Bayard's speech by the statement "that a bill actually passed both Houses, the Republicans being in the majority in both, for providing for the inflation of the currency up to $400,000,000—such Republican chiefs as Morton, Ferry, Logan, and Howe supporting it vigorously."

Now, if it were the purpose simply to burn me as a heretic for the amusement of my fellow-beings, perhaps it would be my duty to acquiesce. But when it is proposed to crucify the Republican party for my heresies, I hope it will not be deemed impertinent in me to deny the heresy.

Will you permit me, therefore, to say to the Nation, to its readers, and especially to Mr. Bayard, that I never voted for inflating the greenback currency since the war closed, and that neither Mr. Bayard nor any colleague of his struggled more persistently against "increased paper money issues by the Government" than I did. In proof of this I ask room in your columns for a few brief extracts from my utterances in the Senate.

In the morning of that protracted debate to which Senator Bayard refers, to wit, on the 18th of December, 1873, I said, when speaking of our greenback currency,

"there was once a good wholesome reason why we should have substituted paper for coin—for a metallic currency. That time passed by long ago. . . . I do hold that if this Government adds a dollar or a fragment—a square inch—to the volume of these broken promises, it will not do to call the Government a criminal, I suppose, but it will come too near the perpetration of a crime to suit me."—Cong. Record, vol. ii. part 1, p. 296.

On the 15th of January following I presented in the Senate a bill providing for the substitution of bank notes for United States notes. I argued then, and still believe, that well-regulated banks can maintain a circulation convertible into coin, while the Treasury cannot, except under unusual conditions. I then said:

"The bank note is conclusive evidence that its maker has accumulated capital exceeding its face by at least ten per cent. The Treasury note is conclusive evidence that the Government has borrowed a sum equal to its face, has spent it and has nothing to show for it. The bank note cannot be issued until the bonds of the Government have been pledged for its payment. The Treasury note is issued simply because there is nothing else to issue, and consequently nothing to pay it with. The bank note is loaned out, and the borrower himself promises to bring it or its equivalent back. The Treasury note is paid out, and the payee takes it because the statute compels him to take it, and in the forlorn hope that the Government may some time be prepared to take it back. The bank note is issued because business wants it and borrows it. The Treasury note is out because the public creditor wants payment and cannot get anything else. The bank note is a laborer and earns money for him who makes and him who borrows it. The Treasury note is a mendicant which the Government quarters upon its creditors in time of peace, simply by assuring them that when they meet a creditor they may in turn transfer the mendicant to him."—Ibid., p. 672.

On the 26th of March, when Mr. Schurz moved to make $356,000,000 the maximum of Treasury notes, and Mr. Bogy and others urged $400,000,000, I said:

"Because $382,000,000 happens to be the sum now in circulation, I propose to acquiesce in that, without saying one word as to how that amount happened to get into circulation. And, on the other hand, I shall be compelled to vote against a proposition, let it come when it will or from whom it may, to increase the sum of legal-tender notes either to $400,000,000 or to any sum above that sum which is now outstanding."—Ibid., part 3, p. 3480.

I might quote from that debate many other remarks of mine quite as much to the purpose, but these will be accepted as proof that I was not an inflationist, at least during that session of Congress. There never was a session during which the smell of inflation was found on my garments.

Long before the panic of 1873, to wit, on the 24th of January, 1870, I discussed our financial situation at considerable length. Then I enumerated our financial maladies as follows:

"We owe a large public debt. We are paying a profligate rate of interest upon it. We have no money in circulation. We have instead a circulation exclusively of paper. The business of supplying that circulation is a monopoly shared in nearly equal parts by the Government and by a limited number of privileged banking corporations. Those corporations are multiplied in one portion of the country and almost wholly denied to other large portions of it. The paper in circulation now, more than four years after the close of the war, in a time of profound peace, of quickened industry and of bountiful harvests, cannot be converted into gold save at a discount of some twenty per cent.; and in this hour of resplendent victory, when the Republic finds no foreign potentate to challenge her ability, she finds no foreign merchant to trust her integrity."

Quoting the remark of Professor Walker, that "no large national debt was ever paid or discharged except by repudiation," I replied:

"The republic may not find a precedent for the payment of her debt, but it is her high privilege to make a precedent."

I said further:

"Less than four hundred millions of this debt consists of United States notes and of fractional currency. This is all debt and all due. Yet many of our people and some of our legislators seem to labor under the strange delusion that these notes, instead of being classed with the debts of the nation, are properly to be scheduled with its assets; and so, instead of endeavoring to liquidate them as debts due, they are studious to invent some way to liquidate with them the debts which are not due."

Indeed, although I do not pretend to rank with those unutterably wise statesmen who, after the event, have always "told you so," yet I may fairly claim not to have been wholly blind to the true office of those United States notes, even at the time of their advent. When the first bill for the issue of legal-tender notes was pending in the Senate I took occasion to state my views of the whole subject. On the 12th of February, 1862, I said:

"It seems to me the Government should never issue a note of any denomination promising thereby to pay specie for it on demand."

Of this Government I said:

"Its contracts, like its records, should import absolute verity."

My advice then was to

"authorize the issue of stocks to the amount of your appropriations, less the revenue applicable to them. Authorize the exchange of those stocks for coin or Treasury notes at par. . . . Then, whoever prefers the interest on the stocks to the use of the money will invest either the coin or the notes in the stocks. But whoever needs money more than the interest of it will keep the coin or notes in circulation."

I respectfully submit that if the advice I then gave had been listened to the breed of inflationists would never have existed. And if any advice I have given at any time since had been listened to, neither Senator Bayard nor the Nation would have advertised me as an inflationist. T. O. HOWE.

ONE REPUBLICAN EMISSARY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: At a Republican meeting held at Jacksonville, Fla., last week—

"Hon. Chas. J. Noyes was then introduced as Speaker of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, one of the proudest positions in the gift of the people of that State. Mr. Noyes said:

. . . . . .

"'On one vital point Garfield and General Hancock are at variance. In Order No. 40 General Hancock says, in substance, that as against military rule the civil law shall prevail. Yet I remember his course when in Washington he upheld military rule above civil law and hung a woman—as innocent, I believe, as any man in the hall. Then the civil law, in the form of the habeas corpus, did not protect her, and he did not bring her before Judge White, but wrote with his own hands the suspension of the habeas corpus, and carried it to Andrew Johnson for his signature.'"

As the Nation suggested that leading Republican speakers should visit the South and enlighten the Southern people, we send you the above as a specimen of such enlightenment. EDITOR "MIRROR."

ANYTHING FOR A QUIET LIFE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The brief phrase above written may doubtless pass muster as a fair interpretation of the long Latin legend which surrounds the historic Indian on the coat-of-arms of Massachusetts. Another unconventional rendering of the same may be given: "He'll fight to the last gasp, if need be, but he will have peace." Twenty years ago, when the irrepressible conflict between the New-England idea and the Southern idea came to its climax, the real representative hand that took down from its crest the sword of the State and wielded it in triumphant vindication of the Massachusetts motto was the hand of William Francis Bartlett, the youngest major-general in the service when the war reached its end. He was the best contribution that it was the fortune of my State to send into the field; he was a true son of the soil if there ever was one, and if the name of any recent soldier of the old Commonwealth is destined to have a place in history that name is his. A Harvard writer has suggested that the college ought to establish a "Professorship of Patriotism" in his memory, to assure the ingenuous youth who come after him that the noble passion called public spirit has not yet vanished from the land. These and all similar honors would be well merited, for his brief life, so unreservedly given to his country, was a truly inspiring career, than which

"No grander episode doth chivalry hold,
In all its annals, back to Charlemagne."

But it was not more by his bravery in battle, by his paying with his person the penalty of patriotism, than by his magnanimity when the strife was over that Bartlett proved himself the typical fighting man—the typical Massachusetts man—of his time. He knew when he had won. He saw clearly that the Southern idea had gone down for ever before the New-England idea, and so he cried aloud for peace. He longed to enjoy the quiet life whose attainment had been his sole inspiration in fighting. He pleaded in trumpet tones for justice and generosity towards the conquered South. He had no wish to see his late adversaries crawl in the dust before him, or formally acknowledge their sins and make hypocritical professions of a repentance which as honorable men they could not be expected to feel. It was enough for him that he had carried his point—that the triumph of the North had removed for ever the one supreme obstacle in the way of a perfect and peaceful Union of all the States and sections. The remedy for lesser troubles, he sagaciously maintained, would be found by trusting to the good impulses of American human nature, to enlightened self-interest, to education, "progress," and time, which cures all things.

Now, the fact that I have read every number of the Nation which has ever been printed may fairly imply that the general drift of its opinions is pleasing to me; but nothing about the paper has ever pleased me better than the hearty way in which it has always upheld the pleadings of my Massachusetts hero for peace and harmony, and the sledge-hammer force with which, in amplification of his arguments, it has crushed out the Stalwart "cries" and pretences designed to arouse ugly passions against the South. I am somewhat surprised, therefore, that the holding of such beliefs does not drive the Nation, as it does drive me and as it unquestionably would drive General Bartlett were he in the land of the living, to accepting the suppression of the Stalwarts as the first duty which every patriotic voter now owes his country—as the essential preliminary to any substantial scheme of reform in American politics.

This idea was advanced by me four years ago, in the only political letter which I ever ventured to inflict upon you, and the Nation was at that time less definitely opposed than now to the success of the Opposition in the struggle for the Presidency. If in this present year of grace your treatment of the Stalwarts' candidate is such that the Boston Journal, their representative organ in New England, praises it as "candid," there is at least some satisfaction to us of the Opposition in seeing proof given, by the admittance to your columns of so much hostile political correspondence, that you still do possess an abundant supply of that sort of "candor" which is to the Stalwart journalist of all earthly things the most hateful. No part of the paper has of late been read by me with keener interest than the pages occupied by volunteer writers in ringing the changes on civil-service reform and the best way of starting a practicable scheme for its accomplishment. All political thought of any seriousness, all sober speculation as to the means by which the experiment of popular government on the magnificent scale attempted here in America may be prevented from becoming a dreary failure, is sure ultimately to concern this supreme need. The problem for patriots is, How to make their principle of "permanency in Government office during good behavior, without regard to political affiliations," a main question of practical politics, on one side or the other of which every practical politician will be forced squarely to array himself. The problem of the practical politician is, How longest to put off this evil day by the use of some "cry" which shall set by the ears the patriots of different sections and parties, and thereby prevent them from combining to achieve a common purpose.

In my letter of '76, explaining why many new men who had, like myself, voted both times for Grant, might be expected then to vote for Tilden, I said that the latter's election was absolutely the only thing which could put an end to the silly shriek against the Solid South; that if the shriek were successful then in winning votes it would be raised again in 1880, and in 1884, and indefinitely; and that, so long as it could be successfully raised, any talk about radical reform in governmental affairs would "belong to lunar politics," would be "visionary and fantastic." In brief, my letter was exactly such a one as I am proud to see you have printed for "* * * *" in this week's paper, though that person probably never set eyes on a single word of it. The Opposition did indeed tremendously outvote the Stalwarts in the election of '76, but it is clear enough that the latter's leaders believed that such degree of success as they anywhere attained was due to their "waving the bloody shirt" and "stirring up the rebel brigadiers." Otherwise they would not have begun the present campaign with the same devilish, and devilishly tiresome, cry. If the response that Maine made to it seemed to have driven them despairingly to the other old device of "scaring the capitalists," and the less threadbare one of "talking tariff to the workingmen," it is none the less true that the "solid" verdict of Vermont, where Vice-President Wheeler first set in motion the cry of "Destruction to the Vanquished," is accepted by them as a strong showing for the efficacy of that cry. They will raise it again in '84 if they get in their man this year, for they will certainly think it their surest stand-by—their true, winning card; and I shall think so too. A straw to strengthen this belief was blown into my face three weeks ago to-night, at Ashtabula, Ohio, where fate, in the form of a bicycle, caused me to alight a few hours in advance of the earliest train that could take me back out of the State again. To beguile the monotony of waiting, I followed the crowd into a hall where the President of Hiram College, the biographer and bosom friend of the Stalwarts' candidate, sat in a chair upon the platform and discoursed concerning the "issues of the hour." The audience was an eminently respectable and orderly one—women composing perhaps a third of it—and the speech contained more words of truth and soberness than one expects to hear issue from the mouth of a "campaign orator." The notable thing about it all was that a tolerably guarded and decent appeal to prejudice against the Solid South was the only one that secured much applause.

People's passions can indeed be played upon so much more easily than their reason can be appealed to that the men inside politics will never resort to reasoning while the easier alternative remains open to them. No argument can now reach the man who believes in the bugaboo of a Solid South, who thinks that the prosperity of Massachusetts is a nobler thing for the Union than the prosperity of South Carolina, who accounts "Solid" Alabama a more portentous political phenomenon than "Solid" Vermont. When such a one shall see the Opposition put in complete control of the Government by aid of the Solid South, he will perforce be convinced that the Solid South is a myth, and he will never be convinced until then. When the editor of the Cincinnati Commercial (who is more responsible than any one man for the shameful spectacle which America now presents of a great commercial country slipping steadily downward towards a silver standard) shrieks about "the conquered Northern people prostrating themselves with inexpressible abjectness before Old Man Secesh," there is left to those of us who believe that the United States extend below Mason and Dixon's line no other alternative than to use Old Man Secesh as a club wherewith to drive the shrieker into an appropriate asylum. When ex-President Woolsey, of Yale, who is as sincere and scholarly a man as it was ever my good fortune to meet, says: "I do not want Grant; but I would vote to give him a third term rather than a first term to any Democrat—even Bayard," he convinces me that the Opposition ought at all hazards to be put in full control of the Government.

My hereditary prejudices are not friendly to this Opposition—though the last-named member of it is the only man now left on the stage at Washington for whom I entertain any definite sentiment of personal admiration—but politics is a practical business; and when the Stalwarts try to throw discredit on two and a half millions of voters in the North by pretending that they are "ruled" by the million and a half in the Solid South who help to elect their candidate, I am bound to reply that I wish the Solid South were, for my present purpose, larger as well as "solider." There is something inexpressibly wearisome about this rant against the solid one hundred and thirty-eight "rebel" electoral votes (thirty-eight of them representing four States which never rebelled, one of the four being Kentucky, which sent more than one hundred thousand white men into the Union army), when coming from the mouths of men who brag of the larger number of electoral votes that are solid for the Stalwarts' candidate. The brazen complacency of the pot in clamoring loudly against the blackness of the kettle may once have seemed amusing for its novelty, but has now degenerated into a damnable iteration.

It has been said that the time often comes in many a man's life when his first duty is to "clear his mind of cant." If a similar time ever comes in a nation's career, that time is plainly the present time. Since 1868 neither one of the rival parties has possessed any distinctive political principles—"not a principle; they're in the show business." Each Presidential election is, so far as the chief actors are concerned, a mere sordid strife between the office-holders and the office-seekers. The former have in their favor the nine points of possession, and this gave them so great an advantage in 1876 that even when outvoted they could not be dislodged. "Good men," who take the theological view of politics, and talk about "loyalty to their party" as if it were a church, winked at the fraud because it kept the "bad men" out of power. The solidity of the sullen and impoverished South in favor of Grant a dozen years ago had no terrors to the men who now stand appalled at the solidity of the hopeful and prosperous South in favor of Grant's classmate and fellow-soldier, Hancock. The vague dread with which many perfectly sane people, who had watched calmly the gradually-decreasing premium on gold, looked forward to the time when the premium should disappear altogether and the greenback rise to par, was often compared to the fears of a man in the dark, hanging by his hands to the top of a probably lofty wall, until compelled by exhaustion to drop to the ground—six inches below. The dreaded "triumph of the Opposition" next November would really cause the country just about as serious a jar. Both branches of the national legislature have been run by the Opposition for quite a while past, and nothing very serious has happened. When they control the Executive also it is probable that "the world will continue as usual to revolve on its axletree once in twenty-four hours, subject to the Constitution of the United States." To convince the weak-kneed brethren of this simple fact would alone be worth all the cost of "a change." The rebel brigadiers who may be sent to represent us abroad will doubtless do the country just as much credit as the rebel brigadiers named Longstreet and Mosby who now represent us. The new appointments to the Supreme Court most assuredly cannot do so much to bring that tribunal into disrepute as did the appointments made by Grant to secure a reversal of its righteous decision against the Legal-tender Act.

When a party has been so long in power that it claims for itself about all the patriotism, virtue, wealth, and respectability of the community; that it pretends to have the exclusive support of the capitalists and scholars and church members; that it believes itself to be for all practical purposes "the country," it is high time for it to be put out of power. When "Boss" Tweed grew insolent enough to ask, "What are you going to do about it?" as if he really owned New York City, he had to be overthrown, even though the "boss" system could not be overthrown with him. It was at least some reform to put ourselves in the hands of a less powerful and overbearing boss. In the present case, since the Stalwarts have forced their candidate to announce publicly his adhesion to the spoils doctrine, it will be at least an act in the line of the desired reform to vote for the opposition candidate, who has made no such pledge. I agree with my Chicago friend, "A. B. M.," and with some of your other correspondents, in thinking that the proposed Publication Society should be independent not only of existing parties but of existing local reform organizations, which have never accomplished anything. I am also ready to be enrolled as a five-dollar subscriber to the publication-fund. Absurd as it may seem to those who think the fund must chiefly be used in the conversion of Democrats, I will add that, if occasion offers, many prominent Democrats will endeavor to persuade President Hancock to retain in office the present "most efficient postmaster that the city of New York has ever been blessed with." I am convinced that President Bayard in such a case would have backbone enough to do his manifest duty, and I am not without hopes that Hancock's spinal column may prove equally rigid against the pressure of the place-hunters.

In discussing Grant's qualifications as a Presidential candidate in 1868 the Nation, while giving due force to the stock objections against an army man, laid much stress upon his praiseworthy habit of quietly doing his best by the duty nearest at hand, and spoke of him in a hopeful strain which seemed reasonable enough at the time, though it has not been justified by the actual history of his administration. It seems equally reasonable now to use the same words, with similar hopefulness, in reference to Hancock. I reproduce them from memory, but if you turn back to your files I am sure you will find that I quote them truly: "He is not a perfect being. He is not a man of the Golden Age, or a knight of the great Order of the Table Round. He is not a statesman in the highest sense of the word, or perhaps in any sense of the word—has probably little store of those acquisitions which a statesman ought to have. But, unless we greatly err, he has that thing which, of all others, the times most need, and which the rising generation ought most diligently to seek after." A MASSACHUSETTS YANKEE.

WASHINGTON SQUARE, NEW YORK, October 18, 1880.

A CONUNDRUM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Was the action of the Louisiana Returning Board in 1876 in awarding the Presidency, considered historically, so morally and legally unjust as to compel a Republican who profited by it, and whose every action is influenced, as far as he is able to control them, by the highest moral principles only, to make what reparation he can by voting the Democratic electoral ticket this fall; just as he would endeavor to restore, as far as he was able to do so, any material thing which the actions of his friends by the same methods placed in his possession? D. H. V.

NEW YORK, October 25, 1880.

[In what sense did this moral Republican "profit" by Mr. Hayes's success over Mr. Tilden? If by the subsequent good government of the country, we do not see what need there is of "reparation" on his part, or what he has to "restore." Nor do we understand the sort of reparation which consists in voting for a party without reference to its probable conduct of the Government. But this opens the whole question of the relative fitness of the two parties at the present time.—ED. NATION.]

IN THE HOUSE OF ITS FRIENDS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Not all the combined eloquence, sarcasm, and ridicule with which for the past ten years "tyrant man" has opposed the admission of woman to the responsibilities of the ballot have ever dealt that struggling cause so staggering a blow as has the recent public defence of the "Ladies' Deposit Company" by one who might fairly claim to rank among the highest female intellects of our country. But, says a prominent suffragist from Cambridge, for this regrettable state of things man is responsible by reason of his persistent withholding all proper financial education from the weaker sex. A financial education is necessary, it would seem, to impress upon the female mind the consequence of suspending a supply of water from a vessel with a hole in its bottom. It is needless to say that the talented authoress in question indignantly repels this unflattering insinuation of idiocy. We know, she says, that ninety-six per cent. is no business rate of interest, and that to secure such profits we must take a corresponding risk, but man's duty is simply "to stand aside and let the women work it out." In other words, we know that we are gambling, and, as the Advertiser's raid threatens to overturn the table before my poor friend has had time to win from later depositors, I will trouble that respectable journal for its note at ninety-six per cent. As to those whose money the authoress's friends have already won, if they were simple enough to believe in the Quaker fund so much the worse for them. The presence or absence of wolves at their thresholds apparently concerns her not.

How clearly such a position as is here taken foreshadows the coming purification of the political arena, when woman shall no longer be excluded from the lists! How like cobwebs will be swept away the various sophistries by which man persuades himself that ends justify means, and is thereupon content to open his hand and shut his eyes and ask no questions and be told no lies! Neither Crédit-Mobilier dividends nor De Golyer contracts will in that day horrify an upright Democracy, while such devices as moieties and the salary grab will be remembered only to show from what depth of corruption the regenerating influence of woman in politics has raised us. If, however, such a case should arise, as the author of 'Democracy' so forcibly describes, where the country's salvation actually demands the pocketing of bribes or the counting out of bad men when they get the most votes, doubtless Mrs. Senator Ratcliffe would be equal even to that emergency. CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I should take pleasure in contributing to a Civil-Service Reform Publication Association which should be entirely dissociated from either existing political party, both in control and in name.

I should also be glad, in case Mr. D. B. Eaton would consent to rewrite and condense his valuable work on the history of this reform in England for popular use, to make a liberal donation, in conjunction with others, to have it printed in large numbers, handsomely bound in ornamental cloth of duodecimo size, and sold for twenty-five cents at retail, twenty per cent. off for five hundred or more copies, the object being to get a copy on the parlor-table of every farmer in America.—Yours respectfully, I. J. Wistar.

Philadelphia, Oct. 20, 1880.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The project of a Publication Society which shall have for its object the dissemination of sound opinions upon the great question of civil-service reform has interested many of your readers in this State. We of Virginia are peculiarly alive to the vital importance of reform in the civil service, not alone of the National Government, but of the State Government. We who have grown up since the war are heartily sick of the old methods, the spoils system, and all of those enormities which make our politics hideous and render it next to impossible for a decent man to be a candidate for office. The reform of the civil service will do more for the purification of the politics of the country than anything else. Let us, then, work for that reform, and let us bring it about as soon as possible. I will gladly contribute $5 a year to a publication society of the kind mentioned in your columns.—Very respectfully,

James Hay.

Madison C. H., Va., Oct. 21, 1880.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have read with interest the correspondence in your columns in reference to a society for civil-service reform. I should be very glad to contribute towards such a society but for the following reasons:

Many intelligent Democrats think that associations of this sort which are nominally non-partisan are generally managed as a side-show to the Republican party. In other words, the Republicans in them are very glad to get Democratic assistance when the action of such a society will help the Republican party, but refuse their aid when its action will help the Democrats. For example: President Hayes undertook to reform the New York Custom-house. He appointed a Commission which reported, after careful examination, that Collector Arthur and Mr. Cornell had been guilty of malfeasance in office in the following particulars: they had neglected their duties and turned the Custom-house into a political machine; they had increased its expenses, while its receipts diminished; they had kept over two hundred men in the employ of the Government, at an expense of $235,000 a year, who did no work except to come monthly and draw their pay; they had allowed their subordinates to take bribes; Mr. Arthur had allowed Deputy-Collector Lydecker to deliver large amounts of dutiable goods on special permits without the payment of duty, which amounted in one single instance to $55,000. All these abuses and frauds were known to Mr. Arthur, and he refused to rectify any of them. For this he was removed by the President, and the removal was approved by the Senate, the Democrats as a rule voting for it and the Republicans against it.

The Republican party in this State elected Mr. Cornell as governor. The Republican party in the United States have nominated Mr. Arthur for Vice-President. The latter was, of course, done to obtain the support of Conkling, Cameron, Logan, and that set. This nomination and Mr. Garfield's letter of acceptance surrender all the ground that President Hayes has gained. Democrats expected that Republicans interested in civil-service reform would refuse to support for the second office in the Government a man who had been convicted of these crimes. In this we are grievously disappointed.

Then take the Free-Trade issue. The Republican party in this canvass has committed itself to the maintenance of the present unjust and unequal tariff. It has distributed tracts and cards everywhere defending this, and reviling the Democrats in Congress, who have voted to revise and reduce it. It is true the Democratic party has not done all that it might on the other side. But its platform is right. Many of its speakers have supported this, and the party is now vigorously engaged in circulating revenue-reform documents to counteract those issued by the Republicans. I enclose samples. It is a mistake to say, as you have said, that no speakers on the Democratic side have discussed this question. At the first public meeting held in Chickering Hall, under the auspices of the Young Men's Democratic Club, the whole subject was fully discussed. It has been since by Mr. Hewitt in the same place, and so it has been in many parts of the country. The Free-Trade Club has been unable to supply the demand for revenue-reform documents from Democratic organizations in the West. We naturally expected aid from the free-traders in the Republican party, but this we have not received. In other words, we find practically that Republican newspapers and public men think more of the success of their party than of civil-service reform or the tariff. It will not do to say of the Democrats that they are no better. Whatever has been done during the last ten years to revise and reform the tariff has been done by the Democrats in Congress.

As for civil-service reform, no surrender could be more complete than that the Republicans have made during the present canvass. The Democrats cannot do worse. We do think that with the appointments in the hands of an Army officer of the highest character, who has spent his life in a service which is a model for reformers, we might look for some improvement.

Whenever you can show me any number of Republicans who will vote against a Republican who opposes civil-service and revenue reform, and will support a Democrat who supports such reform, I will gladly join the society that your correspondents propose. Everett P. Wheeler.

Notes.

Little, Brown & Co., Boston, have issued a popular edition in eight volumes of the works of Francis Parkman, beginning with the 'Oregon Trail' of 1847 and ending for the present with 'Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV.' There is nothing cheap about this edition except the price, the paper being quite opaque, and the binding elegant enough for any library. There is not a single volume that does not read like a novel, and every one of the histories is the highest authority on the subject of which it treats (New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.)——Lodge's translation of Winckelmann's 'History of Ancient Art,' originally published in four volumes, is now brought out in two pretty solid but not unmanageable and still handsome volumes at a reduced price (Boston: James R. Osgood & Co.) The notes are relegated to the end of each volume, but reference to and from them has not been facilitated.——A. Williams & Co., Boston, are the publishers of the 'Directory of the Charitable and Beneficent Organizations' of that city prepared by the body known as the Associated Charities. Some features of the Boston system, such as the registration of help extended to the needy, are peculiar to it; moreover, chapters like those entitled "Select List of Books and Papers on Charitable Work," "Health Hints," "Legal Suggestions," "Rules and Suggestions for Visitors of the Associated Charities," etc., commend themselves to the benevolent everywhere. The alphabetical index of Boston charities fills eighteen pages.——The October issue of the Magazine of American History is a so-called "Gates number," being given up to a history and vindication of Gates's Southern campaign, and to original unpublished documents.——Prof. Goldwin Smith's Bystander, "a monthly review of current events, Canadian and general," seems to have established itself on a firm footing, as well it may, for in the domain of politics at least it is always to be read with profit (Toronto: Hunter, Rose & Co.) The October number alludes incidentally to a fact concerning which we have never seen any precise statistics, but which every traveller's experience verifies: "American paper is now current for all but Government purposes in Canada." This, Mr. Smith adds, referring to the local "Beaverbackers," "may add to the difficulties of the Fiat men when they proceed, as they propose, to proportion the issue of their paper exactly to the wealth of this country."——A beginning of references to publications concerning Russian Nihilism is made in No. 16 of the Harvard Library Bulletin.——No. 12 of the American Art Review brings the conclusion of Mr. W. J. Linton's "History of Wood-Engraving in America," which, except for the size of page required by some of the illustrations, one might naturally expect to see eventually in book-form. In a second and final article there is a further appreciation of the uneven genius of the late Dr. William Rimmer, with a number of fac-similes from his drawings now on exhibition at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts.——The English article in the third number of the American Journal of Philology (Macmillan) discusses the introduction into our language of the words coincide and coincident. Prof. Gildersleeve's visit to England already bears fruit in a contribution by Prof. Nettleship.——Dr. Ph. J. J. Valentini has reprinted from the Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society his ingenious and, on the whole, convincing paper—"The Landa Alphabet: a Spanish fabrication."——Tide-tables for the principal ports of the Atlantic and Pacific Coasts of the United States, for 1881, have been issued as usual by the U. S. Coast and Geodetic Survey Office, Washington, at the price of twenty-five cents each. A table of tidal constants meets the needs of intermediate ports.——The American is the title of a new quarto weekly paper issued in Philadelphia, which aims to belong to the class represented by the London Spectator. In its "national" creed Protection finds a distinct place. Politically it will be Republican in sympathy, but independent.——The Salmagundi Sketch Club will open its third annual exhibition in this city at the Academy of Design on December 20, and remain open at least a fortnight. In general everything in black and white is admissible. Mr. H. P. Share, the secretary, may be addressed at 896 Broadway. ——Part 9 of Vapereau's 'Dictionnaire Universel des Contemporains' (Christern) ends with Tennyson. Omissions like those of Leslie and Fitzjames Stephen, and the antiquated character of the American selections, show how greatly international co-operation is needed in a work of this character.——A laborious work, 'Glossaire archéologique du Moyen Âge et de la Renaissance,' by M. Victor Gay, a former Government architect, will shortly begin to be put forth by the Société Bibliographique. The remarkable feature will be the illustrations of the articles, etc., defined in the glossary, from contemporaneous relics.——A writer in the September Polybiblion ascribes the maxim "Noblesse oblige" to the Duc de Lévis, giving it a date not earlier than 1807, when the first edition of that author's 'Maximes et réflexions sur différents sujets de morale et de politique' was published.——M. Sarcey's 'Comédiens et Comédiennes' is to have a German rival, 'Theatralische Carrièren: Biographien und Charakteristiken,' by Josef Lewinsky. This will contain portraits and fac-similes of twenty-five stage celebrities, including one American, Miss Minnie Hauk; two Italians, Ristori and Salvini; one Hungarian, Gerster; and two native Germans well known here, Wachtel and Lucca.

—A slip of the pen last week made us say that the new Ohio delegation would stand "15 Republicans to 20 Democrats," instead of "15 Republicans in a delegation of 20." As this would seriously affect the complexion of the next House, we hasten to correct the error while there is still time to prevent a national calamity.

—History does not, like fiction, well endure being brought out and read in monthly instalments, and perhaps in the case of Russia we have an extreme instance of the disadvantage of this mode of publication. Mr. Eugene Schuyler's "Life of Peter the Great" must, we think, hitherto have been followed with some difficulty in the successive issues of Scribner's Monthly, and it is only a mitigation of the standing drawback that in the November number he takes his hero to Western Europe, and begins the narrative of that portion of Peter's career with which the public is most familiar. That this very familiarity imposes on the writer a greater carefulness in details need hardly be pointed out. We notice, for example, a not unimportant slip in the title given to Joseph, son of the Emperor Leopold, viz., "King of Rome" instead of "King of the Romans." The third part of M. Alfred Sensier's biography of Millet maintains the interest excited at the outset, and is accompanied by a powerful interpretation of one of his paintings—we mean the frontispiece, "The Sower," engraved by Cole. Mr. Joseph B. Gilder's "Bordentown and the Bonapartes" is an exceptionally good specimen of a typical magazine article, both in text and illustrations. With Mr. De Kay's estimate of Elihu Vedder we quite agree on the whole, without being able to praise unreservedly the quality of it as art criticism. What with this article and those which recently appeared in the American Art Review, the public has had as ample materials as need be for judging of this singularly individual painter as a designer. Mr. Stedman's delicate undertaking to weigh the merits and defects of contemporary poetry is applied this month to Walt Whitman. We find in the essay nothing more acute and truthful than the conclusion that in spite of Whitman's expansiveness, his "hoarseness and coarseness," "he is the poet of a refined period, impossible in any other; . . . not a poet of the people." We must congratulate Scribner's upon the new design for its outer cover.

—The writer of "A Pivotal Point" in the November Lippincott's, describing Texas during secession, does not, perhaps, appreciate the fact that his State is now generally felt to be a large one, and therefore his paper seems a little rambling; but it is for the most part exceedingly interesting. Mr. Baker is a warm admirer of Sam Houston, it is needless to say, and though he both overdoes his eulogy here and there and, which is more curious, fails in appreciation, we think, when he ascribes to Houston's being "no longer young" his inaction in the crisis of secession, he paints an agreeable portrait of him, by the aid of various anecdotes as much as anything. Incidentally he describes an interview held, at the President's request, between Mr. Lincoln and a leading Union Texan so late as 1864, during which the former said:

"'If we held Texas, we should not only outflank the Confederacy by land but by water also'; and he developed the statement in all its details. 'Go back,' he entreated Mr. S——, 'and say to your State that if it will return to the Union the slaves will not be interfered with.'

"'But the Emancipation Proclamation has been issued,' Mr. S—— exclaimed.

"'No matter for that. We will consent to any plan for gradual emancipation the Texans will make,' replied the President; 'they may arrange for it not to go into effect for forty years to come if they will but return. We will fix it to suit them.'"

The first of two papers on "Automatism" by Dr. H. C. Wood is a popular exposition—popular in a good sense—of the unconscious acts of life and the working of the nervous system. Of two analogous articles Mr. Catlin's on "Limoges and its Porcelain" is compendious and entertaining, and Miss Young's on "The Arts of India" of the slightest claims upon any one's attention. "Adam and Eve" is not finished, though it is already issued in covers. We need mention nothing else except possibly a story by Olive Logan, with the following unique plot: The house of Mrs. Marcellus is made a centre of civilization and refinement by the elegant hospitality of its mistress, who for one evening's entertainment proposes that each guest shall relate his last love-affair. Her own is a railway adventure with a fascinating stranger who makes love to her while her daughters doze on the opposite seat, and, while very nearly winning her heart by tickling her vanity, picks her pocket of some hundreds of dollars. Of course she recounts this with the aplomb which Olive Logan understands so well how to represent.

—A weather-wise correspondent writes us from the Connecticut Valley as follows, under date of October 18:

"Yesterday (before the news of the snow-storm in Wisconsin) I remarked to a friend here that if I were ever going to prophesy I should write a letter predicting that this would be the snowiest winter, and nearly the stormiest, ever known. I differ from my more distinguished fellow-prophets in having reasons to give—viz., that this year being one of sun-spot maximum, the continents will be coldest, while the accumulated heat in the oceans, following the succession of long and warm summers, will be greatest, thus establishing a maximum of that inequality of temperature between continents and oceans which causes storms in winter, especially our Atlantic snow-storms. I should suppose that eleven or ten years ago, and also twenty-one years ago, similar conditions existed, but I have no records; and I surmise that even those years were not as remarkable as the past two. The storm of yesterday around Lake Michigan bears the same relation to that lake (as a reservoir of heat, and therefore a source of low pressure in early winter) which the New-England snow-storms bear to the Atlantic. Although rather early for the annual change of weather usually occurring in November, it is not too early, considering that this year it ought to be the earliest in the cycle of ten years; and the news of the severity of the cold proves that it may be clearly set down as such."

—The musical season at Steinway Hall was opened with a miscellaneous concert on Thursday last, which was followed by a second performance of the same character and by the same artists on Saturday. The concerts were not a success. The orchestra, extemporized for the occasion, was under the direction of a gentleman who was wanting both in experience and tact to control it. The result was that the orchestral numbers, which had been selected with good judgment and taste, were very crudely performed, and in some instances completely spoilt. This was particularly the case with the beautiful ballet music from Rubinstein's opera "Feramors." Mr. Rummel was the solo pianist on both evenings, and afforded in an extensive and ambitious selection an excellent opportunity of judging his artistic qualities. His programme included three celebrated concertos, the E flat by Beethoven, the E flat by Liszt, and the A minor by Grieg, with which he made his début in Steinway Hall just two years ago. All that has been said in praise of Mr. Rummel's many admirable qualities can be repeated: he possesses an excellent though uneven technique, and he plays with brilliancy and manly power. But he has lost none of his former defects, and his performance is still wanting in fine, intelligent phrasing and in artistic finish of touch. He showed to greatest advantage in the two works by Liszt, whose wild, rhapsodical style of writing seems to suit him best, and he was least fortunate in Schubert's beautiful "Wanderer" fantasia and in the second and third movement of the Grieg concerto, the quiet lyric character of which appears to be quite foreign to his nature. By far the most interesting performance at these two concerts was that of a young singer, Miss Schelle, who made her first appearance on this occasion. Miss Schelle has a good deal to learn, but with all the advantages of youth, beauty, and a really charming, fresh voice in her favor she has a promising career before her. Mr. Fischer played several violoncello solos in his usual style: admirable and faultless as regards technique, weak and conventional in interpretation. The opera has suffered from the all-prevailing influenza, which seems to have no regard for the artistic requirements of the public and to have overcome some of Mr. Mapleson's best singers.

—The new loan exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum owes its attractiveness mainly to the remains of the last which it still contains. The pictures have the air of having been shaken up and settled anew, so that the general look of the walls is different, but on examination one finds the best canvases familiar. Of the new ones we have remarked few that need notice. Bonnat's portrait of Mr. Johnston, the first president of the Museum trustees, is, of course, the most important of them. It is hung, temporarily it is to be hoped, disagreeably high and can only be seen in bits—in an afternoon light at all events. Like all of Bonnat's work it is impressive in many ways. It is possibly an error to suspect haste in its execution, but we may safely infer from the uncertainty of the background and the "breadth" with which part of the drapery is handled, that pictorially it has not been the object of a loving care. As a portrait it is certainly fine, and a stranger may see that it is a good likeness of some one. It is needless to say that it is firmly modelled and vigorously painted—not too subtly, perhaps, for Bonnat, but a lesson in painting to many portraitists destitute of neither talent nor training. We hazard the suggestion that the artist conceived the attitude to be national as well as characteristic, which latter it clearly has every intrinsic evidence of being. The other new canvases are mainly American. Mr. Wylie's large "Death of a Vendean Chief" shows a good deal of power in spite of such obvious defects as overcrowding, apparent disproportion, and inexplicable lighting; it looks like a prize composition by a promising pupil rather than the purely spontaneous work of a practised hand, but this is rather because its defects are inconsistent with the notion that its merits owe anything directly to maturity. Mr. Huntington's landscape is one of the best illustrations we have ever seen of the relentless criticism of unwise dimensions; if it were but as many square inches as it is square feet its meagreness might possibly be less obvious. Either some of Mr. Bunce's marines are fresh contributions or they have been badly hung heretofore; as efforts after color they are entirely worth attention and examination, and if not wholly successful they have at least the merit of aiming high. In complete contrast are twenty or thirty water-color drawings by Mr. W. T. Richards, whose combined effect is one of pallor without the crisp quality by which water-color art atones for its inherent shortcomings. They are a gift to the Museum, and their accurate draughtsmanship may possibly have a beneficial "educational influence"—a consideration which reminds us, by the way, that the trustees display a curious remissness in allowing the label "Raphael" to remain upon the frame of a particularly flagrant "old master" in the East room. The West room is given over to a collection of the works of the late Mr. Sanford Gifford, which suggest nothing to add to what we recently said of him.

—"American housewives," we read in the New York Times, "will learn with regret of the death of Lydia Maria Child"; but this is absurdly to narrow the circle of those to whose happiness Mrs. Child ministered by her life and writings. Five years before the 'Frugal Housewife' appeared (and the work is still in use at the end of half a century) Miss Francis had made her successful début almost as the first American authoress of the present century with an Indian story called 'Hobomok'; and the ripeness of her intellectual powers is shown by the familiar fact that the next year (1825), at the age of twenty-three, her Revolutionary tale, 'The Rebels,' contained a sermon ascribed to Whitefield and a speech to James Otis which were long supposed to be authentic pieces, and the latter of which is still declaimed by school-boys along with the speech on the Fourth of July which Webster put in the mouth of John Adams. Her literary activity was unchecked by her marriage, in 1828, to David Lee Child, a Boston teacher, and lawyer, and journalist of eminent abilities. Miss Francis was herself at the time a teacher and editor, having founded the Juvenile Miscellany, the first publication of the kind in the country, which she conducted for eight years. The rising generation was also indebted to her for 'The Girl's Own Book,' while 'The Mother's Book' (which went through many editions both here and in England), 'The History of the Condition of Women in Various Ages and Nations,' 'The Biographies of Good Wives,' and the cookery book already alluded to won for her the grateful attachment of her countrywomen. The rise of the anti-slavery movement gave a new turn to her thoughts as to her husband's, and she sacrificed her popularity by issuing in 1836 her 'Appeal in favor of that Class of Americans called Africans,' which was very widely circulated by the abolitionists and exerted a powerful influence. 'The Oasis' and other less literary works having the same philanthropic aim followed the 'Appeal,' and in 1841, on the founding of the American Anti-Slavery Standard in this city, Mr. and Mrs. Child were appointed to the editorial charge of the paper, and retained it for some eight years. Corresponding meanwhile with the Boston Courier, Mrs. Child formed the materials for two volumes of familiar 'Letters from New York' (1843–45), which are still among the best sources of information for the social aspects of the period which they cover. Returning to her native State (she was born in Medford, Mass.), she was occupied for many years in composing her 'History of the Progress of Religious Ideas,' in three volumes (1855). We have not room even for a list of the productions of Mrs. Child's old age, but we should not omit her interesting, if somewhat idealized, 'Life of Isaac T. Hopper,' published in 1852. Her taste for fiction was shown by her 'Romance of the Republic,' composed as late as 1867. In the John Brown excitement she had a famous correspondence with Mrs. Mason, of Virginia, who asked her the solemn question, "Do you read your Bible?" as a sufficient rebuke to her sympathy with the captive of Harper's Ferry. Mrs. Child survived her husband, leading a quiet but always cheerful life at Wayland, and lending her name and hearty sympathy to the woman-suffrage agitation. Her death on October 20 was sudden and almost painless, at the age of seventy-eight. She had no children.

—The recent address on science and culture by Prof. Huxley, delivered on the occasion of the opening of the new scientific college founded by Sir Josiah Mason at Birmingham, illustrates, perhaps more clearly than any other of his utterances, the position held by that naturalist in relation to a liberal education. The professor's departure from the orthodox principles which have hitherto guided the system of university education in Great Britain has not only elicited a good deal of comment from the English press, but also a fair amount of condemnation, the latter being due to a peculiar misconstruction of the ideas conveyed by some of the passages contained in the address. As has frequently been the case in the past, so in the present instance, the author has been credited with having said much more than he actually did say. It has come to be a received opinion among many that Huxley was an enemy of a literary education, and that he favored the exclusion of the purely literary studies from the curriculum of university instruction; but nothing could be further removed from the truth than this supposition. What he maintains is, that no culture can be said to be complete which excludes from its domain a knowledge of nature, or, in other words, scientific knowledge; and that, for the purposes of obtaining real culture, a purely literary education is no more effectual than a purely scientific education. The objection is directed against the ordinary classical training, the sine quâ non of accepted culture, which is forced upon all classes of students. The following passages will best illustrate the professor's views:

"For those who mean to make science their serious occupation; or who intend to follow the profession of medicine; or who have to enter early upon the business of life; for all these, in my opinion, classical education is a mistake; and it is for that reason that I am glad to see" mere literary education and instruction "shut out from the curriculum of Sir Josiah Mason's college, seeing that its inclusion would probably lead to the introduction of the ordinary smattering of Latin and Greek. Nevertheless, I am the last person to question the importance of genuine literary education, or to suppose that intellectual culture can be complete without it. An exclusively scientific training will bring about a mental twist as surely as an exclusively literary training. The value of the cargo does not compensate for a ship's being out of trim; and I should be very sorry to think that the Scientific College would turn out none but lopsided men."

—An excellent number of Racinet's 'Costume' (New York: Bouton), being the ninth in the series, contains twenty-five plates, and perhaps three hundred figures in gold and colors. Of the wide studies undertaken by M. Racinet none are more gravely committed to memory than his investigations into the fated follies which precipitated the Revolution in France, or, perhaps, his notes of the resolute frivolity which ensued just after. The present fascicule of his work contains two singular prints. One is after Lawreince, a Swedish artist who painted modes under Marie Antoinette, and represents the toilet of a beauty, with dressing-maids and barbers and a convenient abbé. In this period a woman received her admirers when, by her own account of the matter, she was undressed, or when her stay-pinched form was encircled by what she called a Tippoo-Saïb, by a Boston-woman, by a Czarina, or a Dutch clown—a pierrot-hollandais—these being so many styles of the caraco; or when a zebra was on her shoulders, and mules were on her feet. After the Terror, folly received a new and much harder crystallization from pride, and its latitude is solemnly perpetuated in a scarce print here copied after Martinet, the originals of which penny broadside are now rare at four hundred francs. Here the popinjay patriotism and sorrows and vanities and vices parade in happy self-esteem at Longchamps, in the epoch of 'Atala' and the 'Genius of Christianity'; the ci-devant displays his desolation in the most populous part of the crowd, proud of his English garments of exile and his in-folio wig; while the "riz-pain-sel," or soldier of the Consulate, is equally vain of his embroideries and tasselled chapeau, as he struts among the "godiches" and "gobe-mouches," all equally bent on catching the eyes of the half-dressed "inconcevables"; and the chariots, whose fashion changes monthly, roll through the Bois, clung to by cherub-faced jockeys who are dressing-maids in the morning and grooms in the afternoon. In another place M. Racinet, whose plates have already given us most of the historic kings and queens from contemporary paintings, accommodates us, out of a fourteenth-century romance, with King Arthur and Iseult, and a chevalier already wearing the knightly garter. Copies from the 'Emblemata' of Johan de Brunes, Amsterdam, 1636, show us the intimate home-life of Rembrandt's time. Another plate exhibits a gorgeous and very comfortless room of state in modern Cairo. More remote researches give us the Assyrian king from the palace of Nimrod, who wears the order of the Maltese cross on his breast; or Egyptian monarchs, whose thrones show groups of fettered captives under the seat or around the footstool, or who drink from rhytons fashioned like the heads of enslaved enemies, thus anticipating the Scandinavian skull-cup. In editing this enormous work the editor plagues himself at every point with the most scrupulous demonstration for each effigy, referring to the original authority, while the completeness of his search seems exhaustive. It is reported that the plates have long been completely ready in the storehouses of Firmin-Didot, and that it is the editor's excessive scruple alone in preparing the text which causes the somewhat dawdling appearance of the numbers. Nearly half of these, however, have now been received.

LANIER'S SCIENCE OF ENGLISH VERSE.*

THE characteristic feature of Mr. Lanier's treatise is the application of the principles and notation of music to English verse. Readers who have no previous knowledge of musical notation and construction will, in spite of the instruction volunteered by the author, labor under considerable disadvantages. The system is not altogether novel. Dr. J. H. Heinrich Schmidt, of Berlin, in an elaborate work on the rhythm and metre of the classical languages, has adopted essentially the same principles, and has also published a smaller work for schools which has been translated into English. Mr. Lanier nowhere refers to Dr. Schmidt; nor is it necessary to suppose that the former is in any way indebted to the latter. Two works starting with the same fundamental principles would often run parallel to each other, although entirely independent.

In a learned and interesting preface Mr. Lanier gives an historical sketch of the attempts to construct a theory of the technic of English verse. He thinks this sketch justifies a new attempt. His first chapter treats of sound as artistic material, and herein, it is almost needless to add, he acknowledges his indebtedness to Helmholtz. Starting with the proposition that a series of words which to the hearer have no meaning, or which may be actually without any meaning, may yet be recognized by the ear as perfect verse, he finds the essential distinction between prose and verse to be that the latter has a definite material or mechanical form, recognizable by the ear, independent of the meaning. It is necessary to what we have to say further on to limit this proposition a little. It does not follow that in all cases a person would recognize a piece of verse as such, even if read to him in the most perfect manner, in a language with which he was unacquainted. That which is manifest and pleasing to the ears of one people may be wholly unperceived by those of another.

Verse being a series of sounds "co-ordinated by the ear," according to some physical law, it becomes necessary to investigate the relations of sounds to each other. Two sounds may differ, and by the laws of nature can only differ, in one or more of four particulars. One sound may be longer or shorter than another, they may differ in "duration"; one may be louder or softer than another, they may differ in "intensity"; one may be higher or lower than another, they may differ in "pitch"; finally, two sounds may differ in what the French call timbre, the Germans Klangfarbe, and Mr. Lanier "tone-color"—that quality, namely, by which we distinguish from each other the tones of the piano, violin, the human voice, etc. We do not like the term "tone-color," but the suggestion of another would involve an argument. Of these particulars the author gives numerous and apt illustrations. As they cover all that can be said or conceived of sound, we must seek in them the foundations of a theory of verse. When a series of sounds is co-ordinated by the ear with reference to their relative duration, it gives rise, both in music and verse, to the conception of "rhythm"; when with reference to pitch, it gives rise to the conception of "tune"; when with reference to tone-color, it gives rise to the conception of "flute-tone," "violin-tone," etc., in music, and to "rhyme," "alliteration," and other physical properties, in verse. Intensity, as an elemental factor, is omitted. Mr. Lanier maintains that the ear is incapable of exactly co-ordinating sounds with reference to intensity; it perceives that one sound is more intense—i.e., louder—than another, but it has no standard and no method of measurement by which it can tell how much; we have no definite notion of what is meant when we are told one sound is twice as loud, or three times as loud, as another. All our judgments of intensity are vague and inexact; hence they cannot be the foundation of a system of verse. To this view there are many objections. Mr. Lanier says the musician can state exactly how much one sound is higher or lower than another by designating the place of both in the musical scale. But the majority of even music-loving people know nothing of the musical scale. They cannot state in any form of words whatever how much one sound is higher than another. There are any number of persons who can tune a violin with as much accuracy as Theodore Thomas and yet do not know the difference between a fifth and a fugue. The musician has no adequate method of expressing in words what is meant by his pp, p, mf, f, etc., but in any given case he can show you very exactly what he understands by these marks. The same remark applies to the execution of crescendo and diminuendo passages. So in all that relates to language there is no point on which the ear decides more instantaneously and accurately than in regard to accent. If a series of accented and unaccented syllables were arranged according to some definite law, appreciable by the ear, any violation of which, in a series pretending to be so arranged, would be immediately noticed, it would certainly be a species of verse. It might not be rhythmical in the sense in which Mr. Lanier uses the word, and which we do not wish to dispute, but it would possess all the qualities necessary to bring it under the definition of verse, and in the absence of a better word people would very likely call it rhythmical.

Having explained the fundamental principles, Mr. Lanier divides his treatise into three parts, corresponding to the three particulars, rhythm, tune, and tone-color. Part I., "On the Rhythms of English Verse," is three times as long as the other two combined. He includes under the term English verse all our poetry from the earliest Anglo-Saxon to the present time. We must limit ourselves to a consideration of the two extremes, and it will conduce to clearness to begin where he ends. It would be impossible to state in a few words Mr. Lanier's doctrine in regard to quantity, or the relative duration of syllables in English. We can only mention two points: 1st, accented syllables may be either long or short; 2d, the quantity of English syllables, although definite in any given case, is continually shifting, even in the same word, according to its connection with other words. The mere statement of these points must render it evident that long and short syllables will offer no serious obstacle to Mr. Lanier in forming whatever theory he pleases. He rejects the word foot altogether from the nomenclature of poetical science and substitutes the word bar, borrowed from the vocabulary of music. He says this change "clears away at a single stroke . . . an accumulation of errors and confusions. . . . The foot of classic metres was . . . whatever fancy might choose to make it; but as soon as it is identified with the 'bar' of music . . . it becomes a thing which can be discussed with profit, as being matter of scientific precision" (p. 150, note). For those acquainted with musical notation the word bar has undoubtedly a meaning mathematically precise. But there are advantages in having two terms. It is certainly convenient to know from the words used that bar means a certain division of the air to which a song is set, and foot a certain division of the syllables as ordinarily read. The next step in Mr. Lanier's theory is the important one. He holds that by looking over a piece of English verse the rhythm in which it is written can be discovered, and the same marks with the same meaning can be written at its commencement that the musician writes at the commencement of a strain of music, $\frac{4}{4}$, $\frac{3}{8}$, etc. The verse can then be divided into bars, and each syllable marked with its appropriate note, quarter-note, eighth-note, etc. In doing this, silences or rests are to be taken into account and marked as in music. Each bar will, as in music, occupy the same time in its delivery. It must be borne in mind that Mr. Lanier uses the word rhythm to include what the musician calls time. The musician generally means by rhythm the manner in which notes of different lengths are combined. The time of all waltzes is the same; the distinction into $\frac{3}{4}$ and $\frac{3}{8}$ is merely formal. The rhythms of waltzes are as various as the genius of composers. What the musician calls rhythm Mr. Lanier calls "primary rhythm"; what the musician calls time Mr. Lanier calls "secondary rhythm." For the general reader it will be most intelligible to retain the old term. The following lines from William Morris's "Love is Enough" are given on p. 158 with the musical notation:

> "Love is enough; tho' the world be awaning
> And the woods have no voice but the voice of complaining."

To save more detailed explanations the reader will please regard the two syllables "And the" at the beginning of the second line as equivalent to one. Mr. Lanier marks these lines as $\frac{3}{8}$ time, and divides into bars as follows, the dash representing the bar in music:

> "Love is e—nough; tho' the—world be a—waning, And the—> woods have no—voice but the—voice of com—plaining."

To each syllable he gives an eighth-note, filling out the last bar with an eighth-rest. The first syllable of each bar is accented, so that the whole corresponds exactly to eight bars of music in $\frac{3}{8}$ time. According to the system, each bar should occupy the same time in its delivery; yet we have no doubt that if the poem were read by a good reader, and we had some precise method of measuring the time occupied in the reading of each bar, almost any two successive bars would be found to present quite an appreciable difference, a difference which if observed in the ticking of a clock would give the appearance of great irregularity, and would make nonsense of a strain of music. Nevertheless the general impression would be that of $\frac{3}{8}$, or, as we should prefer, $\frac{3}{4}$ time. But we think Mr. Lanier has, perhaps unconsciously, covered up some of the weak points in his theory by his choice between two things in themselves indifferent.

We proceed to the next step in the development. He says (p. 141): "The following chapter will deal (1) with the remarkable fact of the almost exclusive prevalence of 3-rhythm ($\frac{3}{8}$ time) in English poetry from its beginning to the present time." The following lines from Longfellow's "Psalm of Life" are given with the notation (p. 174). The dashes, as before, represent bars:

"Tell me—not in—mournful—numbers—
Life is—but an—empty—dream."

These lines are marked by Mr. Lanier, in the same manner as "Love is Enough," as $\frac{3}{8}$ time. To the first syllable of each bar he gives a quarter-note, to the second an eighth-note, filling out the last bar with an eighth-rest. Both poems are marked in the same time, with the result that if the same word occurred in the two poems it would be marked and read in one way in one poem and in another way in the other. Take the word mournful. In the "Psalm of Life" the first syllable is marked with a quarter-note, the second with an eighth-note. The same word in a poem written in the measure of "Love is Enough" would be marked with two eighth-notes. In the one case the reader must make the first syllable twice as long as the second; in the other, he must make the two exactly alike. Which way is correct it is needless to discuss. Unless the utterance of the word is influenced by the sentiment a good reader will always pronounce it in the same manner. We do not believe that either in regard to rhythm or any other physical property there is one English language for prose, another for one kind of verse, still another for a second kind, and so on. We would mark "Love is Enough" in $\frac{3}{4}$ time, meaning, of course, the same thing as Mr. Lanier does by $\frac{3}{8}$ rhythm. We would mark the "Psalm of Life" in $\frac{2}{4}$ time, and then always read English in the same manner, subject, we repeat, to such variations as may be required by the sentiment and other circumstances not connected with the present question. We think the mass of English poetry is in $\frac{2}{4}$ and not in $\frac{3}{8}$ time, as Mr. Lanier maintains. We have tried over and over again all the experiments mentioned by him, besides many others, some of them very curious and interesting, and entirely independent of our own or anybody's opinions or theories, and all have led to the same result. Dr. Schmidt, in his 'Leitfaden in der Rhythmik' (p. 9), has given two lines of German verse with the notation. One line corresponds syllable for syllable with the first line of "Love is Enough." He marks it in the same manner as Mr. Lanier, only using $\frac{3}{4}$ instead of $\frac{3}{8}$ time. The other line corresponds syllable for syllable with the first line of the "Psalm of Life." He marks it in $\frac{2}{4}$ time. He arrived at the result by an entirely different method, but we are all the more confident the result is correct.

Mr. Lanier's treatment of Anglo-Saxon verse is very full. He gives twenty-five lines of the "Battle of Maldon," a poem dating from the tenth century, with the notation attached. It is the longest example in the book of the application of his system. A single direction will render what we have to say intelligible to those unacquainted with the language. Every vowel is to be pronounced, especially the e at the end of words; thus, mathelode is a word of four syllables. We give the beginning of Mr. Lanier's extract, printed as it usually is in Anglo-Saxon texts:

"Byrhtnoth mathelode,
bord hafenode,
wand wacne æsc
wordum mælde." *

Here are two couplets. In each line are two accented syllables, four in each couplet. In the first line of each couplet there must be one, and there may be two accented syllables which form an alliteration with one of the accented syllables of the second line. Not more than one accented syllable must be allowed to come between two which form an alliteration. In the above lines in the first couplet the accented syllable Byrht in the first line forms the alliteration with the accented syllable bord in the second line, and the accented syllable math comes between. In the second couplet the accented syllables wand and wac in the first line form the alliteration with the accented syllable word in the second line, and no accented syllable intervenes. Apart from details, this is all that is known directly of the structure of Anglo-Saxon verse. The number of syllables in a line appears to be limited only by the possibilities of the language. With two or three doubtful exceptions, there are no lines in the poem with less than four syllables, and we have noticed none with more than nine. But in other Anglo-Saxon poems we could show lines of eleven and twelve syllables. Any division of the lines into bars or feet must be argued into the text, not arrived at by counting. This form of verse was not peculiar to Anglo-Saxon: it was widely distributed in the related languages through the north of Europe. The Elder Edda is in the same form of verse, but it is generally more strict than the Anglo-Saxon in its adherence to form. This is especially the case in the "Völuspâ," the oldest of the poems included under the general name of Edda. Of each couplet of Anglo-Saxon verse Mr. Lanier makes one line, so that his twenty-five lines include fifty of the ordinary text. He is not alone in this, though the best scholars object to it. He marks the extract in $\frac{3}{8}$ time, and divides it into bars as follows:

"Byrhtnoth—mathelode—bord—hafenode—wand—wacne æsc—wordum—mælde."

Here we have bars or feet of one, two, three, and four syllables, and as each bar must be read so as to occupy the same time in its delivery, some syllables must be four times as long as others. In other parts of his extract there are bars containing five syllables. We give another line (couplet) from the same poem, though not contained in his extract, divided according to his system:

"Wigan to—wige tha hwile the he—wæpen—mæge."

The second bar contains seven syllables. In fact Mr. Lanier gives to some of the syllables in his extract notes twelve times as long as to others; but as this was not necessary we do not urge the point. The word bord in his first line fills a whole bar, and is consequently marked with a three-eighth note or "dotted crotchet"; the same word occurs in his twenty-first line, in both cases accented, and is marked with an eighth note—in the one case three times as long as in the other. Mr. Lanier has a good deal to say about the "swing of the rhythm." When one syllable can be made to occupy the same time as seven others, to say nothing of twelve, it does not seem difficult to give the rhythm any "swing" the theory may require. It must be admitted that if Anglo-Saxon verse is to be forced into any strictly rhythmical scheme it must be one to which all the objections apply with nearly the same force as to Mr. Lanier's. We must have syllables of all relative proportions between one to one and one to seven, or even worse. But is this necessary? Who shall say that the ear of the Anglo-Saxon and the Norseman was not both pleased and satisfied with the recurrence of the alliteration once in every four accented syllables, according to those rules which scholars have deduced from the inspection of the text, and about which there can be no doubt, because they are merely statements of facts which can be verified even by those who are unacquainted with the language? We have one more objection to Mr. Lanier's notation. Assuming the correctness of his method, we have arranged his extract in $\frac{2}{4}$ time, and it seems to our ear more in harmony with the ordinary method of reading than his arrangement in $\frac{3}{8}$ time.

Mr. Lanier's examination of English blank-verse, especially of the verse of Shakspere, is very elaborate. He devotes four pages (189 et seq.) to a single line from "Measure for Measure." In the course of the examination the line is printed six times with the accompanying notation. Four of the six times it is misprinted, fortunately not so as to interfere with his argument. There is a great deal of learning very clearly expressed, and which, to all who have not made Shaksperian criticism a special study, will be new and interesting.

Part II. treats of "The Tunes of English Verse." The principal distinction between music and speech, says Mr. Lanier, is, that while music employs only a certain number of the tones appreciable by the ear, speech employs all that fall within the range of the human voice. The semitone is the minimum of musical notation. The voice indicates and the ear takes cognizance of intervals of only the ninth part of a tone. Ordinary speech is a series of tunes, though very different from the tunes of music. He says he is engaged in making special experiments on this point, the results of which he hopes to publish hereafter. Part III., "On the Colors of English Verse," treats of rhyme, alliteration, and some other points relating to the material form of verse. It contains much sound practical advice to the makers of verse. The whole work shows extensive reading and a refined taste both in poetry and in music.

* Mr. Lanier translates very exactly as follows:

"Byrhtnoth cried to him,
brandished the buckler,
shook the slim ash (i.e., ashen spear) with words made utterance."

RECENT POETRY.*

IT is not an altogether fanciful notion, perhaps, that the conscious and systematic development of a new conception in literature or art—as well as in other domains, indeed, with which we have here nothing to do, however—is apt to prove, in the nature of things, either futile or fatal. The question is one of intuition mainly; and the idea once apprehended intuitively, it is difficult to see how it can be added to without being altered or without detriment to its completeness. All sorts of evolution are, of course, to be noticed in literary history, but the elaboration into a distinct and formulated creed of any original conception is too conscious and systematic a procedure to result happily in most instances, it seems, and it is to this, probably, that the lifelessness of "schools" is to be ascribed, their sincere flattery of imitation being conspicuously superficial variations upon the theme set by the master, which is either lost sight of or reproduced in faint reflection. Certainly we intend no reference to the effect of teaching, which is a fructifying pollen as it were, and, operating as a spiritual stimulant, produces in the pupil work that is genuine and real. An illustration of what we have in mind is furnished in what has been so much talked of for the past few years, the "modern realism" of the followers of Balzac, who have systematically developed his invention, but in whose work it is easy to see that what is not Balzac is not only not of the same species but of a different genus. And a more pertinent example still is the "school" to which Mr. Symonds belongs. The poetry of Byron, Shelley, and Keats discovered all its cognate possibilities as soon as it was written, and we may be sure that no one else will carry it any further; another equal genius will have his own to write, as others have had since then. When, therefore, Mr. Swinburne, who calls De Musset Byron's "attendant dwarf," sets out to develop Byron's poetry of passion—of passionate protest against the social police-system of the nineteenth century—into a neo-pagan cult, he loses the essence of it, its passionate sincerity, namely, and gives us something quite different. What he gives us has its own value, and a very great value, it is not to be denied, but this is lacking in his followers—his "school" one may surely say by this time—and in them we get only his development of Byron's protestantism into a distinct and positive credo which is not only not Byron but is something in its nature affected and valueless.

So far as we can see, there are few poems of the hundred in Mr. Symonds's volume to which both of these adjectives are not to be applied. He would hardly deny, we imagine, that he is of Mr. Swinburne's "school"; it is likely, rather, that he would profess his fellowship with it modestly but with pride. His diction of itself indicates as much. Of course, accentual sapphics are more or less intimately associated with Mr. Swinburne, but such lines as these have considerably more than a metrical resemblance:

> "Ringed with uncontrollable storms that threaten, > Ringed with envious shoals and a tide rebellious"; and we have "cool, lithe limbs" (also "firm limbs" and "mighty" and even "breathing limbs"), and "pallid anguish" and "passionate petals" (also "tearless" and "dusky" petals, and petals "soft as snow," and a wealth of simple petals), and "loosened hair" and "blown" hair, and "foam-fretted" and "wind-swept," and an echo of the "Hymn to Proserpine" in—

> "Through resounding pines and the roar of cataracts raging > Down black-beetled crags, where winds incessantly wrangle."

It is impossible, indeed, to keep the mind from wandering, and wondering whether Mr. Swinburne himself may not come to grief all too soon, and perhaps unjustly, through his zealous followers' illustration of the ease with which he may be copied, and unconsciously parodied as well as deliberately—which latter, of course, is notorious. But from Mr. Symonds it would be exaggeration to say he stands in imminent peril. His diction is not always penetrated with passion when it purports to be, but it is never so obviously perfunctory and mechanical, and when he is most "obscure" (to use what is here a euphemism, we suspect) he evidently fancies himself uttering pregnant significance of some sort. This is not the case with Mr. Symonds, whose mind occasionally almost seems to stop while his pen keeps on in the paces it has practised so diligently. There is hardly anything strictly "mental" in and it is surprising to find how much of this kind of thing the volume contains. One marvels at the power to keep it up in poem after poem by mere force of habit after having been persuaded that it is a pretty thing to do. Every variety of infelicitous verse, from the irredeemably bad to the merely idle, it is easy to understand the genesis of; but the affectation of dilettantism pursuing patiently what it supposes to be, somehow, in an objective way burning, throbbing, intense, is puzzling. We make bold to say it is a new thing under the sun, as illustrated by the neo-pagan poets of England at the present time.

> "White as peeled willow-wands ableach in May";

The effect of it is inexpressibly cheapening in the temptation it involves to belittle the poetry of passion, which is certainly one of the distinctions of the century. The average reader has all he can do to appreciate the poetic expression of egotism, melancholy, unrestrained ardor, reckless and law-defying sentiment, and so on, without the bias which moral reprehension of the same qualities illustrated in conduct creates. But his task is greatly complicated when he is confronted with a dilettante expression of them; the modern audience is apt to be peculiarly unable to distinguish between real coin of this kind and its counterfeit, and it naturally inclines to suspicion. The matter is not helped by the neo-paganist whose morality is either irreproachable or entirely defensible, as we make haste to say that of Mr. Symonds's verse may be for aught we can affirm to the contrary; but we feel sure that he differs from others of the "school" by dilution chiefly, and an emasculated neo-paganism has few advantages over a fierce one. Nor should it be understood that he is not something more, or rather something other, than a mechanician skilled in the use of Mr. Swinburne's rhythms and phrases, and other machinery. He is an accomplished Greek scholar, as every one has been made aware recently by his translations, and he is nearly as skilful with the classic poetical machinery; he is a man of marked cultivation in other directions, and reminds one of other poets as well as Mr. Swinburne now and then; and he has a nice ear, and a vocabulary whose apparent meagreness here and there is plainly wilful and needless. But for one illustration only of what we are considering, how he cheapens the machinery he knows so well by handling it without quick feeling or real significance, he says (p. 113):

> "But behind

and the reader who sees the figure here for the first time may be struck by it, but in the poem in which it occurs it has no relief and would leave the impression left by Mr. Symonds's own imagery, we fancy; and after it Joubert's "Notre vie est du vent tissu" is half spoiled for us.

Of course Mr. Symonds would have claimed less of our space if his verses were not a type of what the systematic development of the poetry of passion has resulted in. The transition to Mr. Edwin Arnold is an agreeable one, and we are at once outside the atmosphere of affectation. These "poems" comprise a translation of the Indian 'Song of Songs,' and, to quote from the author's preface, "such other poetical works of mine as they [his publishers] think likely to be of interest in America." There are various narratives in verse—"The Rajpoot Wife," which is further witness to Mr. Arnold's interest in Oriental subjects; "King Saladin," and others; a rendering of "Hero and Leander," from the Greek of Musæus; "The Feast of Belshazzar," the Newdigate prize poem of 1852; some verses on a text from Aldrich's 'Flower and Thorn,' entitled "Three Roses: on Adelaide Procter, on Lord Raglan, and to Florence Nightingale"; and, besides several short miscellaneous poems, a number of translations from the Greek poets. The last strike us as very well done. Without comparing them with the original it is possible to perceive that they have not unsuccessfully caught the classic spirit, the hexameter being employed to advantage to this end, and serving the purpose excellently—as perhaps it generally does when it does not fail as English—especially in the passage from the 'Odyssey.' The 'Song of Songs' is a more difficult venture. Of its merits as a translation we are unable to speak, but we may mention that it makes some attempt to follow the original metres, and in consequence displays a variety of forms which are well enough handled to testify to the translator's ingenuity and facility. The language, especially the "descriptions," will be generally found "rich," we make no doubt, but we confess to a sense of thinness in it judged as poetry. Mr. Arnold, we have said before in these columns, does not strike us as a "born poet," but he here furnishes additional evidence that he has quick sympathies and a sincere feeling for what is beautiful, and that he is an agreeable versifier. A "born poet" would not be driven by metrical exigencies to say "Sit thee adown," nor to refer to Vishnoo's neck as "thy nape"; and, in a positive way, his verse would identify form and thought more closely. But we are almost prepared to retract this after reading the little succession of couplets called 'She and He,' for all of which except the ninth and twenty-fifth it is impossible to have anything but praise to express. It is thoroughly simple, and indeed almost homely in its pathos, but no one will mistake its simplicity for "the wholly common," from which it differs by a poetical treatment whose quality of distinction is marked; its appeal to the susceptibility, which is irresistible, is not more noteworthy than its intellectual dignity.

Our debt to Mr. Longfellow and Dr. Holmes is already large enough to prevent regret that their latest volumes do not greatly increase it. Their places in poetry have been so distinctly understood and so little disputed for so many years, too, that not only is criticism superfluous, but nothing is needed by way of description of the poems before us beyond saying that they are characteristic. They are also familiar to magazine readers, having all, if we are not mistaken, been published before. It is perhaps worth noting that the natural force of neither poet gives token of abatement, but it is to be said that their earliest work was conspicuously free from that intensity of youthful fervor which burns itself out quickly, and possessed, on the other hand, the staying qualities of grace and ease in the one instance, and the wit of bonhomie in the other—qualities that mellow rather than waste with time. In a word, both books may be best called mellow.

Mr. Edward King, on the contrary, is a new hand in this field, and as a "young" poet he will not object to our predicting a career for him. His 'Echoes from the Orient' owe a good deal, doubtless, to the romantic nature of the legends they embalm, but it is to be noticed that they do much more than show a sympathetic appreciation of these—they decorate and dignify in careful and natural verse the stories and sentiments which they treat.

If our memory is to be trusted, though they have not the spirited movement and metrical vivacity of Owen Meredith's 'Songs of Servia,' inspired by the legendary lore of the same region, they have the charm of more humanity, and a pleasant flow of not unmusical lines that does its best to atone for the absence of vivid imagery and verbal subtleties. The "Sorrow of Manol" is the longest and most pretentious, and it is entirely possible to read it with interest, and we are not sure that it cannot be reread with pleasure even after the story has been learned. "An Idyl among the Rocks" is less moving, perhaps, but of greater metrical variety and burns with local patriotism. Mr. King's sympathies with oppressed nationalities are very keen, and one of the best poems in his volume is "A Woman's Execution; Paris, 1871." We must make room for the last two stanzas:

"Powder and bread
Gave out together:
Droll! to be dead
In this bright weather!

"'Jean, boy, we might Have married in June!
This the wall? Right!
Vive la Commune!'

We like this better than the sonnets on Switzerland or the "War Contrasts," sonnets which are very philo-Russian, or indeed than any of Mr. King's sonnets. "In Far Away France" has a good rhythmic movement, and the last poem of the book is pretty.

It is easy to account for the association of 'Three Friends' Fancies' here made. The authors are (or rather were, for the poems of one of them are posthumously published) evidently congenial, and it would be difficult microscopy to distinguish between them. All three, we judge from several allusions, are Southern, and the expressions of feeling anent the war and the havoc it wrought are not unpathetic. They and the rest of the poems are the more effective for being contained, and there is little or no grandiloquence to be found in the volume. A good many are of that character which the sympathetic reader would call sad, and an impersonal judgment lugubrious. Metrically they testify to a good ear if not to a wide range, and to say that they are not upon the whole important is by no means to say that they are not very good of their kind. As to that, it may perhaps be intelligibly described as the order of literary effort which it is impossible to eulogize with the warmth that the feeling engendered towards the authors of it would make very agreeable.

'Pipes of Corn' is an unpretending little volume of essays in verse, searching for a pleasant epithet for which we should hit upon "wholesome in tone." "Trowbridge and His Anchor" would make anybody laugh.

Secrets of the Great Whiskey Ring, etc. By General John McDonald, formerly Supervisor of Internal Revenue for the District comprising Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Kansas, Indian Territory, and New Mexico. (Chicago: Belford, Clarke & Co. 1880.)—It is difficult to classify this book. It was meant for a campaign document, in the confident expectation that the third term would triumph at Chicago, and that abuse of General Grant would then be in order. To save it from going to waste, it was turned into a high moral arraignment of General Garfield, which, as the author is an ex-convict, placed it at once in the bouffe category. Historically it breaks down in the attempt to implicate General Grant in the whiskey conspiracy of 1871–75. One might hastily conclude that it is worth only the paper on which it is printed; a careful perusal of it has convinced us, on the contrary, of its very considerable value for the student of American politics and for the reformer. It is almost a complete manual of the art of "poisoning the mind" of a partisan chief magistrate, illustrates the virtue of standing by one's friends "under fire," and draws in indisputable traits the picture of civil-service disorder and corruption of which Mr. Hayes's Administration has not effaced the memory, and against the recurrence of which it unhappily furnishes not the slightest guarantee beyond that of a decent precedent. Above all, it indicates the importance of tone as a qualification for the Presidency, and on this head a few words may be timely.

The intimacy between Grant and McDonald began in their army relations during the siege of Vicksburg. It does not appear how far the general was acquainted with the previous career of his subordinate, who is said to have started in life as a friendless boy on the levee at St. Louis, and subsequently to have become captain and part owner of a Mississippi steamboat; but his common origin must have been unmistakable, for in his deposition of Feb. 12, 1876, the President, when asked whether, in appointing McDonald to be Supervisor of Internal Revenue under protest, he knew that the latter "was an ignorant man, and barely able to write his name?" answered: "I was aware * that he was not an educated man, but he was a man that had seen a great deal of the world and of people; I would not call him ignorant exactly; he was illiterate." But McDonald had no need to open his mouth or to wrestle with his autograph in order to betray his essential vulgarity. Since this book was published his former chief, ex-Commissioner of Internal Revenue Douglass, who is held up to reproach in it, is said to have retorted that "the original cause of his dislike of McDonald was that he [McD.] looked and dressed like a gambler." We cannot vouch for the genuineness of this statement, but no description could better suit the portrait of the author which serves as a frontispiece. "Gambler" is the type to which he belongs, whether we think of him as passing the day in Washington playing billiards with "Bab," or as the speculator who operated in cotton below Memphis during the war and afterwards lost a fortune in bought-up war-claims through a railroad accident, or as the adventurer who laid his pipes for the Missouri supervisorship, and on the one hand directed the plunder of the revenues he was charged to collect, on the other kept the Republican machine well greased with the cheerful tributes of "crooked" distillers. Yet this fellow had ready access to the White House; was publicly "picked up on the sidewalk" by the President, and invited to drive with him (as the latter deposes, and indeed he could hardly avoid this attention if the costly equipage was McDonald's gift to the man who made him supervisor); and was allowed, while under indictment for conspiracy, to have a public interview with the President in the Lindell House (and no wonder if it be true that the latter had been formerly entertained there at McDonald's expense). McDonald's "wicked partner," Col. Joyce, who filled up the intervals of watching the approach of the Government inspectors with writing third-term and other acceptable editorials for the Republican press in Missouri, was also a welcome visitor at the White House, and rode about with the President's party at Lawrence, Kansas. His portrait, though McDonald has a weakness for photograph albums, is not given; but Babcock's is, and so is that of "Sylph," the woman of the town whom Joyce is said to have introduced to the smitten Babcock in St. Louis, and whose sobriquet furnished the latter with an alias in his "crooked" telegrams. For that matter, everybody in this precious circle indulged in aliases, not excepting Krum, Babcock's counsel on his trial, though Babcock, having a pleasant fancy, was more prolific of them than the rest. In short, this narrative, however calculated and insincere in its main object, is unconsciously pervaded by the atmosphere of the bar-room and the brothel, and it seems incredible that President Grant should have come in contact with it without detecting and without repelling it. We know, however, that the Visiting Statesmen breathed freely in the company of Madison Wells and his associates, and that Attorney-General Chamberlain enjoyed the fellowship of Scott and Parker without a suspicion as to their true character. In all these cases we may infer not so much simplicity of mind as self-sacrificing concession to the exigencies of party—

"Ahi fiera compagnia! ma nella chiesa
Co' santi, ed in taverna co' ghiottoni."

At the outset McDonald's appointment was urged on the ground that "it will add strength to the party here [in Missouri]," and his reappointment on the ground that "his large acquaintance in this State renders him especially valuable to the Republican party as a powerful adherent for the coming campaign [of 1872]." It sufficed, in order to get Secretary Bristow's order transferring supervisors from one district to another suspended by the President, for McDonald to telegraph: "Don't like the order; it will damage the Government and injure the Administration."

Quisisana. Novelle von Friedrich Spielhagen. (Leipzig: L. Staackman. 1880.)—In 'Quisisana' (the name of an inn at Capri, meaning "here one is healed"), as in all his earlier novels, Spielhagen reflects the century, and more especially the last decade of it, as observed from a German point of view, in a miniature mirror, and touches incidentally upon the problems of the age in a manner which reveals a clear and comprehensive insight. The hero, Bertram, is a man of wealth, a scholar of high attainments, and a liberal politician. He is, however, approaching middle age, has been jilted in his youth by a heartless coquette for nobler game, and has accepted celibacy with melancholy resignation. His health is also in a precarious condition, and his physician recommends him leisure and the rural quiet which the country-seat of a wealthy friend is supposed to afford. Bertram, having frequently been urged to accept Otto's hospitality, accordingly betakes himself to the latter's castle near the village of Rinstedt, and has there the misfortune to fall in love with his host's beautiful daughter Erna, who, to judge by superficial symptoms, returns his affection. To complicate the situation still further, his former fiancée, Fräulein von Aschhof, by the special contrivance of the hostess, appears upon the stage and manifests her readiness to renew their interrupted relations. A second aspirant for Fräulein Erna's hand, the Baron von Lotter-Vippach, is, for the moment, conspicuously favored by the mother, Frau Hildegard, who, as a piece of characterization, is the most vivid and admirably conceived personality in the book. The baron, however, as might have been anticipated by any one who knows Spielhagen's inveterate hatred of the nobility, turns out to be a gambler, whose honor has been hopelessly compromised by his transactions in past years during a journey in Italy. Nemesis, in this case, assumes the shape of a Russian princess whose mother the baron had cheated with an insolent frankness which almost challenged admiration.

* On p. 259 this reads: "I was not aware," which is plainly a typographic error.

While proofs of his identity with the unscrupulous gambler are accumulating, the baron helps to unmask himself by his fresh performances at the gaming-table during a festival given in honor of the officers of an army corps which is encamped in the neighborhood, and his qualifications as a son-in-law begin to be questioned even by the shallow and snobbish Frau Hildegard. Otto, in the meanwhile, in consequence of his wife's extravagance and tuft-hunting, has become financially embarrassed, and is saved from ruin only by Bertram's timely intervention. The rescuer is, however, too generous to avail himself of his friend's impulsive offer of Erna's hand. Learning in an ingenious and roundabout way that her heart has once been bestowed upon a young lieutenant, Kurt Ringberg, with whom she has recently quarrelled, he sets himself to the task of reconciling the estranged lovers. In this labor, it is needless to say, he encounters no insurmountable difficulties, and when all the other parties to the affair, such as fathers, mothers, and friends, have been persuaded of its desirableness, Kurt and Erna depart to spend their honeymoon at Capri, in the inn Quisisana, which, since the days of his Italian sojourn, had always been a hallowed spot in Bertram's memory. He too had hoped to go there to be healed of his incurable complaint. The story ends with his death, and the title gains a new significance as the physician lays his hand upon the silent heart, whispering "Qui si sana."

As we have hinted, the chief excellence of the novel is not to be found in the complication of incidents which we have above recorded, but rather in its subtle atmosphere of German life, in its extremely modern and wide-awake spirit, and in the completeness of its portrayal of the society with which it professes to deal.

The True Story of the Exodus of Israel; together with a Brief View of the History of Monumental Egypt, compiled from the work of Dr. Henry Brugsch-Bey. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by Francis H. Underwood. (Boston: Lee & Shepard. 1880.)—This is a readable and, in the absence of more independent popular works on the subject, a useful compilation; but it is rather strangely executed. The 'True Story' is, in fact, only the concluding portion of the book, and a translation of Brugsch's 'L'Exode et les Monuments Égyptiens (1875)'; and the 'Brief View' forms "the body of this work," as we are finally told in the "Notes." This, we are there further told, "was written in German"—that is, it was compiled from Brugsch's 'Geschichte Aegypten's unter den Pharaonen' (1877)—"and the concluding Memoir in French," as we have stated. "The translation," the note continues, "was begun by the late Henry Danby Seymour, F.R.G.S., and was completed by Philip Smith, B.A."; which evidently refers to both "the body" and "the Memoir," though the former is not a translation but a compilation. We have notes by Brugsch, by Philip Smith, and by the American editor; but what chiefly renders the whole very strange is the circumstance that the reader of the book—with the exception of the twelfth and last chapter, which contains the translated "Memoir" on the exodus—never knows whether it is Brugsch or one of his compilers who speaks; for Brugsch is by turns, and without a mark of quotation or the least indication of a transition, introduced in the first and in the third person—thus, "It is a well-known fact, of which that immortal master of science, Alexander von Humboldt, personally assured me" (p. 157), or thus, "This portion of Egyptian history was first made known to the world through the discoveries of Dr. Brugsch." We can, however, tell our readers that the famous German Egyptologist is, in the main—that is to say, as far as the sentences are correctly rendered and he is not personally mentioned—responsible for the contents of all the twelve chapters of the book, including statements savoring of the most extravagant admiration of ancient Egypt on one side, and of apparently unbounded reverence for the Old Testament on the other—though the Old Testament itself abominates Egypt ten times more than it admires it.

This is not the place to pass judgment on Brugsch's original theory of the history of the exodus, or on his other attempts at harmonizing the Scripture narratives with the evidences of the monuments—or rather, at sustaining the former against the contradictory silence of the latter—but we may call attention to the spirit, so unusual among German scientific explorers, in which his work of harmonization runs its course. On page 231 we read: "A happy chance—rather let us say, Divine Providence—has preserved, in one of the papyri of the British Museum, the most precious memorial of the epoch contemporary with the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt"; and on page 238, after an explanation which substitutes for the Biblical story of the passage of the Yam Sūph—which to Brugsch is not the Red Sea, just in that narrative—a march between the Mediterranean Sea and the Sirbonis Lake, during which "a great wave," from the Mediterranean, "took by surprise the Egyptian cavalry and the captains of the war-chariots, who pursued the Hebrews," we find this: "True, the miracle then ceases to be a miracle; but, let us avow it with full sincerity, the Providence of God still maintains its place and authority." To this Philip Smith demurs in a note, stating, "Dr. Brugsch has here made a perfectly gratuitous concession, and fallen into the common error of confounding a miracle with a special providence." To this note Mr. Underwood attaches another, saying, "The important fact is that the destruction of the Egyptian host is shown to have been brought about by the operation of natural forces. This being established, it does not matter whether theologians call it a miracle, or an instance of divine interposition." We too think that the theological view is secondary in importance to the critical "establishment" of the fact. Mr. Underwood believes Brugsch has established it, and he proclaims his results as "The True Story of the Exodus"; but Mr. Underwood's knowledge of ancient Egyptian things may not be sounder than his knowledge of the history of the living Egyptologist, of whom he says, "The author, under the patronage of the Egyptian government, spent thirty years in exploration," etc. The facts in this matter are that Brugsch visited Egypt for the first time in 1853, that he was afterwards successively director of the Berlin Egyptological Museum, historiographer of the Prussian embassy to Persia, Prussian ambassador there, consul at Cairo, and professor at Göttingen, and that his explorations "under the patronage of the Egyptian government" began in 1870. Somebody else may be responsible for such slips as speaking of the Nile flowing "up to the shore of the Mediterranean Sea" (p. 30), or of the "sixty sons and fifty-nine daughters" of Rameses II. (p. 170), and again of his "59 sons and 60 daughters" (p. 181). We could point out more inadvertences, but we refrain, remembering—and repeating—our general recommendation of the book.

History of the Waldenses. By the Rev. J. A. Wylie, LL.D., author of 'The Papacy,' 'Daybreak in Spain,' etc. Illustrated. (London and New York: Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co. 1880.)—Mr. Wylie's 'History of the Waldenses' is not an independent work, but a reprint of the sixteenth book of the author's 'History of Protestantism.' Certainly the interest and importance of the subject warrant the separate publication of this portion; and the story is so full of graphic and pathetic incidents that even a less skilful writer could not fail to make an interesting book out of it. Mr. Wylie certainly has the gift of easy and interesting narration, and displays a hearty sympathy with the heroic people whom he describes. Beyond this we can hardly commend him as an historian. His book is full of repetitions, omissions, and inaccuracies, and wholly fails to present a clear and connected history of the people. To take one illustration of the slipshod manner in which the book is made up: the Waldensian valleys are described on pages 5 to 7, and it is stated that these valleys are seven in number, although there were formerly others. Then the three valleys of Lucerna, Angrogna, and Rora are described, but the reader is left to guess at the other four. Other authorities give these three as the present seat of the Waldenses, and we cannot make out from this book that there are any others. On page 26 the valley of Pragelas is mentioned as the seat of a persecution in 1400, and we are nowhere told when this valley was lost to the community; but in 1689 (p. 195) it is spoken of as a French valley, and hostile to the Waldenses. We note a few other inaccuracies. It is said of the invading French regiments in 1655 (p. 139) that their "thirst for blood the Huguenot wars had not been able to slake"; but the Huguenot wars were in the previous century—even those of Richelieu, which were not religious wars, were nearly a generation earlier. By a like anachronism (p. 30) the Albigensian heresy is described in 1488 as "recovering somewhat its terrible excision by Innocent III."—which occurred two hundred and fifty years earlier. Again, the peace granted in 1489 (p. 50) was not the work of Charles II., but of Charles I. Charles II. came to the throne the next year, aged nine months. The statement in a note that "Leger and Gille say that it was Philip VII." must rest upon a mistranslation, for there never was a Philip VII. of Savoy; the prince who succeeded Charles II. in 1496 was Philip of Bugey, seventh duke. When the duchess Christina, wife of Victor Amadeus I., is said (p. 133) to have been granddaughter of Catherine de Médicis, the author must have confounded Henry IV. (father of Christina) with Henry III.; or did he mean that Mary de Médicis was daughter of Catherine?

There is a good map (not, however, containing all the names in the body of the work) and a number of illustrations, most of them good, but some quite inappropriate, and several of them not placed where they would best illustrate the text. With all its defects, the book is a welcome and timely one. In these easy-going days it is as well that we should be reminded once in a while of the horrible crimes which have been committed in the name of religion.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1880.

The Week.

TUESDAY'S election, so far as the result is known at the present writing, gives General Garfield 219 electoral votes and General Hancock the remaining 150, a majority sufficiently decisive, of course, to remove any anxiety about the official count. This estimate gives Hancock, besides the 138 votes of the Southern States, the 9 of New Jersey and the 3 of Nevada. With these exceptions the line is exactly drawn between North and South, and Nevada is not yet conceded by the Republicans. In New Jersey, too, the Democratic majority is but a fraction of that in 1876, and the Republicans claim the Governor and State ticket, and undoubtedly have a substantial legislative majority on joint ballot. New York is the surprise of the day, the Republican majority being about 25,000, apparently, and due not to the State so much as to Democratic losses in this and in Kings County, Hancock's majority in them being some 20,000 below Tilden's. The majority in Ohio is largely increased over that of October. Indiana remains about the same, and Maine has been "redeemed." New Hampshire was comparatively close, and for a time Oregon was doubtful. The Democratic majority in Delaware was but 1,000 odd. In Virginia the Readjusters are badly beaten, and have either lost their negro allies or "traded" Hancock for Congressmen. In Tennessee, where the situation was somewhat similar, a Republican governor is probably elected; and the Hancock electoral ticket seems to have had a close shave in North Carolina. The estimates for the next Congress are various. The Republicans certainly have the House, however, and gain Senators from Indiana, New Jersey, Connecticut, New York, and Pennsylvania; if they retain the disputed seat from Nevada they will, with General Arthur's vote, have a majority, though at present Fair seems to have the best chance. The defeat of Mr. Chittenden, in Brooklyn, is noteworthy and a misfortune. Mr. Hewitt has a very large, and Mr. Morton a sufficient, majority in the Tenth and Eleventh New York districts respectively. Grace is elected mayor of New York, but by a significantly small margin, and Truax is defeated for Justice of the Superior Court.

The result is, apart from its effect on the policy of the Government, gratifying in several ways. It promises to make the White House, during the next four years, as during the past four, the resort of good company—that is, of reputable and intelligent men—and to keep it clear of the class to which the Shepherds, Macdonalds, Joyces, Babcocks, and the like belonged. It proves, too, that there is no need of "a strong man" at the head of the Government, and that a well-equipped lawyer can carry as many States as are necessary to give him the Presidency without dispute, and that the best way of preventing the Democrats from making a fraudulent count is to put up a man who will get large majorities, and not a man who will make a close run and then offer to fight anybody who doubts his election. We see our esteemed and sorrowful and greatly-mistaken contemporary, the World, thinks Garfield in 1880 means Grant in 1884. General Garfield's election certainly means nothing of the kind. Whether his Administration will prepare the way for Grant in 1884 depends very much on the part the select body known as "the Grant crowd" plays in it. If it should be a pure and efficient Administration, and receive as such the steady support of "the crowd" in question, and they should successfully conceal their natural propensities for four years, it would undoubtedly strengthen them greatly, for the country is very indulgent and oblivious towards them. Should they dominate the Administration, however, with such ease as to make self-restraint and disguise seem unnecessary, the country will be just as sick of them in 1884 as it was in 1876 and 1880, and will show it in the same way. If General Garfield will consider carefully the causes of the Republican defeats between 1870 and 1876, and Tilden's Northern successes in the latter year, and the causes of Republican recovery since then, we are sure he will leave us no cause for anxiety about the nomination of 1884.

Mr. Grace's election, together with that of the Democratic aldermen, probably makes a Catholic majority in the Board of Apportionment, which distributes the School Fund. That this will lead to an attempt to divert a portion of it to sectarian schools is, of course, not certain, but it seems very probable. Mr. Grace, in his letter of acceptance, praised the common-school system; but what he said is quite consistent with his thinking the Catholics ought to have a share of the money for common schools managed in their own way. That Kelly thinks so there can be no doubt; for Kelly is a pious Catholic, and on the question whether Catholics should use public money, if they can get it, for Catholic schools the Church has never in any country exhibited the slightest wavering. She has compromised on most other questions of a politico-religious kind, but never on this. In fact, we are willing to stake our very slender reputation as theologians on the assertion that if Mr. Grace as Mayor has discretion in the disposition of the school fund, and fails to give the Catholics a share, he will commit a sin. The canvass was conducted by Kelly in a shocking way for a pious man. He filled his paper, the Express, with filthy stories about the editor of the Herald, to punish him for opposing his candidate, and disgusted a long-suffering community to such a degree that Grace's natural majority of about 40,000 was cut down to 4,000 or less. This indicates that he lost about 35,000 Democratic votes, probably owing to the extraordinary ruffianism of his political and religious patron.

President Hayes's absence on a pleasure-tour during the heat and fury of the canvass has excited some comment, and on the part of certain politicians some ire; but it is undoubtedly one of the many pieces of good example he has set. It presents a most agreeable contrast to the position of the Administration in 1876, when the Secretary of the Interior was chairman of a party committee, and was busy "fighting the devil with fire," and the President was backing up the Southern carpet-baggers with "troops" and snapping his fingers at the State courts, and generally seeing to it that the wicked Democrats got the worst of it. The fact is, that now that our elections are getting to be very close, and that disputed counts are becoming common, it is very desirable that both the chief executive officer of the Government and his legal adviser, the Attorney-General, should keep out of the fray, so that, if there should be a quarrel over the returns, they can exert whatever authority in the matter constitutionally belongs to them rather as bystanders than as participants.

The solid business men have held several meetings in Wall Street during the week, but the Republican rally Thursday was undoubtedly the most imposing as well as of the most unquestioned commercial character. The orator of the day was Col. Ingersoll, who made a most effective speech after his kind. The fitness of his selection to address the sober-minded and serious contingent has been criticised in Democratic quarters with customary flippancy, we observe; but it is plain, of course, that it is not such persons who need conversion to sound principles, and that the Colonel is admirably adapted to cheer and animate those who are already with him. A more noteworthy consideration is, perhaps, the toleration shown by pillars of society for his abandoned theological views, or possibly we should say the overlooking of these on account of his eminent services. We should not have to go back very many years to find a state of feeling far more alive to the interests of theology than to the success of political parties, and insisting on the close connection between the two. As it is, only the World is sensitive enough on this score to display the intolerance indicated in its remark that "the only financier who addressed the otherwise highly respectable, if not very intelligent, Garfield business meeting in Wall Street yesterday was Col. Bob Ingersoll." This is the cynicism of Bourbon orthodoxy. Mr. Beecher, we notice, does not feel in this way, and endorses Ingersoll, for the campaign only perhaps, but cordially. In a letter to the Hon. "Al." Daggett, accepting an invitation to preside at an Ingersoll meeting, he draws the clear distinction between occasions like the present and ordinary occasions. This is no time, he says, to ask idle questions about a man's creed. "If it would promote the cause, I would preside at twenty meetings with twenty Robert Ingersolls to speak," he assures the ex-sheriff, and concludes: "Do what you think best about it, and I will be obedient." Accordingly, the two spoke together in Brooklyn Friday night, but whether they will be in such close sympathy again until the next Presidential canvass it is a delicate matter to predict.

The judicial enquiry into the genuineness of the so-called "Chinese letter" of General Garfield to "H. L. Morey" has occupied the week past without being concluded, so far as the guilt of the person accused of concocting it is concerned; but the production of the letter and its envelope in court betrayed at once the tampering to which the latter had been subjected, and settled the character of this disgraceful political manœuvre. The alleged forger is an English Bohemian who writes for the "story-papers," and who confessedly wrote the editorial articles defending the genuineness of the letter in the underground journal which first published it. No account has been offered of the source from which the precious document was obtained, nor any explanation of "Morey's" inaccessibility; while the most respectable testimony has been given to show that he is a myth, along with the "Employers' Union" of Lynn. The extensive use made of the forgery has, perhaps, justified the Republican managers in attaching so much importance to its disproof in addition to General Garfield's repudiation of it; but it was highly unfortunate that the last hours of a canvass not remarkable for the clash of principles should be taken up with so contemptible an incident. Moreover, the cunning of the parties implicated enabled them to entrap Mr. Jewell, who very unwisely sought to get a retraction from them, into actually bespeaking of Mr. Garfield a political reward for the lawyer who served as the medium of communication, and was made to appear to have been successful in his mission.

Mr. John M. Forbes, whose address to young voters we noticed last week, says in it that "there is a division among the Republican party as to the use by the Administration of the money and services of office-holders," while there is no such division among the Democrats. It would, perhaps, be more correct to say that the proportion of Republicans opposed to such use is greater than the proportion of Democrats, because there are undoubtedly a large number of the best Democrats opposed to it. But when Mr. Forbes goes on to say that only "a certain small use of both" has been made by the Republicans in this campaign, we are sure he greatly underestimates. We believe as much use has been made of both as the Democrats could or would make were they in power. As much money certainly has been asked of the office-holders, whose salaries Mr. Forbes estimates at $24,000,000 in the aggregate. If they paid what they have been asked for, it has fully equalled in amount their direct taxation, both State and Federal. We have seen a printed circular demanding $17 from a poor letter-carrier, whose salary was only $800, and another since the Indiana election demanding one per cent. of salary from everybody. We do not believe the managers have got nearly as much money as they demanded, however, because one result of Mr. Hayes's attempt at reform has been to infuse a little courage into the poor clerks. It is a shameful business throughout. The recognition it involves that the revenue belongs to one party, and that the income of the Government employees, which is unquestionably the property of poor and hardworked men, is taxable by party committees at discretion, is a national disgrace—a disgrace to our politics, our morals, and our religion, and a greater disgrace to the Republicans, for obvious reasons, than it would be to the Democrats.

Mr. Forbes complains that we did him injustice in our remarks on his letter last week in ascribing to him the opinion that the Treasury would be used, in case the South got into power, "in a thousand ways" for the exclusive benefit of the Southern States. Mr. Forbes's exact words were (we did not profess to quote him textually): "There are a thousand ways in which the Treasury can be used for their [the Southern States'] benefit, after throwing out of account the danger of vexatious and unjust taxes." The construction we put on this was that Mr. Forbes did not mean partial taxation; he must have meant direct votes of money to be spent in some way at the South, or, in other words, roughly speaking, for the exclusive benefit of the South, although, of course, strictly speaking, what benefits one part of the country in some degree benefits all parts of the country. But if money spent in the South benefited other parts of the country much or directly, the advent of the South to power would not on this score be at all dangerous. If, on the other hand, it only benefited the North slightly or indirectly, as it would benefit Canada or England, it seems hardly too strong to describe the benefit to the South as exclusive benefit. But Mr. Forbes explains that he meant simply to express his belief that "the Southern oligarchy would get more than their share of the public-improvement fund, and, what is worse, would throw their weight in favor of a system of public improvements by the nation [which he considers a dangerous and injudicious system], and thus involve us in large national expenditure everywhere, of which the South, needing outside help, would get more than its share, while paying less than its share of the taxes." To this we reply, first, that the West and every part of the country in which capital is scarce do this very thing. Every Congressman tries to get money out of the Treasury every year for his "deestrict," without the least reference to its share of the taxes. Secondly, that we do not see how Mr. Forbes reconciles the doctrine that the National Government should in making improvements take into account the amount of revenue collected at the locus in quo with the doctrine that this is a National Government. There is in this, it seems to us, a strong flavor of State sovereignty. A nation measures the public bounty by the needs of localities, and not by the amount it gets out of them. If this is a nation, the poverty of the South constitutes the strongest possible claim for assistance. If a confederacy, grants ought only to be made in proportion to receipts.

Mr. Edward Atkinson, of Boston, made a speech at Atlanta, Ga., a fortnight ago, in the Senate chamber, the most prominent State officials being present. After giving the audience a most dismal and plain-spoken sketch of their own condition under slavery, he said, among other things, that his own observations told him that "the progress of the colored people of the Atlantic States is one of the marvels of economic history." This, however, cannot be true, if we are to believe Mr. Sherman's and Mr. Dawes's account of the negro in those States, neither of whom, it must be admitted, has made any observations on the matter at all. Mr. Atkinson also put in a good or a bad word for the carpet-baggers by alleging that the majority of the white men in the carpet-bag legislatures which piled up the large State debts after the war, were natives. This, however, is not saying much for them, for, if we remember rightly, there were at one time only six whites in the South Carolina Legislature. The worst carpet-baggers were not in the legislatures, but devoted themselves to "manipulating," "mind-poisoning," and bond-peddling outside. Mr. Atkinson, whose address was mainly devoted to the methods of cotton culture and manufacture, also enforced in some very vigorous language the necessity to material prosperity of letting every man who came amongst them say his say without let or hindrance, and invited them, if they wanted to "jaw back," to come up to New England and "search out its weak places." The hardened and diabolical crowd, instead of precipitating themselves on the speaker with pistols and bludgeons, according to their nature as described by "staff correspondents," only laughed and cheered. He told a good story of an old colored man at Columbia, S. C., who accounted for the overthrow of the Chamberlain Government by saying that the reason was "dat you can't put ig'nance ober intelligence and make it stay."

The Times has not learned caution since its hasty adoption, through its Washington correspondent, of Marshal Fitzsimmons's account of the cause of his "persecution" in Georgia. On Saturday it devoted the better part of a column to a despatch from the same quarter on behalf of "a persecuted freedman," by name Samuel Perry, who a year ago was a prominent leader in the negro exodus from North Carolina to Indiana. Extradition papers were served on Perry last week in the District to answer a charge of forging a school certificate in his native State, and Judge Cartter declined to go behind them, after ascertaining their regularity. Perry was accordingly remanded, but Judge Wylie here interposed by a writ of habeas corpus, and the case comes up for decision to-morrow. In the meantime the attempt to excite Northern sympathy is made by alleging that the real object of the "kidnapping" is to punish Perry for his part in the exodus, and the Times lends its columns for that purpose, as well, perhaps, as for campaign effect. Now, it clearly appeared from the testimony last winter before the Voorhees Committee that Perry, with one or two associates, "'worked up' the emigration" (we quote the Times's report of January 25) on business principles, receiving a drawback of one dollar per adult passenger over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and fifty cents for each child or half-fare, and that his choice of Indiana over Kansas, the original destination, was determined by the profits of this arrangement. He admitted on the stand that the circulars which he distributed were extravagant, and he gave the impression of being entirely open to mercenary motives. It was shown that he had suddenly left North Carolina in October on account of this charge of forgery, and he has stayed away ever since. In short, there is no reason for suspecting that he is the object of persecution, or for proclaiming in advance of his trial that he is innocent of the alleged offence.

The three weeks' session of the Episcopal General Convention in this city was remarkable for the complete disappearance of the vexed questions of ritual, liturgy, and doctrine that have agitated the discussions of its recent predecessors. The High-Church faction made no trouble, being probably perfectly content to be let alone, and the tenacity with which it clings to its beliefs and practices has become so notorious that the other parties have undoubtedly come to the conclusion that there is nothing to be gained by stirring it up. The Low-Churchmen as such had very little to say, and since the secession of the "Cheneyites" it is perhaps noticeable that they have not. The withdrawal of the Reformers, indeed, may be said to have had an ameliorating effect in several ways upon the general body. Their success, except in attaining the rewards of conscience, has not been brilliant enough to attract large accessions from the Low-Church party, and yet it has probably made ecclesiastical trials such as that of the Rev. Dr. Tyng, jr., more unlikely than ever. It is clear that the councils of the Church are dominated now mainly by those who call themselves "conservative churchmen," and by those who sympathize nearly with the English Broad-Church spirit, the number of whom is evidently increasing every year. As to liturgy, the changes proposed in the Convention were very mild compared with the dogmatic changes formerly discussed; they concerned modifying the Lectionary, adding a phrase to the Litany, and a petition for extempore prayers from the pulpit on certain occasions and under specified conditions. The first only was carried. On the other hand, distinctly moral and religious matters were debated with fervor, and various measures taken to forward the strictly evangelical work of the Church. If this has fallen behind that of other denominations heretofore it has perhaps been due to the subordination of the characteristics of the Convention just closed to what the laic mind is apt to regard as technical questions.

Colonel Higginson has answered, in the Woman's Journal, our request that he would discuss Gail Hamilton's defence of the "Ladies' Deposit" swindle in Boston in its bearing on the expectation that the entrance of women into the political arena would exert a purifying influence on politics. The answer is that the purifying influence argument "has now been so generally abandoned or subordinated that we need no further sins or follies of women to point the moral." It was Theodore Parker, he says, who started it, "but the whole tendency of later years has been to abandon it and rest the movement on firmer grounds." The object of the woman's suffrage movement now, it appears, is not "to purify politics, but to establish justice." This may be the doctrine preached on Colonel Higginson's side of the Woman's Journal, but we fear he cannot read the writings of the other contributors with care or he would meet frequent instances of the use by them of the purification argument. In the very number in which his article appears, "H. B. B.," after pointing out that the Nation "has been betrayed by its prejudices into a still lower depth of idiocy" than the Congregationalist, maintains that Gail Hamilton's performance does not shake the purification argument, because she is an opponent of female suffrage and stands alone in defending the swindle, while fifty-seven other women, eminent in literature and journalism, advocate woman suffrage and deplore the swindle. He also calls attention to the fact that the great majority of criminals are men, and that only five per cent. of the convicts for swindling are women. It seems, therefore, that the purification argument is not so completely abandoned as Colonel Higginson supposes.

"H. B. B." does not seem to understand fully Gail Hamilton's position. Whether she advocates woman suffrage or not has nothing to do with her attitude towards the swindle. She is at any rate a prominent female political writer, and she has done what we maintain no male writer of any prominence has ever dared do, in publicly defending a swindle by which she was profiting, and asking the person who had exposed it to give his note of hand for the amount she lost by the exposure. This makes her position unique. Nobody, the week before she did it, or when she was abusing the civil-service reformers in the newspapers and writing books on woman's domestic wrongs, suspected for a moment that her mind worked in this way. Her performance, therefore, has spread alarm through the community about the other female lecturers and essayists. Men are asking whether any of the female contributors to the Woman's Journal may not any day advocate something which would break up the framework of society. But one short month ago Gail Hamilton seemed as sound about swindles as any of them. In fact, men's great objection to the entrance of the female mind into politics is drawn from a suspicion of its unsteadiness on matters in which the feelings could by any possibility be enlisted, and this objection draws support from a flagrant example of unsteadiness and obtuseness on the part not of an ordinary woman but a prominent "woman of intellect." It may be that it is unjust to keep women out of politics because they are unsteady, but to a great many men this consideration is a very powerful one; they prefer safety to abstract justice. They maintain that states were not built up and are not maintained by absolute equality of rights and duties, but by shrewdness and patience and good sense; and, in fact, talk about the whole thing in a most provoking and idiotic way. It was for the benefit of these absurd creatures that we desired to have the subject discussed.

The foreign specie imports during the week amounted to $3,404,089, making the total receipts of the year $49,944,917, against $59,753,355 last year. The rates for foreign exchange at the close of the week did not warrant further imports. The New York banks, notwithstanding the heavy receipts of foreign coin and the Treasury disbursements, barely maintained their surplus reserve of something over $3,500,000. Business in all departments was dull during the week. At the Stock Exchange prices continued to advance in anticipation of General Garfield's election. The purchase of railroad securities since the October elections, on the theory that they decided the Presidential contest, advanced during October the prices of the active stocks at the Stock Exchange from 5½ to 23 points, the percentage in some stocks being nearly 50 per cent. Whether General Garfield's election has been "discounted" remains to be seen. In London, British consols have advanced to 99¼ and 99⅝, the highest price for a long time. United States bonds there have been steady, but American railroad securities have generally advanced. The price of silver bullion in London has dropped to 51¾*d.* to 51⅞*d.* per ounce; and the bullion value here of the "buzzard dollar" has fallen to less than 86½ cents.

WHAT THE SOUTH HAD BETTER DO NOW.

AT this writing the result of the Presidential election is unknown, but whichever way it turns, the question what the South had better do in national politics is one of the last importance both for itself and for the whole country. If Hancock be elected it will be largely due to the fact that the North has not believed Republican predictions of the ascendency of the South in Democratic councils. If, in case of his election, there is any sign that the South is disposed to use the Government for its own especial benefit, the reaction at the North against the Democrats will undoubtedly show itself in a very marked way at the next Congressional election, and General Hancock will pass his term as Johnson did, in a hopeless contest with a hostile Congress. It is undoubtedly the disgust and alarm inspired by the absorption of the Democratic majority during the last four years in legislation (whether justifiable or not) for the Southern benefit which has been gradually frittering that majority away, and giving the Republicans once more the power they lost under General Grant, and has enabled the "old set" to come out of their retirement and swagger once more in the light of day. If, on the other hand, Garfield be elected, and the South maintain its alliance with the Democrats, it will, of course, mean the continued exclusion of all Southern whites of character and ability from any share in the administration of the Government, and the exclusion of Southern opinion from all influence on public policy. The Southern say about finance, taxation, foreign affairs, Indian affairs, civil-service reform, and a host of other matters which are sure to come to the front before long, will count for as little during the next four years as it has during the past fifteen. In other words, the Government will be carried on still longer with an almost cultivated indifference to the opinions of three-fourths of the population of sixteen States, including the bulk of the property-holders. This is a most unfortunate situation, not for the South only but for the whole country. Is there no remedy for it?

Many Southerners—perhaps we should say most Southerners—like our correspondent in Memphis, Tenn., whose letter we print elsewhere, seem disposed to give way to despair, and to treat Northern hatred of the South not only as fact, but as one of the permanent forces of American politics, against which there is no use in struggling, and the removal or modification of which must be left to Providence. The sale of the Tourgee books; the change in the New York Tribune; the restoration to influence of Logan, Conkling, and Blaine, whose stock in trade has been composed exclusively of hatred of the South; the effect on Northern opinion of any man of the charge that he sympathizes with the South; the care taken by General Hancock's supporters to deny that he would if chosen President be under Southern influence, are all to him signs, and even proofs, that Northern dislike of the South is general and implacable. Now, we do not need to disclaim on the part of the Nation any sympathy with the attitude of the extreme or Stalwart Republicans towards the South. We have on this point expressed ourselves with sufficient explicitness during the past ten years. We believe the division between the North and South to be in large part due to the efforts of Republican politicians to maintain at the South a black party for the sake of the aid it would or might give them in Federal politics, and without the slightest regard to the mischief it might work in State politics. This policy has now, in our opinion, been pursued with more or less deliberation ever since 1865, and has, of course, had to be supported by vituperation of the Southern whites, and "stories," some true and some false, and some distorted and exaggerated, of their turbulence and cruelty. But after granting this, and granting too all the assertions made in our correspondent's letter, there remains for the South the exceedingly practical question: What is to be done about it? It is foolish to maintain, even if Northern hatred of the South exists, that it is universal and ineradicable. All that we said last week of the changeable character of political motives and conditions is just as true of the North as of the South. It is no more possible for the mass of the Northern people to maintain indefinitely towards the South the temper of 1861 or of 1870, than it is for the South to maintain its temper of those years towards the North. In fact, the North is a far more mobile and changeful society than the South; it has far less time for hatred, or revenge, or malice, or for brooding over wrongs of any description. The Northern air is too full of hope and enterprise to indulge in much reflection on the rascality of enemies in any part of the globe. So that while it is undoubtedly true that a large body of Northern voters, especially of the older generation which carried on the war, cherishes distrust of the South as a sort of pious duty, and approaches outrage stories with a reverence and credulity which might almost be called religious, it is also true that a large and increasing body, especially of the younger generation, is thoroughly sick of the Southern question in all its aspects, and sick of the base uses to which Republican politicians have put it. This was shown very distinctly by the overthrow of the Grant school of politicians in 1874 and 1876, by the declining influence of the "bloody shirt" in elections, and by the defeat of the third-term scheme, which rested largely on the assumption that the South was still a public enemy.

Now, the problem before the South of dealing with this Northern resentment and prejudice and of overcoming it, and of securing a fair share in the conduct of the Government, was a thoroughly practical one. It was made clear very soon after the war was over that the Democratic party at the North was too weak both in numbers, in intelligence, in the press and in wealth, to make it possible for the South to secure restoration through alliance with it. It, moreover, very soon became apparent —say as early as 1872—that the Democratic party was too much discredited by its connection with slavery and secession to make it possible for it even to "turn over a new leaf," by taking up with strange candidates and new-fangled doctrines. It has been shown again and again that when the North was fairly roused it would not submit to Democratic rule, and that the Southern alliance was not strong enough to enable the party to overcome this repugnance. Under these circumstances, putting all sentiment aside and looking at the situation with the eye of the practical politician who seeks place and power solely, it seems to us as if the course of the South was plain enough. It might have sought to profit by the dissensions which as early as 1870 began to show themselves in the Republican party. It ought to have held out to the younger generation of Republicans, who remembered little of the war and were every year taking a more active part in affairs, some inducement to break loose from the party yoke and attempt some new political combination. It ought to have actively furnished those Republicans who were tired of the "bloody shirt" with arguments in support of the position that the Southern men were occupied with better things than cheating negroes out of their votes, and that their co-operation would be valuable in the settlement of the economical and administrative questions which, since 1873, have had so much importance for the whole country. It ought to have held out a hand, in short, to the Republican civil-service reformers, tariff reformers, railroad reformers, and others who were seriously interested in questions affecting the entire nation rather than any one part of it. In this way it would have promoted the disintegration of the Republican party, and the formation of some new organization in which the South could take part without loss of self-respect, and find some relief from that contemplation of "old unhappy far-off things" into which men whose hopes have been crushed are so apt to fall, but which is sure ruin for any school of politicians.

Unhappily, the South did not see fit to follow this course or anything like it. It has been prominent and influential in Congress since 1876, and used its prominence and influence, with curious obtuseness, in helping the Democrats to engage in legislation intended, as every one knew, for the benefit of the South exclusively, which was sure to revive Northern irritability, and which dealt with grievances that nothing but Northern irritability kept alive. It offered no help or encouragement to those Republicans, like ourselves, who were trying to abate Northern prejudice and hopelessness about the South. Nothing came from any Southern politician calculated to quicken the pulses of the younger Republicans with any fresh or generous emotion, or any expectation of a better political day. When the time came, too, for the friends of civil and constitutional government at the North to make a fight against the coarse and shabby Cæsarism which was concealed under the third-term scheme, and against the permanent lodgment of military ideas and methods in American polity, there came from the South no word of encouragement or sympathy that we have ever heard of. On the contrary, as soon as the Republican Convention had nominated a man who, whatever his faults, was an experienced civilian, the Southerners joined the Democrats in setting up for the highest office in the Government a mere soldier, who owed all his fame to his success in killing Southerners in a civil war. It must be admitted that this is a somewhat disheartening story. We can tell it with the better grace because we are among the number of those who believe in the reality of Southern grievances, and also in the reality of Southern progress. But there is certainly nothing in the course of the South in Federal politics since the war to remind us of the skill with which Southern politicians for so many years ruled the North in defence of slavery. They fear and hate the Republican party, but do not see that it is at any time in their power to convert the Republican party into something very different from what it is, and to compel the Logans, Blaines, and Conklings either to give up abuse of the South, or go into obscurity.

THE "OUTRAGES" IN THE IRISH TROUBLE.

THE present agitation in Ireland, horrible as some of its features are, has not been in vain. The Irish land question has in consequence of it received through the English press a more thorough discussion than ever before, and there are, apparently, few if any Liberals who deny now that it differs from the English land question, and that the ideas of the great bulk of the Irish people about land tenures are entitled to recognition in legislation, even if they seem strange and repulsive to the English mind. It seems to have been at last made clear to that (in Irish matters, at least) not very receptive organ that the fact that the English landlord makes all the improvements on a farm before letting it, and keeps the fences and buildings in repair, while the Irish landlord does nothing but furnish the land, constitutes a very marked difference between the land systems of the two countries. It has also been established by all but conclusive evidence that it is customary, or at all events very common, for Irish landlords to raise their rents on account of improvements made by the tenant, in a manner which amounts to confiscation of the tenant's property; also that in all those districts and on those estates in which the tenant's property in his improvements is recognized as a salable interest, under the name of "tenant right" or good-will, the utmost content and good feeling between landlord and tenant prevail, and there is now no disturbance. Also that the arbitrary government of estates by rules which aim at controlling the tenant's way of living, and keeping him in social subjection to the landlord or his agent, which has been in vogue over most of Ireland for two hundred years, no matter what justification, or seeming justification, may be found for it in the faults of the tenantry, is no longer possible in our time and must be given up. The isolation of Ireland from the rest of the world, which so long helped to maintain this system, has passed away. The influence of the Irish in this country on manners and ideas at home has become very great, and it is, of course, hostile in the highest degree to the social system which the existing land tenure supports. The opinion of the whole of Europe, too, may be said to be running strongly against the deduction from contract of any relation but a commercial one, and to make the maintenance of any feudal view of the landowner's function increasingly difficult. Lord Lymington has written an interesting article in the last number of the Nineteenth Century, giving an account of the system introduced by his grandfather, Lord Portsmouth, on estates in the county of Wexford sixty years ago, and still in force, in which the absolute independence of the tenant as long as he pays his rent is a leading feature. He may farm well or ill, just as he pleases, and live and labor in all respects according to his own ideas, and if he wishes to dispose of his interest in the farm, which is always a thirty-one years' lease, he is welcome to do so, to the highest bidder. The practical result of this system is that, on the whole, the tenants, feeling that they are working for themselves, farm well, even if not up to the landlord's standard. But he is abundantly repaid for the surrender of his right of interference by the peace, content, and prosperity which reign on his estates. An ejectment for non-payment of rent hardly ever occurs, and even when it does occur the tenant is allowed to sell his interest all the same, but what he receives of course goes to pay his debts, the arrears of rent among the number.

Undoubtedly this discussion will not be as useful to the Ministry in Parliament when they attempt to deal with the land question next year as it would have been if there had been no outrages; but, on the other hand, there is much reason to fear that without the outrages the discussion would not have been so thorough. One of the great difficulties with which England has had to contend of late years in the government of Ireland lies in the different rhetorical standards of the two countries. The Englishman of to-day distrusts everybody who uses extravagant language, and pays no attention to him. The Irishman, on the other hand, feels that high coloring is necessary to make any impression at all, but has had abundant experience of the failure of his eloquence to bring Englishmen to any adequate sense of his wrongs. The result is a constant temptation to supplement the speeches with crime, and unfortunately this does undoubtedly impress the English public. They are not moved by the hyperboles and picturesque similes in which Irish grievances are usually dressed up, but murder and arson they understand and are roused by. There was much melancholy truth in Mr. Gladstone's admission, which made so much uproar last year, that it was the attempt to blow up the Clerkenwell prison which led indirectly to the passage of the Land Act of 1870 and the disestablishment of the Irish Church.

It was a truth, too, of which there are several other illustrations. Catholic Emancipation was not accorded until the country was on the verge of civil war, and the same thing may be said of the abolition of the tithes. O'Connell sternly repressed "outrages" and denounced all violence during the Repeal agitation, but he accomplished nothing. It is not wonderful that with these examples before them the Parnellites should believe that the only way to obtain a settlement of the land question, which in one form or another has now been pending for nearly two hundred years, is to strike terror. Turbulence and violence have led to the righting of some Irish wrongs; nothing else has done so. Such is the lesson with which the history of his country for the last century has furnished the Irish peasant, and it is not surprising that he acts on it. Even in the days before the Catholics appeared on the scene at all, the Protestant colonists were obliged to seek their legislative independence by embodying a large armed force, and threatening the English Government when it had both a French and an American war on its hands. This unfortunate state of things has been aggravated by the prevailing English ignorance of Irish history. Irish history is by no means attractive reading. A more dismal, and in many ways repulsive, history no country of the western world has to show. It describes no contribution whatever to the stream of European progress. Whatever Irishmen have done for the world either in arts or arms has been done either through England or some other foreign country. The consequence is that the history of the country has had no place in any system of education or culture. As occasionally reproduced in a form to suit English tastes, by men like Mr. Froude, it has presented the Irish people in the guise of a vicious and turbulent tribe whom it was the mission of England to thrash into civilization—a view which, ever since the conquest of India made the "inferior races" so prominent in English politics, has been a peculiarly grateful view which even the most philanthropic and religious Englishmen only put away from them by a hard struggle. It came into play in Irish politics at a most unfortunate period, when the earlier Cromwellian theory, that the Irish were a parcel of Popish cut-throats, was fast dying out, and when they were just beginning to display in the freer air of the present century that remarkable political tenacity which now makes them so troublesome to the English legislator, and has raised the Irish question into the first rank of state problems. There is no more striking political phenomenon of our time than this tenacity. No race in Europe has been reduced by conquest to a lower stage of degradation and poverty than the Irish Celts. Nevertheless, they have not died out before the conquering people. On the contrary, they have multiplied enormously. Nor have they become merged with their conquerors or accepted their ideas. On the contrary, they have, generation after generation, opposed a fanatical resistance to every attempt to absorb them into the British Empire. They have emigrated by millions, and have carried with them everywhere an almost furious sentiment of nationality, although they have never formed a nation, and a singularly active interest in politics, such as has perhaps nowhere been witnessed among people who have had so little political training, even such as local self-government gives, and whose reliance on leaders in politics has been so great. If this interest could be in any way made to inure to the benefit of the British Empire it cannot be denied that it would prove a new and valuable source of strength. Mr. Gladstone has done more towards this consummation than any other English statesman. If he can make it sure, it will be the greatest achievement of recent British history.

THE STATE OF PARTIES IN FRANCE.

PARIS, October 17, 1880.

THE parliamentary session will begin in a few days, and will be a particularly important one, for it is the last of the present Legislature, whose term expires next October at the latest, and very likely the general elections will take place before that time. Everything will give way to this great preoccupation, for it is impossible to conceal the influence which the future Chamber will have on the destiny of the Republic, and the formation of it gives much uneasiness. Permit me to undertake a slight sketch of the state of parties on the eve of the opening of Parliament, before the renewal of those ardent struggles which will not fail to break out in a few days.

Besides the great divisions between the Right and Left many secondary groups may be remarked, whose importance ought not to be judged by the noise they make, but by the echo they obtain in the country. Rather than characterize them in a general way I prefer to define their real influence at the present time. Concerning the Right we shall be brief, for that party has but little weight in the Chamber's deliberations. The first reason of this powerlessness is that for the time being, especially since the elections in August for the Councils-General, they have lost all consideration in the country. They have not recovered from the defeat of the attempt they made on the 16th of May, 1877. Besides this, the Right is greatly divided. The Legitimists, who have just celebrated the fête of their king by numerous banquets, at which the Government allowed them free scope, well knowing their insignificance, cannot pardon the Orleanists, who still sit in the Chamber of Deputies, for having refused to accept the white flag. Moreover, the monarchical party have just experienced a great annoyance: of the few generals who belong to them, one, General de Cissey, former president of the Cabinet Council and Minister of War in 1874, in the palmy days of moral order, has just been disgraced in the famous trial about the alleged information sent to Prussia respecting our plans of military reorganization. The accused was a young Republican officer, but he has been entirely exonerated, and it has been proved that General de Cissey took advantage of his position to gratify a shameful passion, not to betray France, but to heap iniquitous favors on a miserable woman who, we have every reason to suppose, was a paid spy. These revelations have produced considerable excitement, more particularly as the unfortunate general had rendered himself conspicuous by his devoutness. I need not revert to the incurable divisions of the Bonapartist faction; they are more and more evident every day. On Sunday, October 17, M. Paul de Cassagnac presided at a large meeting directed against Prince Napoleon. The Right have, however, one chance in their favor—the irritation produced in some parts of the country by those unlucky decrees which are thorns in the side of the Republic. They may also become dangerous in Parliament by voting for all the extreme motions of the radical Left, in order to put a spoke in the wheel of the Republican government. They do all they can to disturb the water in the hope of making a miraculous haul.

The Extreme Left will not be any stronger at the next session, for they have made no recruits in the partial elections during the vacation. They endeavor to compensate for their weakness by noise, and it may be taken for granted they will make more than ever. They do not speak in the Chamber, but appeal to the country, or rather to the radical masses of our large towns; their support is entirely in these. Unhappily, the Municipal Council of Paris belongs wholly to the Extreme Left, and if it evinces a certain aptitude in dealing with the pecuniary affairs of our large city, it is decidedly intemperate in politics and takes pleasure in the most extravagant things, especially in what concerns religion, which it pursues with hatred. It amuses itself by constantly changing the names of the Paris streets, striking out all those which recall old France and its glories or some religious reminiscence, and replacing them by names either obscure, ridiculous, or revolutionary, to the great annoyance of the inhabitants. It has just commenced another of these changes which upset all one's habits. The greatest injury to the Extreme Left comes from their outside allies, who push extravagance to its utmost limits. I have spoken enough about Rochefort. For the time being he is quite eclipsed by Félix Pyat, one of the proscribed brothers of the Commune, who files down and polishes his writings like an ornamental dagger. This comparison is inevitable, for he unceasingly preaches assassination in his journal, La Commune. He has opened a subscription to present a fancy dagger to Berezovski, now a convict, for having attempted to assassinate the Czar at the Universal Exhibition of 1867. The Government has decided to prosecute this shameless defender of regicide. While acknowledging that Félix Pyat far surpasses the party designated as the Extreme Left, we can but observe that the Extreme Left have too much affinity with the advanced radical parties, as seen by the excuses for the Commune published in their newspapers. The Left, properly speaking, is divided into Left Centre, Left "sans phrases," and the "Union Républicaine," the group long directed by M. Gambetta, who is the axis of the majority. The old Thiersists have united themselves with the Left, and are less remarked than the Republican Union, which is, upon the whole, moderate in everything concerning social questions, opposed to socialistic chimeras, but very ardent in the contest against clericalism. On this point it is not possible to effect a compromise with them. At the present time no influence equals M. Gambetta's with the Republican Union. One of the reasons, however, which prevent him from at once taking office is that this majority is not easy to discipline, and Gambetta does not think he should have sufficient support from them to be able to give a firm, well-prosecuted direction to politics. He attributes this instability or incoherence to the manner of recruiting the Chamber, which is elected by district ballot, thus making the deputies subject to local influences on which their fate depends. The important side in politics being often effaced by the petty preoccupations of class prejudices, Gambetta earnestly desires to have all the deputies of a department voted for on a general ticket in place of the district ballot. He hopes that a Chamber so constituted would better obey the inspirations of a leader and would conform more easily to a grand, united political programme. You know that a proposition of this kind has already been introduced in the Chamber.

The most serious discussions of the coming session will be on this subject. Gambetta has against him all the Extreme Left, who fear nothing so much as to see his influence increase, and they desire to ruin him by every possible means. He has against him the electoral interests of the present deputies, who would find it very convenient to preserve their districts. They have made their beds with great care and would like to lie down in them instead of being exposed to the risk of a larger election, which would make them lose the advantages of their local influence, maintained with so much labor. Gambetta will have to descend from the presidential chair and throw the weight of his eloquence into the scale. I do not doubt that he would be victorious, for he would employ all his tact, skill, and energy to win this great political game, on which, according to him, all his future depends. No doubt, if he succeeds, he will not hesitate to take office at the opening of the new Parliament, and then will be the time for him to show what he is as a statesman in power, whether he can contain factions at home and reassure Europe in his foreign policy. It would be very desirable for the present Ministry to remain in office until the next elections. It is favorably regarded in Europe. Its chief, M. Jules Ferry, is a clever, energetic, eloquent man. It cannot be denied, however, that this minister, like his predecessors, will be at the mercy of a defeat from the majority in a Chamber, both unstable and impassioned, where he is not recognized as the veritable leader. Let us hope he will avoid these dangers and be able to preside over the formation of a new Chamber. With respect to the Senate, we may be sure they will support the present Ministry. The attempt which was made to suppress it met with no response in the country. When you receive this letter the last session of the existing Chamber will be about to commence, and we shall soon learn whether my surmises will be realized. É.

THE "DEMONSTRATION" AGAINST TURKEY.

PARIS, October 14, 1880.

THE doors of the temple of Janus have been half opened, but they are suddenly shut again. The demonstration made against Dulcigno ended in a total failure. The Montenegrins were not willing to attack the little fortified town, defended as it was by the Albanians and by the regulars of Riza Pasha. The "Prince of the Mountain," as Prince Nicholas of Montenegro is called, had often said that every one of his mountaineers, that the children even, and the women, were ready to fight at all times against the Turk; but when the allied fleet was before Dulcigno the mountaineers showed as much prudence and discretion as if they had been born in the flattest plains. Prince Nicholas asked Admiral Seymour to land some troops and to give the signal of attack against Dulcigno. The signal was not given and could not be given. A landing of troops was not in the programme of the "demonstration." Meanwhile the weather became bad on the coast of the Adriatic, and the fleet had to return to the Bocche di Cattaro. Not a shot had been fired on the Albanian coast, and the demonstration had demonstrated nothing except the impotence of the allied Powers.

The Porte had sent a note to the great Powers, in which she explained that she would only give up Dulcigno if all idea of an armed demonstration was abandoned. She pronounced herself ready in that case to make propositions concerning the new Greek frontier and the reforms in Armenia, in the course of time. This note was considered as insolent in the last degree, especially as the last Conference at Berlin had had no other object than the settlement of the Greek frontier. All the western diplomats, with the help of geographers and officers of the staff, had drawn a line to the north of Janina and Metsovo, and the Porte now quietly said that she could only adopt a line to the south of these two cities. In fact, this note of the Sultan's, in conjunction with the resistance of Dulcigno, seemed like a gauntlet flung boldly down to the western Powers. War became almost imminent, and the suddenness of the peril caused great consternation in all Europe. People began to ask themselves who could be the inspirer of the Sultan, for they could not believe that, left to himself, he would have been so imprudent as to defy all Europe. The advantage of a sudden crisis consists in dispelling in an instant the diplomatic fogs which at first surround every question. It soon became apparent that the common understanding, and the common action which had begun with the demonstration against Dulcigno, really covered two opinions, two policies—I might almost say two virtual alliances. On one side stood Prussia and Austria, on the other England, France, and Russia. By a strange combination of circumstances, England, who had always opposed the plans of Russia in the East, who had fought for the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, was now in the front of the battle, more ardent than Russia against the Turks. She seemed to resent the insult of Dulcigno more than anybody else. An English admiral had commanded the allied fleet. Mr. Gladstone, who had taken the place of the Tories, was determined to execute the will of Europe, to give that shock to the glass of the Ottoman Empire which must bring about a fracture on the line which had been marked by the diplomatic diamond at Berlin.

There is not much doubt that at the outset England prepared herself for every emergency. Many measures were discussed which were of a very violent character; but could England enter alone upon the terrible future—"dans le sombre avenir," to use the words of an old poet? No, she was morally sure of the sympathies of Russia if once she began war against Turkey; she knew that the frontier between Bulgaria and Rumelia, which was of her own making, was merely artificial; she knew that the Russian armies would easily cross again the Danube and the Balkans. But she was more anxious to have French co-operation than Russian. The English Government, or at least some members of this Government, entertained the hope that France, after ten years of rest, with magnificent finances, with a large army, would like, perhaps, to try her growing strength, and to try it with a sufficient degree of safety, with the powerful alliance of England and Russia. The temptation was undoubtedly great for a French statesman; he would have been a bold prophet who should have predicted in 1870 that in 1880 France could again take the lead in Europe, and would have on her side the moral and material forces not only of England but of Russia. Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Sir Charles Dilke, and others thought that if Napoleon III. had found it to his advantage to enter into a close alliance with England, the young French Republic would perhaps promise herself the benefits which the second French Empire reaped from this alliance. There have been undoubtedly some men in France in high places who, moved by the most patriotic motives, have hesitated, have thought that they had better not reject the forces which Providence placed at the disposal of France. The words of the Cherbourg speech had not been without an echo in many hearts, in the army and out of the army. But the general state of public opinion has not allowed the desires, the designs, the aspirations of the most active minds to be satisfied. France had been carefully taught by the press for ten years that she must "se recueillir," remain alone, shut up in a determined policy of peace and of non-intervention; she had been taught to mistrust all foreign powers; she had been told repeatedly that England and Russia and Italy had no pity for her misfortunes, that her blood was no longer to be shed "for an idea," that there was no "question" for her except the question of Alsace-Lorraine. The lessons had gone all the deeper into all hearts because the memories of the late war were still vivid, and because the sufferings of the invasion were remembered in every village, in every city, in every household. France did not much mind the congresses and conferences to which her ambassadors were sent, as it were, "en parade"; she did not believe that anything serious could come of it. As soon as Eastern affairs seemed to involve our responsibility there was a universal protest; the papers of all shades, of all opinions, became pacific "with a vengeance." There was but one important paper, the République Française—which is supposed to be inspired by the President of the Chamber of Deputies—that advocated the continuance of a common action with England; and even this paper dared not show distinctly whither this common action might lead the country. The English Government exercised a strong pressure upon those whom it supposed capable of affecting the public mind in France; the incense which was once burnt for Napoleon III., when he could lead with one word the armies of France, was all ready to burn for those who should help England strike a heavy blow in the East. England would not believe that it was not in the power of the President of the French Republic to declare war in the absence of the Chambers; the French diplomats in vain assured her that there was an Article 9 in one of our constitutional laws which said that the President can only declare war with the formal assent of the two Chambers. The English ministers wished to see the text of the Constitution; and, strangely enough, the English ambassador in Paris could not procure it. The fact is that it does not exist in the form of a book or a little pamphlet; there were a few copies of the constitutional laws printed for the National Assembly at Versailles in 1875, and they were only given to the deputies. Since that time no bookseller has had the idea of reprinting the collection of laws which form our Constitution, for the use of the public.

There were, only a few days ago, still two currents in the present Cabinet: a few of its members, who receive more directly the inspirations of the President of the Chamber of Deputies, would probably not have been unwilling to try a policy of intervention in the East; but the majority of the Council, drawing their inspiration from public opinion at large, took such a pacific attitude that it soon became evident that all idea of an active policy must be abandoned. The French ambassador in London informed Mr. Gladstone's Government last Saturday that France would join in no demonstration or occupation in the East, either at Smyrna or elsewhere. This step seemed almost natural, as the news had just arrived that the Sultan, having successfully resisted the armed menaces of Europe, was now willing to surrender Dulcigno to the Montenegrins. Whoever advised the Sultan in this circumstance gave him very good advice. By surrendering Dulcigno after the departure of the allied fleet the Sultan shows some deference for the will of Europe, and at a small price places himself in a position which will enable him to be much more free with regard to the pretensions of the Greeks. He unties the two Montenegrin and Greek questions; the first may be now considered as solved; and Europe has not cut such a good figure in her last "demonstration" that she will be very anxious to "demonstrate" again for the Greeks. Europe was brought face to face with the fearful dangers which were hidden under the "common action"; the goddess Bellona showed her profile only, and it was found that nobody was very willing to follow her. France will sink again into a policy of non-intervention, but she will be still more careful not to tie her hands even diplomatically. Russia will have learned that she has not much to expect from distant western allies, and she will fall back on the old policy which led to the partition of Poland. Germany, without moving, without effort, has been the real arbiter in the late events; she has taken the Sultan under her dangerous protection, she has obtained from him the surrender of Dulcigno, and she will probably be called upon to fix the new frontier of Greece, by a sort of arbitration which nobody in Europe will be willing or able to dispute.

THE "RESTORATION" OF ST. MARK'S.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In response to the appeal in your columns for the St. Mark's Preservation Society, I should like to say that owing to the agitation made over the so-called demolition last winter I went to Venice and carefully examined with the architect the plans and the work done and to be done, and can assure your readers and the admirers of the great Basilica that they may save their money for better uses, as nothing has been done or is contemplated to be done at Venice which the ruinous state of the church does not make imperative, if the walls are not to fall into what most of the agitators seem to fancy to be the proper state of an old church—viz., a picturesque ruin. With one single modification, in which a return was made from a sixteenth-century vulgarism to the original plan, the original design has been carefully retained in every detail, and as far as possible the original stone put back into the original position, but in some cases the marble veneer has been absolutely dissolved away by the elements or decomposed into chalky rubbish. In every case where a stone, column or slab, cornice or casing could be returned to its place even by turning it, it has been done, and of carved work of any kind almost none has been lost. Some parts of the façade are now so decayed, and the brick-work underneath so split and disintegrated, that the facing is only kept in its place by timbers and iron bars, which disfigure the church more than the repairs, and unless the foundations are strengthened the west façade menaces splitting and falling apart. It may not be realized by the "preservers" of St. Mark's that the whole edifice is slowly sinking into the mud on which it is built, but sinking unequally, so that in one case a pier has gone down twenty-two centimetres, owing to the entirely inadequate foundation on which the church was built originally. One door-way is now, but for the struts and bars that keep it up, in utter ruin and must be taken down soon or it will fall of itself, and other parts will be taken down and reconstructed on new brick-work as soon as necessity arises, but no sooner. The whole body of the building is brick-work, and the brick very poor and soft, while in the laying of it sticks were put in to strengthen temporarily the work, but as these are now only ashes and dust they leave the masonry very weak, and it is the brick-work that is failing, not merely the stone veneering which contains the artistic wealth of the church, though that in some cases is quite crumbling and falling off.

Your readers may be assured that everything which reverence and painstaking can do to keep the old work from destruction, and to maintain the edifice in its present state, will be done, but that it will not (to please painters who prefer painting old architecture, the more decayed the better, to restored) be allowed to acquire picturesqueness at the expense of its architectural keeping and preservation as a whole. The great outcry had its origin in total ignorance of what was proposed to be done, of what needed to be done, and what had already been done—a foolish scare by some one who had seen the mosaics crumbling to pieces, and, like Henny Penny, on whose tail the sky fell, went about alarming the world with cries that the cathedral was being demolished. A more senseless and gratuitous excitement was never got up by any one, and as long as the church is under the care of the present architect, Meduna, we need have no fear that harm will be done for want of reverence of it or wanton reconstruction.—Yours truly,

W. J. Stillman.

MATTERS IN VIRGINIA.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The conflict in Virginia between the old "Conservative" party and the new party under General Mahone must be peculiarly interesting to a student of history. He sees a phase of affairs which has occurred many times in the past, and recognizes an epoch in the progress of ideas, limited though it may seem in comparison with some others. It is, however, far from insignificant, and means nothing less than that revolution which had to come in the South as fulfilment of the work done in the war. It means the downfall of leaders who have not entered into the spirit of modern advancements, and have supported them only in so far as they were compelled. It means new men and more liberal ideas. The true issue in this, as in all revolutions, is almost hidden in talk of temporary questions; but there are men who see it very clearly, and that the people have a feeling beyond taxes is shown in frequent county resolutions, and in the constant use of the term "Bourbonism." But a question so intangible as that implied in this word cannot move the masses, upon whom revolutions depend. The great leaders in the world have not accomplished their work by discussing with their followers inner questions involved which could not have been comprehended. Mass-leading requires something more definite; and the pity is that in Virginia, just at this time when the masses needed to be led, the requisite definiteness has presented itself in a form so unworthy as the forcible readjustment of the public debt. Many do not believe, however, that the creditors of Virginia will be really affected. This can hardly be hoped; but it is likely that in the State, with the liberal party in power (as will surely be the case whatever the result in the present national contest), there will be rapid improvement, material as well as intellectual, and that whatever readjusting may be done will not be to the extent that the leaders of the old party would have the world believe. Even these, though they cannot understand the real issue, feel that the debt question is not at the bottom. They generally attribute the whole movement to the selfishness of General Mahone, whom they hate as heartily as the Cavaliers did Cromwell. This hatred is more than political: it is the hatred of a party aristocratical in its notions, full of sentimental fogyism, and blind to liberality of thought and speech.

Said a Funder the other day to another who jokingly asserted himself a Readjuster: "You are too much of a gentleman for that." He did not underscore the word, but he could not have expressed more innocently and briefly the sentiment of his party and the true secret of the whole matter. This is an old war which is going on now in Virginia. D.

DO THE NORTHERN PEOPLE HATE THE SOUTHERN?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The last number of the Nation quotes an extract from Mr. Schurz's recent speech at the Cooper Union, and recommends it to the careful consideration of every Southern voter and politician. The whole force of his utterance depends upon the truth of the assumption that "the people of the North cherish no ill-will towards them"—i.e., the Southern people. If the people of the North do cherish ill-will towards them, then Mr. Schurz does not call upon the South to lay aside all sense of grievance which springs from that fact. The people of the North, it is true, may cherish no ill-will towards the South, but I affirm, without fear of serious contradiction, that there are not one hundred Southern white men in each Southern State who believe this; and the number I select is not merely for the sake of the conventional comparison. These are a few of the causes which produce this belief:

The Republican party is a representative of Northern principles and interests, and owes its long lease of power to Northern support. In spite of the fact that a systematic disregard of Southern rights was one of its main features, and in spite of the fact that during eight years, at least, they managed the affairs of the Government so inefficiently and dishonestly as to cause these eight years to be a term of reproach in the Nation's vocabulary of political phrases, they finally lost control of power only by an almost impotent majority. In spite, also, of the disreputable procedure of the Republican returning boards and visiting statesmen during the Presidential contest of 1876, they are apparently on the eve of a more overwhelming victory than they have gained since the war. All of this might be attributed to the ordinary results of political forces when brought into play. Other points will not admit of this interpretation.

The two books of which more copies have been sold than any others ever known to American booksellers were both directed against the South. The effect of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' was but natural, coming as it did at a time when the evils it described were still in existence and still needed reform. The people of the South having finally been brought to a recognition of the horrors of slavery mainly through the agency of the Republican party, being also thankful that it no longer exists, look upon 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' as a legitimate factor in a beneficent movement. If the prejudice and positive ill-will entertained by the North towards the South had become extinct as the peculiar cause of its origin disappeared, the 'Fool's Errand' would have been read as we now read Longfellow's tragedy of 'Giles Corey,' and certainly not more widely. But the 'Fool's Errand' is a book written by an author of wonderful power, and teaching the old lesson of Southern pride, arrogance, brutality, cruelty to the negro, intolerance of free discussion, and hatred of the North in a manner more artful than it has ever been taught before. Northern dislike of the South, therefore, finds its most exquisite gratification and expression in the 'Fool's Errand,' and the 'Fool's Errand' was written fifteen years after the evils it described had passed away. It is to this fact that the South attributes the success of the 'Fool's Errand.'

Mr. Schurz says the demonstration of ill-will towards the South on the part of Northern politicians is merely stage-thunder. Now, newspapers do not depend for their subscriptions upon Republican politicians. Their popularity in the main is owing to the fact that they reflect the opinions and advocate the interests of their readers. The New York Tribune was at one time a paper liberal in its treatment of sectional questions. The New York Tribune's position towards the South to-day is too well known to need description. The intensity of its hostile feeling towards the South defies the characterization of the most powerfully descriptive adjectives. The Cincinnati Gazette is its Western reflection.

You say in one of your editorials that politicians like Senators Conkling and Blaine "manage conventions dextrously, but they do not manage a party so as to give it success at the polls." The four men who since the war have been most distinguished for their passionate abuse of the South have been all Senators—Morton, Chandler, Conkling, and Blaine. Two died in office and the other two are universally admitted to be the leaders of the Republican party. These men were elected, not by the people at the polls, amid the excitement and restless turmoil that ever attend a popular election, but by those from whom, if from any body of men, liberality of sentiment was most naturally to be expected. Their stage-thunder appears to the South to be more popular than the genuine lightning and rain. It cannot be answered that the election of these men was brought about by other causes. They are and were nothing if not vituperative.

The Northern press and Northern orators always speak of the advent of Southerners to office as a grandson of Noah might have alluded to another deluge. An insinuation by a political opponent that they are "playing into the hands of Southern rebels" is met with indignant denial. As an offset to your quotation from Mr. Schurz's speech, allow me to offer one from a speech by General Sherman, made a few months ago, in reply to an allegation that West Point was under Southern influence. "What nonsense!" he exclaimed, "nothing can be more absurd! Why, General Schofield, Colonel Lascelle, and the other heads of the Academy are all Northern men, thoroughly imbued with Northern sentiments, views, and ideas. This charge is like the rest, purely fictitious, and existing only in the fertile imagination of the newspaper writers." To a Southerner it does not appear that Southern influence at West Point would be a very lamentable national calamity.

The South either has or it has not an equal right to take part in the administration of Federal affairs. The North says it has not, and the South attributes this denial to the continued vitality of Northern hatred engendered by the war. We have expressly said we accept cheerfully and gladly the freedom of the negro. The right of secession has but one living advocate in the South, named Robert Toombs. Notwithstanding this, we are still rebels, and the most liberal mind in the North cannot contemplate without secret dismay the possibility of the administration of Federal affairs passing into Southern hands. Even those who know the absurdity of the usual charges against the South regard us as too illiterate to be able to carry on the Government in a respectable manner. Every Federal office in the South is occupied by a Republican, and in nearly every instance by a Northern Republican.

Judicial positions are invariably filled by Republicans. There is no reason why Democrats should be selected, but certainly none why Republicans as such should be, except that Northern sentiment demands and sustains it. The people of the North are sincere in their conviction that these are things with which the South has no legitimate concern.

You quote from the Sun, a Democratic paper, but less Democratic than Northern. It says—in your extract—that Hancock's Administration "will be as free from the rule of the rebels as from the rule of the Czar of all the Russias."

You congratulate the country on the fact that Southern outrages and the Solid South have been finally consigned to the lumber-room of worn-out political tools. There is surely ground for congratulation, but the satisfaction of the South is somewhat dampened by the reflection that the war closed in 1864, virtually, and that this is the year 1880. In addition to this we are not yet prepared to believe that the millennium of political tolerance has come. So sure are Southern Republicans of Northern readiness to believe ill of the South that their speeches are all directed to the one end of calling forth some expression of indignation, in order to become famous at the North as an additional martyr in the cause of Southern regeneration.

The manifestations of dissatisfaction which appeared throughout the North at the census reports of the increase of Southern population and prosperity were certainly neither noble nor magnanimous.

These are only a few of the points which suggest themselves as proof that the North does cherish ill-will towards the South. It would not be difficult for the South to find a philosophical explanation of this hatred—an explanation which would please Buckle himself. But the explanation would not lessen the reality of the fact that the North hates the South. The expression "hate" implies a great deal, but not too much when treating of Northern sentiment towards the South. Mr. Schurz's statement does very well, as such; but the object of the remark is only to influence Southern action, and Southern action can only be influenced by conclusive proof that his statement is true. If history proves anything, the history of the last fifteen years proves that the North wishes the negro to rule the South. The negro is the only element of Southern society which would act in unison with the North in those matters where Northern and Southern interests are antagonistic. There has been no period during the last nineteen years when Northern troops have not been in Southern States, when the Government has been in the hands of Republicans. This was natural during four years of that time; it was very unnatural for the following ten. As soon as the Democrats came into power the troops were withdrawn. Mr. Hayes withdrew them, but the Democratic party was the cause. They were not withdrawn until a belated Northern sentiment had been partially aroused to the iniquity of Republican misrule. Those who had been most disreputable of all in the States where they had been upheld by the troops immediately went North, and were lionized or were provided with comfortable salaries everywhere except in the North. The South has no assurance that a return of Republicans to power does not mean a return of Northern troops to some Southern States; at least the two ideas are associated in the mind of the South, in spite of the poohpoohs of those who send Mr. Hoar, Mr. Conkling, and Mr. Blaine to Washington as Senators. The grievances of the South may be imaginary but the unanimity of belief in the South that they are not imaginary is astounding. The Solid South is an evil, no doubt, as the South is most ready to admit, but the Solid South will end when there has ceased to be what Henry Watterson called the Stolid North. The South can only say to Mr. Schurz that, as much as the fact is to be regretted, his statement quoted above is an expression solely of his own generous liberality of mind, and is not an expression of Northern sentiment.

EXPLANATION OF I HAD RATHER GO AND SIMILAR IDIOMS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: At least five and twenty years have elapsed since I worked out, though with the help of much less evidence than I now possess, the historico-grammatical justification of the expressions referred to; and, in the meantime, I have looked about me diligently to see whether any one had forestalled me in what I have to say in their defence. As far as I am aware, no one has done so.

I have by me, and intend shortly to print, a brief essay on the phrases in question. From that essay I here give a few extracts, exclusively relating to the collocations "I had rather go," "they had rather be fined than punished," etc., or, more distinctly, collocations in which rather comes between had and an infinitive.

Besides rather, circumstanced as above, and so circumstanced by rights or otherwise, we find liefer, liefest, as lief, as good, like, better, best, as well, as soon.

Expressions such as "I have liefer go," "I had liefer go," are the oldest members of the group to which they belong. Their precursors were "me is liefer go," "me was liefer go," "me were liefer go." In all these cases, liefer is an adjective, meaning "preferable"; and me, where it occurs, is a dative.

Exactly parallel to "I had liefer go" is "I had rather go." An elucidation of the latter therefore dispenses me from dwelling on the former.

In certain constructions, ἔχειν (in post-classical use), habere, avere, haber, avoir, and haben, signify "deem," "rate," "hold," "regard," "consider," "account," or the like. In other words, these verbs, originally possessive, have come to be factitive. To them we are to add our have. Sir John Fastolf wrote, about 1449: "If the place that is beside Walsyngham stand cler, I have hit lever then [i.e., I hold it to be more desirable than] the tother." Paston Letters (ed. 1872–1875), vol. i., p. 94. "To be had in reverence" and "had in honor" we are familiar with from the Bible; and such modes of speech, though slightly quaint, are by no means yet obsolete.

Had, as equivalent to "should have," "would have," emerged in our language as far back, at least, as the eleventh century.

Rather, the comparative of rathe, "speedy," "hasty," "early," etc., at first had the significations to be expected from those of its positive, or "speedier," "hastier," "earlier," "prior," "former," "older."

That this adjective must, at some time, have denoted "preferable," might almost certainly have been inferred from the adverb rather, in phraseology such as "I would have this rather than that," i.e., "I would have this preferably to that." And it actually once was a synonym of preferable, notwithstanding the silence, on this point, of lexicographers and grammarians. Proofs are subjoined.

The first that I shall adduce occurs in an anonymous poem, supposed to date before 1430, found at pp. 86, 87, of Hymns to the Virgin and Christ, etc. (1867):

> "It is rathir to bileeve the wageringe wiinde
> Than the chaungeable world that makith men so blinde."

The second is from Bishop Pecock's Repressor, written about 1456: "And, certis, in such aventure, it were rather to truste to the conscience and discrecion of him which is in state of a reuler, than to the conscience of hem whiche ben in the state of hem that ben to be reulid." Vol. ii., p. 393.

The third is from Lord Berners's translation of Froissart, executed in the time of Henry VIII.: "For I had rather the welth [i.e., welfare] of hym that hath maryed my doughter, than of hym that never dyd nothyng for me, though I have maryed his suster." Vol. i., p. 41 (ed. 1812).

In the anonymous Thersytes, which appeared a few years after Lord Berners's death in 1532, is the verse:

> "I thincke thou haddest rather alyve to be flayne."

Even in the days of James I., the consciousness that rather meant "preferable" lingered on. This signification of the word is pretty plainly recognized by Edward Brerewood (d. 1613), who writes: "Had the Apostles rather a man should perish of famine than be releived of his owne?" A Second Treatise of the Sabbath (1632), p. 17. Had is, with some probability, a strict preterite here; the sense then being: "Did the Apostles hold it to be better," etc.

"I had rather go," to be construed "I should deem going more eligible," is, therefore, simply a way that obtained, in older English, of expressing "I should think it better that I went," or "I somewhat prefer to go."

Your obedient servant,

FITZEDWARD HALL.

MARLESFORD, Sept. 1, 1880.

In my letter which you printed on the 10th of last June, I quoted, for the intransitive verb claim, a book published in 1648. But Bishop Pecock, nearly two hundred years earlier, wrote: "Certis, no man mai cleyme . . . that . . . this word . . . schulde needis bitokene a graved ymage," etc. The Repressor, vol. i., p. 140.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a single one of many cheering signs that, notwithstanding the contempt with which both parties in the campaign have treated civil-service reform, the importance of the subject is being more and more recognized by earnest and thoughtful people of all classes, will you allow me to mention the fact that at the Michigan State Conference of Unitarian Churches, held in Detroit last week, a paper on civil-service reform was read by Rev. C. G. Howland, of Kalamazoo—long an earnest advocate of the subject—and in the subsequent discussion of the paper it came to light that every minister of the Conference was an active friend of the reform. Accordingly the Conference took action (1) to open the way for Mr. Howland to give the paper (which was regarded as a very able presentation of the subject) as a lecture in as many towns of the State as possible within the next few weeks, and then (2) to publish the same in large quantities for free general distribution as a "religious tract," believing that political corruption is an evil fatal alike to government, society, and religion, and that reform of the civil service is the most important moral as well as political issue now before the country. J. T. S.

ANN ARBOR, MICH., Oct. 27, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We have watched with pleasure the agitation of the question of a Civil-Service Reform Publication Society in your columns, and are glad to see your announcement that the subject is taking tangible shape, and that a society will likely be organized soon after the Presidential election. Thus far all the proffers seem to be in cash subscriptions, for the formation of a Publishing Bureau. Believing that the enlistment in the good cause of as many as possible of the already-established newspapers and periodicals will be of advantage in reaching the masses, we modestly volunteer in the new army, and pledge ourselves to do all that a weekly newspaper with sixteen hundred subscribers can. In our own weak way we had already commenced the fight, but we know that under the guidance of a well-managed bureau our battling may be made more effective. We hope to see many other papers speedily fall into line, if such aid is considered acceptable.

Truly yours, W. W. SCOTT.

OFFICE OF THE "IRON VALLEY REPORTER," CANAL DOVER, OHIO, Oct. 22, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Some of your correspondents seem to be anxious as to the possible partisan bent of a Civil-Service Reform Publication Society. The anxiety seems to me to be easily removable. Let the Society systematically decline to "endorse" any candidate, of either party; but let it publish the names of candidates for any office—Congressional, Presidential, State, or local—who are personally pledged against appointments or removals for political reasons, and for complete civil-service reform; and let those who join the Society do so under a pledge not to vote for any candidate not so pledged. Nothing will be more apt to make the average politician "pledge" himself to anything than the imminent refusal of any large fraction of voters to "come out." J.

NORWALK, CONN., Oct. 28, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A good cause is sometimes endangered by the excessive zeal of imprudent friends. The cause of civil-service reform, it seems to me, is exposed to peril from this source. Its advocates quite generally appear to demand not merely that members of Congress shall not exercise a controlling influence in the selection of civil officers, appointed by the Executive, but that the President shall carefully abstain from holding any communication with members of Congress respecting the selection of such officers. Thus, the passage in General Garfield's letter accepting the nomination for the Presidency has been sharply criticised, because he says in it, with reference to executive appointments:

"To select wisely from our vast population those who are best fitted for the many offices to be filled requires an acquaintance far beyond the range of one man. The Executive should, therefore, seek and receive the information and assistance of those whose knowledge of the communities in which the duties are to be performed thus qualifies them to aid in making the wisest choice."

A writer in the Nation of the 30th of September last declares that this paragraph is equivalent to an assertion that "Congressmen should have a guiding and controlling influence in appointing the civil officers of their respective States and districts." This is not a fair construction of General Garfield's language. There are other persons besides members of Congress who, by their knowledge of the communities in which the duties of officers who may be appointed are to be performed, are qualified to aid the Executive with information and assistance in making a proper choice. General Garfield would have the Executive free to seek counsel of all such persons, whether members of Congress or not. But some of the friends of civil-service reform, irritated by the recollection of past abuses, would have members of Congress utterly excluded from giving information or counsel. In my judgment this is going to an unjustifiable extreme. After all, members of Congress are not so much worse than other men. I have known several who were quite intelligent, reasonably honest, and for whose opinions and judgment I had considerable respect. A discerning and upright President may be trusted to hear the recommendations even of members of Congress, and to give them their due weight. The great abuse in the matter of appointments to the civil service has been the demand, by members of Congress, not to give information and advice merely, but to designate absolutely the persons for appointment in their respective States or districts. There is no reason to believe that General Garfield approves of such dictation, or that, if elected, he would submit to it.

As a friend of civil-service reform I hope that General Garfield, if he is our next President, will treat members of Congress with courtesy; that, in regard to removals and appointments to office, he will consult with them, but not with them only, nor with the purpose of being controlled by their suggestions; and especially that he will make no removals except for cause. The fact that a man has been chosen to represent his State in the Senate, or his district in the House, should not be held to disqualify him for giving information and advice to the President respecting appointments among his constituents. The public are quick to complain if a President makes many appointments among his personal friends and intimate acquaintances. He cannot confine his selection within such narrow limits, and if he goes outside of it he must rely upon information from others. It will be difficult to persuade the people that in so doing he should wholly ignore the representatives they have chosen. In seeming to demand such a course the civil-service reformers are doing their own cause an injury. The leaders in any reform movement must lead, but they should avoid going so far in advance as to be beyond the reach of the sympathies of the rest of mankind. The voice crying in the wilderness should not begin too far away in the wilderness. Civil-service reform has already made some progress. It will continue to make progress if its advocates are reasonable, temperate, and persistent. But, now and then, they need to recall Talleyrand's maxim, Pas trop de zèle.

MILWAUKEE, Oct. 25, 1880.

Notes.

A. D. F. RANDOLPH & CO. have in press 'Honolulu, 1828–61,' by the late Laura F. Judd.——Sidney Perley, Boxford, Mass., proposes to publish in January a new monthly, the Essex County Historical and Genealogical Register, thus supplementing the Essex Institute's Historical Collections and the less circumscribed Historical and Genealogical Register of Boston. It will be illustrated as far as practicable.——The Platonist, a monthly magazine of the philosophy implied in its name, is to be issued by Thomas M. Johnson, of Osceola, Mo.——The American Architect for October 23 contains a perspective view of the design for the new National Museum at Washington. The presumed necessity of conforming to the architecture of the Smithsonian Institution must be regarded as unfortunate. The building will be ready for occupancy by July next. The number for Oct. 30 is noticeable as being given up to a history and description of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, with heliotype and other excellent illustrations.——A partial bibliography of Parks and Landscape Gardening in the October Bulletin of the Boston Public Library should be useful to any one interested in the subject.——No. 11 of the Rhode Island Historical Tracts (Providence: Sidney S. Rider) contains sketches of the lives of two Rhode Island authoresses, Frances H. Whipple (Mrs. McDougall) and Catherine R. Arnold (Mrs. Williams), and of a well-known standard writer on law, Joseph K. Angell. It has some value as a contribution to the history of the Dorr rebellion, but is especially curious as recording Mr. Angell's endeavor to recover an English property without an heir—not the first or the last will-o'-the-wisp chase of the kind, but as well conducted and promising as any.——A revised edition of Prof. B. G. Wilder's pocket 'Health Notes for Students' has been issued by Andrus & Church, Ithaca, N. Y. It is commendable for general observance.——'Mary and I; or, Forty Years with the Sioux,' by Stephen R. Riggs, D.D. (Chicago: W. G. Homes), is a narrative of personal experiences in an arduous and often dangerous missionary field, and will have a certain degree of attraction for the religious world for its display of Christian faith and courage, especially on the part of the deceased Mary, the wife of the author. It does not give, or pretend to give, such a view of the special characteristics of the Indians, and of the considerations bearing on the question of their permanent civilization, as would make the book have any special significance in the discussion of the great Indian question.——'The Englishman and the Scandinavian,' by Frederick Metcalfe, M.A. (London: Trübner & Co.), is an attempt to give a lively and popular account of the customs, notions, language, and literature of the Anglo-Saxons and Scandinavians by picking out all the good things from the original books in both languages and weaving them together. If it were intended for scholars, fault might be found with it as not using the latest authorities on various matters; but it is sufficiently accurate and learned for its purpose, and may very well be a success. It is disfigured, however, by an unreasonable insistence on the superiority of the Scandinavians, and also by the use of polite slang by way of garnish, as we find it in the mouths of characters in English novels, not heretofore in the historical works of the fellows of Oxford.——Dr. A. Rambeau has printed in a separate pamphlet his paper in the Englische Studien on the relation of Chaucer's 'House of Fame' to Dante's 'Divina Commedia.' He has gathered all the parallel passages and expressions with true German thoroughness; but they do not amount to much, after all. However, Dr. Rambeau brings in much general exposition and criticism, and has made an interesting paper of it.——Dr. John Koch, in his 'Ausgewählte kleinere Dichtungen Chaucer's' (Leipzig: W. Friedrich, 1880), has selected for translation into German in the original metres ten of Chaucer's minor poems, which he thinks are most interesting and suggestive in connection with the poet's character and life. The longest and liveliest is the "Parlament of Foules," of which Professor Lounsbury lately gave us an excellent edition. The translations are good. The notes are brief and few. The Introduction, however, contains some interesting attempts to fix the dates and other circumstances of the poems.——J. W. Bouton is agent for the new Revue des Arts Décoratifs, of which Quantin is the Paris publisher, in relations with the Union Centrale des Beaux-Arts. The opening numbers criticise and illustrate the recent exhibition of the works of the late Viollet-le-Duc, among other matters of much interest. The photogravures are admirably executed.——Musicians will be delighted to hear that Breitkopf & Härtel, of Leipzig, are preparing a complete edition of Franz Liszt's articles and letters on musical topics, hitherto scattered through various French and German periodicals. The first volume, comprising the monograph on Chopin, translated by "La Mara," has just appeared, and four others are to follow. ——Parts 21 and 22 of Oncken's 'Allgemeine Geschichte' (New York: Westermann) conclude the history of the Crusades, by Professor Kugler, and begin the history of the Roman Empire, by Professor Hertzberg. The illustrations relating to the siege of Rhodes by the Turks are quaint reproductions; those concerning the Roman Empire are fine wood-engravings of well-known scenes and masterpieces of art, introduced by two fragments from the sculptured gigantomachy of the Pergamus altar, showing Athena and Hecate respectively in combat with the giants.

—Long before the Nation reached its thirtieth volume, readers who had preserved the files of the paper urged us to make a comprehensive index to them. Editorial convenience powerfully seconded this appeal, but the task grew more and more formidable while we hesitated, and meantime the associated libraries which have undertaken the continuation of 'Poole's Index' had included the Nation up to the present year, giving subject-references to select editorial articles and book reviews, and occasionally to the other departments of the paper, and affixing, where known, the names of the writers. The probable date of completion of this international enterprise we cannot indicate, and we should further state that the Nation index will not stand by itself, but will be confounded topically with that of the several periodicals embraced in the scheme. We have been lately surprised and gratified by receiving advance-sheets of 'A General Index to the Nation—Vols. i.–xxx., July, 1865–Sept., 1880,' compiled entirely without our knowledge by one of our contributors, who we can only hope will find his account in it beyond the satisfaction which he takes in making our files accessible for those who value them as he does.

—This Index will fill about 40 pp. 8vo, in three columns, containing references not only to articles, but parts of articles, and having this general plan: "(1) To place under the name of each author the volume and page on which each of his books has been reviewed; (2) to place under each subject and subsubject the volume and page of articles, notes, or reviews relating to it." We cannot speak of the execution as a whole, having only seen a portion of the press-proofs, but there is clearly no attempt to reach the standard of the advanced index-making of the present day, and cross-references will often have to be imagined by the searcher. For example, under Crédit-Mobilier, the references are to the original scandal, and not to the revival of it during the past few months, for which Garfield will probably have to be consulted. Inconsistencies like Aiskulos and Alexander, Athens and Crêtê and Cyprus, occur in the treatment of Greek names. Biografy, Elefants, and Filosofy show the compiler's predilection for the new orthography, and Chymistry for the old. But these caprices are the "personal equation" which the user of the Index will soon get accustomed to and make allowance for, while divisions like America—U. S., Art, Bible, Boston, Catholic Church, China, Copyright, Dante, Education, Household, International Law, Politics, Political Economy, Social Subjects, Trade, etc., reveal the real utility of the work. Without endorsing it, therefore, as the best that could have been done, we can heartily recommend it as worth far more than it costs, to say nothing of its being the only actual Index, with no great probability of ever having a rival. Our next issue will probably contain the compiler's advertisement.

—The 'Bibliography of the State of Ohio,' prepared and issued by Mr. Peter G. Thomson, of Cincinnati, is welcome not only in and for itself but as adding another American publisher to the list of American authors. Eastern examples of such a conjunction are, if not so numerous as might be desired, still not rare; and in Cincinnati Mr. Robert Clarke had already shown that scholarship and research and literary aptitude are compatible with success in the manufacture and sale of books. The Ohio Valley Historical Series, which he inspired and supported as long as he was able, is fitly supplemented by Mr. Thomson's Bibliography, an elegant royal octavo volume of 436 pp., printed on heavy paper, with broad margins and rubrics, in unexceptionable taste. It contains some 1,400 titles, from which the ordinary public documents have been excluded, but among which are recorded all the publications of the State geological surveys and the laws of the Northwestern Territories. It ranks ninth in the order of State bibliographies, for only Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Maryland, Minnesota, and Wisconsin can point to similar undertakings; in all other respects it is perhaps second to none. Mr. Thomson has personally examined nearly every work on his list, and in the case of the rarer ones he indicates the libraries in which they may be found. He appends, wherever advisable, notes, both explanatory and critical, and not seldom gossipy, ending with an exhibit of the prices which the work in hand has brought at various sales. The Braddock literature, with Washington's Journal; Harrisoniana, which embraces no less than thirteen campaign lives (with Caleb Cushing and Richard Hildreth among the writers of them) and nine campaign song-books, besides endless sermons, eulogies, etc.; American, German, and French editions of Heckewelder's 'History, etc., of the Indian Nations'; the literature of "Symmes's theory" of the inner constitution of the globe, which enables Mr. Thomson in a note to describe the theory and sketch the life of its eccentric inventor; and the 'Book of Mormon,' of which the second edition was published in Cincinnati, are perhaps the salient features of the Bibliography. Classics like Burnet's and Doddridge's 'Notes,' Finley's 'Life among the Indians,' Christian Frederick Post's 'Second Journal,' and even Ashe's bogus 'Travels in America' and Josiah Priest's 'American Antiquities,' of course, are here, and among the eminent names not already cited we meet with J. Q. Adams, Lyman Beecher, T. Corwin, Michaux and Rafinesque, Paine and Volney; and, of an earlier generation, Governor Thomas Pownall. An appendix of omitted titles, a subject-index, and a list of sales conclude and complete this praiseworthy performance.

—We find in the London Athenæum of Oct. 16 a fuller statement than we were able to make a fortnight ago, from the Messrs. Harper's prospectus, concerning the English edition of their Monthly. It will be apparent from this how significant a step towards international copyright, without the intervention of any treaty, has been undertaken by this house:

"A European edition of Harper's Magazine is to be begun in December by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. It has been through this well-known magazine, in the course of its sixty volumes, that many of the leading novels of Bulwer, Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, and other English writers have been introduced to American readers, and the use of such copyright material has hitherto prevented its sale here. This difficulty it is proposed to obviate by securing the right of serial publication both for Europe and America, and Mr. Thomas Hardy is now engaged upon a novel which, with illustrations by Mr. Du Maurier, will appear exclusively in Harper's. It is noteworthy that while English newspapers greatly surpass American in average circulation, the American illustrated magazines have, on the contrary, larger sales, Harper's reaching about 140,000, and its younger rival, Scribner's, which has already gained a footing here, about 100,000 monthly. The great outlay on illustrations, reaching sometimes a hundred in a number, that these magazines incur, would evidently be impossible did they not attain a very large circulation. The European edition will be partly printed here, the American editorial departments being partially replaced by English."

—We have received a circular from the "Rochester Astronomical Society," with permission "to use in any way most desirable." Upon second thoughts, and upon seeing it appear expanded and with a cut in the reading columns of such papers as the New England Journal of Education and the Illustrated Christian Weekly, it has seemed that some brief notice would be such a use. It chronicles the facts, among others, that "the new Warner Observatory which is being erected at Rochester, N. Y., is attracting much attention in social and literary as well as scientific circles," and that it "has been heavily endowed by Mr. H. H. Warner, proprietor of the Safe Kidney and Liver Cure and other remedies." It is also to be "the finest private observatory in the world," and as it is to be "specially devoted to discoveries there are good reasons to expect very many scientific revelations in the near future." Professors Watson and Swift, the latter of whom is to have charge of it, have already "discovered three intra-mercurial planets," which, considering the endower's ownership of remedies that are safe, suggests a paronomasia that is execrable, to be sure, but how otherwise to account for the connection between astronomy and patent medicines it is difficult to see. Does the science of concocting kidney and liver cures depend in some occult way upon astrology, and is it possible that astrology can have been developed anew by the "discoveries" of Professor Swift? In any event, it is easy to perceive that Mr. Warner has hit upon an ingenious device in advertising his astronomical appliances instead of his chemical compounds. Notoriously the ordinary means of familiarizing the public with the virtues of safe kidney cures have grown stale and monotonous, and such a novelty as this cannot fail to be admired. Whether scientific societies and individuals who desire to make use of the discoveries about to occur will be obliged to reciprocate by taking packages of the patron's remedies for general distribution and personal consumption, does not appear. Possibly the general impression that a man who is unselfish enough to build the finest private observatory in the world in the interests of science cannot manufacture deleterious nostrums, is all that is sought. At any rate, the conjunction aforesaid is odd enough to make us think that educational and religious journals which parade it should either do so in their advertising columns or make more fuss about it in the interests of novelty.

—The recent meeting of the American Oriental Society in this city (Oct. 28) was made especially interesting by the presence of Dr. Martin, president of the college for instruction of Chinese young men in European languages and knowledge at Peking. Dr. Martin made two communications: one on the Chinese worship of ancestors, of which he took a much more favorable view than that of most missionaries, asserting that it had done much to save China from idolatry and hierarchical despotism, and that any objectionable element in it might be left to melt out under the influence of an accepted Christianity instead of being made by positive attack the strongest obstacle in the way of Christianity; and another on new forms of Buddhism in Japan and China, in which, especially in the former country, is seen a notable assimilation to Christian doctrine. Prof. S. Wells Williams, of Yale College, read an article on Fu-sang, held by many to be a western America known to the Chinese; he showed by the circumstances of the origin of its description, and by the surroundings of the latter, that the notion was destitute of any shade of plausibility. The veteran Egyptologist, Professor Seyffarth, discussed the origin and date of the obelisk now in process of erection on Central Park. He pointed out that its current connection with Cleopatra is purely fanciful, and regarded it as first set up by Thothmes III., nearly 1,900 years before Christ, and further inscribed by Rameses II., 200 years later. Interesting contributions to Biblical exegesis and Eastern ceremonial were made from the Syriac by Prof. Isaac H. Hall, of Philadelphia. Prof. Whitney, of New Haven, discussed the methods of transliteration of Sanskrit in use among scholars, with the design of contributing toward the unification of their present variety. Mr. Perry, of Columbia College, read extracts from an exhaustive discussion of the god Indra as he appears in the Rig-Veda. Further papers were offered by Drs. Ward and Hübsch, Professors Short and Whitney, Mr. Rockhill, and others.

—The institution over which Dr. Martin presides is called the Tungwen College. It issued last year its first printed calendar in Chinese and English. From this we learn that, founded in 1861, it now numbers over a hundred students, with eight European professors, of various nationalities, and one Chinese, besides an auxiliary corps of native instructors. The full course of instruction is eight years; three are devoted wholly to the acquisition of European languages, the remainder to scientific and general studies, followed through the medium of those languages, but chiefly of English, for which alone at present the course is completely organized. The successful students are placed in the line of official promotion and put to use as interpreters, translators, attachés to legations, and the like. They are supported by Government from the start, and begin soon to receive a monthly stipend, which is gradually increased according to progress made. There is a foreign library of 1,350 volumes, besides text-books and Chinese books, and a printing-office forms part of the establishment. A list is given of works turned into Chinese from western tongues for the use of the college, mostly by its instructors. The institution was founded and is maintained under the enlightened patronage of Prince Kung, uncle of the boy-emperor. It is, of course, impossible to tell to what it will lead; but it is likely to prove an important agency in helping to break down the thick wall of Chinese exclusiveness.

—Miss Clara Morris is, we believe, the only American actress who has ever attempted with any success the modern French emotional drama. After an interval of some years, she is now playing at the Park Theatre several of her best-known parts, including that of Alixe, a rôle in which she made some of her earliest successes. The play is one which presents opportunities for extraordinarily fine and also extraordinarily bad acting. Alixe, brought up in the household of the Marquis de Césaranne, a happy and amiable girl, knowing nothing about her origin except that she is the daughter of Madame Valory, is in reality the illegitimate child of that lady, who is really the wife of the Count de Somerive. The countess had deserted her husband for the father of Alixe years before, and the husband and wife have never met since. The daughter sees and loves Henri de Kerdran, who is unfortunately betrothed to Lucienne, the legitimate child of the count and countess. Lucienne, however, knows no more of the previous history of Madame Valory than does Alixe, and imagines her mother dead. The Duc de Mirandol, a rich man, gifted with a great deal of good feeling, but also afflicted with a considerable share of folly, is in love with Alixe. The Marquis de Césaranne and wife, married and happy, are figures in the background of the play, serving to lighten its general gloom and tragedy. In fact, and it is a curious fact, if these characters and the duke were omitted, as they easily might be, the play, thoroughly modern as it is in feeling, would be almost classical in form: the unities of time, place, and action are preserved throughout to an extent very rare in modern tragedy. It is obvious that with such materials as the characters and situation present, abundant opportunity for tragedy exists. First, we have the revelation of the mutual love of Henri de Kerdran and Alixe, followed closely by the discovery that he is engaged to be married to Lucienne. Upon the heels of this comes the unexpected appearance of the Count de Somerive and the discovery, gradual but certain, by Alixe of her real history. Meanwhile, to deepen the tragedy, Kerdran has finally determined to break off his engagement with Lucienne and marry Alixe, so that the discovery of her wretched position comes at what was apparently going to be a happy turn in the tide for her. At one stroke her whole life is ruined. She discovers that she is illegitimate, that her mother is a faithless wife, and that she is the sister of the woman whose lover she is taking from her. Such a play could have only one climax—the death of the victim; and as emotional drama is nothing if not heartrending, we are feasted in the fourth act with a sight of the corpse itself. She has drowned herself, and the play fittingly ends with the scene in which her body is brought into the house of the marquis. The range of emotion in the part of Alixe is, of course, very great, and Miss Morris is an actress of such marked natural powers that she brings out many of the strongest points in the play with striking effect. She is, however, to our mind, much better fitted for parts requiring stormy and passionate acting than for pathetic scenes. It is difficult to imagine anybody acting Alixe perfectly. Certainly no English or American actress could do so, for the whole conception of the character, and one at least of the situations, is pre-eminently Gallic. Miss Morris is at her best in the scene in which she discovers her mother's guilt. Her bewilderment and horror over this are a good example of her acting at its best. The acting of Mrs. J. J. Prior, who takes the part of Madame Valory also deserves notice. The part is one full of difficulties, which Mrs. Prior overcomes with marked ability. Indeed, she makes it almost the principal part of the play.

—The most interesting event of last week's Italian opera was the reproduction of "Rigoletto," with Madame Gerster in the cast, who, for the first time in this country, assumed the part of Gilda, one of the most interesting and effective characters on the Italian operatic stage. Never before has Madame Gerster so fully displayed her splendid dramatic qualities as she did on this occasion. Her girlish simplicity in the first act was charming, and the awaking of her love was beautifully rendered in the famous aria, "Caro nome," which she decorated with a wealth of florid ornamentation that was at times bewildering, while the broader passages were rendered with intense fervor and dramatic force. A delightful effect was produced by the artist as she slowly ascended the staircase to her bedroom; she ended her long scene with a high, sustained note of remarkable clearness and power, which faintly died away long after she was out of sight of the audience. In the great duo with the baritone in the second act she was equally effective; but she had reserved the full strength of her dramatic and vocal powers for the famous quartet in the third act, perhaps Verdi's best piece of work, which was the crowning point of the evening's performance. It is needless to speak of Galassi. Rigoletto is one of the most powerful parts of this admirable artist, and he infused it with all his habitual grace and skill. The new tenor, Ravelli, sang the part of the Duke with great brilliancy and animation, and Mlle. Belocca looked exceedingly pretty in her gipsy costume. "Favorita," with the same cast as last year, with Campanini and Miss Cary in the leading rôles, was given at the Saturday matinée.

—The 'Proceedings and Transactions of the Manchester Conference of the Library Association of the United Kingdom' has at last appeared, nearly a year after the meeting and just in time for the Edinburgh meeting. American librarians had received a foretaste of the contents through an abstract in the fourth volume of the Library Journal, prepared by Mr. Tedder, who seems to have a special gift in the art of précis writing. The volume is sumptuously printed, like its predecessors; but seems to us to be of less practical interest, a large part of the space being devoted to historical and descriptive sketches of the libraries of Lancashire, Cheshire, and Yorkshire. Mr. Parr's paper on the card-ledger, in which he has re-invented an American device, Mr. Cotgreave's on his indicator, and Mr. Walford's on library-fires are worthy of attention. The paper on the employment of young women shows some advance in English opinion on this subject since the London conference. Mr. Wilson's "Classification (meaning classed catalogues) in Libraries" contains many just remarks. The gist of it is that a system of classification should be made to fit the books, and not the books crowded into a preconceived artificial classification. But the author does not notice that a scheme can be made out beforehand from the books now in the world, as ascertained by a careful study of the innumerable catalogues published, and then applied to any library. Such a scheme, if it contains within itself provision for modification as science progresses, will probably be not only more logical, but more consistent, and therefore more convenient, than one built up day by day, as the author recommends, by the addition of new subjects as new books come into the library.

—Additional announcements of forthcoming English works include the following books of travel: 'The Expiring Continent: a Narrative of Travel in Senegambia,' by A. W. Mitchinson; 'Seven Years in South Africa,' by Dr. Emil Holub; 'A Trip up the Niger and Benueh,' by A. Burdo; 'Incidents of a Journey Through Nubia to Darfur,' by Sidney Ensor, C.E.; 'Tent Work in Palestine,' by Lieut. C. R. Conder; 'Pathways of Palestine,' by the Rev. H. B. Tristram; 'A Pilgrimage to Nejd,' by Lady Anne Blunt;

'India in 1880,' by Sir R. Temple; 'The Irrigation Works of India and their Financial Results,' by R. B. Buckley; 'Sketches from Nipal, Historical and Descriptive'; 'Voyage of the Vega,' by A. E. Nordenskiöld; 'Siberia in Europe,' a naturalist's visit to the valley of the Petchora, by H. Seebohm; 'Ilios,' by Dr. H. Schliemann; 'The Gardens of the Sun'—the mountains, swamps, and forests of Borneo and the Sulu Archipelago, by F. W. Burbidge; 'New Guinea,' by L. M. d'Albertis; 'Across Patagonia,' by Lady Florence Dixie; 'A Lady's Tour in Corsica,' by Gertrude Forde; 'Unknown Hungary,' by Victor Tissot; 'Holland,' by Edmondo de Amicis; 'Round about Norway,' by C. W. Wood; and 'Rambles among the Hills in the Peak of Derbyshire,' by L. J. Jennings. Kindred works to the foregoing are 'Coral Lands of the Pacific,' by H. Stonehewer Cooper; 'In Zululand with the British, throughout the War of 1879,' by C. L. Norris-Newman; 'With the Kurrum Valley Force in the Cabul Campaign of 1878–79,' by Maj. J. A. S. Colquhoun; 'Colonel Gordon in Central Africa, 1874–79,' with a portrait and maps, edited by G. B. Hill; and 'Voyages of the Elizabethan Seamen'—selections from Hakluyt by E. J. Payne.

—In biography we observe 'A Diary Kept while in Office, 1828–30,' by Edward Law, Earl of Ellenborough; 'Life and Letters of Lord Chancellor Campbell,' edited by his daughter, Mrs. Hardcastle; 'The Personal Life of David Livingstone, from his Unpublished Journals and Correspondence,' by W. G. Blaikie; 'Letters of the late Dr. Thirlwall,' edited by Deans Stanley and Perowne; 'Memoirs of the Duke of Saldanha'; 'Mme. de Staël,' by A. Stevens; 'Jane Austen and her Works,' by Sarah Tytler; 'Samuel Pepys and the World he Lived in,' by Henry B. Wheatley; 'Life of Sir Rowland Hill,' with a portrait by Paul Rajon; 'Life and Letters of John T. Delane, late editor of the Times,' by Sir G. W. Dasent; and 'Life of Sir Anthony Panizzi,' by Louis Fagan. Histories are not numerous: the third and last volume of Col. G. B. Malleson's admirable 'History of the Indian Mutiny of 1857–59,' for which, by the way, an analytical index, embracing also Sir J. Kaye's 'History of the Sepoy War,' has been prepared by F. Pincott; a 'History of Penny Postage,' by the late Sir R. Hill and his nephew, G. B. Hill; and an 'Enquiry into the Origin, Character, and Reform of the English Land System,' by Sir George C. Brodrick. In connection with this last should be mentioned a treatise, by Prof. Richey of the University of Dublin, on the existing legal relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland and the peculiar Irish legislation concerning them; and the concluding volumes of the 'Contemporary History of Affairs in Ireland from 1641 to 1652,' which include hitherto unpublished letters of Oliver Cromwell.

—We conclude with some miscellaneous titles: 'Studies in English Art,' a second series, by F. Wedmore; the third edition of Chatto & Jackson's 'Treatise on Wood Engraving, Historical and Practical'; 'Japanese Arts,' by C. Dresser.——'Horace's Odes,' select English translations, edited by W. F. Cooper; 'Studies in Song,' by A. C. Swinburne; 'Songs and Poems from 1819 to 1879,' by J. R. Planché, edited by his daughter, Mrs. Mackarness; a 'Selection of English Sonnets by Living Writers,' edited by S. Waddington; a translation of the 'Lusiads' of Camoëns, by Capt. Richard Burton; 'The Lyrical Drama,' by H. S. Edwards.——'The Power of Movement in Plants,' by Charles Darwin, assisted by Francis Darwin; 'Prehistoric Europe,' by James Geikie; a 'Dictionary of Ethnological and Philological Geography,' by R. G. Latham; 'Factors of the Unsound Mind, with special reference to the Plea of Insanity in Criminal Cases and the Amendment of the Law,' by W. A. Guy.——'Our Old Country Towns,' by A. Rimmer, illustrated; 'Edinburgh in the Olden Time,' 63 original drawings, 1796–1828, collected by the Rev. John Sime.——'The Letter H, Past, Present, and Future,' by Alfred Leach.

—Curious as the estimate of American literary work by English writers often is, it must yet be admitted that in this respect the palm is rather due the Germans, with whom it is a common notion that the only living American author of note and originality is Bret Harte. His works are in all libraries, more than fifteen volumes of Reclam's cheap edition of German and foreign books being devoted to translations of his sketches and novels, while enterprising newspapers, such as the Berlin Tageblatt, make great efforts to secure a new sketch from his pen, which is then announced weeks ahead in large type. Even the great Johannes Scherr, in the brief chapter on American writers appended to his admirable 'Geschichte der Englischen Literatur,' follows the taste of the crowd in so far as to devote almost a page of praise to Cooper, while Hawthorne is no more than mentioned by name, in connection with Neal, Kennedy, Willis, and Bird. As Germany has never produced any novelists that compare with the greatest French and English, it can hardly be expected that the average German should show better taste in matters of fiction than the average Englishman does, say, in musical matters. But it is somewhat surprising to see the attitude assumed by Spielhagen, who is by many regarded as the leading German novelist, in the October number of Westermann's Monatshefte, of which he is an editor, or at least a regular contributor. Under the heading "Ein lustiges Buch" he gives a very favorable review of Mark Twain's 'Tramp Abroad,' with a translation of the episode of the bluejay. It characterizes Spielhagen's sense of humor that he should give the first place among Mark Twain's works to this, his latest, production, which has certainly contributed little to his fame in this country, and of which the second volume is simply wretched, or at least silly. Spielhagen says that, with the best intentions, he cannot modify his views of American literature as expressed ten years ago in the preface to one of his works. An American drama is still a thing of the future; the lyric poets, Longfellow, Bryant, Stoddard, Taylor, etc., paint after European models, and the specific American elements—a tendency to moralize and indulge in descriptions—are, according to German æsthetic notions, a defect rather than a poetic merit. In our novels all is imitation excepting a few touches of local color. Of first-rate authors in this line, who might be placed by the side of the first German, English, and French, there is not one. Hawthorne is very much overestimated. He is all imitation and mannerism, and style is altogether out of the question in his case. Poe, as a writer of fiction, of course fares no better. The only green branch on the tree of American fiction—and that only of the short, sketchy sort—bears the names of Mark Twain and Bret Harte. Of Howells, Aldrich, and Warner Spielhagen appears never to have heard, and Henry James, jr., he probably takes for an Englishman. All this is certainly very discouraging to hopeful Americans. Apropos of Spielhagen, we may add that his admirers will find a portrait and sketch of him in Nord und Süd for October. The manuscript of the sketch got lost on the way and had to be replaced by another, which shows that even the well-organized German postal system has its shortcomings.

FURNESS'S 'KING LEAR.'*

WE have now an admirable hand-book for the thorough study of "King Lear." Mr. Furness gives us the substance of a hundred volumes in one. It contains a critical text, with all the various readings and interpretations and explanatory notes from the beginning to the present time, with the criticisms and comments of all kinds, lexical, grammatical, æsthetical, and the rest. Mr. Furness works with more ease and expresses his own opinions more freely than in his former volumes, and this is a gain. In an appendix there are discussions of the date of composition, the sources of the plot, the actors, the costume; extended passages of English, German, and French criticism; a good bibliography, and an index. In all there are 503 close-packed pages, and it is a piece of work which Mr. Furness and his collaborators may well be glad to have done. There is no book to be compared with it; it is indispensable to every student of Shakspere.

An examination of it shows that this, sometimes reckoned the greatest of Shakspere's works, is still imperfectly comprehended. After all the study of it a great many difficulties remain unsolved both in the text and the interpretation. In "Hamlet" the verbal difficulties seldom or never extend to the throwing of doubt on the meaning of a sentence; the coherence and familiarity of the matter enable us to follow the sense with confidence. But in the broken and exalted utterances of this play the sense of whole clauses is often doubtful. Mr. Furness's greatest labor must have been with his text. The printed originals are abridgments, and they are so different as to suggest that the copy from which the folio was abridged had been rewritten after the quarto was abridged. Mr. Furness follows the folio, but with many corrections; perhaps too many. It would be simpler and more satisfactory to most students to have the folio always, if it makes sense and metre, even though some other reading seems to be more perspicuous, or poetical, or Shaksperian. Shakspere is not always at his best, nor are we; we may see the dark passage in a new light to-morrow. Thus in I. i. 226, when France suggests that Cordelia must have done something monstrous and unnatural to make her father so curse her, she beseeches him to make known that > "It is no vicious blot, murder, or foulness."

For this Mr. Furness reads:

> "It is no vicious blot or other foulness."

It must be admitted that the new reading is at best rather an improvement than a necessity. Indeed, if "murder" is something too monstrous for Cordelia, the other is too tame for Lear's curses and charges. Mr. Furness might have taken warning from Mr. Richard Grant White, who at first accepted the new reading, but at last rejects it. The example may stand for one class of objectionable corrections; reading burdocks for hardokes (IV. iv. 4), because the botanists cannot identify hardokes, is an example of another class.

Mr. Furness is more and more disposed to adhere to the exact forms of words used by Shakspere. "Why should Shakespeare's text be modernized?" he says; "we do not so treat Spenser. Is Shakespeare's text less sacred?" So he has retained it for its, moe for more, vilde for vile, and the like; and he regrets that he has not printed the "then" of the folio for

* 'A New Variorum Edition of Shakespeare. Edited by Horace Howard Furness, Ph.D., LL.D., Honorary Member of the "Deutsche Shakespeare-Gesellschaft" of Weimar.' Vol. V., King Lear. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1880.

"than." On this hint Mr. Furnivall is about to publish a cheap reprint in the old spelling throughout, and it will be a useful book. It is perhaps better in an edition like this to take the mean between a literal reprint and the usual modernized page. Mr. Furness might, however, carry his adhesion to the folio much farther than he does in the direction of significant and reasonable spelling. In the first scene we find that he has changed weigh'd, craz'd, lov'd, and the like to weighed, crazed, loved; banisht, voucht, and the like to banished, vouched; interest to interess'd; honor, honor'd to honour, honour'd. It would be a little quaint but not offensive to have retained bountie, libertie, shadowie, dutie; the good old ending -ie should not have yielded to the penman's fondness for final y. So bin for been might well stand to testify for our American pronunciation. And why should such a truthful word as horson have its etymology and pronunciation disguised by heading and padding it with w and e?

Mr. Furness has noticed that particles sometimes wholly disappear through absorption into adjacent words, and he keeps a sharp lookout for them, and indicates them by an apostrophe. Thus, in I. i. 275 he reads

"Prescribe not' us our duty," because he thinks a to has been absorbed by the t of not; and in II. ii. 116 he reads

"Such a deal of man
That' worthied him," because an it is absorbed in That. But in neither passage is there any such absorption as he supposes.

In the critical study of "Lear" a great difficulty arises from the point of view. We easily accept the view in "Romeo and Juliet," where everything appears as it does to the eye of youth; Juliet, thirteen years old, is old enough. In "Hamlet," too, we see the world as it appears to one just entering the battle of life. The father of our Ophelia is still a superfluous old Polonius. But, as Shakspere grows older, he passes beyond the experience of great numbers of his readers. In "Macbeth" and "Othello" the point of view is that of middle age, and in "King Lear" the world is seen as it appears to an infirm old man. We must take the truthfulness of the presentment with a large measure of faith. We never have been old men; we do not know how they feel; we never have had thankless daughters; we never have been insane; we do not even know by observation how the insane act and talk. The difficulty of bringing us to this point of view is increased by the story, which turns upon the doings of the young married couples who have to entertain in their families the old king and his hundred knights. It is very easy to take the point of view of the young folks when they say:

"——your all-licensed fool,
And other of your insolent retinue,
Do hourly carp and quarrel;
Our court grows like a riotous inn.
Fifty of these followers are surely enough."

Change the sex of Lear. Literature has hardly a point of view more familiar or more easily taken than the married man's view of the worrying mother-in-law. Shakspere does not disguise the facts. He shows us the king in his unreason, his passion, his worrying, his domineering. How, then, does he bring us to accept his point of view?

The most obvious source of this power is the perfect utterancy of the king, the ease and copiousness with which he gives intense expression to his feelings. He is regal withal, every inch a king; and in the first scene, as we hear him dispensing kingdoms and curses so grandly and so strangely, we give the reins to imagination and bid farewell to the regions of common sense, as though we were listening to the heroes or gods of Æschylus. The difficulty of keeping us in sympathy with the old king afterwards is partly met by showing the young folk committing crimes against each other abhorrent to human nature, so that no one thinks of questioning the justice of their father's reproaches and curses. At the crisis of the play, at the tempest, the whirlwind of his passion, when conversation with other men must needs be pitiful or laughable, the powers of nature—night, and storm, and darkness—fill the stage; rain, wind, thunder become the old king's interlocutors in place of thankless daughters. We see the heavens taking part against us, and the gods killing men for sport as wanton boys kill flies. It is a matter of course that he who could carry us with the king to such heights of frantic passion at the wounds offered to his imagination and kingly pride, should be able to keep us with him in his truly human woe at the death of the daughter he loves. The tears shed over Cordelia need no explanation. But Lear's perfect utterancy in gentleness is as noticeable as that in passion.

Perhaps no other character in fiction or history has been set forth with such minuteness and eloquent elaboration, on the hint of so few recorded traits, as Cordelia. But the commentators treat her mainly as she appears in the final scenes. With her tears and smiles for her poor father, and her immortal voice—ever soft, gentle, and low—she seems the incarnation of filial piety. When her father appeals to her in the first scene to say how much she loves him, she might be expected, if she could not speak, at least to look her love, and tenderly deplore her want of utterancy. But she defends herself sharply in her silence, and commends her want as a virtue. She also roundly declares that she expects to love her husband, if she shall have one, and that she will not pretend to be wholly devoted to her father. Some of the critics expound these passages as showing that Cordelia had a spice of her father's temper. It does not seem to have occurred to any that she has already looked with love on one of her suitors; but that would explain much on better grounds than temper.

LUCA SIGNORELLI AND THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE.*

HERR VISCHER seems to foresee in his preface that few readers who are not unusually gifted with patience and perseverance will follow him through the maze of his historical, topographical, and biographical rambles. He does not, however, warn us that he means to dissect and discuss all themes, including such as the nature of the Deity, the Antichrist, and the Evil One; that he will touch on different philosophical systems of thought, including those of Hegel, Schopenhauer, and many others; nor that he means to quote largely from the book on æsthetics of Herr Fr. Vischer, whose flights of fancy are truly bewildering. He promises to spare us details on Rome, Florence, Lorenzo the Magnificent, and the popes, making sure that we are well informed on these subjects, and this generous consideration on his part gives rise to speculation as to how much more tedious the book might have been had he not given us credit for some previous knowledge and dwelt at length on these themes also. We have under our author's guidance the opportunity of considering Luca Signorelli, his work, and his relation to the Italian Renaissance from every point of view. To use his own words: "We will open the secret door into his studio, we will understand him at his work, we will listen to his monologue, we will look into his very heart; we will not spare ourselves any form of psychological or philosophical research"; and though the data of Signorelli's life are too slight and leave too many gaps for any very detailed biography, Herr Vischer has, by a close study of the work of this great master, done all that patient investigation and a warm sympathy for the personality of Luca Signorelli can do towards giving us the story of his life and work. Our author has spared himself no trouble in this labor of love. He made three journeys to Italy in order to see and study afresh Signorelli's frescoes; other journeys he made to the art galleries of Altenburg, Dresden, and Berlin. One cannot but be impressed by the earnestness and conscientiousness of the biographer, though one may deplore his not having given his work a more readable form.

The first part of the book is taken up with local history—i.e., detailed accounts of the history and government of Cortona, Signorelli's birthplace; of Arezzo, Florence, Loreto, Perugia, Rome, Città di Castello, Urbino, Siena, and Orvieto during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the master having executed works in all these towns. Then comes the biography of Signorelli's teachers and predecessors in art; for example, Lazzaro Vasari, who took him as a boy and introduced him to Piero della Francesca of Borgo San Sepolcro, whose assistant and disciple Luca remained for many years. A chapter is devoted to Verrocchio and Pollaiuolo, Herr Vischer having come to the conclusion that Signorelli during his stay at Florence came directly under their influence as a pupil, on account of a certain similarity in the type of some bearded saints to the works of both those masters; he also recognizes Verrocchio's mannered style of bending up the little finger in hands in movement, in Signorelli's drawings after his acquaintance and apprenticeship in the Florentine school, of which Verrocchio and Pollaiuolo are regarded as the Realists. Another chapter is devoted to the Idealists and Romanticists. Of these, Fra Filippo Lippi, Sandro Botticelli, Luca della Robbia, Ghirlandaio, and Benedetto da Maiano are most important, not forgetting Benozzo Gozzoli, who, according to Herr Vischer, is the only one of his countrymen gifted with gladsomeness. The great Leonardo is placed midway between the Romantics and the Realists, taking the highest place in either camp. Perugino's "angels of upturned looks and pious glances" seem to have influenced Signorelli, as also Pinturicchio, whose style is similar.

After this long preamble follows the life of Luca Signorelli, taken chiefly from Vasari and Manni. The former is a warm admirer of the master's work and speaks of him in these terms:

"Although there is great blame to those who, through the mere desire and pride of surpassing others rather than from a wish of usefulness or beneficence, do good work, this reproach cannot be given to Luca of Cortona, who always loved his art and was always kindly to whoever desired to learn, and wherever he could be of use to his profession. And the goodness of his nature was such that he never stooped to anything that was not just and holy, for which reason heaven, recognizing him as a truly good man, was very generous in the blessings showered on him. Luca Signorelli was an excellent painter, and his works were in such great esteem that none were more so at any time."

The name of Signorelli appears in the books of communal deliberations at Cortona as "Luca d'Egidio di maestro Ventura de' Signorelli." He is frequently mentioned in the archives of his native town, as his family was one of the most important, and he was elected nine times to the post of supreme magistrate of the "Signori Priori." At the age of ten he went to Arezzo to study with Lazzaro Vasari (1451), who, dying the following year, left him a pupil of Piero della Francesca (degli Franceschi). The usual term of apprenticeship was then thirteen years, according to Cennini (in his 'Libro dell' Arte' of 1437); but this term was in some cases curtailed to seven, and Herr Vischer concludes this must have been the case with Signorelli, though he may afterwards have remained with Piero as an assistant in his work at Borgo San Sepolcro and other places where he painted. What became of Signorelli after his years of apprenticeship remains a question. Herr Vischer is convinced that he then studied in Florence, and sees every evidence of this in his work bearing so much more affinity to that of Verrocchio and the Pollaiuoli than to that of his master Piero della Francesca. This evidence is scarcely convincing, for there are many cases in which the natural bent of the artist carries him quite in a different track from the one followed by his master.

The first work of Signorelli is the chapel of Sta. Barbara in St. Lorenzo at Arezzo. In 1474 we hear of his painting a colossal Madonna with St. Hieronymus and St. Paul in Città di Castello; this work has been destroyed. Then ensues a gap of four years, during which time he is supposed to have been at Florence, where he was recognized as a great master in his knowledge of the human form, for Vasari tells how Lorenzo the Magnificent asked him for a sample of his art, and how "he painted for him some naked gods which brought him much fame." From the year 1479 up to that of his death at the age of eighty-two we have very exact information as to his work and very few details of his family life. There is one episode showing how on his return to Cortona he found a beloved son killed by some sudden death, and how without tears he drew his figure most carefully. Vasari also relates that he lived splendidly, was always attired in silk, and was held in high esteem by all the great personages of his time. We further hear of his being at Rome in 1513 when Giovanni Medici became Pope under the title of Leo X. The most imposing ceremonies took place on this occasion in honor of the Medicean Pope. Signorelli seems to have made a long and unprofitable stay there, for a letter from Michael Angelo to the "Capitano" of Cortona describes how Messer Luca had come to him to borrow money in order to return to his native place and had never thought to repay it. Herr Vischer is much exercised by this letter, and cannot believe it possible that so honorable a man as Signorelli should have behaved so discreditably; he cannot reconcile himself to the thought of this standing against Signorelli's character for ever, and entreats us to believe some mistake must have occurred in returning the money. Greater familiarity with the artistic temperament might go far to persuade Herr Vischer that the occurrence is possible and quite probable.

After the comparatively short sketch of his life comes a chapter on the art and fantasy of Signorelli with relation to the Italian Renaissance. In this Herr Vischer seeks to show us the influences which went so far to form the art of this master—the literature of his time; the circumstance of his being an Umbrian; the wild and continually disturbed state of the country around; the orders he received from religious bodies for church decorations, on which, by the way, he seems to have bestowed less serious work than on the commissions from noble Florentine houses; the study and revival of ancient Greek art, which led to the more frequent use of the human form in pictures, and a thorough knowledge of anatomy, derived from the Florentine school. The tranquil life of Signorelli seems in contradiction to his art, which derived its color from the troublous times in which he lived, and suggested continual struggle and active movement. We have next a description of Signorelli's greatest work, the frescoes in the chapel of the Madonna di San Brizio, at Orvieto, representing the history of the Antichrist, the Resurrection, and the Last Judgment, which is supposed to have impressed Michael Angelo so deeply that it did much to inspire him with his own design of the Last Judgment. The subjects in themselves leave every margin for a vivid imagination to have full play. In the forms of his demons, so varied and full of invention, in the beauty of the figures of the seraphim, Signorelli shows an unrivalled power of expression. There is also a series of subjects from classical history, beneath which are medallion portraits of the great Italian poets, scenes from the 'Divina Commedia,' and mythological subjects. At Monte Oliveto, near Siena, is another series of frescoes, representing episodes from the life of St. Benedict, also very powerful, though less impressive than the great epic at Orvieto. A term of Vasari's, used in different senses, furnishes the text of a very long and needlessly discursive chapter. Vasari speaks often of work as "terrible," meaning sometimes awe-inspiring and sometimes merely lifelike and striking; whereupon Herr Vischer is very eloquent, and takes the terribilità as one of the striking qualities of the quattrocentist painters, and especially of Luca Signorelli, and here it is impossible for us not to lose the thread of his argument. He tries to explain what seems very simple and at once understood, therefore not needing much explanation, or else something that is inexplicable.

The second part of the book contains a complete list of Signorelli's paintings, with their dates and histories, explaining through what hands they have passed; also a second description of the work at Orvieto, with diagrams of the chapel. This will make the book a valuable work of reference. Subjoined is a list of painters who have all been directly or indirectly influenced by Signorelli's work: Michael Angelo, Raphael, and even Albert Dürer are among these, and Herr Vischer explains his reasons for each name on his list, though his grounds for extending it to such a length seem to us frequently insufficient. The portrait of Signorelli is a fac-simile reproduction of a drawing by Charles Fairfax Murray from Luca's portrait of himself in one of the frescoes at Orvieto.

Fourth Report of the Record Commissioners. (Boston. 1880.)—This volume embraces "all the records contained in the first volume of the Records of the Town of Dorchester," now incorporated with Boston. The earliest entry is in 1632, the last if not the latest in the book (which follows the jumble of the original) is in 1691. In 1636, "It is ordered that Mr. Duncan shall haue 10*s* payd him by the Towne for to transcribe all these orders into a new booke in a fayre legible hand." For the present and probably final transcript the Boston authorities appropriated $1,000.

The stern physiognomy of this Puritan community relaxes, under the genial influence of Time, almost into a broad grin. The "Tenn men" appointed in 1634 "to order all the affayres of the Plantation, to continue for one yeere, & to meete monethly," and who afterwards gave way to "the 7 men," were bound by the agreement that "whosoever is chosen in to any office for the good of the Plantation, he shall abide by it, or submit to a fine as the company shall thinke meete to impose." Moreover, "If any of these shall be absent without good cause, allowed by the rest, [he] shall pay for his so fayleing 5 shillings, any that shall come after the hour of 8 of the clock to pay 12 pence, and after 9 to pay 2 shillings," etc. By 1642 "our general towne meetinge" had become very disorderly, "by reason that men haue used their libertye to p'pound theere matters to the Plantation without any fore knoledge of the seauen men, and theere matters haue been so followed that diuerse things haue beene spoken of and fewe matters haue beene issued by reason that new matters haue beene vpsterted whyles a former hath beene in heeringe and so much tyme spent and lytle work done"; wherefore it is ordered that the seven men have "fore knoledge" of anything "to be agitated." The rules for "the Schoole of Dorchester" confirmed in 1644 enjoined the schoolmaster that

"4ly eũery second day in the weeke he shall call his schollers togeither betweene 12 and one of the Clock to examin them what they haue learned on the saboath day p^ceding at which tyme also he shall take notice of any misdemeanor or disorder that any of his skollers shall haue Committed on the saboath to the end that at somme convenient tyme due Admonition, and Correction may bee admistred by him according as the nature, and qualitie of the offence shall require. . . .

"5ly hee shall equally and impartially receiue, and instruct such as shalbe sent and Comitted to him for that end whither their parents bee poore or rich not refusing any who haue Right and Interest in the Schoole."

"9ly And because the Rodd of Correction is an ordinance of God necessary sometymes to bee dispensed vnto children but such as may easily be abused by oũmuch seũitie and rigour on the one hand, or by oũ much indulgence and lenitye on the other. It is therefore ordered and agreed that the schoolemaster for the tyme beeing shall haue full power to minister Correction to all or any of his schollers without respect of p'sons," etc.

The standing terror of the Puritan polity was the stranger who might become a burden upon the town. In 1658,

"It is ordered therefore by the select men of this towne that if any maner of p'son ore p'sons in this towne shall intertaine any soiornour ore inmate into his or ther house ore habitation aboue one weeke without lisence from the selectmen ore the maior parte of them first had and obtained, shall forfeit fiue shillings, and for every weekes continuance three shillings foure pence."

Hence in 1671 Francis Bale was taken to task "for Entertaining his Brother in law phillip Searle and his famely in his house without licence"; and Richard Butt for entertaining his father-in-law Stephen Hoppen, "whos answer was that he did not entertaine him, . . . but for to turne him out of doares, he could not Considering the relation that is between them, but he would willingly be ridd of him if he could"; and "the wife of Henery Merrifield" "for entertaining of their daughter Funnell, Contrary to towne order, whose answer was, that she was their daughter and Could not turne her out of doars this winter time but she would willingly returne to her husband as soone as a passadg p^sents." So, too, in 1679, John Jackson had to file his bond "to secur the towne from damedg" by reason of the further entertainment of "Op'tunitie Lane his daughter in law Contrary to towne order"; and the year before, the luckless "John Brown appeared and thought that he might Come into town to be inhabetant becaus born in the town and that he might be an help to his father and mother, the Select men did Respit the full determination at that time to know the towns mind therein and in the meane time his warning out of town to continue in force." But perhaps the most stubborn case here recorded is the following (1672):

"The Select men haueing sent for John plum and his daughter Mercy, and finding that his said daughter being marryed to Thomas Chub of Beuer lee, and being alsoe neere the time of her deliuery is not p'vided for by her said husband, nor taken home to him, but continues heer with her father, contrary to good order, and to the hazarding of a charge vpon the towne, doe therfore order and requier that the said Mercy Chub doe spedily within Six or eight days leaue this towne, and betake herself to her said husband. And doe also warne and order the said John Plum that he noe longer entertaine his said daughter, but hasten her to her husband as aforesaid," etc.

Instead of this the husband rather hastened to his wife (1673), bringing his father-in-law into fresh trouble, and in 1674 the worthy Plum was for the third time summoned to "Cleer the towne of them." For a final glimpse of the interference with domestic relations let us notice that Francis Bale reappears in 1679 to answer the selectmen's enquiries "Concerning his outward Estate," of which he seems to have had none too much, for they "aduised him to dispose of two of his Children, his answer was that his wife was not willing the Select men p'swaded him to p'swad his wife to it."

Our space warns us to pass over other marked passages of equal humor with the foregoing. We cannot forbear remarking that the Record Commissioners had proposed to reprint only the land records of this volume, but that a protest having been raised by very respectable citizens of Dorchester, a committee of the Common Council reported in favor of a complete reproduction, on historical and patriotic grounds. One looks for a Puritan signature to such a report, and it is an agreeable surprise to find it signed "Hugh O'Brien, Chairman."

The Worst Boy in Town. By the author of 'Helen's Babies.' (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1880.)—This book belongs to the new dispensation of books about boys; we were about to say of Sunday-schools books, but possibly we have yet to wait for Sunday-schools sufficiently advanced to have reasonable hopes of catching up with it. It is written in the now familiar and perhaps hackneyed vein of protest against the old order of pietistic juvenile literature, and is a defiant departure from former classic models in the direction of "naturalism." The author is felt to be a kind of Baudelaire, except for the fact that he is a little tardy with his "Fleurs du Mal," and as wroth with the false and affected academic notions of Miss Edgeworth and the Misses Warner as the early romanticists were with canons of adult literature then prevailing. He must be charged, however, with ignoring an important element in the construction of "naturalist" moral tales. They must be manufactured with a deft touch to be entirely acceptable. The author of 'The New Sanford and Merton,' and more recently Mark Twain, understood this better, and accordingly their works of this sort have a distinctly humorous quality, or at least a comic flavor, whereas, though it would be unjust to say that 'The Worst Boy in Town' can be read without a smile, it is perfectly true that the proportion of depression to mirth that it contains is dejectingly preponderant. Few things of the kind are more laughable, for instance, than the description of the strategy with which Master Tom Sawyer contrived to get his task of whitewashing a fence performed; it may be remembered that Tom was averse to labor but a thorough child of this world, and when given this distasteful job as a punishment compassed it by representing to a comrade that it was a very delicate æsthetic performance, and declining for a brief time on that ground to allow him to touch the brush. The author of 'The Worst Boy in Town' lays violent hands on this incident, and devotes a chapter to an account of how his boy got his comrades to chop the wood he had himself been set to chop for misconduct; and we are bound to confess we have rarely read twelve more dreary pages, and this not because chopping wood is naturally less humorous than whitewashing, nor wholly because the humorous possibilities of the situation had already been exhausted by Mark Twain, but because of what housewives call the "heavy-handedness" that the author betrays. Again, nothing is more requisite than a light and tricksy treatment when one is describing the absurdities of prayer-meetings, and the rollicking fun which boys who are not milksops may have by sticking pins into, throwing "spit-balls" at, and peppering with torpedoes the enthusiasts who take part in them. This sort of style will never do:

"Under the single slat which formed the back of the bench and directly in front of him Jack beheld the broad and well-patched trousers-seat of Nuderkopf Trinkelspiel, and Satan, who long ago became noted for putting in an appearance when the sons of God were in council (see Job, chap. i.), suggested to Jack that through such a mass of patches a bent pin might work its way for quite a distance without doing any serious damage to the wearer. Jack broke an anticipatory laugh square in two and closed his eyes in prayer to be delivered from temptation, but," etc., etc.

This must be described as irrelevantly labored, and before we get to the event we lose our interest in seeing the meeting break up in disorder. We must add that another fatal defect of the book is its lack of verisimilitude, and the danger it thus illustrates of falling into the opposite extreme to that of the old order of moral tales. "The worst boy in town" transformed into a mere puppet can have no more influence for good than impossible "Little Episcopalians." It is to be feared that the writer not only fails to treat his subject flippantly enough, but fails to conceive it seriously enough; and the latter, we need not point out, is as grave a defect under the circumstances as the other, and one we never expected to find in the author of 'Helen's Babies.'

Der moderne musikalische Zopf. Eine Studie von Emil Naumann, Prof. Dr. ü. Koenigl. Hofkirchen-Musikdirector. (Berlin: Robert Oppenheim.)—Emil Naumann's musical study gives us an insight into the present musical condition of Germany. We see how intense is the party spirit, how bitter the feeling among the worshippers of Wagner and Brahms towards the disciples of the classical school. The author is one of the neutrals whose number is very limited in Germany, and who, standing on a higher plane than the contending parties, should be able to give an impartial criticism. He is pained to see how many musicians have not the slightest perception of organic unity in the laws which govern music, and are wholly ignorant of the history of music. When the representatives of the classical school are in their most generous mood they assert that with Beethoven the history of music ends; while, on the other hand, the modern Romanticists regard Beethoven as only the beginning of the higher development, and some of them are willing to concede even this honor only to the Beethoven of the Ninth Symphony and the later string quartettes. Naumann, though he is ready enough to make concessions to living masters, is not of the opinion that any one has the right to make changes in the scores of the great composers of former times. The fact that Beethoven omits a repetition of the first part of the allegro in his Ninth Symphony, at once emboldens the newest of our new musicians to do away with all tradition and omit the da capo in symphonies and sonatas. Beethoven's last sonata for the piano in C minor, Op. 111, and his string quartette in B major, Op. 130—both works belonging to the same period as the Ninth Symphony—have an express direction for the da capo, and prove clearly that Beethoven himself could not have understood an omission of it in the light of a reform. Naumann thinks it equally unjustifiable when famous quartette-players spoil Haydn's lovely music, in itself so grand and simple, by an amount of false sentimentality and a number of pianissimos, fortissimos, crescendos, diminuendos, and sforzandos, that would make poor papa Haydn turn in his grave should he hear them. Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, he thinks, certainly stand in no need of having their taste corrected by these modern apostles. "Away with these dusty traditions!" they cry, "which impede your flight, and you will soar sunward like eagles." Therefore, especially, "away with the sonata! that most threadbare of the antiquated garments of the past." Jean Jacques Rousseau's "Que me veux-tu, Sonate?" might be excused on the ground that the best of them with which he was acquainted were the compositions of Samartini (1700–1775) and Sacchini (1735–1786). Had he been so fortunate as to hear Haydn's, Mozart's, and Beethoven's symphonies and sonatas he would have changed his mind as readily as, after becoming acquainted with Gluck, he retracted what he had said in his 'Dictionnaire de Musique' about the superiority of the Italian opera. With Gluck and Mozart the musical drama reaches its climax. Gluck pre-eminently is the master who in his own productions designates the exact boundary between music as an independent art and music as the mere reinforcement of diction. He who aspires to go beyond the great master in this direction can produce at best but a musical mongrel, which is neither genuine poetry nor genuine music. The so-called leading-motive (Leitmotiv) is not original with the musicians of "the future"; only the immense abuse of it is the special property of this party. The Leitmotiv existed two hundred years ago, but not as the mere mannerism which it has now become. When the theme in the introduction of the overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni" resounds again in the mouth of the Commendatore at the finale of the opera, or when the trumpet-signal in Beethoven's great overture to "Leonora" is heard again later on in the prison scene, the two themes, considered as musical prologues, are like an awful foreboding, and intensely powerful in their effect.

The last chapter of the little volume is mainly devoted to Wagner. After a brief sketch of the renaissance in Italy, and of the condition of music in Germany in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, we are told that the epoch of German musical genius begins with Johann Sebastian Bach and ends with Beethoven. Between this great beginning and this great end come in chronological order Haendel, Gluck, Haydn, and Mozart, equally great in their several ways. Composers of the later period like Franz Schubert, Weber, Spohr, Marschner, Berlioz, Chopin, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and contemporaries like Wagner, Liszt, and Brahms are characterized as men of great talent. All of them except Mendelssohn (and the exception is made only in favor of his oratorios, psalms, and church music) represent in greater or less degree the new Romantic school.

"The predominating tendency of Wagner's dramas," we are told, "manifests itself in the portrayal of the Germano-Christian world of the middle ages, in the idealization of woman (originating in mediæval Mariolatry) into the redeeming angel of man, who is lost in a world of diabolism and sin, such as she appears in Senta in the 'Flying Dutchman,' and in Elizabeth in 'Tannhäuser'; or again in an attempted glorification of free love, in the spirit of mediæval chivalry, as a mysterious celestial power which overrides all conventional restraints, as in 'Tristan und Isolde'; or, finally, in a revival of the 'Minne' and 'Meister' songs of the mediæval and succeeding periods, as exhibited in the 'Meistersinger.'"

In his love for themes from German mythology Wagner shows himself a true disciple of the Romantic school, though his Nibelungen dramas are somewhat of a departure from his general tendency; yet in the last of them, the "Götterdämmerung," he hints clearly enough at a speedy return, for the fall of Wotan and Walhalla would seem to indicate that the old Teutonic gods had not brought the fulfilment of things, and that something higher must be expected. In "Parcival" we have, as he himself says, the keystone of all his creations. In this drama he emphasizes even more intensely and passionately the Germano-Christian tendency with which he started, and which is the basis of his earliest musical productions. Naumann remarks that modes of thought which were perfectly natural, healthy, and justified in Dante's or Wolfram von Eschenbach's time, or in the time of the Crusades, are to-day morbid and affected, because there is nothing in contemporary history to furnish a background for them.

Franz Liszt, the second eminent "talent" in the new school, shows a close resemblance to Wagner in his symphonic poems "Tasso," "Dante," "Hamlet," in his oratorio of "Christus," and in some of his songs and legends. The events of his life more even than his works are proofs of this similarity. The great virtuoso, celebrated and applauded by the world, the artist who had spent more than half of a long life in brilliant gaieties and excitements, after a fantastic existence makes a pilgrimage to Rome, like a knight of the middle ages, there exchanges the coat of the layman for the priestly robe, retires to the Dominican convent on Monte Mario and soon becomes the favorite of Pio Nono, who calls him his faithful son, his "Palestrina." Another great "talent," though not so closely related to Wagner, is Johannes Brahms. Robert Schumann stood godfather to his first productions, and before he died gave Brahms a kind of prophetic blessing. Yet Wagner's influence upon him and his productions is easily traceable, no matter how much his disciples may try to deny it. They are, as a party, even more one-sided and conceited than the Wagnerites, and form as great a mutual admiration society as these. Who was it that announced the first symphonic work of Brahms as the "Tenth Symphony"? Not the worshippers of Wagner, but Brahminical idolaters. The essentially lyrical talent of Brahms ought never to have been compared with Beethoven, to whose unapproachable greatness Wagner comes at any rate somewhat nearer than Brahms, who is by nature tender and delicately strung, whilst the former puts the stamp of his powerful personality upon all his productions. Naumann closes his volume with the hope that by his frank and impartial criticism he has earned the approval and sympathy of all those who share his opinions in silence without daring to express them openly. The future will show how far he is right.

The Poetry of the Talmud. By S. Sekles. (New York. 1880.)—To one of the component elements of the Talmud the author of this book has furnished an introduction which is not lacking in interest and in merit. Such introductions are indispensable aids to any student of the vast Talmudic literature. They have been felt to be a necessity since Samuel ibn Nagdilah, in the eleventh century, wrote his 'Introduction to the Talmud,' and large is the number of such keys and guides which have appeared since then. For the Talmudic literature treats of the most diversified subjects, is almost all-embracing, and reflects all the various aspects of the mental life of the Jews during the seven centuries following the Maccabean war of independence, in the second century before Christ. The rich contents of the Talmud, embarrassing per se, become still more perplexing and appear still more entangled and chaotic in consequence of the lack of order and systematic treatment. Even the specialist who devotes all his time to the study of the Talmud will find it difficult, without the help of good and reliable guides, not to become lost in this pathless labyrinth. The one great element of the Talmud, known under the name Halakhah, and treating of the legal life of Judaism, has been systematized, codified, commented upon by numberless post-Talmudical scholars. Another large part of the Talmudic literature—and, in the wider sense of the word, the Midrashim, etc., are also included in this term—is called the Agadah, and comprises the didactic, narrative, and poetically fanciful utterances of the Rabbis in the period indicated above. The Agadah, too, has been the subject of a considerable number of books of diverse value. There exist Agadic chrestomathies and anthologies, more or less complete; there exist learned writings on the nature, and contents, and origin, and meaning of these peculiar products of Eastern fancy. A few modern writers on this subject may be characterized as being unbiassed and truly scholarly, while others still pursue the old apologetic and unscientific tendencies, and, by applying a totally unhistoric method, still allegorize even the grossest superstitions prevalent in those ancient times, and the grossest Münchhausenisms of a Rabbi Bar bar 'Hanah and others. By such perverted hermeneutics they succeed in finding in the Agadahs a premeditated symbolic and parabolic teaching of most sublime doctrines, of which the first originators of those portions of the Talmud had not the remotest idea. But is this allegorical method of explaining the Talmudical Agadah any better than the method of the Mohammedan clergy in Persia, who symbolize the lyric outbursts of Hafiz, the singer of Shiraz, and who find, for instance, in the wine whose praise is sung by him a symbol of faith; in intoxication caused by wine-drinking, a symbol of the religious ecstasy of the soul; in the beloved maiden, the personification of the community of the faithful; in the friend with whom the poet spends his happy and joyous hours, a mystic representation of the Deity? This method, however, is by no means restricted to the scholars of Persia and to the commentators of the Talmud. The theological literature of other denominations, too, offers parallels without number.

Admitting that the Talmud, like every other contemporaneous literature, contains elements which no artificial apology can elevate into absolute and eternal wisdom, it must also be conceded that it is exceedingly rich in true poetry, lofty and sublime, and in sayings breathing the purest ethics. As to Mr. Sekles's work, we have to say that, in the absence of any similar book in the English language more thorough and exhaustive and scholarly, it is to be recommended as one which gives to the general reader a fair idea of the Agadah. In special chapters it speaks of compositions for liturgical purposes, of wedding celebrations, funeral orations, fables, proverbs, riddles, and so forth, and the examples and illustrations the author gives will undoubtedly appear to many to be interesting. In making his selections from the abundant materials the author must have had considerable difficulty. Very annoying is the slovenly and uneven manner in which the Hebrew words are transliterated. Sometimes the Dagesh forte is indicated by doubling the consonant, but in innumerable cases this has not been done. And thus we find the unorthographic spellings: Shamai, Kama, Vidui, Nida, Tefila, Tana, etc. Nissim (instead of nesi-'im, p. 7), sholom (instead of shalom, p. 12), sufdanim (instead of sappedanim, p. 12), bechoroth (instead of biccurim, p. 19), and similar other grammatical and orthographical monstrosities greatly disfigure the book. A little more scholarly exactness, a little more quickening of the philological conscience, a little less carelessness in these things are greatly to be desired, not only in our author, but in very many others who appear before the public as writers on Jewish and Hebrew topics.

The Progress of the World in Arts, Agriculture, Commerce, Manufactures, Instruction, Railways, and Public Wealth since the Beginning of the Nineteenth Century. By Michael G. Mulhall, F.S.S. (London: Edward Stanford. 1880. 12mo, pp. viii.–569.)—Mr. Mulhall's book, though not announced as an annual publication, is best described by comparing it with Martin's well-known 'Statesman's Year-Book.' The latter is intended to show, primarily, how the world is governed, Mr. Mulhall's work how it is growing. The two works present a nearly equal amount of information about the leading states of the civilized world, and some part of the data are similar in the two, as, for instance, the statistics of population, area, and traffic. But the space that Mr. Martin gives to reigning families and sovereigns is taken up in Mr. Mulhall's book with statistical accounts of the vital and industrial development of the different peoples. In the first part are grouped, in such a way that comparison may be made at a glance between the different nations, the statistics of capital, income, accumulations, commerce, landed property, manufactures, instruction, charities, etc. These are given mostly in round numbers; they form a more serviceable conspectus of the Western world's economic condition than we have elsewhere seen within the same compass. Part II. gives in fuller detail the leading statistics of the British Empire, and Part III. more briefly those of foreign countries, the latest sources of information being used. Mr. Mulhall has done his work with great care and intelligence, and he has found room for a number of the curiosities of statistics, vital and other. The book is well indexed.

ALL WHO ENGAGE IN

CHINA PAINTING,

Whether for pleasure or profit, will find their work greatly facilitated by use of the AMATEUR'S MINIATURE KILN (Patented), which enables the artist to "fire" small articles successfully as soon as painted, the process being very simple and expeditious. Cups, saucers, tiles, ovals, candlesticks, etc., may be fired in the small sizes; the largest size will admit any article not exceeding 12 inches diameter and 8 height. Prices, complete, $3 to $25.

Many artists who are using this kiln testify that its work is generally far superior to that produced by the old method in large kilns, and that by a little experience the artist becomes an expert in firing, being able to adapt the process to his own work in each case with much greater certainty of success than when entrusted to another person. With "under-glaze" work specially good results are obtained, the glaze being finished with remarkable brilliancy. Full descriptive circular, with testimonials, sent on request.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1880.

The Week.

AS if to give the finishing touch to the absurdity of their late canvass, the Democrats in this city are now busy in hunting up evidence of Republican fraud, which they hope to get in sufficient quantity to do away with the Republican majority and induce Congress to throw out the State vote, or else accept that of the Hancock electors. When we remember that the party has been fighting tooth and nail in Congress for the last four years in defence of the theory that all elections are State elections, not to be either supervised or investigated by any Federal authority except when Congress passes on the qualifications of its own members, this attempt to convert Congress into a general Returning Board must be set down as of a piece with the party advocacy of "a tariff for revenue only." There seems to be so little judgment, or even common sense, left in the party management that we cannot, in justice to the large number of really intelligent men who vote its ticket, help looking for some immediate effort to break the concern up and try a new organization. We do not know exactly how a party "disbands," but it is plain that the hour for disbanding has arrived for our Democratic brethren. Neither man nor party ought to live after the brains are gone.

One of the stories they have got up as the basis for their proposed "protests" against Garfield's election is that twenty thousand illegal votes were cast in New York City. These voters, of course, were persons who came into the city for that purpose; but in answer to the request to produce some of them Kelly declares that they all went away the next day. Whence they came and whither they went he does not explain. The railroad traffic contains no trace of them, and there were no signs of them in the hotels and lodging-houses the night before election. They must, therefore, be hidden in the woods around the city and are trying to depart in twos and threes without exciting attention. It would not be a bad idea for Mr. Kelly and Mr. Dorsheimer to go out in search of them. It would furnish a good healthy day's tramp to two gentlemen who are doubtless suffering for want of exercise. If they are in the woods the farmers will know of it through the disappearance of their chickens, and if even one or two of them can be captured it will make the Democratic chiefs look a little less ridiculous than they do now. It really seems likely that some of these will pass the winter getting ready for an attempt to count General Garfield out. But if they do, fancy how the country will feel about them by March next, and what a hold they will have secured on the industrial and commercial world, which already distrusts them, and what a fine place their party will be for the young men who are looking to the future!

The comments of the Southern press on the election have been moderate and in the main sensible and hopeful. They frankly deplore the stupidity of the Northern Democracy and the low tone given to the canvass by the party managers; and the error of taking up Hancock in preference to Bayard is also confessed. The weightier journals almost serve a notice of dissolution of partnership on their late allies. The Augusta Chronicle says the South "has for the last time been led lamb-like to the slaughter," but that where she will next go depends upon the solution of "the tremendous problem now confronting the two parties and all sections: Will the Administration of Mr. Garfield be, in case of a control of Congress, modelled upon that of Hayes, or dictated by Grant and Conkling, with Zachariah Chandler's spirit as the inspiring goblin?" The Charleston News says that if the apprehension can be removed that "the National Government will furnish the means for squeezing the South dry, as South Carolina was squeezed from 1868 to 1876," the Southern people will range themselves in accordance with their several agricultural and commercial needs and opportunities; and it proceeds to show that "New England is nearer to the South Atlantic States, in matters relating to finance and the tariff, than Mississippi and Texas are." It thinks, if the new Administration shows a friendly face to the South, that "one of the first questions that the Southern whites will have to ask themselves is, Whether the welfare of the South has been and is likely to be hindered or advanced by the alliance with the Democrats of the North?" and that they will "make themselves heard on this subject before the winter is past." The Memphis Avalanche says that the consequences of the election will be "the dissolution of the two solid sections that are now arrayed against each other," thus justifying the Republicans who voted with such a hope. Mr. Watterson, in the Louisville Courier-Journal, regards the late campaign and the issue as a sad failure, but begs his readers to let him "pass on"—"for God's sake, let us pass on!" This we take to be a renunciation of Bourbonism, though it sounds like a remonstrance addressed to a policeman. Perhaps as pleasing a symptom as any is the readiness shown by the Nashville American to treat the new Republican governor of Tennessee with respect and fairness. It admits his ability, and hopes to be able to act with him for the good of the State.

The newspapers are busily at work making up General Garfield's Cabinet for him. Foremost among them, and with a certain air of authority, is the Cincinnati Commercial. It gives Mr. Blaine the filling of the Navy Department, for the comical reason that "there is a great depressed shipbuilding interest in Maine"; to Mr. Conkling the Post-office for his friend Platt; to Mr. Cameron the War Department; and to General Logan the Department of the Interior. No Cabinet could be made to contain more of such elements of corruption as exist in American politics, and the suggestion has therefore a bouffe sound which makes it a possible joke. The same prophet declares that General Grant will probably have the English mission, "owing to the flattering estimation in which he is held by the English people," and to the fact that "his daughter is the wife of an English gentleman." The scandals of his Administration, too, against which the Commercial used to bellow so lustily, are, it appears, all forgotten and forgiven in consideration of his "admirable conduct since the Chicago Convention."

There is a certain seriousness given to all this by a Washington letter in a Stalwart paper, the Boston Advertiser, which declares approvingly that the Southern Republicans are looking to President Garfield for "a prompt and thorough reorganization of the Republican party throughout the South, by setting the officeholders once more to 'work' at politics—President Hayes's Executive Order No. 1 having destroyed the machinery of the party at the South." But with the officeholders once more enjoying their freedom, Republicanism, the writer thinks, "will again have a powerful organization at the South." Evidently the "old set" think that their day is again near, and that General Garfield will supply them with abundance of the old victuals. It is denied, on the other hand, with increasing positiveness that he has made any bargain whatever with the "Grant crowd." Nevertheless, it will be well for all independent organizations to keep together and strengthen themselves, with the view of passing an effective judgment on the new Cabinet and its doings at the first Congressional election under the new Administration.

The events of the week in Wall Street show that, so far as prices are concerned, the effect upon them of the election of General Garfield and a continuance for four years of the present financial policy of the Government had been mostly "discounted." On the Wednesday morning following the election an effort was made to create a "boom," but it was unsuccessful, and, although there has been no serious decline in prices during the week, it has required good speculative management and large foreign orders for stocks to keep prices up. These latter orders have been remarkable, and they are justly to be attributed to the increased confidence which foreigners have in the business enterprises of this country now that it is known that the Republican party are to continue in power. Securities and shares to the amount of fully $5,000,000 have been bought here for English account within a week, the bills drawn against the shipment of which have again driven the rates for foreign exchange down to the gold-importing point, so that the arrivals of foreign gold, which of late have fallen to a small sum, promise to become larger again within two weeks. It is fortunate that there is this prospect, for the New York banks, which are lending credits to the amount of $325,000,000, are, in their reserve, within $1,750,000 of the legal limit, and they have little aid to expect from the Treasury, which has stopped general bond-purchases to make preparations for the redemption of $13,500,000 six per cent. bonds, which mature on December 31. The Secretary has agreed to take any of these bonds in advance at a fair price, but they do not seem to be in the hands of persons who care to sell. There is considerable talk about measures to improve the currency. It is said that Secretary Sherman will recommend legislation to deprive U. S. notes of their legal-tender quality; and it has been suggested that these notes be paid off, so far as the coin in the Treasury will serve, and the remainder funded into 3 per cent. bonds, thus giving the whole business of issuing credit currency to the banks, to which it properly belongs.

The Virginia Funders had a narrow margin to spare, and their exultation over the Readjusters is tempered by the unexpected revelation of their danger from the Republicans, who came within a few thousand of carrying the State and elected two Congressmen by large majorities. The Mahone faction has undoubtedly lost a good deal of prestige by the poor showing its electoral ticket made, and General Mahone himself is properly mad. He says that next year when the State officers are elected his party will recover itself, and prove its claim of outnumbering the Bourbons. This may be true, but it should be remembered that the Readjusters ran a separate electoral ticket for the sole purpose of keeping their organization intact and demonstrating their numerical superiority with a view to the State election next year. In this they have failed conspicuously, and it remains to be seen whether they have not thus lost their hold over the uncertain voters. Mahone explains his defeat as due in part to desertions from his ranks of whites who became alarmed for the fate of Hancock, on hearing of a Bourbon plan to count the State for Garfield if the Readjusters were successful, rather than acknowledge their defeat by the latter (which is, of course, nonsense), and in part to the desertion of "the deluded blacks." He is as bitter against the blacks as his political shrewdness will permit, but, while reproaching them for treachery to the party which had "suffered and done so much" for them, he still looks to see them speedily back again. They are already beginning to see, he thinks, that they have been put to a "selfish use" (which is a neat saying in the mouth of Mahone) by the Bourbons, who are anxious to have the color-line reestablished. He alleges positively a Bourbon-Republican conspiracy by which the former were to be relieved of the odious association of the blacks, and the latter to get them away from "their best friends," the Readjusters.

This seems imaginative at first sight, as it compels us to believe that the Bourbons paid the negroes' poll-taxes in order that they might vote for Garfield, but something dark and mysterious is needed to explain the phenomenon of their having voted en masse, voted as they chose, and got their votes counted. Some time ago the Times's "staff correspondent" deprecated the proposal to have this poll-tax paid by Northern Republicans, on the ground that since the Bourbons would have the counting to do and were desperate men Republican votes would be valueless, and the money might just as well be thrown into the street. We dislike to discover an error of this kind in this correspondent's information, for it indicates that he has not made the thorough examination of the condition of the South that he appears to have done, and throws discredit on a mass of most vivacious correspondence. He ought to have ascertained from Mahone the existence of the aforesaid conspiracy. There is, in fact, evidence of its existence elsewhere in the South, especially in the Southwest. In South Carolina, of course, and in certain Alabama Congressional districts, the antiquated expedient either of tissue-ballots or of bald counting out is said to have been again resorted to this year; but we hear of no intimidation and no outrages. The Republican committee claims three Congressmen in Arkansas, the Missouri delegation is badly broken, and in Tennessee the Republicans have been allowed to do just what they pleased.

The time does not appear to be propitious for local "Bosses." If Mr. Kelly barely escaped defeat with his municipal ticket, his Philadelphia counterpart, Mr. McManes, fared even worse. The local battle there was waged upon the comptrollership, in which important office the Independent Republicans desired to keep the Democratic incumbent, who had been put there three years ago by the reform voters co-operating with the Democracy. The evidences of impending disaster were so strong that three days before the election the "Boss" and his friends caused the regularly-nominated Republican candidate to resign, and appointed another whom they thought to be stronger; but, in spite of this strategy, the Democrat had a majority of 13,466 in the face of a Republican Presidential majority of 20,762—thus showing that more than 17,000 Republicans cast their votes against the "Boss" and his choice. This is emphasized by the Democratic majority of over 1,750 in a senatorial district, hitherto Republican, in which the "Boss" had defeated the sitting senator and caused a new candidate to be nominated. There are those, however, who are inclined to see in all this not so much an uprising of the independent voter as the revenge of the State "Boss," Senator Cameron, for the revolt of the local "Boss" at Chicago, a revolt which did much to defeat the third term. Even should such be the case, the symptom is not an unhealthy one, and the situation is full of promise for the friends of good municipal government at the local election of next February, when there will be no national questions to distract the attention of the voter.

The Pope has again disappointed the expectations at first entertained as to his moderation, and this time more openly than ever before, by an address to the six hundred old functionaries of the temporal power whom he still keeps in his pay, and who recently called on him in a body at the Vatican to pay their respects. He exposed several fallacies set afloat by his enemies—such as that he was not imprisoned because he was not subject to visible coercion; and that his speech was free, because he said what he pleased; and that his apostolic authority was reverenced and respected at Rome, and that nothing interferes with his doing all that is required for the government of the Church. On the contrary, he is imprisoned, because he is not independent; his freedom of speech is such as many of his predecessors have exercised in the midst of the torments of persecutors; his authority is not reverenced or respected, because in the city of Rome insults are levelled at him, at religion, and at the Church, and have even been carried to the point of celebrating under his eyes the anniversary of the occupation of Rome by the Italians. He cannot carry on the government of the Church properly because he has been deprived of the aid of the convents, and his appointments of bishops are interfered with, and many of his churches in Rome have been closed to worship and converted to public uses. The impunity accorded to heretics is also an offence to him, and he complains bitterly that in starting schools to counteract the influence of those set up by the Protestants he has had to do so under the common law like any private person. He winds up the enumeration of his grievances by declaring, with an energy worthy of Pius IX., that "he will never acquiesce in the present condition of things," and "will never cease to call for the restitution of all which, by fraud and deceit, has been taken from the Apostolic See."

It must be said that the Pope by no means confines himself to vain lamentations over his losses. He is meeting the enemy manfully with such weapons as come to hand. To counteract the evil influence of the state and Protestant schools he has set up at Rome fifty-two well-equipped schools, which have complied with all the provisions of the Italian law. In the number are included normal schools, technical and professional schools, and gymnasia, besides the primary schools, and he devotes sixty thousand dollars a year to their maintenance. The bishops, too, all over the kingdom have been instructed to open similar schools in their dioceses, and to use their influence to procure the election in the various cities of municipal counsellors pledged to substitute clerical for lay teachers in the schools of the municipality. The faithful are everywhere admonished from the pulpit, as in Belgium, not to send their children to the state schools where the others are accessible. It is estimated that there are over sixteen thousand priests and expelled monks and nuns now engaged as teachers in the Papal schools. This is, however, legitimate warfare, and is likely to be much more effective than the barren cursing in which Pius IX. indulged so freely.

The Turks have been guilty during the last three or four years of a great many pieces of audacity, but the last which they have perpetrated on their English creditors is probably the worst of all, and has drawn from the London Times a burst of bitter scorn. Their unfortunate bondholders, except those who are secured by the pledge of the Egyptian tribute, have not, as is well known, received a cent of interest for several years, and there is not the least likelihood they will ever receive any. All sources of income which the Porte possesses and which could be diverted to the use of creditors, are pledged to creditors who were wiser than the bondholders. Nevertheless the Ottoman Government has just published in London a pompous circular, inviting the bondholders to send delegates to Constantinople for the purpose of "settling an equitable and practical solution for resuming the payment of the interest and the sinking fund of the debt." As soon as the Porte comes to an understanding with them the bondholders are "to name a bank" to administer the revenues, the Government having, however, "general control," and "the bank" will then have the privilege of taking what it can get, and handing over to the bondholders what remains after the "general control" has had its share. The cream of the joke lies in the last paragraph, which says that "the question of the floating debt, with that of the Russian war indemnity, will be taken into consideration at the time of making this new arrangement." As nobody knows what the amount of the floating debt is, and as that of the Russian war indemnity is enormous, the suggestion that the bondholders should take these two liabilities "into consideration" is very humorous. The probabilities are that if the bondholders ever receive anything it will be through such an arrangement as has been made in Egypt, by which the Government will be deprived of all control over the finances, which will be handed over to European administrators, and the court provided with a fixed and moderate allowance.

A batch of the leading agitators of the Irish Land League have been arrested and are to be prosecuted for conspiracy on much the same legal lines as Daniel O'Connell was. That a conviction can be obtained if the jury is properly packed there is little doubt. O'Connell's conviction was obtained in that way; but then the House of Lords quashed the conviction on the ground that the jury was packed, and Lord Cottenham said that if that sort of thing were allowed "trial by jury in Ireland would become a mockery, a delusion, and a snare." How the Crown lawyers are going to get over the difficulty now it is hard to see. They have begun, it is said, by retaining most of the leading men of the Irish bar, leaving the Land Leaguers only the second-rate, but we believe some of the defendants are going to defend themselves, and if they cannot secure an acquittal they will at least make the "coort ring," which is what an Irishman once asked his lawyer to do when told he had no case and that he had better keep his money. Curiously enough the address of the Land League since the arrests seems to have been written by an American. It would never have occurred to an Irishman to talk of the landlords as "antagonizing our people." There is still very strong pressure being brought to bear on the Government in favor of a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, which was certainly very effective the last time it was tried—if we remember rightly, in 1871. Only five persons were arrested under it, but all the agitators and promoters of agitation who were at all known to the police disappeared like magic as soon as it was passed. Few of them care to spend even a week in prison, and if it seems sure, and there is no chance of evading it by a jury trial, they abandon the cause of the oppressed and "make tracks" for happier countries with shameful alacrity.

The Catholic clergy of the diocese of Cork have held a conference at which they adopted some resolutions which probably contain as fair and temperate a statement of the tenants' side of the Irish land question as has yet appeared. They declare the rents to be exorbitant as a rule, and give for this a very good reason in the fact that, farming being the only calling open to an Irish peasant above that of the day-laborer, the competition for farms is very great and any rent asked is freely promised. As a remedy for this the resolutions propose the basing of rents on a valuation made by a "competent, independent, impartial, and lawfully constituted authority." Insecurity of tenure they also pronounce to be one of the great evils of the Irish farmers' condition, and ask for fixity as long as the rent is paid, and the legal prohibition of any contract in evasion of this fixity. They call, also, for the tenant's right of selling his interest to any solvent person in case he wishes for any reason to surrender the farm; for increased facilities for the sale and transfer of land; and for the legal requirement from farmers and landlords of the provision of decent dwellings for laborers. They urge on the Government as "useful and feasible" the reclamation of waste lands. The resolutions close with a solemn denunciation of all "doctrines destructive of the rights of property," and of all persons who "by violence of language seem to suggest to our excitable people that crime may help towards the advancement of the tenant farmers."

The last annual 'Agricultural Returns' issued by the British Board of Trade throws some instructive light on the effect of the foreign competition on the British farmer. That a very large number of farms are standing idle for want of tenants is a fact familiar enough to the readers of English newspapers, but what is going on on the farms still under cultivation is not so well known. The area of the grain crop in Great Britain has decreased one per cent. since last year, and seven per cent. since 1870. Fallow land, mostly left in a very foul condition, has increased within the year from 721,000 acres to 812,000. There has, however, been a considerable increase in the area of permanent pasture and in orchards and market gardens. The number of agricultural horses has declined; horned cattle have slightly increased, but sheep and lambs have decreased heavily. Pigs have also diminished seriously in number—by 483,000 since 1878. The importations of all the British farmer's products have been increasing with (for him) alarming rapidity. They indicate, the Times says, "something little short of an economic revolution," and it adds that "the question involved is not so much one of the national supply of food as of the existing organization of society." In other words, it is raising the question whether England will be able to afford much longer the maintenance of the rent-receiving class. It is useful, it is ornamental, and it has had a splendid history; but it is apparently fast becoming a luxury beyond the national reach.

News has been received, it is said, by Mr. Maynard, the Postmaster-General, from Constantinople, that the three men who murdered Mr. Parsons, the American missionary, had been convicted and sentenced, one to death and the other two to fifteen years' imprisonment with hard labor. The letter contains also a considerable amount of what the boys call "taffy" about the Turkish authorities "affording every facility," etc., and "refraining from interposing certain technicalities which might have saved the criminals," with the usual rider about the intense hatred of the Porte for the Powers of Europe, but its "strong feeling of respect and consideration for Americans." We trust the State Department will not be thrown off its guard by this stuff. Mussulmans guilty of crimes against Christians in Turkey, when the prosecution is pressed by any Western Power, are always convicted with a beautiful and touching facility. The trouble is that the sentence against them is not executed. There was no difficulty in convicting the murderer of Colonel Comondouroff, but he has not been hanged to this day. It is very certain that the love of the Porte for Americans will not lead to the execution of Mr. Parsons's murderer without vigorous pushing, and for the simple reason that the killing of a believer for killing a giaour fills all good Mussulmans with horror. The probabilities are that during the coming year the Turkish affection for the United States will grow steadily, and so will the reluctance of the Porte to hang the young Circassian whom "the Ottoman Central Criminal Court" has just sentenced to death.

REFORM, THE NEAREST DUTY.

PERHAPS the most hopeful feature of the late canvass, for reformers, was the almost complete effacement, by Mr. Hayes's orderly and unpretentious Administration, of the scandals of the previous régime. We do not mean effacement from public memory—though Mr. Hayes has undoubtedly furnished his own party with an excuse for forgetting them—but neutralization of them as cherished Democratic ammunition. Mr. English, speaking bluntly for the body of office-seekers who nominated him, had declared twenty years to be long enough for any party to remain in power, without regard to merit, and à fortiori if this lease had been misapplied in corrupt practices. Ordinarily, therefore, a searching review of the whole period would have been legitimate; yet, as a matter of fact, it was felt by the Democrats themselves to be an anachronism to offer any argument older than four years for a change in the party government of the country. Accordingly their bulky 'Campaign Book,' which made such havoc in the Tilden campaign, proved little better than rubbish for the one just closed, and we saw McDonald's revival of the shameful story of the Whiskey Ring fall perfectly flat, not because sensibilities had become blunted, or because this adventurer failed to implicate Grant in the conspiracy, but because the reminiscence was irrelevant.

This ought to show us, it ought to show General Garfield, how easy it is to establish and maintain the traditions of good government. But there is another side to the picture: had General Grant or a product or apostle of Grantism been the Chicago nominee, the savor of the Administration now drawing to a close would have been wholly lost, a new edition of the 'Campaign Book' would have been issued and used most destructively, and McDonald's revelations would have had the same sort of cumulative effect in convicting General Grant of sharing in the public plunder that Oakes Ames's memorandum had in 1873 in making Mr. Garfield seem guilty of corruption. Now, if we go further and enquire what actually saved us from this contingency, we shall have to admit that the fear of the 'Campaign Book' was much more potent than any change in the party standard of morality wrought by Mr. Hayes and his advisers. We said last November of their Administration: "It is even doubtful whether we shall owe it the retention of the civil-service reform plank in the next Republican platform"—and in fact the plank was contemptuously ignored until it had to be ungraciously replaced; "and whether even what we do owe it—the purified atmosphere of the White House, an honest and generally efficient and business-like conduct of the departments without scandal or jobbery, and a very hopeful beginning of Custom-house competitive examinations—will save us from the return of the Silent, Strong Man to Washington"—and everybody knows how narrow was the miss at least of his nomination. But as early as June, 1876, immediately after Mr. Hayes's nomination, we wrote what follows:

"Let us not be misunderstood. We have no doubt he will surround himself with a respectable Cabinet; that his secretaries of state will never be chance acquaintances made in the railroad cars or at dinner-parties; that his associates will be men of honor and education; that he will be in good relations with the intellectual and moral as well as the material interests of the country; that he will not tolerate thieves or theft in his immediate view and presence; and that he will be the enemy of all kinds of jobbery. But this he might be and do for four or eight years without permanently or even sensibly reforming the Government or removing one of its Oriental features."

We shall illustrate the truth of this forecast by reference to the undisguised and unchecked assessments upon Federal office-holders made by the managers of General Garfield's canvass. Public opinion is now sufficiently enlightened to have pronounced this scandalous if Mr. Hayes had been seeking a re-election. It will, however, be too generally overlooked that this was precisely one of the abuses which Mr. Hayes fancied he could correct by setting the example of a voluntary renunciation of a second term. To quote the language of his letter of acceptance:

"The reform should be thorough, radical, and complete. We should return to the principles and practices of the founders of the Government—supplying by legislation, when needed, that which was formerly the established custom. They neither expected nor desired from the public officers any partisan service. They meant that public officers should give their whole service to the Government and to the people. They meant that the officer should be secure in his tenure as long as his personal character remained untarnished and the performance of his duties satisfactory. If elected, I shall conduct the administration of the Government upon these principles, and all constitutional powers vested in the Executive will be employed to establish the reform. The declaration of principles by the Cincinnati Convention makes no announcement in favor of the single Presidential term. I do not assume to add to that declaration; but believing that the restoration of the civil service to the system established by Washington and followed by the early presidents can be best accomplished by an Executive who is under no temptation to use the patronage of his office to promote his own re-election, I desire to perform what I regard as a duty in stating now my inflexible purpose, if elected, not to be a candidate for election to a second term."

It appears, then, that there is no necessary connection between a one-term Presidency and the exemption of public officials from forced contributions to a partisan fund, so that there need be no discouragement on account of General Garfield's neglect to adopt the logic and follow the precedent of Mr. Hayes. At the same time it is clear that no advance has been made during the past four years towards relieving a host of salaried officials from mortal anxiety about the issue of party contests, which is what makes the payment of campaign assessments compulsory, even when the President will not, and Mr. Jewell cannot, threaten the officeholder with removal in case he fails to respond to the call. In other words, there will be no permanent reform in this particular so long as the instinct of self-preservation makes a public servant the natural accomplice of the party in power. Mr. Garfield's Administration may be in all respects the equal of Mr. Hayes's, without, on the eve of the next election, preventing eighty thousand officers and their families from retiring at night with much the same feelings as the inhabitants of a besieged city who know that in the morning their homes may be given up to pillage if the defence should not hold out. Such a quadrennial terror we have called an Oriental barbarism, and no humane man will contend that it ought to be perpetuated, or that Republican or Democratic Executive Committees should be allowed to play on it, on the twofold pretence, first, that the party is the country, and second, that the civil service is an appanage of party.

All the existing political conditions, as well as our late experience, point to the necessity of a speedy embodiment in legislation of the principles of an unpartisan service with fixity of tenure. Only a constitutional amendment would place the reform beyond revocation, and the statutes which will probably precede such an amendment ought to have the longest possible time to run before a repeal can be attempted. If we could assume that General Garfield still has the reform at heart, we might expect him to select for his Cabinet men known to favor it, or who had voluntarily put it in practice, or who would pledge themselves to do so; to foreshadow clearly his policy in regard to it in his inaugural address; and in his first message to exhort Congress to consider without delay a measure for taking the civil service out of politics. One of the strongest arguments for such a course—and one which a patriotic President should not be afraid to employ openly—is the probability that the Republican party will by the end of his term have shared the general dissolution of parties consequent upon the rise of real, and the disappearance of sham issues. They will, therefore, sacrifice little or nothing by resigning their hold upon the offices, while they may (if they take a less gloomy view of their future) use the reform as a means of retaining on their side the moral elements of the country. Besides, if there is anything to gain from it it will be much more valuable to them if enacted in the very beginning of the new Administration: in the making up of fresh "records" the earlier virtues will be justly entitled to more weight than the later.

But is Mr. Hayes quite functus officio as regards civil-service reform? Long have we waited in vain for a promised message on the subject, with practical recommendations. What better legacy could he leave than such a message now? Heretofore there was no reception for it either among Republicans or Democrats, among Stalwarts or Bourbons. In December he will address neither the same Republicans nor the same Democrats that he parted with in June. A change has already begun in them—how marked, they themselves are unconscious, and will be until brought face to face with an issue which has no party bearings. Is it certain that Southern Congressmen would not improve the very first opportunity of showing that they have no further use for Democratic caucuses; that they have taken to heart the lesson of the November elections, and that they are ready to unite with any progressive and unselfish combination having in view the general good? Is it certain that their late Northern allies would shrink from following them even if led by President Hayes, when the civil-service plank of the St. Louis platform furnishes a handy justification? Is it certain, finally, that the Stalwarts would stand aloof, or oppose a threatened union of the elements just enumerated? Let the country have the benefit of the doubt. Let President Hayes's last word to the nation be, like his first, an assertion of the "paramount necessity" of a return to the practices of the fathers. He has now nothing to fear from Congress, and still something to earn in the gratitude of his countrymen. If he cannot point to one permanent result of his original dedication of himself to reform, let his latest utterance at least show that he retracts nothing of the principles so well laid down in his letter of acceptance; that the same high sense of duty animates him to "obey the voice at eve obeyed at prime."

SOME THINGS THAT KELLY MIGHT SAY FOR HIMSELF.

THE recent performances of the present Boss of this city have elicited more than the usual amount of reflection on the social conditions which produce Bosses and give them such a command of votes as Kelly has displayed. Ordinarily the discussion of these things is confined to Republicans, who are apt to be sore over the disappointments they occasionally meet with at State elections, when they "come down to the Harlem River" with what seems to be an overwhelming majority, and find the Boss waiting for them on the farther bank with a city vote which swallows it up and gives the State to the Democrats. At the last two elections, however, the Boss has played false to his own party. He withheld so many votes from Governor Robinson that the Republicans were enabled to cut him to pieces on the Harlem River, and take the Governorship for themselves. Now again Kelly has "traded" with the pure-minded men who manage the Republican party in order to get his friend Grace into the Mayoralty; that is, he has, it would appear, sacrificed General Hancock as he sacrificed Governor Robinson. He "left the city" with so small a majority that when the Republicans "came down to the Harlem River" he was able to offer no resistance. This last default on his part has been made all the more provoking by the fact, which has just come to light, that the Democrats were after all not dependent on Indiana for the Presidency, and that New York would have given them all they needed. They are consequently considering the social condition of the city, and the nature and origin of the political phenomenon called Kelly, with a gravity and solemnity they have not for a long time bestowed on any city affairs. There is an indignation felt towards Kelly in his own party which that eminent man evidently finds hard to bear, and against which he has been feebly defending himself in the character of a champion of religious liberty. This is not bad ground for him to take, for it would certainly look as if much of the odium visited on him was due to his being an Irish Catholic who has been instrumental in imposing on the city for the first time an Irish-Catholic mayor. It is certainly nothing new for the city to have a Boss. Kelly is, in fact, the third Boss who has ruled us. Fernando Wood was the first, and was when he became Boss generally recognized as thoroughly disreputable and depraved, although, we believe, a Protestant church-goer. Tweed was the second, and was generally believed guilty of stealing the public money long before he was found out, and was well known to be a libertine and sceptic, and his government was much harsher and more exacting than Kelly's. Kelly, on the other hand, is very abstemious, and possesses a most robust religious faith, and is not suspected of peculation of any description. His rule, too, has been very mild and indulgent, and he is the nephew-in-law of the Cardinal and owns a newspaper. He has, it is true, made bargains with the Republicans, but all the Bosses have done so. Liberty to do so is one of a Boss's prerogatives. He could not maintain his place without it. Kelly has published scandalous and filthy stories about a brother editor, but this is a disagreeable and yet solemn duty which the proprietor of a newspaper is occasionally called on to perform. Crises do arise every now and then when it is absolutely necessary to save the public from the foolish arguments of a rival by revealing one or two little facts of his personal history which he is trying to conceal. In fact, after a rigid examination of Kelly's case we are unable to detect anything in his career as a Boss which will account for the extraordinary detestation with which he is now regarded. He does, it is true, exercise powers which have hitherto been reserved by the unwritten law of the Republic for native Protestants. He "controls" forty thousand votes or thereabouts, it is estimated, in this city, and has grown, as General Grant says of Senator Conkling, to "great proportions," although he had no father to "teach him to reason" in his childhood and "correct his errors." According to most of the traditions and rules of politics he is certainly a provoking and unwarrantable person.

Nevertheless, there is much more to be said for him, and, though we make no secret of our dislike for him and his system, we feel bound, now that everybody is abusing him, to say it for him. In the first place, it must be borne in mind that he is practising successfully a strictly American art—that of controlling votes by machinery and the distribution of offices without discussion or legislation. He does, in other words, on a small scale in this city what Messrs. Conkling, Blaine, Logan, and Cameron do on a large scale in their respective States. He is said to be very ignorant, but we see nothing in his public career to convince us that he is any more ignorant than any of the gentlemen we have named. They may know more than Kelly, and perhaps some of them do, but they do not reveal it as politicians. We feel very confident that he is a man of more culture than Logan, and has a far keener intellect. In a competitive examination in geography or arithmetic, for instance, we are sure he could give Logan forty-nine marks out of one hundred and beat him. Logan, too, has only given a fortnight to the study of finance, while Kelly must have given at least a month. As a distributer of "spoils" and as a collector of "assessments" not one of these gentlemen can, to use the popular figure, hold a candle to him. He is really a very respectable financial officer, while a city of which Logan was Comptroller would speedily swarm with "readjusters" and persons in favor of "scaling" the debt. Whether he is as powerful a reasoner as Mr. Conkling is something on which we cannot pronounce positively, because we have never heard Kelly reason when he was in good dialectical condition and his mind was working at full power. He makes a very respectable speech, and it contains about the same sort of stuff as the "great efforts" of the gentlemen above mentioned. Mr. Cameron, according to the best accounts, cannot make a speech at all. Kelly is said to be autocratic and overbearing in his manner to his followers, but so is Mr. Conkling. Neither of them leads his public by persuasion or by any open instrumentality. The art by which Kelly has risen is the art by which Mr. Conkling has risen. He sees that his men go to the primary meetings and the conventions, and that when there they act under his orders, and he thus obtains control of the nominations, and takes care that nobody gets them but persons who will distribute the subordinate city offices in such manner as he directs. In short, he has his machine, as Mr. Conkling has his. But it is said he uses it for his personal advantage. Perhaps so; but do not Mr. Cameron and Mr. Conkling and Mr. Logan do the same thing? We feel quite sure that Kelly has some belief in himself. He is not, in his own eyes, wholly a trickster. He doubtless believes that he can govern the city better than anybody else, and he feels that he uses his power in some degree for great ends, such as the glory of the true Church and the political advancement of men of his own ways of thinking. What more can any leading statesman of the day claim for himself? The truth is that New York City is governed as all other communities in the country, whether city or State, are governed which live under Bosses. The advantage Kelly has over the other Bosses, and it is one which we have no doubt they envy him, is that his followers are more obedient and reliable. Nothing can be more illiberal or un-American than to try to confine the practice of Boss arts to natives and Protestants. These arts are open, like everything else in the country, to all who can successfully cultivate them, no matter of what race or creed. Kelly renders a service to his race and his creed in showing that in this field Irish Catholics can hold their own with the smartest and trickiest and most unscrupulous of any race or creed in the world.

One of the most curious attempts to depreciate Kelly and his system has emanated from Mr. Richard Grant White, who has been comparing the 'New York Directory' of 1830 with that of 1880. In the former he found that the Macs and O's occupied only fourteen pages and there were hardly any signs of Germans at all. The Macs and O's, Mr. White rightly concludes, were mostly Irishmen. An unseemly attempt has been made by one of our esteemed contemporaries to maintain that the Macs were in part Scotchmen, but this inference is much weakened by the ancient distich:

> "Per Mac atque O, tu veros cognoscis Hibernos;
> His duobus demptis nullus Hibernus adest."

In 1880 Mr. White finds that the Macs and O's fill sixty double-columned pages, and the German Sch's fill thirty-eight double-columned pages, to say nothing of German names which begin without the Sch. From these facts he draws the conclusion that the Irish have driven the Americans out of politics, and that the Germans are driving them out of different branches of business, and that as "one consequence of this change" "social life, properly speaking, has passed away." "In New York," he mournfully says, "society as a refining, cultivating, humanizing influence has ceased to exist." What he means by "society properly speaking," we are not sure that we know exactly. But we presume that he wishes to convey the idea that civilization in New York in 1880 is much lower than it was in New York in 1830. It is due to Kelly to say that there is no better proof of this than the change of names in the directory. New York of 1880 is vastly richer in everything that constitutes civilization and refinement than the New York of 1830. That of 1830 was a small colonial town, with little or no communication with the rest of the world. It had no libraries, no pictures, no music, no authors or artists of any note; no restaurants, no parks, no museums, no great public buildings; few men who had seen any country or who spoke any language but their own, no famous scholars, few great fortunes, and not a very large commerce. It had, for its opportunities, perhaps as good a society as can exist out of a great capital, but no society which can be called "a refining, cultivating, humanizing influence."

The proof of this latter proposition is easy enough. The City had a mob which, considering the smallness of the population (about 175,000 in 1830), was apparently, though containing so few Macs or O's, more turbulent and ferocious than any that musters under Kelly's banner. At the election in April, 1834, the mob fought all day in the streets, plundered the gun-shops, and were near capturing the Arsenal. Three months later in the same year a few Abolitionists were holding meetings in the city. The mob, incited by some of the newspapers, broke up the meetings, attacked the store of Arthur Tappan, wrecked the house of his brother Lewis, stoned the militia, assailed the house of Dr. Cox, an obnoxious clergyman, erected barricades in the streets which had to be carried by storm, and wrecked one of the churches, throwing the furniture and pews into the streets. In the August following, the stone-masons rose against the cutting of marble by convicts, and attacked the houses of several prominent citizens, and the troops had to be kept under arms for four days and nights. Mr. Stone, in his History, tells us that at this time a prominent citizen wrote to a friend in a neighboring city: "Buy me a quiet place in the suburbs, and, if necessary to complete the sale, draw on me for the amount. I cannot live here longer, for my property is not safe." And yet these were the halcyon days of Mr. White's imagination. Early the following year (1835) the mob, escaping from the "refining, cultivating, humanizing influence" of "society properly speaking," determined to attack a small body of wicked Irishmen who had formed a militia company, called the "O'Connell Guards," and began their operations on Sunday by three great fights, which lasted most of the day, and in the course of which a physician in large practice was killed. On Monday they fell to once more and "gutted" a public-house and dangerously wounded several prominent citizens. On Tuesday they would have continued the fray if the O'Connell Guards had not agreed to disband. In February, 1837, flour being high owing to a bad harvest, the mob broke loose again, mustered in front of the City Hall, six thousand strong, and thence marched to attack a large flour-store. They routed the police, broke into the store, emptied the flour-barrels into the street, stoned the Mayor, wrecked another flour-store, and, in fact, had their own way all day. They were supposed to have destroyed over six hundred barrels of flour and one thousand bushels of wheat by way of lowering the price.

The fact is, that New York has gained enormously within fifty years in everything that constitutes the glory and attractiveness of a great city—in arts, in literature, and in the security and commodity of life as well as in wealth and commerce and population. But this, instead of making the rule of the Bosses more tolerable or less discreditable, renders it the more shameful. Every man who knows what civilization means, and who believes that the end of government is to make life easier, more graceful, and more hopeful for the industrious and peaceable, may fairly cry out against it. But this right we must deny to the native politicians of either party. The Irish Bosses of this city are the legitimate results of the government by "Machine," which is as much a product of native ingenuity as the sewing-machine or the reaper.

Correspondence.

THAT CERTAIN SMALL USE OF MONEY AND SERVICES OF OFFICE-HOLDERS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Being one who is watching the civil service and the question of reform, I can add some facts to show how far the use of money and of Government clerks' time has entered into the campaign.

1. Money.—As soon as the campaign had been organized a call was made for two per cent. of all salaries. It was called a "contribution," but was made upon all. I know an orphan boy of 15, who has $25 per month, who was included. The "Stalwart" clerks, whom I estimate at 25 per cent. of all, at once paid and kept up an incessant talk about the meanness of those who did not pay. Quite a widespread impression was made by these men that if this money was not "contributed" the party could not succeed, and every Republican would be turned out upon the incoming of the Democrats. These men made it pretty odious for the delinquents. Later, the Congressional Committee employed collecting agents and sent them to see the delinquents. These agents received a liberal commission on what they collected. Neither the agents nor the committee-men have made threats, but the Stalwart clerks have been free in remarking that the delinquents "are spotted." After the October elections there was a general coming up of the delinquents, and, although a call was made for an additional one per cent., the indications are that from 85 to 90 per cent. of the assessments have been paid. These remarks apply to the departmental clerks here in Washington. At the custom-houses of the North I am able to judge from having visited a good many of them. Heavier per cents. were levied, and 100 per cent. of the levies collected. This was especially true in Maine, where there was a general belief that tenure was dependent on payment. The contributions called for by Mr. Blaine's committee were nothing short of direct taxation.

2. Services.—Many of the clerks in the departments went home to vote in the October elections and stayed till after the national election. This was especially true of the clerks from Ohio and Indiana. Many of them worked harder that month, at home, than they have done in a year in Washington. I know a clerk who acts as private secretary for one of the Stalwart leaders, and I honestly believe he has not done an average of four hours' work daily for the Government since the Chicago Convention. In addition to the time taken directly for campaign work, the Government has lost enormously in time spent in reading and discussing the political situation in business hours.

If this was necessary to keep the Government in the hands of the Republican party, it can be endured; but how long shall it be necessary?

NORTHERN DISTRUST OF THE SOUTH.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have a considerable and somewhat intimate acquaintance in several and widely separate parts of the North, and from my knowledge through these obtained believe that what your Memphis correspondent, in your issue of 4th inst., terms "hate" should be entitled "distrust."

The solid political front of the South; its readiness to accept without demur any candidate and any platform from the Northern Democracy; its apparent indifference to any question of public policy other than its own restoration to power, not unnaturally excite and maintain this distrust. I am certain that a large proportion of those who now act with the Republican party would hail with delight any action of any part of the South which would give evidence that they hold the right determining of some one of the questions of national reform above their local or sectional issues, and would be as willing to act with them as with Canada's nearest neighbors.—Respectfully,

T. E. C.

THE INDEPENDENT VOTE IN PHILADELPHIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me to refer briefly to several letters which have lately appeared in your columns. Mr. E. P. Wheeler looks upon societies for the furtherance of civil-service reform as mere "side shows" for the benefit of the Republican party, and says: "In other words, the Republicans in them are very glad to get Democratic assistance when the action of such a society will help the Republican party, but refuse their aid when its action will help the Democrats." In support of this opinion Mr. Wheeler cites three instances, none of which, I must be allowed to say, are in the least to the point. Neither Mr. Hayes, the Democratic members of the Senate, nor even the Chicago Convention are members of a civil-service society, or entitled in any way to be considered as exponents of the feeling that calls for the formation of such societies. It is rather to counteract their tendencies in some cases, in others to make up for their shortcomings, that such societies are needed. And to cite the action of the Republican party in reference to the tariff as an indication of what Independents would do in reference to reforming the civil service seems almost ludicrous. Such reasoning and such objections should not for a moment discourage independent men in carrying on a great reform movement.

The recent election furnishes at least one most conspicuous proof of the fallacy of Mr. Wheeler's views. In Philadelphia the City Comptroller, Mr. Pattison, a Democrat, had proved himself during three years' service a most excellent officer. The Republican politicians considered it most important to capture this office, and selected as their candidate Mr. Joel Cook, a man of ability and character. It was discovered just before the election that some actions of Mr. Cook, though not affecting his character or ability, diminished his availability; he was therefore forced to retire, and Mr. Jeffries, a man combining ability, character, and availability, was put in his place. The result showed that whilst the Republicans on the general ticket had a majority of over 20,000, Mr. Pattison, the Democratic candidate, was elected by a majority of over 13,000. The exact figures are:

Garfield, plurality	20,727
Green (Judge S. C.), R.	22,243
Graham (Dist. Att'y), R.	20,419
Pattison, D.	13,517

To elect a candidate in the face of a majority for the other party of over 20,000 would seem almost an impossibility, yet it was done. The above figures show that over seventeen thousand Republicans voted for a political opponent, not because their own man was objectionable, but simply because they believed that a man who had done his duty well ought not to be removed by reason of political opinions; and this is the very essence of the civil-service reform doctrine, which evidently has 17,000 disciples at least in Philadelphia. In the face of such action how idle it is to talk about "side shows" for party benefit!

It is to be remembered, also, that this was accomplished against the active exertions of the local Republican newspapers, which labored zealously for the party candidate, affirming that he was every jot as good a man as the Democrat. Moreover, it was done in the face of the almost overmastering interest that connects itself with such a Presidential canvass as we have just gone through. A more decisive proof of the thorough sincerity of the Republican Independents could not be desired or imagined. Before Mr. Wheeler inveighs against it, it would be well for him to point out some similar instance on the other side. None such has come to my knowledge.

Your correspondent, writing from Memphis over the signature of "P—n," insists on the "Northern hatred" felt towards Southerners. I think it may be said that amongst the intelligent Independents of both parties, who now hold the balance of power, and who, as admitted by many partisan Republican journals, elected Mr. Garfield, there is no such thing. But there is a strong feeling of disapproval of certain characteristics which are only too evident, and this disapproval is perhaps felt as even more annoying than hatred. The characteristics I refer to are: the narrowly sectional character of Southern politics and utter absence of interest in national issues; the absence of freedom of speech, as understood at the North. That Mr. Atkinson should have friendly attention from an audience that knew exactly the sort of speech that he would deliver, does not countervail this.

Again, Northerners entirely disapprove of the modes by which Southern elections are carried, the wholesale intimidation, tissue ballots, and false counting. They believe that the entire character of the recent result has been influenced by such means; that these means are dangerous in the South and contaminating in their effect on the North, naturally suggesting, for example, Mr. Barnum's present attempt to upset the recent election and throw the whole country into confusion.

Your correspondent "H. R." does not, like Mr. Wheeler, think the civil-service reformers insincere, but, on the contrary, over-zealous, and quotes Talleyrand to them as saying "Pas trop de zèle." Talleyrand said nothing so pointless. The story is, that after giving his instructions to a new set of subordinates, he turned as he was leaving the room, and added "Surtout, Messieurs! point de zèle!" And in his view he was, of course, right. He wanted intelligent machines, which the civil-service reformers do not propose to be.

M. CAREY LEA.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 6, 1880.

[From the above it clearly appears that, in accordance with the terms of his letter a fortnight ago, Mr. Wheeler is now under obligations to join the Civil-Service Reform Publication Society at once. Due notice will be given him of the proper destination of his subscription.—ED. NATION.]

SOUTHERN ALLIANCE WITH THE DEMOCRACY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: From your reflections upon the division of the Democratic party in Virginia (No. 800, Oct. 28) I beg leave to quote the following:

"'Read that honest confession, ye deluded people of Virginia who have innocently followed what you supposed was a Democratic leader,' the Richmond Dispatch exclaims in triumph; and there are numberless other untimely indications that fidelity to 'Democracy' is regarded by even those Virginia Democrats who object to the title 'Bourbon' as the first of political duties, in no matter what exigency.

"This is what renders it doubtful, at least to people who have no intimate interest in the honor of Virginia, whether Mahone is not performing a public service in exploding the nonsense and antiquity of Bourbon notions, even at the expense of cheating the creditors of the State."

Permit a subscriber who believes that the public has an "intimate" and direct "interest" in preserving a distinction between right and wrong, to take exception to even the appearance of immoral teaching in a journal of acknowledged ability and influence. I am sure that you will disclaim the advocacy of unsound views upon an obviously moral question, and cease to be doubtful whether a "public service" is ever rendered "at the expense of cheating the creditors of a State." The "political machine" against which you have so repeatedly and successfully waged war battens upon such sophistry and such fables as "the end justifies the means" and "anything to win," and imperils the permanence of the institutions of our country. Your well-known views upon the proper methods of conducting a canvass must force you to disclaim even the appearance of sanction to "cheating creditors," though the gain be the loss of the South to "Democracy."

Your zeal, too, apparently outstrips your usually temperate judgment, and you inveigh against the South for its "fidelity to Democracy." Your journal, with others of like influence in the North, denies to the people of the South an equal degree of culture, civilization, and toleration; and you base your hopes of our improvement upon contact with our countrymen of the North and the gradual and ameliorating influences of time. Is it not a little inconsistent, then, to expect the South, in the brief period of restored equality which she has enjoyed (only since President Hayes's inauguration), to cut loose from "fidelity to Democracy" and swell the ranks of a party which still grants ovations to, and crowds the places of public assembly to hear, a Conkling, a Blaine, a Cameron, or a Logan? It is true the "bloody shirt" is in some disrepute, that it is worn threadbare; but as long as such men are permitted to retain power and prominence so long will it continue a convenient and potent scarecrow to move the masses. Is it too great a guarantee to ask of the North that these men should be permitted to serve the country in some private capacity? Their utter and complete unfitness for the places they occupy has been demonstrated time and time again in your valuable columns; and their complete and voluntary isolation from all apparent interest in the momentous questions submitted to this generation for solution warrants the prediction that the nation may avoid chaos in the absence of their counsel.

Such fidelity as many of us of the South bear to "Democracy" is the natural sequence to the ordeal of "reconstruction" through which we have passed. The political history of our country will demonstrate the fact that the party in opposition to the existing Government has always been "strict constructionist," as opposed to the "loose constructionist" views of the dominant party. It is the history of all parties of all countries. Is it not natural, therefore, that we of the South, in passing through the phases of "reconstruction," defeat, humiliation, military government, frequent inroads of troops during elections (the last occurring in Virginia just prior to President Hayes's election), should throw our political weight with the party in favor of strict construction of the organic law of the nation—the party in opposition—the "Democracy"? We desire the disruption of the "Solid South," of "fidelity to Democracy," and a division of the country into parties based not upon sectional or territorial questions, but upon those affecting the permanent advancement and improvement of our common heritage. When the "Solid North" shall offer to the "Solid South" the complete retirement of "machine" and "bloody-shirt" politicians, and a return to questions affecting the vital interests of the whole country, then will "fidelity to Democracy" and a "Solid South" pass as quickly and irrecoverably away as the dreams of a night.—I am, very respectfully, VIRGINIUS NEWTON.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As I believe that civil-service reform is at present the one great question underlying all others in our politics I shall be most happy to subscribe to the Publication Society. The proposed plan of publishing and distributing documents for the purpose of opening the eyes of the more intelligent voters to the actual facts in regard to our civil-service system and its results, seems to me a most sensible one. I believe that it is the only way in which civil-service reformers can secure substantial and permanent success.

If the Publication Society is properly started on a non-partisan basis, and vigorously conducted, it ought to be able to effect a good deal before the next Presidential election. I am confident that there are to-day in this country enough voters who would be glad to see Government offices no longer the spoils of politicians to hold the balance of power between the two parties. There should be several times as many in a few years if the Society does its work well. Organize these voters, even in a rough way, and the politicians will compete for their support. I voted for Garfield, in spite of the fact that he has thrown overboard civil-service reform; at the next election I hope to be able to vote for one of the candidates because he favors civil-service reform, and can afford to say so.

If a meeting of those interested in the proposed society could be held during the Christmas holidays I think that many would attend it who could not be in New York at any other time.—Yours respectfully, J. Q., JR.

QUINCY, MASS., October 31, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The reasons given by your correspondent, Mr. Everett P. Wheeler, for thinking the organization of the proposed Civil-Service Reform Publication Society premature, appear to me, on the contrary, to tend strongly to the conclusion that such a society is urgently needed and ought to receive the support of every sympathizer in the cause of good government. When we shall have arrived at the state of affairs suggested by Mr. Wheeler as a condition precedent to his joining the Society, one of the most important objects it contemplates will have been gained.

Civil-service reform is, I believe, the most vital question before this country to-day, entering directly or indirectly into every other political problem under discussion. In the hope that it may be possible gradually to shape and direct so strong an expression of public opinion as shall force the subject into the prominence that it deserves, I and nine of my friends will gladly join such a society as is outlined in your issue of October 21. I write while the election is still undecided, in order to emphasize the fact that in our opinion the society, to accomplish any good, must be quite independent of either of the existing political parties.—Your obedient servant, J. M. L.

BALTIMORE, November 2, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There are ten of us here who wish to contribute our mite of $5 a year each in aid of the proposed Civil-Service Reform Publication Society, and to express through your columns our deep interest in, and sympathy for, the objects of that society. Our numbers can very easily be considerably increased. As it is, we may be regarded as a nucleus for a branch of any non-partisan central organization that may hereafter be inaugurated.

I may go on to say that the lively interest which is being developed on all sides in the condition of our civil service is a most welcome sign, and quite encouraging to that class of citizens who have not been able for some time to feel much interest in the contentions that have composed the web and woof of the politics of the country. It indicates, among other things, that now perhaps the time is close at hand when they too will feel drawn to take a part in politics, and may reasonably hope to exert a share of influence on that public opinion which chooses representatives, and dictates the measures and objects which they shall consider and enact. Once let our politics become interesting, and there will be no lack of attention to them on the part of those who are called the best people. For many years this class has kept itself greatly aloof from politics because of the lamentable absence from the political arena of any fresh and open issues, and the sore indifference of parties and the general public to suggestions and projects of a reformative tendency. But now at last the time seems to have arrived when the public mind is ready to attend to such suggestions, and if this be so we shall not have long to wait until the air is full of earnest, intelligent, and thorough discussion of most useful and interesting political questions; and among these questions the condition of our civil service, in point of present importance, no doubt occupies the chief place.

The general public is beginning to be aware that there is something "rotten in Denmark." It has not escaped notice that politics—national, State, and municipal—are too exclusively concerned with the spoils of office, and that the character, aims, and morals of public men do not keep pace in improvement with the progress of the country in wealth, population, and general welfare. Best of all, it is beginning to be seen that the peculiarities and faults of our civil-service system are the chief causes of our bad political ways, and the inferiority of our public functionaries. If this be the correct view of the situation then it is indeed plain that our proposed organization is as opportune as the need for it is urgent. After the pending election is over, the field will be perfectly clear of engrossing subjects. There is not likely to be any contest over the tariff; the currency question has been discussed to a definite conclusion; and there is no life left in the watchword of a "Solid South." But notwithstanding everything seems settled, still we do not feel at ease. The country is sensible of a grievous ailing somewhere, and great multitudes have placed their finger on the civil-service system, and the saying is heard in all parts of the land that the centre of the disease is here.

A. R. COOPER.

LOUISVILLE, KY., October 23, 1880.

Notes.

JANSEN, McCLURG & CO., Chicago, will shortly publish 'Club Essays,' by Prof. David Swing.——By authority of the State of Wisconsin, Messrs. H. A. Tenney and David Atwood, reporters respectively of the constitutional conventions of 1846 and 1847–8, have compiled and published a 'Memorial Record of the Fathers of Wisconsin'—i.e., of the delegates to those conventions (Madison: David Atwood). Besides alphabetically arranged memoirs of upwards of two hundred persons (some, like Alexander W. Randall, James Duane Doty, and Rufus King, having a more than local reputation), this volume contains a rapid sketch of the formation of the Territory of Wisconsin, by the editors, and again by another hand, census tables by counties from 1836 to 1880, and the text of the rejected and adopted constitutions. The genealogical value of the work is apparent, and the general reader will find in it some anecdotes of pioneer life, and an instructive exhibition of the way in which States have been formed.——The second volume of Mr. Henry J. Morgan's 'Dominion Annual Register and Review,' for 1879 (Ottawa: MacLean, Roger & Co.), marks the progress of a very useful work, needing further improvement chiefly in the direction of literary finish and typographical clearness. For example, the chapters on the political history of 1879 would be much more readable and available if furnished with topical headings. Something may be learned on this side of the line even from discussions of the right of the Speaker of the House to make administrative appointments during the interval between two parliaments; the right of lieutenant-governors to appoint Queen's counsel; the right of a member of the House to take his seat on a telegram announcing his election, while the certificate is delayed by storms (allowed, but not as a precedent); the duty of stopping the postal service on Sunday (principle affirmed, but application left to the Government's discretion!); the wiping out of the insolvency statutes (unsuccessful in Senate); the Letellier case, etc. The proposed abolition of the Supreme Court, the establishment of the N. P. (as our neighbors call their new high-tariff policy), the appearance in Parliament of fiat-money alias "national-currency" apostles, the Chinese question arising in British Columbia, the Government's cogitation over civil-service reform, its delicate relations with the Indians of the Northwest, etc., are other matters of interest to the people of the United States, let alone such cases of actual contact and collision as the right of Canadian barges to navigate our canals, the Fortune Bay row, and the Alaskan boundary. A full history of the national policy as to public lands and railways forms an important feature of the work.——From the review of Canadian literature in the foregoing volume we take the following titles of recent works: Joseph Tassé's 'Les Canadiens de l'Ouest'; the Rev. Dr. Ryerson's sturdily patriotic 'History of the Loyalists of America and their Times,' in 3 vols.; Judge Marshall's 'Brief History of Public Proceedings, etc., in Nova Scotia,' during the earliest years of the present century; and James Hannay's meritorious 'History of Acadia.' It is announced that the chief topographer of the Geological Survey is re-engraving, for a new edition, his steel-plate map of Canada of 1868, of which the scale is 25 miles to the inch.——Prof. A. N. Prentiss's articles on the "Destruction of Obnoxious Insects by means of Fungoid Growths" in the August and September numbers of the American Naturalist have been reprinted separately. They reach a conclusion adverse to Prof. Hagen's expectations of the utility of the yeast fungus, but do not discourage further experiments of a similar nature.——From recent numbers of the Français we learn that the so-called atelier de photographie of the National Library is about being opened to the public—a sort of exhibition room in which access will be given to fac-simile reproductions of the rare MSS. and engravings too precious for vulgar handling. Also, that the famous sculptor, Chapu, has set the good example of embellishing his native town with plaster-casts of some of his principal works, including his lovely statue of Jeanne d'Arc and the Schneider memorial at Creusot.

—Miss Kate Greenaway's artistic gift is confirmed in all its scope and originality by the pretty little 'Birthday Book for Children' which succeeds her 'Under the Window' of last year (New York: Routledge); and Mrs. Sale Barker, who this time furnishes the verses, is evidently a kindred spirit, and acquits herself well of her difficult task of matching every day in the year and its corresponding picture with a childish rhyme. Perhaps it is on account of the diminished scale that one feels that the "epoch-making" quality inheres rather in the earlier than in the later performance. Miss Greenaway does not lack the flattery of imitation. 'Ups and Downs,' for example, by M. J. Tilsey (New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.), follows the two nursery-books just named, at a considerable distance, it is true, but undisguisedly. The author is far from being Miss Greenaway's equal in design, or draughtsmanship, or color, yet now and again makes a good picture, and verses like "When Sunday comes" and "There are two boys we saw abroad" are clever enough. In 'Pretty Peggy, and Other Ballads' (New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.) Miss Rosina Emmet's designs recall R. Caldecott's more than those of any other predecessor, but for the most part have a physiognomy of their own. The coloring is very good, the drawing generally so, with an occasional surprise that it is not better. The graceful little group on the dedication page is distinctly American and not English—a fact which should give the book a transatlantic interest. The ballads are old, and the music accompanies them. Crude lithographic work distinguishes Eleanor W. Talbot's 'Wonder-Eyes and What-For' (New York: Cassell, Petter & Galpin), nor is much to be said of the rhymes; but in the longer metres there is humor for the elders, if not for the little folks.

—In the October number of the Bulletin of the Nuttall Ornithological Club (Cambridge) Dr. Elliott Coues is able to substantiate his recent assertion in his Bibliography that Audubon was indebted to MacGillivray for the scientific portion of his descriptions of species. Among valuable ornithological MSS. in the possession of Mr. Joseph M. Wade, of Rockville, Conn., he found and was allowed to copy and print in the Bulletin a letter from the Scotch naturalist to the Franco-American, under date of May 28, 1834, in which MacGillivray writes: "You say you have accumulated a mass of materials which you are desirous of seeing in print, and propose that I should revise it as before. I shall be glad to do so, if you please, and willing that you should confer the benefit on another, if you find it expedient. As to the terms, let them be such as you please with respect to money," etc. This shows that the service was a customary one, and was on a business footing. Dr. Coues also prints punctiliously an inedited letter of Audubon's, equally enjoyable for its hearty spirit and for its disregard of the rules of correct composition; and a sly foot-note praises Dr. T. M. Brewer's editing of the Audubon letters in the October Harper's. Over Wilson, whose literary and artistic remains enrich the same collection, Dr. Coues warms with sympathy and admiration, except in the case of his poetry, of which he gives a lovelorn specimen. He remarks upon "the decided superiority of the originals [of Wilson's bird drawings] in comparison with the published engravings" by Lawson.

—The International Review for November is rather heavy, but a paper on "State Debts and Repudiation," by Robert P. Porter, makes it valuable. Mr. Porter has apparently devoted a good deal of patient industry to the investigation of his subject, with the result of a useful compendium of statistics and collateral exposition. He shows the financial condition of the various States in 1840 and at present; gives tables illustrating the increase of the different debts, the market value of the bonds in different years, and so on; and recounts the circumstances of the several repudiations. The last is pitiful reading, of course, and Mr. Porter lets it convey its own moral in the main, though he is moved to conclude in terms of which no Southern reader of his article will controvert the justice, while some, indeed, may be benefited by the reflection that they are just. "The wholesale repudiation," says Mr. Porter, "in that section of the country during the past decade has been one of the most mistaken, injurious, and inexcusable policies which criminally unwise legislation supported by a false public opinion ever inflicted upon a people; and the South is to-day suffering, and will for generations to come suffer, for the folly of those who were lured from duty and honesty by party passion and false theories." He is equally severe on Minnesota, it is needless to add. E. de Pressensé writes in a sound rather than a sprightly fashion about "The French Republic and the Jesuits"; George L. Andrews, in "West Point and the Colored Cadet," makes an exhaustive review of the Whittaker case, before it is too late, we presume; T. C. Felton's "The Muster 'Vorstellungen' at Munich" is elaborate, instructive, and long; so is Charles S. Baker's "The State and the Railroads," which, he argues, should have intimate relations; and J. T. Morse, jr., one of the editors, does his best to leaven the entire lump by lightly written and agreeable talk about "Boston Lawyers in the Old Days," in the course of which he tells several amusing anecdotes, and draws outline sketches of early practitioners at the Massachusetts bar. Stories about lawyers make the best variety of gossip of this order, and Mr. Morse knows how to stop before he has given us too much.

—A recent number of the Southern Historical Society Papers contains an important contribution to the history of the late war, in the form of an article upon "General Hardee and the Military Operations around Atlanta," by Col. T. B. Roy, late of Gen. Hardee's staff. It is intended as an answer to the strictures of General Hood upon the conduct of Hardee on the 20th and 22d of July, 1864, and in the affair at Jonesboro six weeks later. Colonel Roy has collected with care the testimony of living witnesses of the events, and it is only fair to say that he seems to have refuted pretty thoroughly the criticisms on General Hardee which are contained in General Hood's 'Advance and Retreat.' We pointed out in our former review of General Hood's book (Nos. 769, 770 of the Nation) that, whether Hardee had fully accomplished all his commander had a right to require or not, Hood's own account of the campaign shows that the responsibility for its results cannot be shifted to the subordinate. The new facts brought out by Colonel Roy strongly support the general view of the campaign which we took, though they also tend to show an animus on the part of Hood toward Hardee more ungenerous than we should willingly attribute to him. It appears that, in the engagement at Peach-Tree Creek, the delay of which Hood accuses Hardee was beyond the control of the latter, and that Hood himself directed one of Hardee's divisions to be sent to the support of Cheatham on the extreme right, thus stopping the attack which Hardee had ordered. Instead of being responsible for the failure of the attack on the 22d of July (the battle of Atlanta), Hardee seems to have done all that an energetic commander could do, as we have already shown in our articles above referred to. As evidence that Gen. Hood's depreciation of Hardee was of later growth than his book intimates, Col. Roy refers with a good deal of force to the fact that on the 28th of July Hood sent Hardee from his own command to take charge of the movements of the other two corps of the army, when they had become involved in their ill-fated assault on the Union lines on the Lick-Skillet road. This certainly would seem to prove that Hardee was under no cloud in the opinion of his commander at that time. New light is also thrown upon the affair at Jonesboro, after Sherman had swung to the south of Atlanta, and Col. Roy brings strong evidence to sustain the assertion that Hardee was then showing great abilities as a corps commander, and doing all that could be done to correct the strategic error of Hood, who remained long and strangely blind to the fact that Sherman was in earnest in placing his army upon the Confederate lines of communication.

—A brilliant and positive etching, almost without retroussage, and remarkable for its broad treatment of light, is selected from Méryon's works for the October Portfolio, and presented in the skilful fac-simile process of Amand Durand. It represents a house with a turret in Paris, demolished in 1851. For works of this bold character the copying method of M. Durand is particularly competent; but it would be a mistake to suppose that the reproduction is an entirely chemical and scientific, as opposed to an artistic and finishing, process. M. Durand is an engraver of experience, and he practises his retouching so openly that he meets his visitors burin and magnifier in hand, fresh from the labor of mending and re-cutting the lines on whose accuracy his fac-simile depends. It will be interesting to see whether the reproductions by Delangle, in the new Rembrandt issued by Quantin, declared by Charles Blanc to be perfection, and to be without retouching, will excel these surprisingly clever imitations. In original etchings the Portfolio has latterly given particular attention to architectural views and landscapes. The "Senate House, Cambridge," in the October number, "St. John's College, Cambridge," in that for August, and some wood-carvings by Grinling Gibbons, in the September part, are crisp and picturesque studies, by Brunet-Debaines, Toussaint, and Greux respectively, which sustain, if they do not advance, the standard of Mr. Hamerton as champion of an art which it is important to keep undegraded. A subject by Colin Hunter, "Mending the Nets," in the last number, is the effort of an amateur, and looks so. We fancy a decreasing evidence of personal attention in Mr. Hamerton's journal, so far as the text goes. In the matter of printing the coppers, while we do not suspect a lack of editorial ambition, there are signs of change of style, as if the press-work were henceforth to be committed to British hands, and a national school of skilled plate-printers to be formed, in opposition to the French workmen who formerly had charge of his etchings.

—Dr. Ross, of Cambridge, Mass., to whose essay on "Village Communities" we recently called attention, has published a paper, read at the August meeting of the American Association, on "Primitive Democracy in the Alps," in which he examines one of the pet theories of Mr. Freeman in the same unsympathizing spirit with which he had previously treated Sir Henry Maine. It may have occurred to other readers than Dr. Ross that the eloquent passage with which Mr. Freeman introduced his lectures on the English Constitution was rather too oratorical to stimulate confidence in its strict accuracy, and his present critic makes out what is at least a plausible case against the English historian and his school. "Among the dales and mountain-sides of Switzerland," says Mr. Freeman, "one is in a land where the oldest institutions of our race, institutions which may be traced up to the earliest times of which history or legend gives us any glimmering, still live on in their primeval freshness." Between Tacitus's observations and the earliest mediæval record there is a gap of eight and a half centuries, yet Mr. Freeman assumes not merely that the institutions of the two periods are the same, but that they existed in unbroken continuity. But Dr. Ross's essay has the merit of being constructive as well as critical, and is valuable at least for its suggestiveness with respect to the constitution of early Teutonic society. His theory is, in substance, that democracy is an idea peculiar to an advanced civilization—which is not, of course, particularly original. This presentation of the case against previous commentators (for which we must refer the reader to the pamphlet) is excellent, however, the point of it lying in the alleged mistranslation and misconstruction of an important passage in Tacitus.

—We take pleasure in announcing the formation and readiness for active work of the Society for Political Education, whose headquarters are at No. 79 Fourth Avenue in this city. This organization, "non-partisan in its character and, in the best sense, national in its scope," is managed by an Executive Committee of twenty-five members, consisting at present of Prof. W. G. Sumner, of Yale; David A. Wells, of Norwich, Conn.; Charles Francis Adams, jr., of Boston; Horace White, George S. Coe, Geo. Haven Putnam, E. M. Shepard, and R. L. Dugdale, of New York; Franklin MacVeagh and M. L. Scudder, jr., of Chicago; Gen. Bradley T. Johnson, of Richmond; John H. Ames, of Lincoln, Nebraska; A. Sydney Biddle, of Philadelphia; A. Mitchell, of New Orleans; George Mason, of Galveston; and Peter Hamilton, of Mobile. Its support is found in an active membership paying an annual fee of fifty cents, on condition of reading the annual course prescribed by the Society; and a co-operative membership, which, on payment of not less than five dollars annually, will be entitled to receive from time to time the tracts published by the Society. For active members a cheap edition, in a uniform set, of Nordhoff's 'Politics for Young Americans,' Perry's 'Introduction to Political Economy,' Johnson's 'History of American Politics,' and McAdam's 'Alphabet in Finance'—the first year's course—has been provided, and for three dollars may be had of G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, or Jansen, McClurg & Co., Chicago, the publishing agents of the Society. For further particulars as to the nature of the tracts contemplated, and as to advisory lists of works that may be studied apart from the course, we must refer those interested to Mr. R. L. Dugdale, Secretary for the East and Acting Treasurer, at the above address. In time the society, if well conducted, will go far to remove the reproach of our political system, that it does not provide for making suffrage intelligent as well as universal.

—The regular season at Steinway Hall was opened on Saturday by the first concert of the New York Symphony Society. Dr. Damrosch has reorganized his orchestra, and there were many strange faces among the musicians. This partly accounts for the fact that the ensemble-playing was by no means as finished as is generally the case with this leader's performances. The opening number was Beethoven's dramatic overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and the symphony of the evening Brahms's No. 1 in C minor. It seems almost impossible to acquire an interest in this long and elaborate composition. All that a thorough knowledge of the theoretical part of music and conscientious study and work can supply is here produced, but what genius alone can give—warmth and strength and fulness of ideas—is altogether wanting. The five long movements—three of which are slow, which seems a serious mistake in form—drag wearily, with scarcely one refreshing thought, with rarely a fine orchestral effect. The symphony was first introduced here three years ago, when everybody tried to like it, and very few succeeded. It fell so cold upon the audience last Saturday that it is not likely to be produced again for some time. The event of the concert was the first appearance in this country of Mr. George Henschel, a baritone who brings a European reputation with him, and who is, in fact, a concert-singer of the first rank. His voice has a rich and sympathetic quality, is of unusual compass—he went through nearly two octaves, from the lower G to the high F sharp—and is remarkably even in every register. But Mr. Henschel is more than a singer, he is an accomplished artist. His pronunciation of his own language, at least, is admirably distinct. He sang a highly dramatic song from Handel's "Alexander's Feast" with great fire, but appeared to greatest advantage in a beautiful lyric scene from Weber's "Euryanthe," and in some delightful songs by Rubinstein and Schumann, which he gave as encores. A spirited but rather rough performance of Liszt's "Mazeppa" concluded the performance.

—Mr. Mapleson brought out nothing new last week. The most interesting feature was the reproduction of Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera," which has not been heard here for some years. Mme. Montesini, a dramatic prima donna, was introduced on this occasion. She seems capable of assuming great operatic characters, but her first performance was very much injured either by nervousness or indisposition. She sang frequently out of tune, and throughout the part with a most painful tremolo. Miss Cary was excellent as Ulrica, and Mme. Swift filled the insignificant part of Oscar very satisfactorily. The new tenor, Ravelli, gains upon acquaintance, and was very effective in several scenes; but the triumph of the evening fell again to the lot of Signor Galassi, who took the part of Renato. His rendering of the famous "Eri tu" was one of the best efforts of this admirable singer. "Aïda," with the same principal artists in the cast, was produced for the first time this fall, and Madame Gerster as Traviata drew on Monday, in spite of the sensation at Booth's Theatre the same evening, one of the largest houses of the season.

—In the Rundschau for October Dr. Friedrich Kapp publishes a long and highly interesting article on the (personal) relations of Germany and this country, in the course of which he comes to speak of the writings of Charles Sealsfield, of whose adventurous life we spoke some time since (vol. xxx., p. 215). German literary critics—for example, H. Ethé—have long held up Sealsfield as a first-rate genius; and we now find that Dr. Kapp, though looking at him from a different standpoint, concurs in this view. "With what extraordinary success," he writes, "did Sealsfield study and observe this people. Even now Americans can learn certain features of their character better from him than from the best of their own writers." His works form so many chapters "of the history of civilization, which he paints in truly seductive colors. But their greatest attraction is due to the fact that this modern history is typical for the development of humanity at large, and suggests many weighty points with respect to its oldest history." In Germany these works "were literally devoured, and were a regular topic of students' conversation, both among themselves and with ladies." In the United States, "on the most favorable reckoning, he can have had only a few hundred readers, and they forgot his books as soon as read." At present he is here known "not even by name." In the Boston Public Library Dr. Kapp could find only one of his works, and "no American literary history even mentions his name." This is hardly a fair statement, for Allibone gives him fitting notice, and refers to Griswold, though the list of his works, compared with Dr. Kapp's, is defective. If deemed unworthy of more permanent form, it might yet be worth the while of one of our "library" publishers to give us a reprint of the works of this singular author.

—No. 348 of Virchow and Von Holtzendorff's 'Sammlung,' by Dr. F. Hoffmann, of Gera, is entitled "Of the History of Civilization in Europe (Plants and Domestic Animals)," and attempts to give the history of the introduction into Europe of the most important cultivated plants and domestic animals, and of their influence on the Continent's development. The lecture is based on Viktor Hehn's "Cultivated Plants and Domestic Animals, and their transition from Asia to Greece and Italy, as well as the rest of Europe," which appeared in a second edition in 1874. The proof of the statements made rests, as is well known, on history and philology, but especially philology, in its obscurer investigations, and consequently lacks the demonstrative nature of the testimony of contemporaries of the events conjectured. Still, the account here given, whether exact or not, includes so many interesting details that we should think the essay would repay translating, a remark that might be made of many other essays in this series, and also of the "Zeit- und Streit-Fragen." We may call attention here to another essay on a linguistic subject in the latter series, No. 106, which, though published in 1878, has a permanent value for the student in general and the German citizen: "Foreign Words in German," by Th. Heinze. The author does not look upon foreign words with favor, although he is obliged to confess the vast number of them in even the most domestic relations of life, and wants his countrymen to return to the native force and resource of the German and develop them. He gives copious instances with comments. He notices with pleasure that legal legislation has lately discarded century-old technical terms and replaced them by native or newly-invented ones; and that the military authorities, from their extensive practice in German composition, have produced a much better history of the French war of 1870 than of the Austrian war of 1866. He would not go so far, however, in relying upon native idiom as Philipp von Zesen two hundred years ago, one of whose inventions was Löschhorn for Nase, also Schauburg for Theater, Zeugemutter for Natur, etc. Fortunately, the men of his day laughed at him.

—No man in Germany is more versed in Scandinavian literature, history, laws, and politics than Konrad Maurer. In Icelandic matters there is no greater authority living. When, in the year 1834, Denmark received her new constitution, strenuous efforts began to be made by the Icelanders to reorganize their old Althing (Parliament) and secure more independence in the administration of the island. After a prolonged struggle with the Danish Government, they finally in 1874, the year in which the thousandth anniversary of the colonization of Iceland was celebrated, received a new constitution, which, though it might have been far more liberal, marks a new era in the history of Iceland, and can hardly fail to advance materially the prosperity of her people. The two men to whom Iceland is most indebted for the privileges granted by the new constitution are unquestionably the patriot Jón Sigurdsson, who died last year, and Konrad Maurer, of Munich. The latter made a thorough study of the whole history of Iceland, its relations to Norway from 1264 to 1381, and its relations to Denmark from the latter date down to the present. In leading German periodicals from time to time he set forth the claims and rights of the Icelanders and the abuses of them by Denmark. The struggle and final victory of the Icelanders is now historic, and Konrad Maurer has very wisely gathered all his articles on the subject into a volume of 318 pages ('Zür politischen Geschichte Islands. Gesammelte Aufsätze.' Leipzig: Bernhard Schlicke. 1880). The reader will find it an exhaustive account of the political history of Iceland from 1834 to 1880, with many glimpses of previous epochs. It is doubtless true that it must be considered as the work of a partisan, but, on the other hand, it is equally true that Herr Maurer is very nearly if not quite free from rancorous party spirit. Having spent some time in Iceland and in Copenhagen, and having examined all accessible documents, he speaks on all topics within the scope of his work with the authority and without the national prejudice of a native. The sixth and last article in the volume is a sketch of the life and services of his friend Jón Sigurdsson.

CRAWFURD'S PORTUGAL.*

WHEN the 'Travels in Portugal, by John Latouche,' appeared, a few years ago, no one acquainted with the accomplished British consul at Oporto needed to puzzle himself long with the pseudonym behind which the author chose to hide. In the volume before us Mr. Crawfurd supplements his former work with a series of studies of Portuguese history, and literature, and social life which, though at first glance they may seem a little disconnected, will be found on examination to be by far the most accurate and discriminating picture that has been given by any English writer of this interesting people. No portion of Europe, if we take into account its historical significance and the service it has rendered modern civilization, has received such scant appreciation as the little kingdom that divides with Spain the Iberian peninsula. Cut off by its more powerful neighbor from contact with the Continent, and only slightly affected by the turmoil of European political agitation, it has been left to pursue the even tenor of its way, and has almost been forgotten in the great onward movements of modern times. Until a recent period only easily accessible to the traveller by a sea voyage, it has been far less visited than other portions of Southern Europe, and the majority of those who have sailed up the superb bay of Lisbon, contenting themselves with hurried trips to Cintra and Mafra, have agreed in the disparaging verdict that Portugal was a country a hundred and fifty years behind the rest of the world. Mr. Crawfurd's book is an indignant protest against a judgment which he stigmatizes as foolish and ignorant. It is a generous plea for a country and a people that he has learned to know intimately by long years of residence, and respecting whose character and social life he writes with the authority of one who has prepared himself for the task by long and close study at first hand. The evident enthusiasm with which he writes only lends his chapters an additional charm.

The author modestly describes his book as a medley of history, of criticism, and of description. But it is throughout an original study, and of the kind of information that writers who undertake to describe foreign countries so copiously derive from Murray we have absolutely nothing. It is the work of one familiar with those aspects of Portuguese life which do not come under the notice of the ordinary tourist; of one who is evidently a ripe scholar, a close observer, a zealous student of antiquities, and a lover of nature in all her forms. Added to this there is a keen sense of humor that gives a delightful zest to the sketches of social life. He likens his volume to a well-known dish which the traveller meets with in the more uncivilized parts of Portugal —a dish in which meat and game and fowl of every kind are seethed together with an equal variety of vegetables and herbs and spices. We do not remember to have tasted the dish, but if it resembles this charming volume we can think of none more tempting to the most dainty palate. It is a medley, but a medley that only a most skilful artist could compound.

For what Mr. Crawfurd terms the more solid ingredients we have an admirable introductory sketch of the rise of Portugal, and of the romantic career of the warrior king, about whom so many legends cluster, the heroic Affonso Henriquez. The scanty historical remains that supply us with genuine material for illustrating the reign of this founder of Portuguese monarchy have nowhere been so clearly and intelligently discussed as in the chapter which the author devotes to this part of his subject. It is an interesting fact that a large English contingent co-operated with Affonso in the capture of Lisbon from the Moors, so that centuries before the campaigns of Wellington had made Vimeira and Torres-Vedras familiar as household words the long connection of Portugal with England had begun. Mr. Crawfurd has taken pains to make a personal inspection of every locality that he describes, and the skill with which he has narrated this earliest chapter of Portuguese annals can but awaken an earnest desire on the part of his readers that he should go on with the story, and enrich our historical literature with a complete history of Portugal. It is safe to say that there is no one living who possesses better qualifications for such a task. The diligent researches of Hercolano have prepared the way, and a subject so attractive, with the artistic treatment that Mr. Crawfurd could not fail to give it, would be sure of a cordial welcome from readers on both sides the Atlantic.

The distinctive charm of this volume will be found, however, not so much in its contribution to Portuguese history, or in its discriminating criticism of early Portuguese literature, as in its graphic pictures of the life of Portugal at the present day. Here the writer's admirable descriptive power and his keen observation are at their best. While he stoutly defends the Portuguese from the aspersions so freely heaped upon them, his eye is quick to discern the ludicrous or absurd aspects of Portuguese society; and his portrait of the Portuguese country gentleman, and of the mode in which he indulges in field sports, is dashed with an irresistible sense of the humorous which his evidently cordial regard for the people with whom he has lived so long cannot suppress. Mr. Crawfurd, who is himself a practical farmer, does not hesitate to say that even England may learn some lessons in agriculture from Portugal; and while freely conceding that the Portuguese are lamentably deficient in zeal for all higher intellectual interests, he asserts that in what goes to make up the substantial good of social life—in religious equality, in freedom from commercial restrictions, in equality before the law—they are not a whit behind most European countries. In a country where the higher literary and scientific culture is almost wholly lacking, where the press has no influence, and where public opinion hardly exists, such a result as this cannot fail to excite surprise. Mr. Crawfurd accounts for it from the fact that the Portuguese race is the product of an almost unexampled blending of nationalities—a race which combines the tough fibre of the north with the more subtle genius of the south, and therefore possessing great and rare qualities. We cannot help thinking that his estimate of the present generation of Portuguese is rather high, but we demur with hesitation to the judgment of one whose opinions are based on such long and close acquaintance.

A classical scholar like Mr. Crawfurd could not, of course, fail to note the evidences, so abundantly preserved in Portugal, of the Roman occupation. In the method of holding land the emphyteutic tenure of the later empire still survives. And not simply in legal traditions, but also in the habits of the people may be detected unmistakable Roman features. The modern Portuguese landed proprietor, like the old Roman, does not relish living on his estate. Although in Portugal there is no lack of country-houses, and some of them good and pleasant ones, the Portuguese gentleman prefers the more sociable life of the city. He never resides at his country-place, but simply runs down to it for a brief holiday season. This is the more surprising as the Portuguese landscape is full of rare and diversified beauty. The foreign commerce of the country for three hundred years has made it an emporium of plants and shrubs from every quarter of the globe, while its genial climate allows the variegated growth of China, Japan, Australia, and South America to be readily reproduced. Nor are the native products unworthy to be compared with these. Mr. Crawfurd is compelled to admit that, so far as relates to the practical methods of farming, Portugal has made little progress for fourteen hundred years. The same ploughs are still in use that were brought here by the Romans, and the Georgics of Virgil may be interpreted by practices to be witnessed on any Portuguese farm to-day. The most common details do not escape notice. Some of our readers will perhaps feel a more kindly interest in the little kingdom when they learn that the cod is there held in an esteem not inferior to that with which he is regarded in Massachusetts, and that the bôlos de bacalhao, which in the opinion of all good Portuguese alone renders existence tolerable, is nothing more nor less than the familiar fish-ball which forms the Sunday breakfast of orthodox New England. Mr. Crawfurd declares that, could he persuade his own countrymen to adopt this nutritious diet, he would do more for their material advancement than most statesmen accomplish in a lifetime. But he frankly confesses that it is difficult for him to approach this topic without seeming to be over-enthusiastic.

In a work so much of which is devoted to the rural life of Portugal the most famous product of the soil, the vintage of the Douro, naturally is not forgotten. A long and interesting chapter is devoted to port wine, and the long residence of Mr. Crawfurd, and his own practical experience as a wine-grower, enable him to throw much light on a subject which both ignorance and prejudice have helped to obscure. Here, as everywhere, he is loyal to the land in which he lives, and sets a high estimate upon port as compared with other wines. Into this interesting discussion we cannot, however, follow him, nor can we do more than mention the two charming chapters with which the book concludes, in which the author treats us to bits of travel, the accounts of his visit to the ancient Roman town of Cetobriga, in southern Portugal, and of his exploration of the lost city of Citania. Nothing in the whole book is finer than some of the descriptions of natural scenery in these chapters. In addition to his other accomplishments Mr. Crawfurd is an enthusiastic botanist, and no rare plant or fern eludes his searching eye.

NICHOL'S BYRON.*

MR. NICHOL'S work has not escaped the dangers that beset writing to order. Is it quite fair to stretch all our worthies upon a Procrustean bed of two hundred pages duodecimo? Compare, for instance, Mr. Ward's 'Chaucer' with Mr. Nichol's 'Byron.' All the facts now ascertainable of Chaucer's life can be summed up in three or four pages; the rest of the volume is merely a picture of the times of Chaucer and a critique of his writings. Mr. Nichol, on the other hand, has such a mass of facts, such a network of controversies to deal with, that he cannot afford the space for an ample discussion of Byron's authorship. Yet such a discussion is particularly necessary and timely in the case of Byron. No poet was more idolized and more vilified in his day; and it is quite time that some critic should instruct us how, not to admire nor to vilify, but to understand him. Mr. Nichol will help us in a measure; the general tone of his work is healthy, because sensible; it is itself a sign of the reaction to which it adverts in favor of Byron. But it is insufficient, partly because the writer could not within such narrow limits develop his views freely and naturally, partly—and indeed chiefly—because he has not put himself at the right point of view. The proper way of treating Byron is precisely the opposite of Mr. Nichol's, it seems to us; the biographical portion might be restricted to the narrowest limits compatible with clearness. What, for instance, does the ordinary reader care to know of the right and the wrong of the dispute between Byron and Hunt, or how can it benefit him to know? It is wasting time and pains to attempt at this late day to compete with Moore. Those of us who wish to know the man Byron as he appeared to his contemporaries will, of course, read and re-read the 'Life and Letters,' just as we turn to Lockhart and to Boswell for our information concerning Scott and Dr. Johnson. Moore's work, it is true, is anything but infallible; it needs careful revision. Here Elze's work will be quite sufficient for most purposes. On the other hand, to comprehend Byron's authorship aright, to estimate his influence on our times, the sooner the critic learns to discard Moore, Elze, and all other would-be judges, the better for him and for us. We venture to say that no one will succeed in penetrating the secret of Byron until he discards absolutely all critiques, conversations, and gossip, and studies Byron where every other author ought to be studied—in his printed works alone. After subjecting these to unprejudiced and persistent examination, the critic may of course derive an occasional ray of light from outside sources. He will derive more, however, from political than from literary history, we venture to suggest. Byron's writings, from "Childe Harold" to "Don Juan," are the poetic treatment of European politics. The autobiographical element in them has been absurdly overrated. Excepting such unmistakably personal poems as "The Dream," we may say that their significance to us at the present day consists in their being the expression of the thoughts and emotions of Europe in the early part of our century. They constitute, therefore, a most valuable contribution to our "Culturgeschichte," and it is from this point of view that we would have them estimated.

Let us apply the method to Byron's three pre-eminent works, "Childe Harold," "Cain," and "Don Juan." If "Childe Harold" be merely the outpouring of a single cynic, dead and buried these fifty years, of what value is it to us? Now, if Mr. Nichol had only read the first volume of Brandes's 'Hauptströmungen' as carefully as he has read the fourth, he would have seen the connection—although it has escaped Brandes himself—between the émigré-spirit of Madame de Staël and Benjamin Constant and the Childe-Haroldism of Byron. The English poet is the link between this émigré-spirit and the subsequent Weltschmerz of Alfred de Musset and Heinrich Heine. His voice is merely one, although the loudest, in the general European litany.

Did Byron continue in this strain? Certainly "Cain" is of a different order of writing from the "Pilgrimage." Were it merely what on its face it purports to be—the unphilosophic expression of an unphilosophic mind—we might consign it to the upper shelves, or read it solely for its scattered beauties of emotional description. But "Cain" is something more. It is a renewal of the conflict that had been waged since the days of the English and French deists between revealed religion and free thought. We can imagine to ourselves Byron as saying to the orthodox of his day: "You hold to the inspiration of Genesis, the temptation and fall, the descent of mankind from a single pair, the central position of the earth in the divine economy. I will accordingly take you at your word, construct for you your first family, confront you with the rigorous deductions from your own assumptions. Furthermore, I will take you out of this wonderful earth and show you how it looks from other worlds. After seeing other creatures and types that perished ages ago, you can decide for yourselves what chance you have of immortality." It was the boldness and the vigor of this home-thrust, and not the high-flown language of Lucifer, that electrified England in 1821, and that will secure for "Cain" its significance in literature. For us its author is no longer a mere cynic.

"Don Juan" is more difficult to characterize. Its scope is wide and its variety endless. To call it a satire is not enough. Of what is it a satire? and in what tone is it couched? To neither of these questions does Mr. Nichol have a direct answer. In one place he almost gives us to understand that the satire is aimed at England. This is only partially true. "Don Juan" is a satire upon all Europe and European society, not of the nineteenth century, as critics tacitly assume, but of the ancien régime. The persistency with which literary men of all nationalities treat "Don Juan" as a nineteenth-century poem is curious. The groundwork of the story—i. e., the fable of Don Juan Tenorio de Sevilla—is mediæval; all the historical characters introduced by Byron are well-known personages of the eighteenth century. Again, the atmosphere of the poem is wholly that of the days before '89; a career like that of the hero would have been impossible after the Revolution. The movement is evidently caught from Louvet de Couvray's 'Faublas,' which is by eminence the type of Don Juanism in France under Louis XVI. There are numerous passages, it is true, in which Byron introduces personal reminiscences and renews many an old literary feud. But of the poem as a poem we must say that it has always seemed to us an attempt to portray the vice, the foibles, the glittering laisser-aller of Spain, Russia, England, France, and Italy before the dark and evil days of the Revolution. That Byron had France and Italy in mind, and would have drawn them on his panorama had he completed the work, is evident from his letter to Murray, dated Ravenna, Feb. 16, 1821. The circumstance that "Don Juan" was planned and composed entirely on Italian soil should not be overlooked, for Italy was then the only European country where such a work was possible. Although suffering from the invasions of French and Austrians, it had escaped the social and religious upheavals of its neighbors. Here alone the graces and easy-going virtues of the ancien régime survived as a sort of Indian summer.

Conceding, then, that "Childe Harold" is largely a portrayal of the author's moods, we must be prepared to recognize in "Cain" a clearly-defined objectivity, equal at least to that of Milton's "Paradise Lost." And in "Don Juan" the narrative and descriptive parts and the entire action of the poem are in the strictest sense objective. The personal digressions are mere appendages, and may be expunged without affecting the story. By expunging them (and also those other passages that are too broad for modern English taste), a skilful editor might produce, we are confident, a work that would be instantly and universally acknowledged to be the most striking and most realistic metrical narrative in our language. But, in fact, no one general estimate of Byron is possible. What will apply to him in his earlier, his Byronic, stage may not hold good of "Cain," and it certainly cannot help us in understanding "Don Juan," or "Beppo," or "The Island." Elze and Taine are at opposite extremes from the truth. Elze creates an imaginary Byron, whom he dislikes and depreciates; Taine another imaginary Byron, whom he extols without discrimination.

While Mr. Nichol's work is unsatisfactory for want of any such general views as we have roughly indicated, it is nevertheless entitled to the credit of being thoroughly conscientious. It gives the tenor of Byron's life fairly, states the facts clearly and accurately. An ordinary reader will gain from it a sufficient insight into Byron's way of living and writing. Mr. Nichol's remarks upon the Scotch element in Byron's temperament are well worth considering. All the good engravings we have seen of the poet suggest a Scottish type of face, and some of his irregular rhymes betray, we think, the Scottish accent. The delicate matter of the Stowe scandal has been handled with discrimination. Mr. Nichol might have dismissed it with even fewer words as the worst fiasco of our day. Byron's controversy with Southey is scarcely treated with sufficient fulness. The reader will find a much more incisive and detailed analysis, one more in favor of Southey, by Hennig, in the Anglia iii. 426 ff. The strictures upon Moore are over-severe; at least, we fail to see why a "worldling" must be of necessity "a superficial critic," or why the respect Byron and Shelley paid to Moore should be such an "enigma." In connection with this we call attention to Thiergen's doctoral dissertation, 'Byron's u. Moore's Orientalische Gedichte, eine Parallele' (Leipzig, 1880). Many of Thiergen's positions are utterly untenable and to the last degree conventional; but his rhyme-analyses and comparisons of kindred passages in the two poets evince careful study. Mr. Nichol's remarks upon "Cain" may be contrasted with Schaffner's 'Cain u. seine Quellen' (Strassburg, 1880). One perceives at a glance the thoroughness of the German "method." Schaffner is the first, to our knowledge, to point out any connection between Byron's conception of Abel and the Towneley Mysteries. Mr. Nichol's chapter on Byron in Greece may be read as a wholesome antidote to Elze's. The Scotchman's verdict is the common-sense one: that Byron knew perfectly well what he was undertaking, and might have succeeded, and, indeed, deserved to succeed. Although Mr. Nichol does not cite Professor Jebb's recently-published lecture on "Byron and Modern Greece," his views are almost identical.

CHURCH BUILDING IN THE MIDDLE AGES.*

ITALIAN history, during the erection of the cathedrals of Venice, Siena, and Florence, has been frequently studied in the light of political, commercial, and literary advance. The more prominent incidents have been chosen for special recital; the buildings themselves are described in every work upon mediæval architecture and in laboriously-compiled monographs, and yet the book before us stands alone: there is no work in any language projected upon the same plan. The sombre monuments of the Gothic Arnolfo di Cambio, to whom was given the freedom of Florence, are well known; the extravagant design of adopting the entire Duomo of Siena as a transept for a new and vastly more magnificent edifice has often been discussed; but they never before have been illustrated by Dante's journey through the spiritual realms, the date of which lies within a week of this honor accorded Arnolfo, or by the reckless violence of the brigata spendereccia. It is difficult to define the perception thus gained. When Mephistopheles would acquaint Faust with the lovable nature of the maiden whom fortune had led across his path, he did not knowingly portray her personal attractions, perchance in the manner of the late eminent Prime Minister of Great Britain, but went, in the quiet of the summer evening, to her small, spotless room, where, surrounded by the objects familiar to her daily life, the receptive Faust could could alter his flippant tone after the first meeting, understanding and appreciating more than would have been possible in a number of circumspect interviews. And thus does the author of these 'Historical Studies of Church Building' succeed in introducing us to the inner significance of the great mediæval cathedrals chosen as his subject, not by demonstrating the details and dimensions of their construction, but by viewing them through the medium of historical appreciation. The elevations and sections of these buildings, indeed, stand only in the relation to their real import that features and attire do to life and love; the technicalities of detail are studied by the mere antiquary in much the same way as Frosch or Altmayer would doubtless have looked upon Gretchen's charms. "Among the arts, the one that has alike the closest and the widest relations to the life of a people—to its wants, habits, and culture—and which gives the fullest and most exact expression to its moral disposition, its imagination, and its intelligence is that of architecture." It is by a rare apprehension of this truth that Mr. Charles Eliot Norton is peculiarly fitted to be an historian of that greatest manifestation of human ideas, sentiments, and emotions.

> "An aller Hoffnung künft'ger Freuden
> In ihrem Dunstkreis satt sich weiden";

Although the book before us is the author's first publication upon architecture, he brings to it a long familiarity with the subject, scholarly and conscientious labor, and, above all, this exceptional insight born of an earnest love for his work; and the result is a study of three of the greatest mediæval cathedrals which, in its general accuracy and clearness, will be a valuable reference for students of art, while its graceful and often poetic diction will make it an interesting volume even to the most aimless reader. The value of the introduction, which characterizes the temper and condition of human relations during the middle ages, is only limited by its extreme brevity. The advance of religion, law, and commercial prosperity is concisely defined, the position of the Church being recognized with singular insight and moderation. After the complete ruin of antique civilization the tumult of the time of Charlemagne had driven shy and unprized learning and art to the monasteries, where, hidden from the lawlessness of war and the destructive passions of the times, they grew rich in their retirement with the power that comes from quiet and unity.

> "When, towards the close of the tenth century, in various parts of Europe, the sense of increasing civil order and security was distinctly felt, one of the first signs of this improvement was a general zeal for the building of churches—a work of piety to which all, poor and rich, weak and strong, alike could contribute, and in the merits of which all could have a share. It was a work for the glory of God and of his Mother, for the honor of the saints, for the credit of the community, for the eternal benefit of every individual. The hearts and the imaginations of all men were engaged in it; the dispersed resources of the people were brought together to achieve it; capacities that had long been unused were evoked, and, as in other ages, a vivid and earnest faith found its just and characteristic expression. . . . The mediæval ideal of beauty was indeed not less narrow than the moral ideal of the time, but it was not less genuine. It did not embrace the whole creation; it was perverted by ascetic prepossessions and by superstitious fears."

Mr. Norton cannot too strongly emphasize this fact, that the moral and intellectual dispositions of the middle ages are to be read in these mighty walls and in the faithful decorative work which beautifies them. They remain, as he says, "monuments over the grave of the passions, hopes, and faith of generations that were capable of efforts beyond the mark of modern times." It was in the same spirit that Heine, standing before one of these cathedrals that seem built with the strength of Titans and decorated with the patience of dwarfs, explained to a friend who, with mingled awe and pity, had enquired why we do not build such edifices in our times: "Ah! my dear Alphonse, the men of that day had convictions, while we moderns have only opinions—and it takes something more than opinions to build a cathedral." How strong these convictions were is illustrated by the zealous devotion of "one Master Guccio and his wife Mina," who gave themselves as oblates, offering their lives and all their property for the furtherance of the work upon the Sienese cathedral, in the impulse which in preceding centuries led men to venture life and fortune in the Crusades.

In the studies upon Venice, Siena, and Florence Mr. Norton relates incidents characteristic of those cities during the building of the typical cathedrals: St. Mark's, Our Lady of the Assumption, and St. Mary of the Flower. The patriotic pride of the Venetians in the independence and perpetuity of their state, the charm and mystery of the East, which pervaded the port, are felt in the chosen episodes—the discovery and transportation of the body of St. Mark, the legendary subjugation of the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa to Pope Alexander III., and the preparations and outset of the fourth Crusade, as related by its historian, Villehardouin. Because of the more abundant documentary evidence, twice the space allowed Venice is devoted to Siena and to Florence. The Sienese cathedral was chiefly a municipal undertaking, and researches among the archives of that commune have provided new materials bearing upon the construction of the church and the sources of the requisite funds. The progress of the work was interrupted by the feuds constantly occurring between Guelfs and Ghibellines, which ended in the battle of Montaperti; the completion of the extravagant alterations was rendered for ever impossible by the devastating plague of 1348; the triumph and misery of the city are depicted with equal force. The history of Florence in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries is similarly illustrated, the writer's vivid and poetic fancy drawing us near to the reality of the past, as a fragrance brings back a half-forgotten story. But as some direct acquaintance with the structures themselves is necessary—as, to carry out the simile, some meeting, however short, between Faust and Gretchen was requisite before he could muse with personal interest in her vacant room, her ten words are here amply represented by accounts of the cathedral buildings, which, free from technicalities and of admirable appreciation, give the book the highest standing among those works upon the art of building in the middle ages with which it might naturally be compared. The architectural descriptions predominate in the sections on Siena and Florence, the Tuscan cities being particularly interesting from the employment of Niccolò and Giovanni Pisano upon the pulpit and façade of Our Lady of the Assumption, and of Brunelleschi, Donatello, and Ghiberti upon the building of the cupola and lantern of St. Mary of the Flower and the bronze gates of the Baptistery.

That it may not interfere with the continued narrative of the text, much detailed information is given in foot-notes that will be welcomed by every scholar. With what exceptional care the author's statements are verified may be judged from the fact that the given date of the completion of the Florentine Duomo, 1467, corrects an error which is even accepted in Milanesi's new edition of Vasari, 1878. In a work which appeals so directly to the general reader the advisability of publishing the Latin documents relative to the cathedral of Siena, as an appendix, may be questionable, however great their importance to the specialist. We could wish that, in their stead, greater length had been allowed the historical introduction. The book is throughout singularly free from those faults of omission and commission to detect and publish which is ordinarily deemed the special province of the reviewer, and which he is wont to present as the result of a foray, as it were, into the enemy's country. Two dates are not correct, one a mere misprint of 1864 for 1764, as the publication of Adam's 'Ruins of the Palace of the Emperor Diocletian at Spalatro,' the other perhaps an oversight in allowing a sentence, as it now stands, to state that the Venetian campanile was restored in 1489; although it was, as Mr. Norton says, shattered by lightning in that year, it was not rebuilt until 1510, when Bartolommeo Buono added the existing attica and pitched roof. The mechanical presentation of the work by the publishers is admirable in every respect; it is the handsomest book that has ever been printed by the well-known firm of Franklin Square, and one of the best representatives of American book-making that could be named. The leaded pica seems almost too luxurious, and it is desirable that a reprint should be issued in smaller type, without the appendix, as a cicerone for those who visit the cathedrals. We cannot think from the plan of the book and from its title that the 'Historical Studies of Church Building in the Middle Ages' are to end here, but trust that Mr. Norton's professional duties will permit him to devote the necessary research to continue a work which will not only add to his high reputation, but will be a credit to American scholarship.

RECENT NOVELS.*

'THE WELLFIELDS' is in some respect the best story yet written by the author of 'The First Violin.' It is, of course, a love story, and the scene is laid partly in Germany, in that sort of artistic society which the author describes so well, and partly in England. Jerome Wellfield is a young man of extraordinary beauty and accomplishments, the heir of an old family, once Catholic, but in its later generations apostate from the true Church, who falls in love, in Germany, with an English girl named Sara Ford. Sara is a young woman of great loveliness and strength of character, but strength of character is not among Jerome's possessions. He discovers shortly after his engagement that his father has made away with pretty much all the Wellfield property, and that he will have to make his own way in the world. Returning to England for this purpose, he leaves his sister with Miss Ford in Germany, and, going to his family estate, finds it in the possession of a Mr. Bolton, whose daughter Nita is now the heir to all the property which he would, in the natural course of events, have come into. There is also close by a Jesuit priest, who determines, after the manner of Jesuit priests, that the best thing for Jerome is that he should marry Nita and return to the fold, bringing the property under the control of the Church. For this purpose he schemes and intrigues. His plan works admirably. He contrives to establish a complete mastery over the weak character of Jerome, and to fill him with the idea that it is essential to him to break off his engagement with Sara Ford and marry Nita Bolton. The gradual process by which this result is brought about is extremely well described by the author, and in the end Wellfield plays the dastardly part which his religious friend desires. He first makes his sister return from Germany, and then breaks off his engagement. A marriage with Miss Bolton follows; but here for a time the plans of the priest are baffled. He has established his hold upon the husband, but, although he succeeds in making the wife unhappy by a disclosure of the behavior of Jerome, the only result of this is that he exposes his own character and gains nothing. In the end, however, fate is on the side of the Church, for Mrs. Wellfield dies a broken-hearted woman, leaving behind her a child, who, of course, in the end falls a victim to the machinations of the wily Father Somerville. Meanwhile Sara Ford, whose heart has also been broken by Jerome, is suddenly married by a sort of coup de main. The gentleman who effects this alliance is one Falkenberg, a critic; he has early fallen in love with Sara and given her some very good advice about art. This Falkenberg is fortunately a man of great wealth and high character, and in the end makes her completely happy. Wellfield's sister is provided for by her marriage with John Leyburn, who at one point in the story seems to be trembling on the verge of an unfortunate passion for Miss Bolton. This outline gives a poor idea of the story. The description of the means by which Father Somerville establishes his hold upon Wellfield, and brings about his marriage, is admirably done, and the whole plot of the novel is managed with a firmer hand than the author has hitherto shown. Falkenberg is poorly drawn, and exhibits that tendency toward priggishness which is the unfailing characteristic of the truly good man in novels written by women.

'White Wings' is of a flimsy texture, and adds to the cumulative evidence that Mr. Black has probably already written all the readable books he had to write and is now relying upon their momentum. 'A Princess of Thule' was sufficient to lend him a good deal, and the central figure of that work was charming enough to make her introduction at the close of this story, even though only for an instant, jar a trifle on one's sense of her worth, which is certainly considerable enough to withdraw her from the thoughtless and whimsical treatment of her creator himself. But it is evident enough that Mr. Black is unlikely to reach that level again, and his recent books have seemed almost like an express abandonment of every ambition to do so, or to do anything, indeed, beyond gratifying the popular audience which better work has gained for him. Even this we should think it would be hazardous to play fast and loose with by furnishing it provender of the quality of 'White Wings.' It is "a yachting romance," and its incidents are few and unexciting, as a matter of course, since it is part of Mr. Black's general scheme to avoid the improbable and shun the suspicion of melodrama. Neither are its characters remarkable, for the same reason; and of plot there is really none at all. Readers of the book will at once remind us that the Laird of Denny-mains should be excepted from this catalogue of commonplace, but we confess this portrait is an example of what we like least in Mr. Black. His line is, like that of Robertson in dramatic writing, to be simple and natural, to depend upon the real forces of familiar things to move his readers; to discover what is pleasant, pathetic, mirthful, what not, in the society and situations nearest at hand, and to let all kinds of heroics religiously alone. Now and then he has followed it with complete success, as in the instance above mentioned; but it is a particularly difficult one to follow, because it demands an absolute sincerity. Mr. Black's sincerity is wholly a relative quality, valuable, no doubt, when one is illustrating the possibilities of melodrama, and entirely unobjectionable in psychological analyses, but in exploiting the charms of commonplace inadequate. Simplicity is, of course, the last thing one ought to affect, since affecting it is plainly a contradiction in terms. Mr. Black, however, is artistically and sentimentally fond of it; he deals with it in what is technically known as the extenuated style, and artfully—or shall we risk the paradox, and say artlessly?—tries to play it for more than it is worth, in vulgar parlance. He has the air of containing himself, of suppressing emotion, of endeavoring to convey volumes by a hint, and, in general, of ridiculing all rhetorical devices by example. The effort after effortless effect, however, is always evident in the absence of very subtle art, and Mr. Black's is commonly transparent enough, while it is tinged with a sentimentality which is getting to be so much of an old story in much current writing that to a sensitive taste it must soon come to appear worse than the worst melodramatic absurdity. It is the least respectable, in some respects, of the varieties of what is accurately, though vulgarly, termed "gush." 'White Wings,' for example, is full of "And now—and now," and "And then—and then," a sort of palpitating, dynamic introduction to what is to follow; sometimes the sequence concerns the landscape, sometimes the yacht, sometimes the emotions of the excursionists, but always it is of the most ordinary character. "Then the girl spoke, proudly and bravely —," says Mr. Black, and, instead of some "proud and brave" speech, we have the entirely inoffensive remarks consistent with her character, which, in turn, is of course consistent with Mr. Black's general scheme. This kind of thing is clearly a waste of ammunition, and one resents the cheapening of the ways and means of melodrama which it involves. And in the portrait of Denny-mains all this seems somehow concentrated. He is a person of the Colonel Newcome type, a simple and laughable but noble-minded Scotch laird, and it is a pity that he could not have been treated as simply as he deserves. The creation of Colonel Newcomes may safely be called a hazardous business, and any one who enters upon the task lightly plays with edged tools. Mr. Black's success will be accurately enough understood if we say that he contrives to show an appreciation of the beauty and dignity of such a character without evincing the ability to construct one whose individuality discovers any new potentialities in the type. Almost any one could, given the same facility, do as well in the latter regard as is here done. And Denny-mains is the only character of the novel. Furthermore, the natural limits of the story are far narrower than its actual terms; it betrays in its manifest padding, quite as much as in its mechanical hysteria and its mechanical affectation of simplicity, the effect of success upon the popular novelist. But, as we say, it is possible that Mr. Black may be too sure of the fidelity of his audience.

Mr. Scudder's stories and romances afford an agreeable contrast in these regards. They are the work of a writer who has a thorough respect for his art and would not think of trifling with it, though he may be an eminently successful trifler in it. Thus their slightness becomes an important merit, and the writer is so careful to preserve literary propriety in making it a conspicuous quality that we have finished each story with the wish that there had been more of it, if not with the conviction that an extension of it would have been wise. They are, too, admirably simple, and not simplicity disguised and tricked out in an effort to heighten its effectiveness. Mr. Scudder has a reputation for writing good children's books, but these stories are of a thoroughly adult character and we do not now happen to think of any of the kind that excel them. "A Hard Bargain," "Do not Even the Publicans the Same?" and "A Story from the Siege of Boston," are decidedly inferior to the rest, and we cannot help wishing they had been omitted if the remainder would have made a sizable volume. "Left Over from the Last Century" is perhaps the best of all. It is not only witty both in idea and phrase, but it has a real flavor and is the work of a true humorist; the hero is a charming imbecile whose like we have not met with in a long time, and yet with a pathetic nature which rivets the interest his quaintness arouses. The pathetic, however, is not so distinctly Mr. Scudder's forte as the humorous; and even the story "Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John," straightforward as it is, threatens to become embarrassing once or twice, though our fears are not justified and its excellent moral is enforced without any incidental clap-trap. In such a story as "Nobody's Business" or "Accidentally Overheard" he shows how agreeably he can treat pure whimsicality by failing to pretend that it is anything else and gaining everything by the concession. "The House of Entertainment" is an unusual piece of work, with elements enough and of sufficient strength of fibre easily to stand expansion into a novel, we should say. But Mr. Scudder is on the safe side, and no doubt he is right in preferring suggestion to elaboration. His stories are all marked by ingenuity and have an original situation, as good short stories do of course, and possibly in more pretentious work this would stand him in less stead and he would have to depend more upon his ability to deal with character. This is considerable, and it is plain that all his personages have been thoroughly studied and are beyond doubt based on acute observation, but it is rather minute than broad, and if Mr. Scudder had a freer hand perhaps he might not write short stories so well. Nevertheless, "The House of Entertainment," if not so piquant as "Left Over from the Last Century," which we have called the best, is in respect of character and emotion the most important; it has to do with Shakerism, and treats it at once sympathetically and critically. Ruth and her father make a picturesque pair, and the hero is depicted with a good deal of distinctness, considering his shadowy nature.

It is difficult to see in 'Bricks without Straw' the same hand that wrote 'A Fool's Errand.' In the nature of things, perhaps, it is not to be expected that a genuine and unlooked-for popular success should be immediately succeeded by a predetermined and deliberate one. In such cases the second book is sometimes the earlier written, and brought out to be floated by the fame of the first; sometimes it is thrown together with extreme haste to take advantage of the flood tide; sometimes it is manufactured out of whole cloth and has really no reason at all for existing. 'Bricks without Straw' may be included in any of these classes. But for its acknowledged authorship we should ascribe it to a hand controlled more by feeling than judgment, whose enthusiasm had been occasionally checked and modified by a cooler mind. The effectiveness of 'A Fool's Errand' was due in great measure to its candor in admitting the existence of excuses, or at least natural causes, for the state of things it deplored and attacked. In this book there is not even a man of straw set up to justify the blows of which a shower is kept up. It has the air of a Stalwart polemic, written in the heat of a Presidential campaign for the approval of a campaign committee. The "staff correspondents" do not excel this, for example:

"Ah, God! how sad that history should be compelled to make up so dark a record—abuse, contumely, violence. Christian tongues befouled with calumny! Christian lips blistered with falsehood! Christian hearts overflowing with hate! Christian pens reeking with ridicule because other Christians sought to do their needy fellows good. No wonder that faith grew weak and unbelief ran riot through all the land when men looked upon the spectacle! The present may excuse, for charity is kind; but the future is inexorable and writes its judgments with a pen hard-nibbed!"

This refers to the ill-treatment "nigger-teachers" received in the South after the war. The significance of the book's title is that the "Nation" (sic throughout the book) didn't furnish the straw (of "troops," we infer) wherewith the freedmen might make bricks to rear the edifice of their civilization and advancement. The scene is in one of the Carolinas, in 1870, as nearly as we can make out. The only personages who do not richly deserve hanging are negroes, a "nigger-teacher," "radicals," and a "Douglas Democrat," who becomes a "Radical" before the book closes, and is promptly ostracised therefor, though his family is a very proud one. The plot is very simple and the incidents few, so that it is hardly to be classed as a novel at all. There is a phenomenal horse and a perilous ride, readers of 'A Fool's Errand' may be informed, and the poverty of invention which the repetition suggests is scarcely disguised. Indeed the book is to be treated entirely as a political pamphlet, and as such we can see no respect in which it is not a failure. It may be of no consequence that its effect should be to harden the hearts of the wicked Southerners, who have always shown a sensitiveness when their worst side only was held up to public notice, but we submit that its general tone and temper have become tiresome to reading people at the North, and now that the election is over we are ready for something more novel than "outrages" and something more spicy than elaborate sarcasm of the pusillanimity of incredulity concerning them, at least between the covers of a book. The last chapter recalls Judge Tourgee himself, however, and is another plea for education as the Southern panacea. The other good thing that we have remarked is a letter from a white refugee in Kansas to the converted Carolina "Radical," in which he says: "Nobody asks your politics. I don't reckon anybody knew mine for a year. The fact is, we're all too busy to fuss with our neighbors or cuss them about their opinions. I've heard more politics in a country store in Horsford in a day than I've heard here in Eupolia in a year." The book would be amazingly improved by the substitution of "contemporaneous human interest" of this sort for its eloquent denunciations and its blood-curdling Ku-klux stories.

Sport and Photography in the Rocky Mountains. By Andrew Williamson. (Edinburgh: David Douglas. 1880.)—Mr. Williamson has made a delightful record of his visit to this country in 1878. It begins with his departure late in August from Hall's Gulch, Colorado, for the Eagle River and Piney Range, where most of his shooting was done. The volume, a large quarto, is illustrated from photographs which Mr. Williamson took himself by the wet collodion process, and to his skill and perseverance in getting them, under many difficult circumstances, we owe the seventeen charming plates which adorn the book. The text modestly professes to be no more than "a few notes explanatory of the photographs taken and a short account of the excellent sport obtained."

The principal game killed was elk or wapiti, with a sprinkling of black-tailed deer and a brace of grizzly bears. The first wapiti was found at the timber line on Piney River, and Mr. Williamson was fortunate enough to kill him unaided and alone, though, from using in his Express rifle expanding bullets, which he considers far less deadly for large game than solid ones, it took four shots to bring him down. He gives a fine picture of the head of this stag, of which the antlers were 51 and 53 inches in length, with a span of 42 inches. On pp. 22, 23 is another interesting description of the successful stalk of a very large stag, of which Mr. Williamson gives the measurements as 17 hands high at the shoulders and 6 feet 8 inches around the heart; the horns, however, were not so fine as those of some killed before. This stag got his death-wound on the verge of a deep precipice, where he was left until the next day, when Mr. Williamson returned and took an excellent photograph of him and the surrounding scenery. The change of camp to Eagle River was fortunately made just in time to miss meeting a marauding band of Utes, and very nearly at the cost of the photographic apparatus, which, with the pony carrying it, rolled down a steep hill, and afterwards narrowly escaped destruction in fording the river. Finding that the game on Eagle River, which at the point they struck it was but forty miles from Leadville, had been scared away by other hunters, Mr. Williamson decided to return to his old ground on the Piney, where he again had excellent sport. Chapter viii. describes a red-letter day, when a desperate combat between two large wapiti was witnessed by the author and his guide, Wilkinson, after which both the combatants and a third stag were successfully stalked. Plate 13 gives us a post-mortem view of one of these as he fell, with an enormous pair of antlers 56 and 59 inches in length, and much greater in span and circumference than any other the author obtained. The first bear killed is photographed in Plate 16; and Plate 17—"The Home of the Grizzly"—is a fine picture of wild forest scenery. The amount of hard work accomplished by Mr. Williamson was great, all his shooting being done on foot, and the game, as a rule, reached only after arduous pursuits of hours. His success was fairly earned and fully appreciated, and he can be charged with none of the useless and wanton destruction of the large game of the West wrought by so many English and Americans who glory in the mere numbers they slaughter. Mr. Williamson makes a vigorous protest against this detestable butchery, and states, with pardonable pride, that his entire bag consisted of but thirty-two head, though he might have easily trebled it, and closes by saying:

"I have the greater satisfaction, and surely it is one a humane man will deem a far higher reward, that through the whole trip I never shot a stag whose head I did not bring home as a trophy, never fired at a hind, that we only killed such black-tail as we really needed, and that, save in the case of the grizzly bear, we never lost a wounded animal."

The paper, typography, and plates of the book leave nothing to be desired, and, indeed, are characteristic of the publisher, while the narrative is so plain, straightforward, and evidently truthful that the reader feels it is written by a genuine and intelligent sportsman. Mr. Williamson deserves the thanks of even the Anglophiles for disregarding the rule so generally observed by his countrymen who travel here and write a book, by devoting no part of his to imaginary quotation of the Yankee vernacular. In fact, he confines himself so closely to his topic that we are at a loss to know his opinion of us as a nation even. As bearing on a question lately discussed in Nature, we notice his statement that he has observed in the Highlands of Scotland the deer eating their own cast-off antlers, thus accounting for these being so rarely found in places where they must have been dropped. He thinks this habit does not prevail with the elk and black-tail deer of the Rocky Mountains, from their lost antlers being frequently seen on the ground. The rapid disappearance, however, of the shed horns of our own common deer has never yet been satisfactorily accounted for, and Mr. Williamson's statement may give a clue to it.

Miracle Plays and Sacred Dramas. A Historical Survey. By Dr. Karl Hase. Translated from the German by A. W. Jackson, and edited by the Rev. W. W. Jackson, Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1880.)—The Ober-Ammergau play has called into existence a small library of guide-books and essays, many of which have appeared this year in new editions. Among the new works which deserve notice is Mr. Jackson's translation of Hase's 'Das geistliche Schauspiel,' published in 1858 at Leipzig. This work, consisting of six popular lectures, is, as the title shows, devoted chiefly to the sacred drama, the early stage of which, the miracle-play or mystery, occupies but one lecture. By changing the title the translator has exposed the weakness of the original, which gave a not very clear idea of the origin and development of the mediæval drama, and since its publication a number of valuable works throwing great light on the subject have appeared which the translator and editor have overlooked. They have added some notes to supply the defective treatment of the Early English Drama in the original, and have completed Hase's account of the Ober-Ammergau play. Otherwise, they have not made use of any new material, and have failed to correct the mistakes in the original work. For example, the language used in the oldest mystery, the "Wise and Foolish Virgins," is not Provençal, but Old-French; the romantic element predominating in the mystery of the "King of Hungary's Daughter" was not borrowed in the thirteenth century from a romance of the Troubadours, but from the Trouvère, Philippe de Reims; and the statement that at the beginning of the thirteenth century a drama by a troubadour, Anselm Faidit, of Avignon, entitled "The Heresy of the Fathers," was acted at the country residence of the Marquis Boniface of Montferrat, is incorrect—the author and the play having had no existence. The idea that the stage for the performance of the mystery consisted of three stories was deemed correct when Hase's book was written, but has since been abandoned. We have also noticed no reference to the Italian, Breton, and Basque popular plays on religious subjects which are still acted by the peasants.

With the exception of the lecture on the "French Classical Tragedy," which is meagre and unsatisfactory, the other lectures are entertaining and instructive, those on the "Sacred Drama in Spain" and on Hans Sachs being particularly good. With the above restrictions, the book is worthy of commendation. The translation is excellent, and we know of no other work in English which covers this ground.

MLLE. BERNHARDT IN "ADRIENNE."

A RECEPTION had been conscientiously arranged to degrade this actress in every point, to make her appear as a sensation and a charlatan, and to fasten public attention exclusively upon her physical singularity, her defective diameter, her temper, or upon the clothes she had extracted with some anxiety from the Custom-house; but when it came to facing her with her first audience there was enough quiet receptivity in the house, and enough distrustful attention, to make the début a test. The people who had seemed like an army sacking a castle outside turned into a bench of moderators as soon as they found their places. And they listened with a fixed, hard patience, a dutiful, unwearied responsibility, that in its way was a good background on which the artist could sketch her effects. She had to play without the approving murmurs and sighs of satisfaction at the finer shadings to which she is accustomed, and the applause was in every instance dictated by herself with the common declamatory apparatus. We are without devices for expressing a sense of the refinements of playing, and can show approval only in an ejaculatory manner. This produced on Monday night the unfortunate result that such of the actress's successes as were most directly in the line of her character passed without sympathy; and that the applause came down specifically upon the passages in which she endeavored to go outside of her own proper nature. Mlle. Bernhardt, however, never seems to wish to exceed the limits of herself except in passages where the author forcibly commands it. She shows an overweening anxiety to give her part a complexion in consonance with her own possibilities. It is evident that she has taken her temperament as a given quantity of artistic material, looked at it from the outside, and sought to develop it in its own line as a study of dramatic quality. Her subtle but unsafe kind of tenderness, her Phœnician keenness of profile, her cajoling smile as of the Cyprus statues, were the edged instruments of her craft; and her acting at the recalls, when she practised all the tenderness and smiling on the audience, and seemed to hold her life on the tenure of its approval, had the air of being studied up a little more anxiously than anything in the play.

The purely plastic study of Mlle. Bernhardt's acting was a most interesting thing. Few tragedians may be supposed to have arranged the business of the play with a more intelligent use of merely sculptural effects. When she raised her spectral arms—one was always raised higher than the other—the line of the figure, the posture of the limbs, in her case apt to be a mere diagram, was always supported with her own drapery or with some one else's. Thus, when fainting with arms extended, in the recitation-scene at the Hôtel de Bouillon, there were duchesses on either hand, in assorted colors, to imbed the diverging members (with an instant intuition of the fainting business) in their own robes. It is not likely that a person in the audience, during a series of attitudes that were very free and anatomical, once derived a sensation of meagreness, or perceived aught but the fastidious grace of the motion itself. In the recitation of "The Two Pigeons," at the line "Amants, heureux amants, voulez-vous voyager," the actress spread her hands, with a happy sketch of a flying bird, over a form, a pose that seemed positively to soar in its aspiring and towering elevation. When she learned that her lover was really the Prince de Saxe in the little actress's haunt of Mlle. Duclos, her first gesture was one used by Doré for La Connétable in the 'Contes Drôlatiques,' a lifting up of the hands, in a curled concave fashion, high above the body bent back in a repellant gesture; but when she advanced upon the Princess to unmask her, in the interview of the hiding-place just after, her body was bent forwards almost at right angles, the advance was in measured paces, and the hands were extended as far back as possible, bent almost like claws, as if ready to tear and rend. When defending the door of the Princess, in the preceding scene, she met the intruding Abbé with a pointing hand of threatening, almost precisely like the sketch by herself in her libretto. In the scene of desolation in her own chamber, she sat by the box of flowers in a mass of crushed lace, and extended her whole body along with the hand in which she held out the blossoms for sympathy towards the old prompter; in this pose, and in the accent of the "mon pauvre bouquet!" she found an effect almost as thrilling as the incomparable "meine Blumen" of Seebach; but, directly after, when envying a supposed rival in the words "aimée! elle est aimée!" she rose and thrust out her palms, held downward, at their extreme distance and higher than her face, with the gesture of combating strange seas of melancholy. The arm movements were all made so that the audience could see them without foreshortening, and were never wasted by being pointed in front. The artist moved through the acts, indeed, in a succession of intensely descriptive poses, calculated to the very point of being spontaneous, and never once ungraceful. The hands were pressed to the heart often—both together, as in the "Ta femme! moi?" of Maurice's final declaration in the death-scene, or the left hand alone, as in all the first moiety of the declamation from "Phèdre." They nervously tossed a lace mouchoir from one to the other when she promised the prompter to triumph over her passion as he had triumphed over his own. In this moment, too, there was a suggestion of realism and familiarity, at variance with the gently idealized tone of the rendering in general, and balanced on the one side by the early introduction of comedy-acting when Maurice is bantered for his spelling, and on the other by the stark naturalness of the death, when Mlle. Bernhardt completely abandoned the atmosphere of poetry thrown over all the preceding portion, and gave the house a good raving, dishevelled dissolution, fit for "The Sphinx" or any melodrama that had never seen the Théâtre-Français. The episodic quotations throughout the piece were variously worthy of attention. The play is rich in them, and the actress gave them great variety of reading, from the purely idyllic, bucolic, country purity of the "Two Pigeons" (kindly ascribed to Corneille in next morning's Sun) to the "Phèdre." In this last, however, the reader certainly did not rise to the opportunity of divesting herself completely of Bernhardt, of Adrienne herself, and compassing the full height of a legendary heroine, of a mythological character compelled by the gods. The plastic variety shown by the artist in her recalls must not be forgotten. Her first was effected leaning her cheek upon her hand, and being pulled slowly across a broad doorway by the assiduous prompter; all were deeply curved, or hollowed out, with lassitude and a sense of movelessness even in the advance; and all were so appealing, so eloquently silent, that the house had an outburst of loyalty at every appearance, between its rather critical spells of coolness in the body of the play.

The Week.

WE have discussed elsewhere Judge Davis's extraordinary performance in the Court of Oyer and Terminer. The natural result of delivering a denunciatory political speech from the bench when committing a person for trial on a charge of libel is, that he is now engaged in a controversy with one of the witnesses, through the newspapers, on a question of fact. He has had to acknowledge that he was in error in charging Mr. Hewitt with having seen the Morey letter before its publication. He admits that Mr. Hewitt had not seen it before it was printed in Truth, but maintains that he had seen it before the lithographed publication was made. This Mr. Hewitt denies also. The point is hardly worth elucidation, but it almost seems as if the parties were engaged in a game of cross purposes. Is not the lithographed publication which Judge Davis says Mr. Hewitt saw before it appeared, the publication by the Democratic Committee? and is not the lithographed publication which Mr. Hewitt denies having seen before it appeared, the publication in Truth? The question whether Mr. Hewitt advised the lithographed publication, or instigated it, is, after all, a secondary one, on which Judge Davis has wasted his acumen. The principal question is, Did Mr. Hewitt advise it in good faith and believing the letter to be genuine? The next in order of importance is, Did he advise its publication and circulation for the purpose of damaging General Garfield, while himself holding the opinions which it attributed to General Garfield? If he answered the first question affirmatively, he could only be condemned for a gross indiscretion. If he answered the second affirmatively, he would plead guilty of participation in a very despicable political dodge. But, no matter what he says or has to say in the newspapers, abuse of him from the bench by a judge who had not heard him in his own defence, and had no jurisdiction over him, was scandalous, and calculated to bring the administration of justice into contempt.

As to the morality of campaign stories, dodges, and devices, we hold that there is but one morality for both parties, and that a Republican lie or fraud calls for precisely the same quantity and quality of reprobation as a Democratic one. We have, therefore, especially since Mr. Hewitt appeared on the scene as an awful example of Democratic depravity, been pained by the recollection of the calm with which General Grant's campaign story about General Hancock was received by Republican moralists. Although, as plainly appears from the Hewitt case, full to the neck of virtuous wrath, they had not one word of indignant remonstrance for a charge against General Hancock of official complicity in a monstrous fraud, told with the utmost calm and minuteness, and given in a revised form to a Methodist minister for circulation through the religious press. There was no truth in it. It was false and slanderous from beginning to end. It came from a man in a high position. It was intended to deprive General Hancock of votes he would otherwise have received. It imputed to him, not defensible economical opinions, but absolute criminality in one of its worst forms. We do not know to this hour, however, what our Republican contemporaries thought of it. Was it not, under the Davis ruling, something in the nature of "an appalling crime," a "national crime," and a "war on the safety and sanctity of popular government"? Now, don't put on that far, uninterested look, brethren, which is so apt to steal over your countenance when your attention is called to Republican sins. Keep up the stern Roman expression which you wear when you are watching the Democratic villains, and let us have a judgment on the little campaign story above mentioned, commonly known as the "Fowler Story," which made General Hancock a partner in a conspiracy for the issue of fraudulent bonds in Louisiana.

General Schofield has made his annual report to the Adjutant-General, in which he gives an account of the condition of West Point Academy which, if it had appeared before the election, would have certainly brought severe chastisement on him at the hands of the Stalwart press. After describing the improvement made in the morals and manners of the cadets by changes in the methods of discipline, he takes up the Whittaker case, and with it the general question of the status and treatment of colored cadets at the Academy. He boldly asserts, as now proved beyond question, that the attack on Whittaker was either an invention of his own or was perpetrated by persons with whom he was in connivance, and denies that any cadet had in any case anything to do with it. With the arguments by which he supports this position our readers are already familiar. He next explains and justifies the institution of a court of enquiry for a court-martial; makes some severe and well-deserved comments on the performances before that court of Mr. Martin I. Townsend, the counsel sent by the Government to supervise the proceedings; also some excellent remarks on the uselessness of trying to enforce pleasant social intercourse between the white and colored cadets by means of military discipline, ascribing its failure partly to the bad character of some of the colored cadets, and partly to "a natural reaction against an attempt to govern social intercourse by military regulations." He maintains, too, that the Military Academy was not a good place to begin the experiment of social intercourse between the white and the black man, and that it is unfair to expect that the young men of a race so recently emancipated from slavery could compete with the whites, and unfair to force them into the competition. Only one of the eleven colored appointees has succeeded in graduating.

As to the color prejudice, General Schofield calls it a "just aversion to qualities which the people of the United States have been long accustomed to associate with a state of slavery, and intercourse without legal marriage, of which color and its various shades are only the external signs." He is here by no means clear, or if clear is hardly sound. A "just aversion" to a quality can only be made the basis of a prejudice against a man by proof that he displays the quality. What General Schofield probably means is, that the aversion entertained towards color by the white cadets is a natural or an excusable aversion, created by the association in their mind of color with the vices of slavery, and with impure and degraded ancestry. He truly adds that this "cannot be removed by the simple act of enfranchising the slave; it can only be done by the education and moral elevation of the race." What made the newspaper declamation about the Whittaker case so absurd was that it not only denied this proposition, but denounced the cadets, young men of about twenty, for not rising at one stroke superior to prejudices which prevail in nearly every white family in the United States, and affect all but an infinitesimally small minority of the white men and women of the country in their intercourse with the colored people. General Schofield's protest against converting the military school into a nursery for "delicate hot-house plants," and lowering its standards or changing its methods so that boys with inferior mental, moral, and physical qualifications can get through it comfortably because they happen to be colored, must commend itself to every sensible reader. Even Stalwart editors will approve of it privately, however much they may bellow over it in public. The duty of the white race is to keep all its standards up and raise the colored race to them; not to lower them to the level of the colored race. There is no logical stopping-place short of fetishism and solitary feeding, if we once begin the practice of adapting our institutions and customs to the needs of such exceptional ignorance and weakness as we happen to have in the country. This is the view of the great body of the American people. The excitement over the Whittaker case out of doors was largely due to each man's desire to have some other man's son rid himself of the color prejudice in his social relations.

The New York Times has started a subscription for the purpose of raising $250,000 to pay a pension for life to "the oldest ex-President." As matters stand this is, of course, a movement to provide General Grant with an annuity, and that such is the principal object of the promoters of the scheme is not concealed. Most of the arguments in favor of the scheme are no more applicable to his case than to that of Mr. Hayes, who will soon stand in the same category. It must be said on the other side that if it is desirable, either on grounds of decency or grounds of justice, to pension any ex-President, it is desirable to pension all, and that the duty is one which, if it exists, fairly devolves on the nation at large, and which it would be very discreditable to have performed by "passing round the hat" among rich men. Every American citizen, however humble, has a fair right to feel and to say that it hurts his pride to have ex-Presidents pensioned by private subscription, as long as the public treasury is overflowing. Moreover, it is not seemly to make a distinction between General Grant and Mr. Hayes on the ground either of seniority or service. The seniority distinction is senseless, and as to services, we must presume in a matter of this kind that all ex-Presidents have deserved equally well of their country. If special provision is to be made for General Grant it ought to be in the character of a soldier simply. We feel quite sure that there will be no opposition in either party to a well-considered movement in Congress to provide a retiring allowance for all ex-Presidents, which would satisfactorily cover this case, and whatever is to be done ought to be done at once. It is at best an affair of $40,000 or $50,000 a year, over which it is disgraceful to have so much humming and hawing.

A very respectable organization, the Young Men's Democratic Club of this city, has been enquiring through a committee into the causes of the defeat of the party at the late national election, and into the best course to pursue with regard to the management of local politics in New York city and county. The committee reported certain resolutions, which were adopted, and which censure as one cause of Hancock's defeat the affiliation of the Democrats of Maine with the Greenbackers, which he mistook for a good omen; the neglect of the tariff issue in the canvass; and "the absence of a well-defined and consistent line of policy on the part of the party during the last four years, and especially in the conduct of the Presidential campaign of 1880." In New York the responsibility of failure is laid upon the State Committee, which received back the triumphantly rebellious Tammany Hall of 1879; and upon the two halls whose indecent lottery of the local offices disgusted all honest men, and resulted in a ticket which could add nothing to the strength of the party. If there was Republican "colonization," the report continues, then the halls were negligent in allowing it; if there was none, they were probably guilty of trading the electoral to save the local ticket. The committee concludes that in any case these organizations have forfeited the confidence of Democratic voters, and they recommend that the Club take the initiative in a new organization and enrolment of these voters, "and become the nucleus of a full and complete representation." But in order to prevent its falling into the hands of boss and machine government, they propose to procure the enactment of a law making "frauds and intimidation at primary meetings a felony." Nobody is better qualified to frame such a law than the chairman, Mr. Simon Sterne, whose name is a guaranty that the project "means business." As, once in force, the law would do something to purify the Republican primaries also, we make no doubt that Mr. George Bliss would cheerfully co-operate with Mr. Sterne in drawing it up.

The Treasury bought less than $600,000 worth of bonds for the Sinking Fund during the week, purchases having been limited to the sixes which mature December 31 next; and the arrivals of foreign specie amounted to only $2,100,000. The banks, while not gaining all of the above amounts, were drawn upon heavily for payments into the Treasury and for currency to ship to the South and West, and the result was that their surplus reserve was nearly extinguished, only $503,000 having been left on the average account of the week. The effect of this reduction in reserve was to advance the rates for demand loans from 3 to 4 per cent. to 5 to 6 per cent. As the rates for money advance here the market for foreign exchange weakens; consequently the rates for bills on London fell so that there was a clear profit in importing specie, and nearly $6,000,000 was ordered from London and the Continental markets during the week. At the Stock Exchange there was, notwithstanding the advance in the rates for loans, a very strong market for United States bonds, which advanced to the highest prices ever paid for them (111⅛ for the 4's and 112⅛ for the 4½'s), and there was also a further rise in railroad bonds. Speculation in stocks was tame and halting, and the net result of the week's fluctuations was a decline in prices of 1 to 9 per cent. The price of silver was steady both in London and here. The bullion in the "buzzard dollar" was worth at the close of the week 86⅝ cents.

The Times's protégé, Samuel Perry, lately leader of the North Carolina exodus to Indiana, has been discharged by Judge Wylie, of Washington, on grounds which show how much remains to be done to settle the principles of inter-State extradition. This judge held it to be a suspicious circumstance, affecting the "whole moral atmosphere" of the case, that the requisition was entrusted not to a sheriff or some such officer, but to a farmer (the North Carolina papers call him Doctor Bagby) from the county where Perry had "worked up" the emigration. He then pointed out the time which had elapsed—nearly a year—between the date of the alleged forged school-warrant and that of the proceedings against Perry, when he was bound over in the sum of $100, and the farther delay of six months in finding an indictment against him. Moreover, though Perry prepared he did not utter the instrument, and had it been genuine it would not have been good, as, under the decisions of the North Carolina courts, it was not an order for the payment of money. Hence Judge Wylie, waiving the question whether Perry could have a fair trial, or rather conceding that he could, after hearing testimony pro and con., concluded that he must necessarily be acquitted if sent home, so that the State would not be the loser by the refusal to give him up, and, economically of course, though the judge did not say this, all the parties would be the gainers. This is very kind, no doubt, but it is not surprising to learn that the State took an appeal to the court in banc. Judge Cartter, it will be remembered, paid instant respect to the requisition.

Professor Robertson Smith's enemies in the Free Church of Scotland have at last got the better of him. He was brought up before the Ecclesiastical Court more than a year ago, our readers may remember, for unsoundness in an article on the Bible in the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' but got off owing to some mismanagement on the part of the prosecution. Soon afterwards a new volume of the 'Encyclopædia' appeared in which he had an article on the Hebrew language and literature, which appeared to be worse than the first, and was eagerly seized on as an excuse for reviving the proceedings against him. In August last a commission was appointed by the General Assembly to examine this last article, and it has just made its report at a special meeting. It finds him guilty of irreverence in his treatment of the Scriptures; of speaking of them in such manner as to give the impression that God is not the author of them, that their narrative portion is not authentic, and that their prophetic portion was untrue. He talks of Ezra and Nehemiah as being "singularly destitute of literary merit"; alleges that two chapters of Isaiah "seem to have been first published as literary broadsides"; speaks of the Song of Solomon as a "lyric drama," and the story of Jonah as "a parable"; and describes Eber as simply "an ethnological or geographical abstraction." He defended himself in a speech of an hour and a half, in which he is reported to have made great havoc with the report and its authors, over whom, of course, he has an immense advantage in point of learning and dialectical skill, but injured himself somewhat by the impetuosity of his attacks on them. It availed him nothing, however, as he was suspended from the exercise of his professorship for six months by a vote of 270 to 202. He denies the validity of the whole proceeding on technical grounds, and it is now not impossible that the case may make its way into the courts of law.

The state of things in Ireland grows more and more embarrassing for the Government, and is illustrated in somewhat ludicrous fashion, it must be confessed, by what is occurring in Mayo. A Captain Boycott, a land agent of Lord Erne, who also farms himself, has been deserted by all his servants and laborers, and has been literally tabooed by the whole surrounding population. Nobody will work for him, or buy from him, or sell to him, and, as his life has been threatened, he goes about accompanied by a guard of policemen, under whose protection he has been making feeble attempts for some weeks to gather his crops with the assistance of his own family. The tenants also refuse to pay him any rent. An expedition was got up by some of the Orangemen to go to his assistance, and save his crops and chastise his enemies, but as this would have been a beginning of civil war the Government refused to allow an armed party to start, but agreed to protect a small force of laborers with troops. The laborers have accordingly reached the ground, escorted by a detachment of cavalry and infantry. As soon as he gets his crops in Captain Boycott is going to leave the country, and it remains to be seen how Lord Erne will collect his rents. The story here is the old one—too high rents, advances in rent considered unjustifiable by the tenants, harsh treatment of tenants and laborers, and the stern enforcement of arbitrary "office rules." The incident is mainly useful as an illustration of the power of persecution possessed by the Land League, and of the want of any real moral hold on the peasantry by many of the landlords—if not, indeed, of the whole class—in some parts of the country.

Mr. Gladstone appears to have relieved the public mind in England by announcing at the Lord Mayor's dinner that the Government considered the protection of life and property in Ireland their paramount duty, the performance of which must precede all attempts to deal with the land question. As the murders and intimidation continue there is still some reason for believing that the Government will resort to a suspension of the habeas corpus, which is certainly not only the most effective but the mildest remedy that could be resorted to. All the other schemes of coercion involve, in a greater or less degree, the punishment of the innocent with the guilty. The prompt seizure of the orators who now suggest or apologize for assassination would do a great deal of good, and probably more to the tenant farmer than anybody else. But, in any event, the Ministry is expected to bring in a strong Land Bill when Parliament meets, putting a check on the arbitrary raising of rents by some system of legal arbitration, and facilitating the purchase of land by the peasantry, both by the offer of Government loans and the simplification of conveyancing. Should the Lords throw it out there would probably be a dissolution and excitement such as has not been seen since the passage of the Reform Bill. Both parties perceive clearly the bearings of the Irish land question on the English land question, and in fighting over it are fighting for position with reference to future operations. This relation of Irish to English questions furnishes one of their strongest arguments to the Home-Rulers. They say they never can get an Irish question settled in accordance with Irish opinion.

Two members of the Cabinet, representing its Radical wing, have also made speeches on the Irish question, Mr. Bright and Mr. Chamberlain at Birmingham. Mr. Bright promised a measure giving the tenant fixity of tenure and security against the arbitrary raising of the rent. Mr. Chamberlain, on the other hand, defended the prosecution of the Land-Leaguers, on the ground that if the law were violated the Government had no alternative but to punish those who violated it; while if it had not been violated, the accused had nothing to fear from the trial. There is evidently no great vigor in the prosecution, and of course most of the life will be taken out of it before the jury by the admissions of the Cabinet that the condition of the tenants justifies agitation.

The most important contributions to the literature of the subject of late have been two articles, one in the Nineteenth Century, by Lord Sherbrooke, better known as Mr. Robert Lowe, and one in the Fortnightly Review, by Mr. Morrough O'Brien. Lord Sherbrooke's has been drawn out by Mr. Tuke's pamphlet, which is more interesting and more influential than anything which the discussion has produced. He applies to the relation of the Irish landlord and tenant the well-known rules of political economy with the utmost neatness. The parties are free agents; the letting of the land is a contract; if the tenant does not like it he need not enter into it. True, he has no security for his improvements; but, on the other hand, owing to the tenant's want of capital, the landlord has generally no security for his rent. The tenant, therefore, if he finds his farming under existing conditions unpleasant, ought to engage in "some handicraft trade or occupy some humble position in the ranks of industry." We presume, in case he can find no such "handicraft trade or humble position in the ranks of industry," he ought to withdraw to some retired place and die quietly in some way which will entail no expense on the county. The answer to all this is, however, that the land has in no European country been treated as a mere agent of production. The landlords, both in England and Ireland, have always treated it as a source of social and political influence and obligation, and yet England is the only country in the world in which politicians venture to preach that the relation of the people to the soil is a purely commercial one. They have been trying to force the acceptance of this doctrine on the Irish for two hundred years, as we see, without any success. Lord Sherbrooke's advice now is to treat the Irish land theories as mere whimsies, and pay no attention to them. Some of the English Liberal papers dispose rather summarily of his lordship's economical sermon, however, by recalling the fact that he voted for Gladstone's Land Act of 1870, which is based on the theory that land-letting is not a mere commercial contract, and that the tenant is not a free agent. Mr. O'Brien's article is a useful one, being devoted to an account of the working of the peasant proprietorships on the church-lands lately sold. It is certainly in the highest degree hopeful.

A very slight check in the Assembly—an adverse vote on the order in which certain bills should be taken up—led on Tuesday week to the resignation of the Ferry Ministry in France, almost immediately after the opening of the session. M. Grévy, however, refused to receive it, and a portion of the Left declared that by the vote they simply meant to manifest their preference on a minor point, and by no means to express any want of confidence in the Ministry. Accordingly, on Thursday last, M. Ferry made a speech demanding a direct vote of confidence, and giving notice that the Ministry would not keep office on sufferance. Clémenceau, the leader of the Extreme Left, therefore, made a bitter attack on them, and after some further debate a division took place on a motion of confidence, which was carried by 297 to 131. In the course of the discussion, M. Baudry-d'Asson, a furious royalist, who had previously been suspended for disorderly behavior, entered the Chamber and took his seat in defiance of the order excluding him, and had to be removed, amidst a scene of great tumult, by the main force of fifteen soldiers, who carried him out, while he kicked and struggled violently. Nothing better was expected of Baudry-d'Asson, but the fact that the Duc de la Rochefoucauld was violently excited on his behalf shows what a state of mind the Extreme Right has worked itself into under the execution of the decrees.

The Ministry retains its place, but it seems to be generally acknowledged that its hold on the Chambers amounts to but little, and that its final downfall may any day be looked for. The Extreme and Advanced Left, which gave the majority against them on the order of procedure, has refused to recede from its position; and as M. Gambetta is on the side of the Ministry, and, in fact, as our politicians would say, "owns" it, this is taken as an indication that he too can no longer control the majority, and that his situation is becoming precarious. The object of Clémenceau and those who act with him is to force Gambetta himself into taking office, by destroying the ministries which are one by one set up to keep things going until Gambetta concludes that his hour has come. Clémenceau has recently made a very savage speech in this sense at Marseilles, calling on him to take the open responsibility before the country of the power which he really exercises, but exercises privately and indirectly. It is very doubtful whether, after the Ferry Ministry retires, any politician either of the first or second order will consent to fill a position which is fast losing all credit or dignity, and whether Gambetta will not be compelled at last to step into the breach himself. There is some danger now that he may himself be so weakened by the time he heads a Cabinet that he will not be able to hold his own either. And after him, what?

GENERAL GARFIELD AND THE BOSSES.

GENERAL GARFIELD is a man of ideas, and must ere this have asked himself the question, What ought a President of the United States to seek in order to signalize his administration before his contemporaries and to posterity? What line of procedure will give him the best claim to the respect and gratitude of his countrymen and the favorable judgment of history? After this question is answered another will present itself: What instrumentalities are best calculated to produce the desired result? A President of the United States has only four, or possibly eight, years to do his work in. He must so arrange his labors that they can be reasonably consummated within this space of time, or he must put things in train so that his successor shall be in some sort constrained to take up his unfinished task and push it forward.

It would be idle to controvert the maxim which governs all politicians, that their first duty to the country is to keep their own party in power. General Garfield will, of course, assume as his first postulate that steps must be taken which will at least keep the Republican party in the majority in as many States as it controlled at the last election. The means by which this end can be most certainly attained are the chief subject of contention now, and will continue to be so throughout his whole term of office. Intrigues for the next nomination on the part of various aspirants and cliques play a large part in the course of events under any administration, but each aspirant like every member of every clique believes or pretends to believe that his aims are those best fitted to strengthen the party and maintain its supremacy. In the clashing of interests around this principal subject of contention Tom, Dick, and Harry can afford to be mistaken, because they are irresponsible and frequently have nothing to lose. But the President of the United States cannot afford to be mistaken. He is bound by his higher standpoint to see farther than others, as his punishment for failure will be heavier. If he be one of the aspirants for the next nomination himself, still less can he afford to commit any serious error in discerning the causes which tend to strengthen or weaken the party in those States where its majority is small and doubtful, but of the last importance.

A glance at the two administrations next preceding General Garfield's will be useful in assisting us to answer the question what line of procedure and general policy is best calculated to keep the Republican party in power, and may enable us incidentally to determine how far General Garfield himself is indebted to such politicians as Conkling, Cameron, and Logan for his election. The two salient points of difference, as to policy, between the administrations of Grant and Hayes were those relating to the government of the South and the management of the civil service. President Grant represented all that is denominated Stalwart in both these particulars. President Hayes has represented the opposite, or nearly the opposite, in both particulars. President Grant led his party to untimely defeat; President Hayes has enabled it to achieve a narrow but sufficient victory. The narrowness is best shown by the vote of New York, where a change of less than twelve thousand would have elected General Hancock, and produced a revolution in the public officers from Maine to Oregon and wherever the Federal Government has a representative in any part of the world. About one vote in a hundred is all the margin that the new Administration has to go on in this State, which happens for the time being to be the deciding factor between the two parties in national politics. In Indiana the state of things is very much the same, and it may be remarked in passing that if Indiana had given a Democratic majority in October General Garfield's chances in New York would not have been worth a rush. The balance of power is but a breath, a zephyr, and we hold that it is altogether fortunate and desirable that it should be so. It is a fact to which all citizens who have no other interest to subserve by their votes than the common good of the country may reasonably "point with pride." It is a fact which puts both parties, and especially the party in power, on the nicest adjustment of their behavior. It is a fact to which General Garfield must pay the strictest heed, and which he cannot afford to lose sight of for a moment.

The Southern question is now settled in such a way that there is no possibility of unsettling it by any outside pressure or interference exerted from Washington City. If General Garfield desired to pursue a different policy from that of President Hayes he would not know how to begin, nor could any of his Stalwart advisers tell him what to do. A new régime of troops at the polls, with double-headed legislatures in Louisiana and South Carolina, would be voted down by the North at the first opportunity. Of the two points of essential difference between the Grant and Hayes administrations, the only one which need greatly concern General Garfield relates to their respective methods of managing the civil service. It is not to be affirmed that Mr. Hayes has achieved entire success in this branch of administration, but he has given better satisfaction to the country in this particular than any President since John Quincy Adams. President Lincoln had no chance to do anything helpful in this regard, and he is the only one of our later Presidents before Mr. Hayes who can be said to have had the mental and moral make-up to do anything helpful. The country, during Mr. Hayes's term of office, has been brought to regard the civil service, its administration, its mode of appointment, its morale, as a subject of the highest interest. To have fixed public attention clearly upon this subject is a very great service. President Hayes has done something more: he has stimulated a public demand for a better service and better methods of securing it.

The method in vogue under President Grant—the method which the Bosses will now endeavor to replace, using General Garfield as the instrument for that purpose—was to regard all Federal officers as the raw material of train-bands organized in the personal interest of Senators and Representatives in Congress. The public service was so far a secondary consideration that it was deemed in the highest degree impertinent to raise such an issue against the wishes of the local Boss whose perquisites were threatened. Such was the view taken by the majority of the Republican Senators in the New York custom-house cases at the beginning of Mr. Hayes's Administration. Mr. Hayes has paid the penalty of his temerity by losing the society of the Bosses for the greater part of his term of occupancy of the White House, but he has brought back a majority of Republican Congressmen to the national capital, and of undisputed electoral votes to the nominees of the party, and he has compelled the Bosses to support one of his intimate friends, and one identified with his own policy, as his successor in the Presidency. Upon the whole he has nothing to regret except his own deviation from the line of conduct which has brought about results so admirable even from a party point of view, and so strikingly different from those which were produced by the former régime. If the party, as a whole, owes nothing to the old system, General Garfield himself owes little or nothing to its chief exponents. All the Bosses who bore sway under Grant opposed him at Chicago, and all of them sulked for months afterward, and until it became apparent to them that he would be elected without their aid. They then came forward with banners bearing the device "306," and gave to the campaign the semblance of a contest for the next Presidency instead of this one, and thus drove away many voters, though fortunately not enough to lose the election. General Garfield's personal popularity in Indiana was as important a factor as any in deciding the vote of that wavering State, and the Indiana election, as we have already observed, made a Republican victory in New York possible. Whatever General Garfield owes in return for his election he owes to the Republican voters of the nation, to the American people, and not to any clique, coterie, or faction whatever. His debt will be fully discharged if he administers his office upon this understanding. He can best signalize his administration before his contemporaries and in the eyes of posterity by continuing and bettering the reform of the civil service, and if he does so he can in all probability lay down a policy from which his own successor, whether four or eight years hence, cannot easily depart. We can point out to him no better guide, so far as principles and their application are concerned, than his own public speeches in and out of Congress. It is needless to add that the instrumentalities are not to be found among the Logans, Camerons, and Tom Platts who are so volubly named at this juncture for members of his Cabinet.

THE MOREY LETTER CASE.

THE late canvass was marked, especially towards the close, by several very odd incidents, but none odder than the production, with the sanction of the Democratic Committee, of the Morey forged letter.

The letter was intended to fasten on General Garfield the charge of holding opinions about Chinese immigration which would injure his chances as a candidate in the Pacific States, and probably cause him the loss of a good many votes in the manufacturing districts of the East. It made him say that he thought the Chinese Treaty ought not to be abrogated, or the immigration of Chinese laborers be restricted, until the wants of American employers were fully supplied. It would, if genuine, have been no more injurious to him as a candidate than a letter declaring for an immediate abolition of the tariff. It imputed to him no sentiments discreditable per se. Here it is in full:

"DEAR SIR: Yours in relation to the Chinese problem came duly to hand.

"I take it that the question of employees is only a question of private and corporate economy, and individuals or companys have the right to buy labor where they can get it cheapest.

"We have a treaty with the Chinese Government, which should be religiously kept until its provisions are abrogated by the action of the general Government, and I am not prepared to say that it should be abrogated until our great manufacturing and corporate interests are conserved in the matter of labor.

Very truly yours,

"J. A GARFIELD.

"H. L. Morey, Employers' Union, Lynn, Mass."

The first paragraph contains an economic truism which is recognized in the legislation of every State in the Union, and which the police enforce whenever there is a laborers' strike. The second paragraph contains two propositions. The first is a simple repetition of the clause in the United States Constitution which declares treaties made with foreign powers to be "the supreme law of the land." The second affirms that General Garfield has not made up his mind that it would be expedient to abrogate the Chinese treaty until manufacturers and corporations have secured as much labor as they want on satisfactory terms. The term "conserved" is obscure, but this we take to be its meaning. Thousands and probably hundreds of thousands of economists and moralists all over the country undoubtedly would adhere to these propositions and would see nothing dangerous in them. Probably no man with much to do would take the trouble to repudiate such a letter, even if forged and put in circulation in his name, if he were not a candidate for office.

General Garfield was, however, a candidate for office, and as such its circulation was likely to damage him, and in his eagerness to rid himself promptly of responsibility for it he applied to it the somewhat ludicrous epithet "brutal." It is no more "brutal" than a letter imputing to him hostility to the tariff would have been. It is a base letter because forged and intended to do damage at a critical period, but this is the worst that can be said of it. The Republican Committee felt it to be so important to expose it that they at once began the prosecution of the person supposed to have concocted it, and who certainly based on it an article accusing General Garfield of "lying" in denying its authenticity.

In ordinary cases the proceeding would have been opened by the arrest and examination of the accused before a police magistrate, but as forgery, unless it affects property, is not a punishable offence under the New York law, it was found to be necessary, in order to reach the supposed author of the letter, to have the letter treated as a criminal libel. A police magistrate was very likely to be unwilling to take the responsibility of putting this construction on it, and even if he were willing, his construction would not have weight enough or éclat enough to make it useful for electioneering purposes. Accordingly the somewhat unusual but perfectly legal course was adopted of bringing the accused before one of the judges of the Supreme Court on a "bench warrant." This judge was Mr. Justice Davis, who has for the last fortnight been conducting the examination, and has closed it by committing Philp, the defendant, for trial.

It is to be observed, however, as necessary to a proper appreciation of Judge Davis's share in this extraordinary case, that the examination before him was just as much a preliminary examination as if it had been conducted by a police justice, and was surrounded by the same restrictions and usages. The object of such an examination is not to reach a definite conclusion as to the prisoner's guilt, but to ascertain whether there is a sufficient primâ-facie case against him to warrant his being held for a full trial before a jury. Until the jury has passed upon the case the presumption of law is that he is innocent. It is therefore customary for magistrates conducting such examinations, both in this country and in England, to abstain from all unnecessary comment, and especially from anything like denunciation or magnification of the offence, and from anything approaching to complete assumption of the defendant's guilt. In fact, this delicacy is carried so far among lawyers who live up to the best traditions and usages of the profession that we believe it is considered unjustifiable for a prosecuting counsel to indulge in invective against the prisoner in the opening statement before the jury. He is expected to reserve that until the prisoner's case has been heard.

Judge Davis has taken a different and, if we are not greatly mistaken, an unprecedented view of his duty. He has written a long and very elaborate opinion, in which he not simply commits Philp for trial, but pronounces him guilty of criminal libel in the most positive manner, and enlarges and expatiates on the gravity of the offence, and singles out for denunciation various other persons, some of whom were before him simply as witnesses, but some of whom were not before him at all. We can recall, in fact, nothing like his decision in the recent history of criminal jurisprudence, and we hope the bar has read it with proper surprise.

He finds that to attribute to General Garfield, even by direct assertion, the sentiments of the letter would be libellous, because these are such "as would tend, if believed to be his, to bring him into popular hatred and contempt, and to excite breaches of the peace." It follows from this irresistibly that to have said in the late canvass in a newspaper article that General Garfield was really a free-trader would have been made libellous by his merely denying the fact, for it is impossible to prove, in opposition to his own assertion, that a candidate does or does not hold during a canvass any particular opinion. So that, under this rule, any discussion of a candidate's probable motives or opinions, which tended to bring about his defeat, would be libellous and indictable. We are glad to think that in this matter it is juries who settle the law, and not judges. But as he goes on, Judge Davis's imagination seems to become more and more inflamed. Not satisfied with the functions of a police justice, nor even with those of a petty jury, he takes on himself those of a grand jury, and begins an exploration in search of other offenders besides those before him. Not only is the Morey letter a criminal libel, but the evidence of it, "taken in connection with other evidence," "tends to establish a grave conspiracy to accomplish a national crime," and this conspiracy "points to men in other quarters and of far higher positions, of whom he (Philp) may have been an accomplice or only a dupe and tool." A "national crime" is, we believe, an offence hitherto unknown to the law. It must, as English is now written, be a crime committed by a nation in its corporate capacity, and a conspiracy looking to such a thing must be a very serious affair, so serious that we can hardly believe that the conspirators would begin by publishing a bogus letter ascribing some mild twaddle about Chinese immigration to a candidate for the Presidency. But it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that when he got as far as this Judge Davis had mentally laid aside his judicial character, and was composing a ringing article for a campaign newspaper. The following is quite in the style of a Stalwart "editorial" of the period:

"It must be the wish of all honorable minds that this case will lead not only to the discovery and exposure of the guilty, but to the enactment of laws which will prevent or severely punish offences of this character. Whoever be the guilty in this case, right-thinking men everywhere must look upon the act as an appalling crime wholly at war with the safety and sanctity of popular government. Fortunately no committee and no body of men hold in their hands the conscience of the people; and no party fealty is strong enough to intercept the sentence of condemnation which honest men of all parties must pronounce upon such guilt."

Here we find that a disgusting but by no means novel campaign trick, which was ridiculed forty years ago by foreign caricaturists of American manners like Dickens, has grown into "an appalling crime wholly at war with the safety and sanctity of popular government." It can hardly be as a judge of the Supreme Court that Judge Davis tells us that there are some appalling crimes which are only partially "at war with the safety and sanctity of popular government." What name to give to the bold assertion that "no committee and no body of men hold in their hands the conscience of the people," we do not well know. Respect for the bench requires us to call it at least an obiter dictum, but we are afraid that a great many irreverent persons will characterize it in plain English.

His remarks on Mr. Hewitt were, if possible, still more extraordinary than those on the atrocity and gravity of the Morey letter. We have no intention here of undertaking Mr. Hewitt's defence. His position in the matter must be sufficiently unsatisfactory in his own eyes. His best friends cannot acquit him of grave indiscretion, but he is entitled to the benefit of all the favorable presumptions (to which General Garfield has owed so much during the late canvass) raised by a long, unblemished, and useful public and private career. The life of no man in New York furnishes stronger claims to the charitable and careful judgment of the community, even in the face of very unpleasant facts. Therefore, even if he had been the prisoner in this libel case, it would have been unseemly for the judge in a mere preliminary examination, where he could not make a full defence, to rake him with fierce, condemnatory criticism. But he was not the defendant; he was merely a witness. His connection with the letter, however reprehensible, was not before the court. It neither added to nor diminished the gravity of the forgery or libel. Nevertheless Judge Davis denounces him, in the same vigorous newspaper rhetoric in which he describes "the appalling crime," as a man "of known sagacity in business and public affairs who is supposed to have a decent respect for truth," but "pressed and caused" the publication of the letter, which "was a wrong to his intimate friend as base and wicked as an assassin's stab." The judge then proceeds to distribute the guilt of the affair among those who helped to spread the letter, and lays it down that they were all accessories to the forgery in the forum of morals. He speculates as to the probable cause of the "toning down" of Mr. Hewitt's "conscience," confesses himself unable to decide whether or not the non-acceptance of Garfield's denial was "under a subterfuge," and decides what his (Hewitt's) "motive" was in a certain act in which he assumes that he was an accomplice.

As we have said before, we are not defending Mr. Hewitt, or apologizing for the Democratic Committee, or extenuating Philp's offence. We are simply calling attention to the use made by Judge Davis of the very trifling and insignificant process of sending an accused man for trial before a jury, to compound on the bench a campaign document to which, even if it had emanated from the Republican Committee, there would be very grave objections on the score of fairness and accuracy. If such attacks on character are ever justifiable from a position so high as the bench, from which all censure falls with so much force, they are justifiable only at the real trial before the tribunal which is to pass finally on the case. Uttered in advance of this trial, their plain tendency to prejudice the public and the jury would of itself suffice to make them indecent.

THE TURKISH CRISIS REVIEWED.

PARIS, October 29, 1880.

THE policy of peace has triumphed in Europe, for a little while at least. The famous demonstration of Dulcigno has not been quite useless, in that it has demonstrated what may be called the actual impossibility of war. It has had another utility—it has torn away the diplomatic veils and shown Europe as it really is, not as it appeared in the protocols of the Congress of Berlin. We have been so near a war that all the great Powers have been obliged to show their sentiments, and to do something more than speak of their common understanding. We have emerged from platonic politics into realities; and what are these realities? Europe spoke of nothing but of a common action and of the necessity of a perpetual harmony, but, in fact, we can see in the late situation two groups of nations animated by very different sentiments.

On one side stand Germany and Austria-Hungary, now united by a most cordial alliance. There is no longer any doubt that when Prince Bismarck rushed to Vienna some time ago he was afraid, or seemed to be afraid, of an alliance of Russia with France, and of a war with Russia. He offered to Austria the German alliance, and guaranteed to her the development of her influence in the valley of the Danube and in the peninsula of the Balkans. Germany is disinterested in the Eastern Question in so far that none of the provinces of the Ottoman Empire can fall into her own sphere of action, and this situation gives her a great authority in the settlement of the Eastern Question. She can throw herself with a greater weight on the side of Austria or of Russia. Bismarck has chosen to espouse the cause of Austria in the East, and in return he has, so to speak, changed the Emperor of Austria into one of the confederates of the new Empire. Things go so fast in our time that Francis Joseph, who was turned out of the German Bund after Sadowa, is becoming now the hope of the Bund. If a general war should break out, it can be said almost with certainty that the regiments which fought against each other on the plains and hills of Bohemia would now fight side by side. The German unity is achieving itself in this new form: not only do all the German-speaking provinces now feel themselves tied to a common destiny, but Germany exercises, through the medium of Austria, a powerful hegemony over the various races which constitute Transleithania, and her attraction, already felt in Bosnia and Herzegovina, will soon be felt even further in the peninsula of the Balkans. The old Metternichian policy has found its point d'appui in Berlin.

There is no reason why this new alliance, founded upon the solidarity of all German interests, should produce immediate results in the East. Nobody knows better than Austria the intrinsic difficulties of the Eastern Question. The Ottoman Empire is slowly decaying, and it is better to wait till a new order of things is established by the necessities and fatalities inherent in the various elements which are now in a chaotic state. Austria has probably not many illusions concerning the vitality of the ambitious little nationalities which are struggling for life in the peninsula of the Balkans. She feels that it is her "manifest destiny" to protect these pseudo-nations with their pseudo-princes; to build roads and railroads for these provinces which had been so completely neglected by the Turks; to introduce the arts of civilization, laws, the police, the whole state-machinery of the West into these lands, which seem now almost emerging from barbarism. But Austria is in no hurry. The work which is before her is not the work of a day, and she is not willing to advance any solution by a premature war. It became evident as soon as the allied fleets appeared before the Albanian coast that Germany was not willing to bring the naval demonstration to a warlike end. On the other side stood England, France, and Russia. England was in the forefront of what may be called the active group of Europe. She entered into the Eastern Question with a passion which astonished only those who are not old enough to have seen the Crimean War. Many of us, however, remember England's intense ardor at the time of the Conference of Vienna, of the famous "four points" of Lord Russell; we remember the burst of sincere or affected anger which followed the publication of the despatches of Sir Hamilton Seymour. The situation was not the same in 1880. There was no more sentimentalism about the "sick man," no more alarm about the ambition of the Czar; all the anger of England was now directed against the Sultan. Six great Powers decided in a congress that Montenegro should have such a frontier and Greece such another, and England seemed to consider the resistance of the Sultan as a crime which must be at once punished. We can hardly imagine that such men as Lord Hartington, Sir William Harcourt, and Mr. Forster should have found it very extraordinary that the Sultan would not give up large provinces and important cities to the Greeks without even the semblance of a fight. Mr. Gladstone may be more romantically disposed. He gave up the Ionian Islands in the midst of profound peace, but the Sultan will only give up Janina and Metsovo under coercion. Mr. Gladstone was willing that coercion should be exercised in favor of Greece; he was all ready to form a triple alliance with France and with Russia. The temptation was surely great, if there had been any chance of success in the undertaking. England would have had two Continental armies, instead of one—and what armies! The French army, completely reorganized, and numbering now 500,000 in time of peace; the Russian army, fresh from the battle-fields of Plevna, a people rather than an army, a numberless host, fired with all the passions of the Slavic races. Italy, too, might have been drawn, willingly or unwillingly, into the great alliance. She would probably have thrown her fortunes on the side which would have been perforce hostile to the interests of Austria.

What Russia's sentiments may have been in this crisis; how far England approached the Government which has the strongest and most permanent interests in the East; what promises were made, what hopes were given—all this remains a secret for the present. We can only say in a general way that Germany's attitude towards Russia has for some time been marked by hostility; that the journey of the Emperor Francis Joseph to Galicia was considered in Russia as an indirect threat, as an indication that if it was necessary Germany would not hesitate to reopen the Polish question. Since the termination of the Eastern war the relations of Russia and of Germany have become very unsatisfactory. The Emperors still exchange courtesies, while the press and the diplomacy of Germany and of Russia are in a state of continual warfare. The Russians believe that the failure of their plans, the rejection of the treaty of San Stefano, were owing as much, and perhaps more, to the opposition of Prince Bismarck than to the attitude of Lord Beaconsfield. The Russians cannot be consoled for having had Constantinople in their hands, and for not having been allowed to taste the forbidden fruit. Russia seems all ready for any action that would add something to her prestige, and that would undo the treaty of peace which the efforts of all Europe imposed upon her. She wants a new treaty of San Stefano; she hopes for the final union of Rumelia with Bulgaria; her agents preach a great Bulgaria, a Pan-Bulgaria. She does not like to see the approach of Austria in Bosnia and Herzegovina. She looks upon the Hohenzollern of the Danubian Principalities with distrust. The tide of Panslavism which is rolling constantly towards the Balkans is also rolling towards the Carpathians. But Russia found in the last war that her organization was very imperfect; she is correcting it now, and she is not yet prepared for any important war.

England expected that France would be very eager for her alliance. Kinglake has carefully explained in his 'History of the Crimean War' that one of the chief reasons of it was the isolation of Napoleon and of his associates after the Coup d'état. It seems singular that the English statesmen could have imagined any similarity in the situation of the Government born of the Coup d'état and of the actual Republican Government, which, whatever may be its faults of conduct, had at any rate a most legitimate origin, as the Republican Constitution was voted by the Constituent Assembly of 1871, elected with the most perfect freedom. It may please some Republican heaven-born statesmen to associate with the representatives of the oldest monarchies and aristocracies; but it would be an insult to their patriotism and to their good sense to suppose that they could endanger their own country in order to win the hypocritical homage of a few lords, who were not long ago the guests of Napoleon III. at Compiègne or at Saint-Cloud. There has been, for a moment, a small party of action—I can find no better name for it, as I will not call it a warlike party—a party composed of a few men who thought that the time had come for France to emerge from her isolation. These men saw with dissatisfaction the success of the English Liberals in the last elections, as they thought that the Liberals were tied to the policy of non-intervention; but when they found that Mr. Gladstone had adopted an active policy in the East, when they received his advances, they thought that they had no right to refuse a chance which seemed to them almost providential. They saw already in their imagination a great movement inaugurated in Europe by the two great Liberal Powers, England and France, seconded by Italy—which has also a Liberal Government—and followed by Russia—which, if it is not a Liberal Government, still defends in the East a cause which has the sympathies of all the Liberals in the world. There was to be a great crusade in the whole of Europe, and France would be at the head of it; she would be again the moral leader of the world.

Facts have dissolved this dream. Internal peace was necessary to France if France wished to take a great part in the affairs of Europe; and internal peace has been much compromised by the decrees against the congregations. The development of the policy of the decrees is only now beginning; we are now "divided against ourselves," and the bitterness of the religious strife is only now being felt. While this "Kampf" goes on, France will not look across the frontier. War is impossible; the mere mention of "war" makes all parties almost wild with rage. It would be too long and too painful to analyze all the elements of the present situation. One thing, however, seems certain: the leaders of the state may do what they please, they cannot reconcile the country to war—that is their "ne plus ultra." The leaders of the party of action have themselves felt this, and the English Government has been informed politely that there is no possibility of a "common action" which may lead to something more serious than the late naval promenade.

THE FLOOD OF OBSCENE LITERATURE IN FRANCE.

PARIS, November 1, 1880.

THE session will be opened in a few days. Being the last of this legislature it will be invested with considerable importance. The blundering way in which the decrees against the unauthorized congregations other than the Jesuits have been carried out keeps up a dangerous irritation in the country. On the reassembling of the Chambers it is probable that this question will cause the downfall of the Ministry. I shall defer everything that properly speaking concerns politics, and devote this letter to a grievous fact which saddened all right-minded men in France last summer: I allude to the development of immoral journalism within the last few months. These papers, issued at a low price and on a large scale, contain the most obscene stories or pictures. They swarm like reptiles in a noisome and overheated mire. The Government has done its duty. For some time it has been unceasingly prosecuting those publications which were flagrant incentives to debauchery, and the law has condemned them with great severity, though not equal to their deserts. Let us not deceive ourselves: the repression of the law courts, however necessary, does not go very far to cure this evil. I have just been looking over one of those papers which have most signalized themselves in the crusade against good morals, and although previously condemned to pay a heavy fine, accompanied with months of imprisonment, it has not altered for the better, but continues to issue its detestable writings; its columns are still filled with stories as inept as they are indecent. It is satisfied with slightly veiling their immorality, but its pernicious influence will be as strong as before. Reading the journals which were the first to denounce it from professional jealousy, you would have thought from their modest airs that they were themselves regenerated; but in spite of self-imposed restraint, they could not keep from returning to their old ways the day after they had invoked public decency against an imprudent rival. Nothing could better show how general and deeply rooted is the evil.

Let us seek to analyze the immediate causes of it. It is unnecessary to enter into a psychological study of the baser side of human nature, which has existed at all times. We shall fix our attention on the exceptional manifestation of mental libertinism, such as we see in our own day. In several epochs of history many similar instances may be noted. In the past, one of the causes of this rage for corrupt literature has repeatedly been the repression of liberty. On the one hand, the human mind, prohibited from taking part in the stormy phases and sharing the noble passions of political life, expended its passion on the most unworthy objects. On the other hand, despotism found its best security in the development of a life of pleasure. It fostered such tendencies to the utmost of its power. This is the history of the Roman decadence, and also our history under the Second Empire. The court watched approvingly the lowering tone of public morality. It did nothing to check it, but rather encouraged it by its example, and still more by the facility it afforded immoral literature, in the license given by the commission on colportage to publications almost obscene, as proved by the scandalous catalogue brought to light by one of our senators. During the Second Empire operettes and cafés-concerts flourished. It has already been justly observed that the Vie Parisienne was the avowed organ of this licentious literature, each of its numbers containing one of those peppery stories which are now being prosecuted. The writers covered them with a certain elegant varnish by describing the scenes as taking place in drawing-rooms and boudoirs of high life. They were no less an affront to all the laws of decency. Scandalous journalism became one of the most paying undertakings of the day. "À tout seigneur tout honneur." It is right to recognize the fact that the Empire bequeathed to our current literature a large portion of the virus which dishonors it.

The Second Empire is, however, not solely to blame in this matter. We must take into consideration the immense fatigue the country felt after passing through the terrible crisis of 1870 and the following years. Such vicissitudes pervert and degrade those whom they do not ennoble. This is what happened after the French Revolution: there was an unhealthy expansion of the public mind during the Directory. I am aware that just as assassination formerly moderated Russian despotism, so this violence is in some respects held in check by the fatal increase of duelling. It is none the less a fact that before a final arrangement of this kind it is allowed great immunities. Literature shows signs of this license. It may be said that the diapason of human speech has been changed. There are no longer any doubtful expressions or "risky words." Novelists of the realistic school have advanced with rapid strides in this way with ever-increasing effrontery. Excesses of this kind have been so common that delicate-minded novelists have dared far more than they formerly would have done. They also have been subjected to the contaminating influence of the surrounding atmosphere. How many times have they not introduced into charming works scenes or words which would not have been tolerated some years ago! If the best have failed what shall be said of the disciples and imitators of the masters of realism? During the past year novels have been published in Paris which are tissues of iniquity, unredeemed by a spark of talent. The successful sale of M. Zola's last work is a scandal unsurpassed by any of which he is so lavish in his works. Humanity is there depicted under the most hideous aspect; the human animal is therein abandoned to the fury of his instincts. That is what is called realism! Never has a more mortal injury been offered to man than this pretension to portray him truthfully whilst admitting only his inferior and at times base qualities, never taking into account his yearnings after justice or the ideal, or making allowance for the generous struggles of his conscience. When this literature was found so remunerative many endeavored to render it popular. The papers which scandalize us at the present time were glad to change into current money the ingot they saw so appreciated on every bookstall. We are happy to see public opinion manifesting itself with so much energy against this infamous literature. The French Republic has a particular motive for becoming more severe with reference to literary morality. At the present time it is striving to diffuse instruction throughout the country. The Government feels it to be a point of honor that a few years hence every French child shall know how to read. This is an obvious reason for taking heed what kind of literature is provided for the rising generation. É.

CAMPAIGN BRIBERY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I reside in one of the interior counties of this State, in a town having about five hundred voters. My first vote was cast in 1868 for Grant, and in political faith I may style myself a "Young Republican" and a disciple of the Nation. Believing it my duty to take an active interest in political affairs, though without desire to become in any sense an office-holder, I began about two years since to attend our town caucuses. Being on intimate terms with the leaders of the "machine" in my town and county, I readily became one of our town committee, and this year a delegate to our county and district conventions. I have taken an active personal interest in the recent campaign. I have had full faith in the success of the Republican cause, believing that the majority of the voters, especially in the rural districts, when fully aroused, would vote from conviction with the Republican party.

On election morning I went early to the polls and stayed there all day. I "peddled" Republican ballots, and watched closely the progress of the voting and the methods of the workers and poll-drivers. I discovered that upwards of twenty per cent. of the votes were openly for sale. I know that more than sixty were bought by the Republican "workers" at prices ranging from two to five dollars each. How many the "Democratic" workers secured by the same means I do not know, but probably nearly an equal number. I have since learned that the towns in our county each require on an average at least $250 for the sole purpose of buying votes on election day, and that this is the usual sum expended in this manner. I am informed that it cost our candidate for Congress, in a district naturally (!) Republican, and who was elected by a large majority, not less than $25,000 to pay his election expenses within the past sixty days. I find that it would be folly for any one to aspire to office in this county or neighborhood who was not wealthy and willing to pay liberally for the honor (!)—that wealth is almost the sole requisite in a candidate for any office of importance. Finally, I find that this state of things is by no means exceptional, but that it is precisely the same in the adjacent counties and Congressional districts.

Mr. Garfield has been elected. The vote of this State has been decisive of the result, and this State has given a majority of less than 25,000. I am forced to the belief that the use of money in the open purchase of votes has gone far to bring about this result. One would expect to find at least some private expression of condemnation for the participants in so disgraceful a system—for those who proffer the bribes as well as for those who accept of them; but such is not the case. Men of the strictest integrity, who would scorn a dishonorable action in any business or social matter, do not hesitate to take an active part in this open bribery, and they do not lose caste in the community by so doing. Their action is considered a necessary part of "practical politics," and to be applauded in proportion to their success—i.e., to the number of votes they secure by outbidding their opponents.

How is it possible for any real reform to be inaugurated with such corruption at the ballot-box? How can we expect wise legislation when our law-makers are selected by such a process? Now, I should be glad to devote a portion of my time to political affairs in the interest of good government simply, but I ask, What can I do? I am quite ready to be a subscriber to the Civil-Service Reform Publication Society, but is that to be the extent of my political activity? Must I stand aside and see the methods of this campaign repeated year after year, with no effort made to change them? My friends of the "machine" tell me that they deplore the necessity for this state of affairs; they acknowledge that the corruption of the ballot-box is the root of all the evils of our present government; they profess theoretically to believe in the desirability of civil-service reform; but they say that practically we must accept the situation as it is—we cannot change it. Are they right?

I am sir, etc., M. C.

New York, November 8.

NORTHERN FEELING TOWARDS THE SOUTH.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of November 4 I notice a communication entitled "Do the Northern People hate the Southern?" Perhaps a statement of what seems to be the feeling in this (Mr. Garfield's) district, which Mr. Watterson calls "the most hidebound in the Union," would be of interest as giving what, from a Southern standpoint, would be considered the worst phase of that feeling.

It cannot be denied that there is, throughout this section, a general impression that, whatever may be true of the cities and larger towns, the South is not an agreeable place for a Northern farmer to live in. This is not merely a prejudice inherited from the times before the war, but is largely a result of the experience of those who, after the war, went from this district to find homes in the South. One of them, the author of 'A Fool's Errand,' was so fortunate as to realize from the narrative of his experience what, perhaps, might be considered a fair equivalent of its cost. Since that time the class that is constantly emigrating from this section, consisting mainly of young farmers and professional men, full of energy but without capital, have not been sufficiently curious about the feeling at the South toward Northern emigrants to try it. They know that at the West success means social position and political influence. Their impression is that at the South they can never be anything but "carpet-baggers." An intelligent farmer who went down to Virginia three years ago, and came back this year to stay, said: "I don't know but they treated me decently enough, but my wife was wholly ignored." His wife was a woman of more than average culture and intelligence. To this feeling it is due that, though the climate of the South is so inviting, our emigration goes West.

There is also a feeling here that the elections at the South are not nearly so much the free and fair expression of the will of the people as at the North and West; that the stories about ballot-box-stuffing, tissue-ballots, and intimidation, though, of course, overdrawn for campaign purposes, are not all idle tales. Had it not been for this feeling the action of the Louisiana Returning Board would have received no justification in this district. This feeling was much intensified by the attempted repeal of the election laws by the last Congress. We could not see why any honest man should be afraid of United States supervision of its own elections.

The impression prevails here that life is not nearly so safe at the South as at the North and West, and that murder is not usually punished

The "Solid South" has entered largely into the canvass here, but the question has been mainly discussed on its economic side. The conduct of the Southern leaders during the last four years has not been such that we were willing to trust the interests of the nation to their guidance. On all the great economic questions, some one of which must in the near future come to the front, their position could not be even guessed at. It was not so much that the South was solid, as that it was solid for that party whose policy three months hence none but a clairvoyant would venture to predict. We prefer things to stay as they are till we have time to discuss what changes are advisable.

That there is no such warmth of feeling between the South and the North as between the East and the West is largely due to the fact that there are no such family ties between their citizens. There is scarce a family in any State north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi, that has not near relations in almost every State between it and the Pacific. Visits, letters, and local papers are exchanged, keeping up a constant cordiality. Of course no such feeling can obtain between the North and the South till the tide of emigration is turned southward.

But that there is any feeling of ill-will or hate toward the South is untrue. We do not even go so far as your correspondent. We here know of no such body of troops as "Northern soldiers." If he had been present at the meeting of the citizens of Jefferson, the home of Giddings and Wade, on the evening of the day after the election, he would have heard, as the uniform expression of feeling, thankfulness that there would be now four years of a reasonably stable policy, during which the progressive element at the South (and we believe that there is such an element) can unite with that of the North in securing reforms which shall add to the prosperity of the nation. The verdict of the 2d of November was a blow at no section, but solely an expression of the American people, to the effect that the conduct of its affairs could not safely be entrusted to the Democratic party as at present constituted and led.

Yours very truly, L. B. Tuckerman.

THE SOUTH AND THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have just finished reading your article bearing the title "What the South had better do now," and have been a good deal interested in its perusal. The subject is, however, a difficult one. The solution of the difficulty is not altogether apparent to me, and partly for the reason that there is a moral phenomenon displayed at the North at the present time which I do not fully comprehend. I am a Southern man, born and bred, but I have been a good deal of the time in the North for the last few years. Unless I have been much deceived, I have found that financial men are generally opposed to the Democratic party. That I understand, for, although a Democrat, I think that the "record" of the Republican party, since Mr. Schurz saved it from a fiat policy, is more creditable on the whole than that of its opponent. But what I do not fully comprehend is the fact that I have usually found that what may be called the religious element at the North is strongly, I may almost say fiercely, committed to the Republican party, and that not through any notions of policy or good government, but apparently from motives of animosity towards the Southern people, always active and generally intense. I have commonly found the business men of the North disposed to take rather a charitable view of the sins of the South; but whenever I have talked with a deacon or a class-leader I have nearly always discovered that he was animated by feelings of hatred towards the people of the South which were cultivated with a devotion that could seemingly only proceed from a strong sense of duty. Why should this be? Does the religion of Christ practically lead to uncharitableness? Is it that men who are always talking about loving their neighbors and forgiving their enemies need some relaxation by acting in a different spirit? I have often asked myself these questions, and I have never been able to hit upon a reply that could be regarded as satisfactory. I know that it will be said that the fact does not exist; but I am certain that it does, and I will appeal to any candid observer for confirmation of what I have said. It may also be said that I speak from a spirit of hostility to the Christian religion, bringing forward a commonplace reproach of hypocrisy but too often charged upon the Church by those who are blind to its usefulness. This, however, is not true. I am a believer in churches, and am not unusually shocked by the want of conformity that must, of course, exist between all lofty ideals and the performances that go along with them.

But to return to your article: the Solid South is, no doubt, at present a part, and the principal part, of the capital of the Radical party. The Democratic party is only the splint which binds up the decayed bones of the Republican party. That party can afford to tax all office-holders for the purpose of preserving a united Democracy in the South. The remedy seems to be easy. Let the Southern people throw the Democratic party overboard. What then? If we had that fine measure of charity which would induce us voluntarily to swell the ranks of men who spend their whole leisure time in depicting all Southern men as bullies and cutthroats, unworthy of association or even of life, my opinion is that the Democracy of the North would in their turn take up the cry of the "Solid South," making the same use of it as that made by the Republicans now. Suppose that some of us go over to the Republican party and some do not, and that some Southern States vote the Republican ticket, will that end the matter? I wish it might, but I cannot foresee any such result. The vindictiveness that is now manifested towards all the Southern States would then be concentrated on those which might still vote for any other ticket. It is easy to suggest some way out of a notorious difficulty, but every remedy is attended with trouble and is obstructed by impediments of a very serious character. X.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In proposing a means of ensuring a non-partisan character to the Civil-Service Reform Publication Society, your correspondent "J." has indirectly raised the question, Whether it is the purpose of the society to bind the vote of its members in any way—for example, as "J." suggests, to vote for no candidate who is not "personally pledged against appointments or removals for political reasons"?

Combined action at the polls would have a recognized force in politics and give the society considerable influence in close elections. But many are ready to carry out "J.'s" principle who would not go to the extreme of virtually disfranchising themselves for a time, at least. For I take it the society would merely discriminate between the candidates of other parties and not, like the Prohibition party, nominate candidates of its own on the sole issue of civil-service reform. Such reform, important as it is, will be largely a matter of detail, and cannot be made an exclusive issue at present, when there is no gross violation of its principles, and when other questions are more prominently before the public. It differs from the Abolition movement in being not an isolated question, but one closely connected with every department of public affairs, and in the fact that it does not appeal to the feelings and sentiments of the people, but mainly to their common sense and business experience. It is nothing if not practical, and everything which will cause it to be classed with Prohibition and other impracticable reforms should be carefully avoided.

Obviously there may be wide room for choice between two candidates, neither of whom is a pronounced friend of reform. Because we cannot have a candidate after our own hearts is no reason why we should reject the best that offers, provided he be not positively objectionable. Would it not, then, be enough for those who join the society to pledge themselves always to support the candidate who plainly declares for civil-service reform as against the one who does not, leaving members in other cases free to vote (or not to vote) as they think best? Those who believe in a stricter pledge can have it for themselves, but a much larger number will be ready to take it in a modified form, and both will have the same kind of moral effect.

No vague general declaration from any candidate should be accepted, such as "a thorough and radical reform in the civil service," which might mean a change of men without any change of system. Let it be clearly understood that the "reform" demanded is based upon the English system of civil service, which has for its essential features competitive examinations in appointments to the subordinate offices, with absolute independence of political considerations, successive promotions to the higher grades of the service as in the army and navy, and, for all except the heads of departments, assured tenure of place during good behavior. When this last is fully secured the assessment of salaries and similar abuses may be safely left to regulate themselves. F. H.

AN ANACHRONISM.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The November number of Scribner's Monthly contains a copiously illustrated article, by Joseph B. Gilder, on "Bordentown and the Bonapartes," in which is the following passage:

"When Lafayette made his triumphal progress through the States in 1824, he was received by the Count with open arms, notwithstanding the fact that he had been denounced as a traitor in Napoleon's will. The Marquis had been paying a visit to General Moreau at Trenton, and was escorted to Bordentown by a troop of Pennsylvania cavalry."

As General Moreau died September 2, 1813, and had been buried at St. Petersburg eleven years when Lafayette revisited America, I presume that the latter only visited the ruins of Moreau's mansion at Morristown, opposite Trenton, if, indeed, there is any foundation for the story. The American local articles in pictorial magazine literature abound in similar reckless errors. One of the earliest numbers of Scribner's contained a grossly inaccurate sketch of Marcia Burns, proprietress of the site of Washington City, which Col. W. H. Philip, executor of the estate, properly stigmatized. G. A. T.

THE USE OF WRITING.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: What is the use of preaching and writing? Two years ago you had a controversy with the Rev. Thos. K. Beecher on the currency. Later the Hon. David A. Wells devoted a letter in your columns to his case, in which the "milk-tickets" illustration was used. On the part of yourselves and Mr. Wells it was simply a knock-down argument. How one could survive it is impossible to see; yet last election the Rev. Thomas K. Beecher ran for Congress on a Greenback ticket. What is the use of writing?

Yours truly, J. A. Walker.

November 13, 1880.

[You might as well ask, What is the use of the courts, or the police, or of any other reformatory or preventive agency? Besides this, it is to be observed that, as Dr. Johnson long ago pointed out, when you have provided a good argument you have done your whole duty; the responsibility of providing intelligence enough to be convinced by it rests on others.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

Henry Holt & Co. have in press 'Our Familiar Songs, and Those Who Made Them,' with words and music, edited by Mrs. Helen Kendrick Johnson; vol. ii. of Taine's 'French Revolution,' translated by John Durand; 'Sister Augustine, an Old Catholic,' by Augustus J. C. Hare; 'Poems,' by Robert K. Weeks; 'The Child's Astronomy,' by J. D. Champlin, jr.; and a 'History of Modern Europe,' by C. A. Fyffe.——J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce 'Vignettes of Travel,' by W. W. Nevin; 'Shakespeare's Dream,' by Wm. Leighton; 'Oldtime Child-life,' by E. H. Arr; and the miscellaneous writings of the late Dr. Francis Lieber. A reduction in the price of Lippincott's Magazine is promised with the new year.——Moses King, Cambridge, has done well to reprint from the Harvard Register Mr. Henry F. Jenks's interesting paper on the history of the Boston Public Latin School. Its value is enhanced by several wood-cuts.——Nothing need be said by way of comment on the hundred pictures from Doré's Bible series chosen to make up the 'Bible Gallery' just issued by Cassell, Petter & Galpin. A portrait and life of Doré are prefixed to the descriptive text of Talbot W. Chambers, D.D.——Encouraged by the success of their last year's Christmas annual, the 'Stage Door,' the Messrs. Routledge have brought out this year the 'Green Room,' edited, like its predecessor, by Mr. Clement Scott, and, like it, containing contributions only from those connected with the stage as author, actor, or critic. There are articles of one kind or another by Mr. Henry Irving, Mr. W. J. Florence, Mr. F. C. Burnand, Mr. H. J. Byron, and Mme. Modjeska. The best thing in the little book is an anecdote of the founder of the theatre which was long our best: when Mr. James W. Wallack was once playing Rover in "Wild Oats" at the Haymarket he was greatly annoyed by an old gentleman near the stage, who rose and began to put on his overcoat. "I beg your pardon, sir," said Wallack, "but the piece is not quite over." The old gentleman was entirely prepared, and replied: "Thank you, Mr. Wallack, but I've had quite enough of it!"——'American or Standard Whist' is the title of a neat volume of two hundred and fifty pages written by "G. W. P." and published by James R. Osgood & Co. The American differs from the English whist of Cavendish and his followers in that it is played in strict silence, honors are not counted, and the game is seven points. Assuming that American whist is played by gentlemen who do not need to be watched, and who can get enough interest out of the game without betting, the laws and rules are greatly simplified. "G. W. P." is outspoken and iconoclastic, but his manner is in general courteous, and a lover of whist is likely to find many new views in this book, which will be a wholesome stimulant to indolent "book"-players.——Those whom a part contents as well as the whole, will find also the cheapness of a 'Handy Book of Popular Quotations' (Putnams) a recommendation. The poetical extracts are arranged alphabetically, not omitting the a's and the's, and there is a catch-word index.——A novel, and doubtless to many a welcome, compilation is Cecil Arnold's 'Index to Shakspearian Thought,' consisting of classified passages derived from the plays and poems (Scribner & Welford). The grouping is instructive, and as for the classification we must put up with it, for it is next to impossible to meet every requirement of reference. Thus, one pleasant feature of this collection is its embodying the minor songs, but in looking for the dirge from "Cymbeline" "Dirge" might seem the last title under which to look for it. On the other hand, under "Merry" one might expect to find the song of Autolycus. The book is beautifully made.——An account of the library of the late Edward Fournier, with a portrait and a charming view of his overflowing and disordered cabinet du travail, makes a delightful "first paper" in Le Livre for October. Among notable books reviewed in this number, or in Polybiblion of the same date, we remark Julien Bregeault's 'Procès contre les cadavres dans l'ancien droit'; Champfleury's 'Histoire de la caricature sous la Réforme et la Ligue,' to be followed by a history of caricature in the East; the beginning of an important series on the typographic antiquities of France, Claudin's 'Origines de l'imprimerie à Albi en Languedoc' (1480–84), a work of great originality and authority; Alfred de Besancenet's 'Le général Dommartin en Italie et en Égypte' (1786–90); Lespinasse's edition of Étienne de Boileau's 'Livre des Métiers'; and a promising series of 'Questions controversées de l'histoire et de la science,' just begun to be published by the Société Bibliographique.——B. Westermann & Co. send us the first number of Le Roman des Familles, a bimonthly magazine, published at Berlin, under the direction of M. G. Van Muyden—a curious combination of nationalities. Its tales will be what are called in this country "original" (inédits), and it will occasionally give a comédie de société. Foot-notes explain Parisian or provincial locutions, etc., and everything unclean will be scrupulously kept out.——Among the new publications of Hachette & Cie., of Paris, is an illustrated octavo volume of 'Voyages et Découvertes des Compagnons de Colomb,' translated and abridged by M. J. Girardin from Washington Irving. Perhaps this French practical testimonial to Irving's merit may be taken to offset a characteristically British criticism in a recent number of Notes and Queries, to the effect that if Irving had rightly appreciated Dutch character "he would never have published that very foolish, would-be humorous burlesque, 'The History of New York.'"——Mr. F. Gutekunst, Philadelphia, continuing his gallery of deceased notabilities, has just issued an excellent imperial photograph of the late Mrs. Lucretia Mott.

—Mr. George Haven Putnam, concerning whose part of his publication, 'Hints for Home Reading,' it was recently remarked in these columns that "another publisher would have made a different list" (i.e., of books suitable for libraries), construes the remark as an accusation of using his position as editor to push his own publications. We are glad to assure him explicitly that we designed nothing further than an allusion to a natural and no doubt unconscious bias in favor of works with which he had of necessity a more intimate acquaintance than "another publisher" would.

—The Atlantic for December is decidedly a literary number, though a paper on "Libel and Its Legal Remedy" has a social, the usual "Reminiscences of Washington" an historical, and "The Æsthetic Value of the Sense of Smell" perhaps a scientific, interest. In the last Mr. Henry T. Finck speculates curiously, and reminds us of various curious though familar facts bearing upon his subject. He does not look for a "nosonicon" soon, however, because there are no scales in odors, and because artificial scents are inferior to natural. Some one in a review of Mr. Mallock makes the point that he is everywhere except in 'Is Life Worth Living?' uncertain, and gives him what by this time we should suppose many people will admit is the good advice to "study Joseph de Maistre on Voltaire if he would know what are the most efficient weapons against atheism." The novels of the period are treated at great length and with a discrimination, in our opinion at least, which makes the article a safe "guide," if such be its purpose, but fails to make it of absorbing interest in itself. Mr. T. S. Perry has a number of remarks about "Gray, Collins, and Beattie," the sum of which is that the poets in question have merits that it is possible to overlook, and that the common notion that their age was unfavorable to poetry is to a certain extent a mistaken one. To what extent, Mr. Perry does not say, and, of course, it would be difficult to say; but we wish he had attempted it with a little more enthusiasm. A paper on "Mary Wollstonecraft," by Mr. G. E. Woodberry, is very sympathetically written, and is, from this cause chiefly perhaps, a successful literary portrait. Mr. Woodberry is "tempted to link her name with that of George Sand; . . . vast as was the difference in their genius, they belong to the same order of women"—an association that would bear more specific and elaborate justification. Mr. Stedman has some verses on the late Mr. Sanford Gifford, and Dr. Holmes some on the late Prof. Peirce. Two reviews of George's 'Progress and Poverty' deserve special attention.

—The instalment of Mr. James's 'The Portrait of a Lady' in the December Atlantic strikes us as a literary performance of a very high order. It indicates, to be sure, more emphatically than even his recent writings have done how wholly he has abandoned the realm of romance and the potentialities of the dramatic and heroic elements to be found therein; and these have so long been esteemed so essential to a novel of any large importance that Mr. James's discarding of them, after he had shown an unquestionable ability to deal with them, naturally seems a pity. Nevertheless, though there is not a situation, hardly an incident, and almost no narrative in these chapters, they make some of the most interesting reading we have met with for some time in fiction, old or new. They are, it need scarcely be said, the data of character, and to find this unfolded from without in a manner variously delightful enough to furnish a criticism upon the superiority of the recognized method—namely, development from within—is a disarming surprise. One asks himself, after enjoying the subtle and sympathetic dissection in itself and witnessing the unexpected result of it in distinct portraiture, if, after all, too much value has not been set upon the mere terminology of the art of novel-writing, and if Mr. James is not wiser than his critics in disregarding it and following his unmistakable bent for analysis. At any rate it is safe to admit that in his deft hands the scalpel is a very effective instrument, and an introspective age will certainly condone the violation of traditions if the analysis is well enough done. Nearly every sentence of the thirty pages or less that the current instalment fills is a revelation of some occult and individual yet typical trait; and there is so much skill evinced in the process that the reader feels irresistibly flattered at the homage paid to his perceptive powers throughout. Perhaps when, as in the natural course of things must happen, we come to some event further on, Mr. James will be less happy, but we trust he will not get tired of this story before he has thought out and polished every detail as carefully as he has done so far.

—In Lieutenant-Colonel Garrick Mallery's 'Collection of Gesture Signs and Signals of the North American Indians' (Washington: Government Printing-Office. 1880. Quarto, 329 pages) more than two thousand signs, in alphabetical order, representing several hundred different ideas, are minutely described by the author, formerly Chief Signal Officer of the U. S. A. The material, which is unprecedentedly large, was furnished by about forty special correspondents throughout the Union and other parts of North America, and by pure-blooded Indians who had been sent on official business by their tribes to the authorities in Washington, and willingly supplied Colonel Mallery's collaborator, Dr. T. W. Hoffman, with a plentiful and reliable array of gestures new to explorers. With all these results the author has compared the sundry systems of deaf-mute sign-speech, the signs made by the Cistercian monks, by the Italian peasants, and by several Asiatic and Australian nations. The inventiveness, imagination, and powers of combination displayed here by the American Indian are really astonishing; he is able to sketch even colors with unmistakable mimicry, and has also developed a sign for the idea of color taken as a generic term. The mode of forming signs for tribal names is of special interest to the ethnologist, and in this particular the various tribes show a greater consensus than in many other directions. These signs will explain several of the tribal names now current. Thus, the Cheyennes are designated as a "butcher" tribe by the fingers of the right hand drawn across the left arm or wrist; the Pawnees as the "wolf" tribe, by raising two fingers of each hand above the ears or head; a portion of this tribe, one of their four sub-divisions, once lived on Loup River, a fork of the Platte River, and about the year 1820 three of these sub-divisions were found roaming on both sides of the same fork. An Indian speaking about the Crows, or Absárokas, of Montana, will make the sign of flapping wings; about the Nez-Percés and the Caddos, by the gesture of piercing the nose, although the former had renounced this custom before they became acquainted with the whites. The Káyowa tribe is designated by combining the signs for prairie and drinking water; "Indian" is expressed by rubbing the back of the left hand lightly with the index of the right, which points to the idea of color, and hence "to dark-skinned." Although a considerable number of Indian gesture signs are of modern origin, we cannot doubt that such as express concrete acts and objects known to everybody are of high antiquity and have undergone but a few unimportant modifications. Colonel Mallery's treatise forms the fourth publication of the ethnologic series of the United States Bureau of Ethnology.

—"After dinner," wrote John Quincy Adams in his diary, on July 11, 1836, his seventieth birthday, which he was spending in Philadelphia, "Benjamin Lundy came at six, and I walked with him to the house of his friend, James Mott, No. 136 North Ninth Street, where there was a large tea and evening party of men and women—all of the Society of Friends. I had free conversation with them till between ten and eleven o'clock, upon slavery, the abolition of slavery, and other topics; of all of which the only exceptionable part was the undue proportion of talking assumed by me, and the indiscretion and vanity in which I indulged myself. Lucretia Mott, the mistress of the house, wife of James Mott, is a native of the island of Nantucket, and had heard of my visit there last September. She is sensible and lively, and an abolitionist of the most intrepid school." In this brief entry the ex-President compressed the salient traits of the late Mrs. Mott—unbounded hospitality and philanthropy, unflinching courage, a bright and vigorous intellect; but to these should have been added a more than Quaker sweetness of spirit and aspect, which venerable age only made the more striking. She was in her prime when Mr. Adams recorded his impressions of her, and had not yet become, at least in the full sense, a representative American woman. For eighteen years she had been "in the ministry" among Friends; she had, in 1827, parted from her Calvinistic associates to unite with the followers of Elias Hicks; she had been among the first to receive Garrison on his release from Baltimore jail, and had taken an active part in forming the American Anti-Slavery Society in December, 1833, and a local Female Anti-Slavery Society in the succeeding year, thus, contrary to the prevailing narrowness of her sect, co-operating with the "world's people" in the chief humanitarian movement of the age. The mob era had already set in: in the previous October the editor of the Liberator had been hustled through the streets of Boston at the peril of his life, and on the day following the interview with Mr. Adams the first midnight assault was made on Bailey's anti-slavery press in Cincinnati. In 1837 Lovejoy was murdered at Alton; in May, 1838, Pennsylvania Hall, dedicated to "free discussion," was burnt on the fourth day after its opening, with the connivance of the city authorities of Philadelphia. Mrs. Mott spoke on the third day at a meeting of anti-slavery women, while brickbats were crashing through the windows, to the terror of a purely female audience; on the next day, before a similar gathering, and while the building was again surrounded by rioters, she "exhorted the members of the Convention to be steadfast and solemn in the prosecution of the business for which they were assembled." Men had been excluded from these meetings because it was still "considered improper for women to address promiscuous assemblies," and Mrs. Mott had expressed the "hope that such false notions of delicacy and propriety would not long obtain in this enlightened country." In 1840 this question became the touchstone of the abolitionists, who divided in consequence of opposite views about it, and the "Old Organization" appointed "our beloved friends William L. Garrison, N. P. Rogers, C. L. Remond, and Lucretia Mott" delegates to the World's Anti-Slavery Convention to be held in London in June of that year, with Clarkson for President. British feeling, however, sympathized with the prejudices of the New Organization, and Mrs. Mott and her sister delegates were not recognized. She accordingly took her seat in the gallery, as appears in Haydon's huge painting of the scene, now in the National Portrait Gallery. In July, 1848, James Mott presided at the first Woman's Rights Convention, held at Seneca Falls, N. Y., and his wife, one of the four ladies who had called it (another was her sister, the late Martha Wright), was among the speakers. Of her subsequent career it is enough to say that she remained prominently identified with these two (we might almost say twin) causes, with the cause of temperance and of free religion. As a speaker she was far above the level of the "ministry" to which she belonged, but her presence rather than her oratory distinguished her among the women speakers of our time. In spite of some published utterances, she was not properly a writer, in this respect offering no comparison with the late Mrs. Child. Socially her home was the centre of an immense circle, and here the Burleighs, McKim, Whittier, Lowell, and a troop of other philanthropists, young and old, were entertained almost as sons and brothers. The fugitive slave knew it also as a safe harbor, and the poor and needy never left it empty-handed. Mrs. Mott was born on the island of Nantucket on Jan. 3, 1793, her father being Thomas Coffin, of the line of the British Admiral Coffin, and her mother Anna Folger, of the stock from which Benjamin Franklin was derived. The shrewdness, humor, and common-sense of the author of 'Poor Richard' were well represented in the kinswoman who has just departed, and who was not more remarkable for her vitality than for the endurance of her mental faculties, and her eager interest to the last in current thought and in all good work for the improvement of mankind. Her husband, whom she survived, was in every way worthy of her.

—The first concert of the Philharmonic Society introduced a programme of great interest, which was, almost without exception, performed in a highly satisfactory manner. Finer ensemble-playing than that by the string instruments on Saturday evening has seldom been heard. The opening number was Beethoven's "Eroica," a work equally familiar to the musicians who played it and to the audience who listened to it, and which only calls for the remark that Mr. Thomas took the Funeral March unusually slow, differing in this respect from many distinguished conductors, who are of opinion that a slightly increased tempo gives additional effect to the movement. The second orchestral number was the Introduction to the third act of Wagner's "Meistersinger." The selection of this piece was not very fortunate, for to understand and appreciate it one must be familiar with the opera. It is intended, like most of Wagner's orchestral introductions to the different acts of his operas, to convey an idea of distinct dramatic situations which either have already occurred or are going to take place. Nobody unacquainted with the opera will be able to follow Wagner's ideas in this beautiful composition. The last number was Berlioz's romantic symphony, "Harold in Italy," interesting as a musical experiment. Berlioz selected a solo instrument to represent the leading actor in this dramatic tone-picture. The viola represents Byron's hero, Childe Harold, and the plaintive strains of this instrument resound again and again throughout the four movements, recalling the melancholy wanderer. The symphony in its entirety has not been heard here for many years. The great orchestral difficulties, the fantastic, often eccentric, character both of conception and construction, will always prevent it from becoming a popular work. Under Mr. Thomas's careful, strong hand the orchestra overcame them with admirable precision, and Mr. Schwazy played the solo viola part with great taste and feeling. Mr. Joseffy surpassed himself in playing the graceful and brilliant Henselt Concerto, and in a Scherzo by Litolf, which he gave as an encore, he displayed an amount of mechanical skill which no living virtuoso has ever exceeded.

—The first of a series of piano recitals by Miss Anna Bock attracted a very numerous audience to Steinway Hall. The young artist appeared with a programme of great interest and scope. In a trio by Raff she was assisted by Messrs. Brandt and Müller, and displayed marked intelligence and judgment in avoiding a mistake frequently committed even by more experienced artists: Miss Bock never attempted to make the piano prevail over the other instruments, and the whole performance was one of the best specimens of chamber-music ever listened to in New York. In her solo numbers she gave evidence of those desirable qualities which were favorably noticed last year when she first returned from Europe: brilliant technique, a soft and melodious touch, great power, and excellent artistic taste. Her rendering of the celebrated Sonata in C sharp minor, the "Moonlight," was especially commendable. Her greatest technical accomplishment was one of Chopin's Études, Op. 10, No. 2, which ranks among the composer's most difficult works, and in which she overcame the most break-neck passages with delightful ease and self-confidence. The remaining numbers by Mozart, Scarlatti, and Saint-Saëns were executed with equal merit, and Miss Bock may count her first appearance this season a genuine success.

—A correspondent writes us as follows:

"The strictures on the appreciative faculty of the Germans in matters of American fiction (Nation, No. 801) seem rather severe. Spielhagen, although a writer of much-read novels, most of which enjoy great popularity in American translations, is not considered a high authority as a littérateur. As the chief editor of Westermann's Monatshefte, however, it is not likely that he could help knowing Henry James, jr., as an American author. Of the three translations published in Germany of 'The American' one, by the now famous M. Busch, forms vols. vi. and vii. of 'Amerikanische Novellisten'; the second is translated "Aus dem Amerikanischen," and the third is part of Auerbach's 'Transatlantische Roman-Bibliothek.' Neither does it seem such an entirely common notion with the Germans that Bret Harte is the only living American author of note, since there are many good translations of Emerson's, N. Hawthorne's, Holmes's, Bryant's, and Howells's works at least, not to speak of Asher's and Tauchnitz's reprints of the originals—both literary enterprises of which no other nation can boast and which seem to show that good novels in the English language are more appreciated in Germany, and read, too, either in the original or translations, than in any other, not English-speaking, country. One more proof of the ever-growing interest the Germans take in American literature: Dr. R. Doehn, a former resident among us, has just published 'Aus dem Amerikanischen Dichterwald, Literar-historische Skizzen' (Leipzig: O. Wigand; New York: B. Westermann & Co.), from which book Spielhagen or any other German can derive all the information needed for an appreciative judgment on 'hopeful Americans.' We quote from his preface: 'The time has long gone by when American literature, and poetry in particular, was in its age of childhood. The fetters of intellectual dependence on English models are fairly loosened if not entirely broken. The American, politically and industrially independent, cultivates poetry also from a standpoint of his own. For obvious reasons the interest in the poetical literature of America has been steadily growing for some time in Europe, and in Germany especially, and hence, from this point of view also, my work may be a timely undertaking.'"

—The effective and increasing activity of the native scholars of India, in emulation of Europeans, in the work of laying open to present knowledge the ancient records of their literature, is one of the encouraging signs of the times. Mr. Jogesh Chunder Dutt has recently published at Calcutta (Trübner, London) the first volume of an English translation of the Râja-Tarangini, or Chronicle of the Kings of Kashmir, well known as the book in Sanskrit literature to which cleaves a larger percentage of historical character than to any other. A much more extensive and important work is a version (Bombay and London: Trübner) of two of the authoritative treatises of Hindu law, the Vyavahâra Mayûkha and Yâjnavalkya, by a native lawyer of the highest standing and connections, named Vishvanath Narayan Mandlik. The version is richly provided with notes containing references to other leading authorities and extracts from them, and an elaborate introduction and appendices constitute nearly half the volume. So valuable a single contribution to the vexed and difficult subject of modern Hindu law-practice has hardly been made before, and it is the more trustworthy as coming from one who is able to look at things from the point of view of the native. The Sanskrit text of the two treatises is added in a companion volume.

—Some very interesting data as to the prevalence and manner of occurrence of defective vision are given by Dr. Eugen Netoliczka in his recently-published pamphlet, entitled 'Untersuchungen über Farbenblindheit und Kurzsichtigkeit.' In this paper the author details the results of an exhaustive series of enquiries made by himself during the years 1879 and 1880, mainly upon the students of Gratz, Styria, and covering several thousand individuals. As to Daltonism, or color-blindness, Dr. Netoliczka arrives at the general conclusion: 1. That the affection is hereditary, and quotes in confirmation of his own observations those of Magnus, which, in addition, tend to prove that, as in the case of other hereditary transmissions, there is frequently a manifestation only with the second generation. 2. It is very rarely present among females. Of 819 girls examined not one was found to be color-blind. Magnus and Cohn, in Breslau, and Jeffries, in Boston, obtained equally negative results from examinations respectively of 2,216, 1,061, and 1,025 individuals; Dor, on the other hand, reports that he has observed among 611 females examined in Berlin five cases of color-blindness. This immunity from an affection which is developed to the extent of about four per cent. among males is attributed to circumstances connected with female occupation. Constant attention paid to the harmonious contrasting of shade and color, whether in dress or in design, from earliest childhood to mature womanhood, acts as a developing agent upon the sense of color perception, and hence the superiority, in this particular, of the female eye and of the eyes of such as have to do with the careful analysis of color. This view receives support from the fact that in the country, as compared with the city, cases of partial color-blindness are much more numerous, doubtless because country people, as a rule, attach comparatively little significance to, or are imperfectly educated in, color-harmony. 3. Daltonism is in no way connected with defective definition in vision. 4. The inability to distinguish red colors is of much the most frequent occurrence, violet blindness being comparatively rare. 5. Certain persons, while readily able to distinguish between colors when near at hand, fail to do so at a distance. This form of partial Daltonism, from its practical importance, especially invites the attention of railroad officials, and ought to receive far more consideration in the examination of employees than has hitherto been the case. 6. Color-blindness, if not absolutely curable, may to some extent be mitigated through proper treatment. An examination of 4,500 students, composed of about an equal number of individuals of both sexes, attending the lower schools (Volks- und Bürgerschüler), showed a far greater prevalence of short-sightedness among girls than boys, the ratio being nearly as 14 to 10 per cent. This is attributed to an extra strain upon the organs of vision induced by hand-work, which, in addition to the normal studies of the class, is compulsory upon the female attendants of the schools. Short-sightedness obtains most among the highest and the lowest classes, the members of the middle class being most exempt. Country people are less affected than the inhabitants of a city, and thus, perhaps, enjoy ample compensation for their lack of color perception. The opinion held by Dr. Netoliczka that myopia is frequently the result of hereditary transmission is combated by Prof. Cohn, who maintains (in the address recently delivered before the German Association in Danzig) that the affection is rarely if ever congenital, but is rather induced by an injurious method of study during childhood.

RECENT WORKS ON EDGAR POE.*

IT is certainly a strong tribute to the unique genius of Edgar Allan Poe that there should have appeared within a month or two no less than three elaborate biographies or critiques in regard to him. Simultaneously with the appearance of Mr. Ingram's extended memoir we have a more condensed biography by Mr. R. H. Stoddard, said to have been prepared expressly for a volume of 'Select Works of Poe,' though based on a previous memoir; and we have also a reprint of Mr. E. C. Stedman's careful critique, which first appeared in Scribner's Monthly. These publications are a recognition of Poe's genius, but they are also, in part, the fruit of whatever was bizarre or melodramatic in his career. No sober poet, who pays his bills regularly and keeps the ten commandments—who, in the immortal words of Hosea Biglow, "stays to hum and looks arter his folks"—can afford such tempting material to a biographer as one who, if less gifted, yet occasionally disappears for a year or two without trace of his wanderings, and who, when his whereabouts are best known, sometimes gives his friends most reason to wish him still a wanderer. All that makes Poe's career least defensible—his vices, quarrels, desperate straits, attempted suicides, ardent and sometimes simultaneous love-affairs—all these afford great resources for the biographer, who has reason to be grateful for a subject who did not dwell in decencies for ever. It is almost amusing to see how each new memoir of Poe professes to be the first to tell the real story of his life; and how each, while denouncing the obvious malice of Griswold, ends by re-establishing almost all the damaging facts which Griswold left only half-proved. If Poe fared ill at the hands of his enemy, he has fared worse, on the whole, at those of his friends. With every disposition to make the best of the man, we must honestly own that we never thought so ill of him as on closing the last page of Mr. Ingram's two bulky volumes.

Of the three books before us, that of Mr. Ingram is the work of a laborious and not very discriminating annalist; while Mr. Stoddard's is that of a man of much poetic feeling, who is, however, too fond of disguising himself as a jaunty and rather cynical man of the world. Both these are essentially biographies, tempered, in Mr. Ingram's case, with a little criticism, and in Mr. Stoddard's with more. Mr. Stedman's essay is pure criticism, and is, like all his work in that direction, of very high character. There is sometimes a little prolixity and perhaps over-refining; a touch of judicial self-consciousness, a dallying with his golden chain, like Tennyson's chancellor—we sometimes wish for the abrupter decision of Mr. Stoddard's more trenchant strokes; yet these are but a small abatement of the praise due for such admirable work. In these respects the English biographer is at great disadvantage, compared with the American critics; he adds a good deal to our detailed information, but scarcely anything to our critical resources.

Probably no man living has taken so much pains as Mr. Ingram to collect all possible memorials of Poe, and he deserves hearty thanks for this zeal. On the other hand, it is probable that the hastiest American writer has the advantage of knowing more of Poe's milieu, and of the influences around him, than his English biographer. Mere remoteness makes it hard for Mr. Ingram to understand the society in which his hero mingled, the people whom he loved or hated, and the opportunities and temptations that surrounded him. It also leads him into biographical inaccuracies, as in his assumption (i. 165) that the first two-volume collection of 'Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque' made no impression upon the public. Contrast this with the personal reminiscence of Mr. Stedman, which we can heartily confirm, in regard to this very collection of stories: "With what eagerness we caught them from hand to hand until many of us knew them by heart" (Stedman, p. 35). But in a more general way this want of local knowledge mars the work of Mr. Ingram. We can pardon the high-sounding sentence with which the memoir opens, "Edgar Allan Poe was of gentle birth," although the plain, unvarnished fact is that he was the son of two strolling players, and that his paternal grandfather was an Irish wheelwright. The whole theory of descent from the Le Poer family is disowned by the American Poes, and was apparently a bit of romantic enthusiasm on the part of Mrs. Whitman, whose maiden name was Power, and who liked to fancy herself a blood relation of her betrothed (Ingram, ii. 248). This social ambition is a common weakness of biographers, and is not to be severely censured. But Mr. Ingram's explaining the fact of Poe's adoption, with his brother and sister, into other families after the death of their parents, as being "in accordance with a custom not uncommon in republican countries" (i. 9), becomes amusing in view of the fact that M. La Vigne has just called attention to the prevalence of the same practice in Russia; and nothing can well be more preposterous than seriously to attribute the unpopularity of Poe's writings with some of his countrymen to the fact that in his "Some Words with a Mummy" he describes thirteen Egyptian states as governed by a tyrant named Mob. After fully stating the bearing of this jeu d'esprit, Mr. Ingram adds these words: "The Americans being too susceptible to relish a joke at their own expense" (ii. 13). Probably a single day of a Presidential canvass would convince even an English biographer that if there is anything in which Americans revel, it is in jokes at their own expense; all branches of the English race fortunately take such jokes with a relish, and the countrymen of Mark Twain most of all. It was really Poe, not his readers, who had no relish for a joke; there was not an impulse of innocent play about him; every jest must either carry a sting or be saturated with the atmosphere of sepulchres.

It shows the unconsciousness of Mr. Ingram's frequent partisanship that he sometimes gives on the same page his impressions and the facts which refute these impressions. If there was anything for which Poe habitually posed, it was the "chivalrous" attitude; he used to say to his female admirers, "I cannot point an arrow against any woman" (Mrs. Weiss in Stoddard, clxv.) Accordingly his biographer takes him at his word, assuming, as a thing undoubted, "Poe's invariable courtesy towards women" (ii. 46), and then takes pains to preserve, in the very next paragraph, a vulgar personal assault upon Miss Walter, of the Boston Transcript, a dignified and most estimable lady, whose only offence was in properly reproving the conduct of Poe—which Mr. Stedman justly calls "absurd and outrageous"—in connection with his poem before the Boston Lyceum. How much lower deeps even than this could be fathomed by this chivalrous poet in flinging slander against a woman who had offended what Stedman (again) calls his "measureless self-esteem," will be seen when we turn to Mr. Ingram's exhibition of his duplicity toward Mrs. Whitman.

It is hard to recall, among all the sad revelations of literary biography, anything so utterly dastardly as the whole record of Poe's life, as revealed by his own letters, during his brief betrothal to this unselfish and generous woman. Something of this may have been before suspected, but Mr. Ingram gives the whole evidence, sparing us no damning detail of date, and showing conclusively that during the very period when he was writing to this lady as ardently and as reverentially as ever lover wrote to his betrothed—while she was using all her influence to redeem him from his debasing habits, and was undergoing agonies of doubt and fear for his sake—he was constantly solacing himself by writing other letters equally ardent, and often on alternate days, to a lady whose name Mr. Ingram discreetly veils as "Annie"; while the worthy Mrs. Clemm, his mother-in-law, was apparently using all her influence to detach him from his intended wife, and to cultivate his romantic passion for her rival. Let us consider some steps in the affair. On October 18 he wrote to Mrs. Whitman as his "best and only-beloved Helen"; even after this she hesitated about marrying him, and all her friends tried to prevent it; he attempted suicide in Boston, passed a night of wild delirium in Providence, had a terrible scene with her in the morning, and she decided to be his wife "in the hope of being enabled to preserve him from his impending doom" (Ingram, ii. 177). She then gave her pledge, "upon condition that he never touched intoxicants again." Poe went to New York to make arrangements for his marriage, and wrote to her on November 14: "Beloved of my heart, of my imagination, of my intellect—life of my life, soul of my soul—dearest, beloved Helen, how shall I ever thank you as I ought?" In a letter written a few days afterward he describes a cottage where he dreamed of himself and his beloved as dwelling, afar from the world (Ingram, ii. 179). It almost surpasses belief when we find that on the 16th of November he was writing in a strain quite as impassioned to "Annie," telling her that she must come to him, that he "cannot live," and conjuring up another picture of a cottage, far from the world, as attractive as the first one, with her near him as his guardian angel:

"It is not much that I ask, sweet sister Annie. My mother and myself would take a small cottage—oh! so small—so very humble—I should be far away from the tumult of the world—from the ambition which I loathe—I would labor day and night, and with industry I could accomplish so much. Annie! it would be a Paradise beyond my wildest hopes. I could see some of your beloved family every day, and you often. Do not these pictures touch your inmost heart? . . . Farewell, here and hereafter. For ever your own Eddy" (Ingram, ii. 194).

With this "heartrending epistle," as Mr. Ingram calls it, from a lover who had just been moving heaven and earth to get himself betrothed to somebody else, Mrs. Clemm also sends "Annie" a note written by herself under this same date of Nov. 16, saying: "He raved all night about you, but is now more composed." If this were a solitary instance, it would be less humiliating; but the thing was chronic. This spiritual bigamy seems to have been just the condition in which Poe revelled, in his then half-insane condition; and all through that month, by Mr. Ingram's merciless showing, he was alternately turning the stops of emotion for "Helen" and for "Annie." He kept on writing to Mrs. Whitman, by Mr. Ingram's statement, "a series of idiosyncratic epistles" (ii. 178), and almost on the same day he would write in an equally idiosyncratic manner to the other lady, who seems to have had, for a time at least, sufficient propriety not to answer them. Thus he wrote (Nov. 22) to "sweet Helen": "My sole hope now is in you, Helen. As you are true to me or fail me, so do I live or die" (ii. 180). Then he wrote on the very next day (Nov. 23) to "Annie's" sister: "If there is any pity in your heart, reply immediately to this and let me know why it is I do not hear from Annie. . . . Her silence fills my whole soul with terror. . . . Let me but hear from her once more, and I can bear whatever happens. . . . You would pity me if you knew the agony that is in my heart as I write these words" (ii. 196).

This is bad enough, but worse follows. He broke his pledge of abstinence, and Mrs. Whitman dismissed him. Yet on the 11th of January he had the baseness to write to his other correspondent that the engagement was broken off by himself, and to exult in it: "I need not tell you, Annie, how great a burden is taken off my heart by my rupture with Mrs. W.; for I have fully made up my mind to break the engagement" (Ingram, ii. 202). Worse yet, he wrote a letter to Mrs. Whitman, about Jan. 23, sent it to "Annie" for herself and friends to read, with the request that it should then be sealed and posted (ii. 204), and then closes with this crowning infamy: "But of one thing rest assured, Annie—from this day forth I shun the pestilential society of literary women. They are a heartless, unnatural, venomous, dishonorable set, with no guiding principle but inordinate self-esteem. Mrs. Osgood is the only exception I know" (ii. 205).

When one reads this sentence, so plainly aimed at her whom he had deceived, wronged, and was now maligning; her who was his "guardian angel" so long as he allowed it, and who went to her grave his faithful lover and staunch defender—not knowing, let us hope, to her dying day how he wrote about her to "Annie"—no manly reader can help feeling that whatever Griswold may have done to injure the memory of Poe, the revelations of Mr. Ingram are more fatal. The indulgent public will, as in the case of Goethe, pardon almost any number of love affairs to a poet so long as he makes them consecutive, but it is absolutely impossible to throw any glamour of personal honor about a sentimentalist who is remorselessly torturing two women's hearts at the same time.

It is due to Mr. Ingram to say that, though he almost uniformly takes Poe's side during his whole life of quarrels—and this without much judicial weighing of the facts—he yet recognizes in a general way the defects of his favorite. Thus, he finds the limitation of his genius to be shown in his repetitions (i. 152); admits that criticism was not his forte (i. 249), and regrets some of his "ill-considered critiques" (i. 158). He acknowledges that the majority of Poe's works "subdue the intellect only" (i. 181); he owns that the poet's irregularities destroyed his hopes and placed his reputation in the hands of foes (i. 215); admits that his "insatiable love of hoaxing" renders it very difficult to put confidence in anything he wrote (i. 255); and shows that every woman who attempted to befriend him "deemed it necessary to let him go his ways" sooner or later (ii. 192). In view of these admissions, it is idle to treat Poe as a lofty hero obliged to herd with his inferiors, and to deprecate his descending into the arena to "combat blackguards" (ii. 86). The simple fact is that Poe loved a fight like any Irishman, and was commonly the first to toss his own hat "into the arena." Worse yet, he gave fine names to this quarrelsomeness, and made his boast, "I uniformly attacked, where I attacked at all, those who stood highest in power and influence" (ii. 172), whereas three-quarters of his bitterest onslaughts were on those who were already unpopular or unimportant. Only once, in the case of Professor Longfellow, did he fairly strike Bois-Guilbert's shield; and it is possible that he knew, as the result proved, that Bois-Guilbert would be too good-natured or too magnanimous to notice the thrust. Mr. Stoddard handles this whole matter far more wisely than Mr. Ingram, and his verdict on Poe's critical controversies will be the final one: "He advanced no critical principle which he established; he attacked no critical principle which he overthrew. He broke a few butterflies on his wheel, but he destroyed no reputation" (Stoddard, lxxxix.)

In summing up, we can say that the public is indebted to Mr. Ingram for a considerable addition to the materials for a life of Poe, but that his book leaves us, as did the far inferior work of Mr. Gill—which, by the way, Mr. Ingram studiously omits to mention in his bibliography—with the impression that Poe's true biographer is yet to come. It is hardly to be expected that a full memoir will ever be written in the spirit of Mr. Stedman's criticism—so clear, so just, so strong. On one literary point we think this agreeable writer wholly wrong: his vindication of Poe's tiresome "repetends" (p. 59), which Mr. Stoddard more justly condemns. We are surprised, too, that he should speak of "Lenore" as "one of the simplest of ballad forms" (p. 60), ignoring the fact that in its original form, as first printed in Lowell's "Pioneer," it had a lyrical play and exaltation almost as fine as that of "Israfel," which Mr. Stedman places among the first of English lyrics. The present jingling and commonplace form of "Lenore" was only one of Poe's calamitous afterthoughts, when he had become thoroughly given over to the "repetend." But most of Mr. Stedman's essay seems to us simply admirable, and many of his special points and phrases rank high in critical art, as where he classes Poe with Doré rather than with the great masters (p. 76); where he points out that, after all, the poet "loved his share of pain" and took a keen delight in the tragedy of his own existence (p. 101); where he contrasts Poe with Hawthorne, and shows that "the Puritanism by which Hawthorne's strength was tempered was also the source from which it sprang" (p. 68); and when he points out the honorable fact, in view of Poe's indebtedness to French literature, that "there is not an unchaste suggestion in all his writings" (p. 93). Mr. Stedman has in short given us much good criticism; Mr. Stoddard many good facts, including some which the ampler English memoir contrives to leave out, such as citations from Poe's plagiarized book on 'Conchology'; and Mr. Ingram has given us only too ample an array of information, covering almost all points except this alleged plagiarism. A debt is thus due to each writer, and yet we cannot help thinking how hugely it would delight Poe, were he still alive, to break his combative lance against all three.

A HERO OF THE PENINSULAR WAR.

THOMAS GRAHAM was the most distinguished of Wellington's generals in the war of the Spanish Peninsula. The originality and audacity of his military achievements elicited the emphatic commendation of Napoleon himself, and he had the singular fortune to attract toward himself in an exceptional degree the confidence and affection of the two greatest British soldiers of his time—Sir John Moore and the Duke of Wellington. The biography of such a man deserved to be written, but we regret to say that we cannot compliment Captain Delaroye on his performance. His life of General Graham * bears little more resemblance to a book (properly so called) than a backgammon-board lettered on the back to that effect bears to a veritable 'History of England.' A certain quantity of biographical materials has been placed at his disposal, and Captain Delaroye has been content with "shooting" these into a common receptacle, and styling the operation a 'Life of Thomas Graham, Lord Lynedoch.' No researches have been made in the voluminous literature of the Peninsular War for information wherewith to supplement and complete these imperfect records; and so scanty are the Captain's explanatory comments that, except to a reader who brings to the perusal a very considerable knowledge of the Napoleonic period, the book would be hardly intelligible. Some weeks ago we regretted that the life of such a hero of romance as Sir James Outram should have been entrusted to hands so little capable of doing justice to the stirring theme. The regret is even more poignant in the case of General Graham. Lord Lynedoch's military career was exceptional throughout. He did not enter the army until he was past the age of forty. Up to that time he had been a Scottish gentleman of fortune, living on his estates, representing in Parliament, as one of the "old Whigs," the county of Perth, and devoted to the sports of the field. It was in following these that he acquired those powers of endurance, that splendid horsemanship, the keen eye for the configuration of a country, and the rapid judgment and decision which were destined to do his country such good service in its struggle with Napoleon. The death of a dearly-loved and beautiful wife was the cause of his becoming a soldier. Amid the perils and adventures of war he hoped to find distraction from melancholy remembrances from which there was no escape in the quiet and leisure of a country life. The town of Toulon was at that time held by a combined force of British, Spanish, and Neapolitan troops, and was besieged by the armies of the French Republic. Lord Mulgrave was in command of the British contingent, and Mr. Graham, without either military rank or a commission in the army, became his aide-de-camp. Such irregularities were possible in those days, and now and then, as in the present instance, for example, were justified by the result. In the course of a sortie against the French works Graham exhibited so much courage and such a swift, intuitive perception of what was to be done at a critical moment in the fight, that Lord Mulgrave earnestly pressed him to become a soldier, confidently predicting his future eminence if he took his advice. Graham did so.

The British Government in those days was sorely in need of troops to make good the waste of war, and country gentlemen of wealth and position were allowed and encouraged to raise regiments which they themselves were to command so long as the war lasted. It was at the same time possible for these gentlemen, at a very trifling expense, to obtain permanent rank in the British army, if they so desired it. Graham now solicited and obtained permission to raise a regiment, of which he was to be the colonel. This regiment is the present Ninetieth Light Infantry. He neglected, however, to make use of the means at that time available for securing permanent rank in the army, and this neglect was near causing the loss to the country of one of the finest soldiers she has produced. Without permanent rank, Colonel Graham was employed on a variety of highly responsible duties. As representing the British Government he was with the Austrian army under Wurmser in their endeavor to compel young General Bonaparte to raise the siege of Mantua, which terminated in Wurmser and his army being themselves shut up in the fortress they desired to relieve. Colonel Graham effected his escape from Mantua before the garrison was reduced to extremities, and, marching with Marshal Alvinczy to its relief, was present at the great battle of Rivoli, in which the Austrian army was entirely defeated. Meanwhile the Duke of York had become commander-in-chief of the British forces, and one of his first acts was to destroy all those facilities whereby temporary officers became permanent. In more than one instance the new order of things was set aside, but in the case of Colonel Graham the duke was inexorable. The fact was that Graham was "a vile Whig" (as Dr. Johnson would have termed him), and Whigs were a variety of the human race which the Court could not endure. But for an accidental ambiguity in the wording of his original commission Graham would have forfeited his military rank entirely on the conclusion of the Peace of Amiens. Much to the chagrin of the Duke of York this ambiguity saved him; but the Government refused to give him any employment suitable to his rank. No official neglect sufficed, however, to damp his ardor, and when Sir John Moore was appointed to the command of the British troops in Spain, Colonel Graham volunteered to accompany him as his aide-de-camp. The offer was eagerly accepted. The two men had long been friends, and each knew the worth of the other.

Sir John Moore is one of those rare heroic figures whose character far transcends his achievements. All the qualities which inspire admiration and command affection were so combined in him, that > "Nature might stand up,

> And say to all the world, 'This was a man!'"

How warm and lasting were that love and admiration we know from the testimonies to his worth recorded by the Napiers, by Lord Hardinge, and by his generous antagonist, Marshal Soult. The evidence of General Graham is no less emphatic. His notices of the campaign of Corunna teem with affectionate references to the general. Interesting above all is his description of the manner of Sir John Moore on the morning of Corunna. The prospect of fighting a battle, after the long anxieties of the retreat, made the general as "happy as a lover":

"I could scarcely have believed it possible," writes Colonel Graham, "for a man so worn down with fatigue and anxiety to have been so transformed as he was on the 16th of January, 1809. It was a transition from fixed gloom, bordering almost on despair, to a state of exultation at the prospect of being attacked before an embarkation could take place. . . . On a summons from Sir J. Hope he called for his horse, and I shall never forget, not only the animation but the almost boyish gaiety of his manner and countenance, as we rode out to the lines."

All that day the general was to be seen encouraging his troops wherever the fire was hottest, and twilight was coming on when he was stricken from his horse mortally wounded. The wound was a terrible one, but such, says Colonel Graham, "was the invariable firmness of his mind, such the consciousness of his rectitude, that he bore this pain without an altered feature." Among the dying requests of Sir John Moore was an earnest entreaty that Colonel Graham should obtain permanent rank in the British army. Such a request by such a man at such a time, supported as it was by brilliant services rendered in this very campaign, could not be ignored, and shortly after Corunna Graham was gazetted as a lieutenant-general and second in command to Lord Wellington in Spain.

It is curious to contrast the actual facts of Lord Wellington's Peninsular campaigns with the popular legend about them which still prevails in England. That legend represents them as an unbroken tide of success, driving the enemy

> "Back to France with countless blows,
> Till o'er the hills her eagles flew > Beyond the Pyrenean pines";

and it is mainly and almost exclusively to these campaigns that Englishmen are wont to attribute the fall of Napoleon. As a matter of fact, in Wellington's campaigns victory and reverses alternated throughout; and, despite his great military genius and the indomitable courage of the British soldier, he failed to loosen the French grip upon Spain until Napoleon had destroyed himself and his military power by his mad expedition into Russia. In truth, even in the melancholy annals of war, it would be hard to find a more useless waste of human life and treasure than that occasioned by the English wars in Spain. They availed nothing for the primary object for which they were undertaken, the overthrow of Napoleon. To Spain they were worse than useless, for at their close England acquiesced in the setting up of a tyranny in that country more degrading, because immeasurably more bigoted and unintelligent, than the tyranny of Napoleon, and to which the present fallen state of Spain is clearly traceable. To Great Britain herself the consequences were most disastrous. Her people, dazzled by the glare of military glory, did not care to ask themselves what they had reaped in return for all this lavish expenditure of their blood and the fruits of their industry. They knew that the Whigs had been opposed to this glorious war, while the Tories had approved and supported it. And so for nearly twenty years they submitted themselves like "dumb, driven cattle" to the yoke of a reactionary Toryism. The fruit of the Spanish war, so far as Great Britain was concerned, is to be found in that dark period of her domestic history which extends from 1815 to 1832, and in the millions which it added to her national debt.

General Graham arrived in Spain when the prospects of the allies looked very dark indeed. The campaign of Talavera had ended in the disastrous retreat of the British army within the frontiers of Portugal. Two large Spanish armies had been entirely broken up and dispersed by the French; Marshal Victor was blockading Cadiz; and Masséna, at the head of sixty thousand men, was preparing (as he and all the world believed) to drive Wellington to his ships. Neither he nor the world was cognizant of the lines of Torres Vedras. General Graham was appointed to the command of the Cadiz garrison, which, besides some Spanish troops, consisted of five or six thousand British infantry. It was while holding this command that he won the brilliant victory of Barrosa. A combined British and Spanish force had moved out of Cadiz, under the command of the Spanish general Lapena, to attack the French position at Chiclana. Owing to Lapena's incompetence this force had got itself wedged in a narrow and confined piece of ground, where certain destruction awaited it if the French succeeded in establishing themselves upon the Barrosa height. Graham, perceiving the immense importance of the position, had occupied the hill with the entire British contingent, four thousand strong, but received from the Spanish commander a peremptory order to withdraw. He obeyed, nothing doubting that Lapena proposed to occupy the place in his stead. But no sooner had the British troops withdrawn than Lapena withdrew his men also, without, however, sending word to the British general that he had done so. Marshal Victor, with nine thousand men concealed behind the cover of a pine wood, had been eagerly watching these movements, and no sooner perceived that the Barrosa height had been abandoned than he threw forward his columns in all haste to seize it. The news of this advance reached Graham, who at once countermarched his men, expecting to find Lapena and his Spaniards still in possession of this vital point. He found on his arrival nine thousand tried French troops actually drawn up on the hill, while his Spanish allies were nowhere to be seen. Never, we suppose, was a commander placed in a more critical position. If he retired, the fate of the allied force was sealed, their destruction was inevitable; if he attacked, he would have to do it with four thousand men against nine thousand. General Graham was already past the age of sixty, but the brightness of his eye was not quenched nor the natural force of his mind abated. Swift as light his mind formed the determination to attack. The concentrated fire of twelve guns checked the advance of the French columns, and then the British infantry—hastily thrown into two divisions—were sent headlong at the enemy, the general himself leading them through the thickest of the fire. For an hour and a half a fierce struggle, bayonet to bayonet, was carried on along the summit of the hill, and then, broken and disordered, the French were driven down the slope. How severe the battle was can be judged from the fact that of the small British force of four thousand men no less than sixty officers, sixty sergeants, and twelve hundred rank and file were killed and wounded. The French army might have been entirely dispersed and the blockade of Cadiz raised but for the apathy of the Spanish general. Although close at hand, not one Spanish soldier was sent to the assistance of the small British force, and, though Graham held the heights for several hours in the hope that Lapena would make some effort to improve and complete the astonishing victory that had been won, the Spaniard remained motionless and supine, and the French drew off unmolested. Lord Wellington's comments on the whole transaction are characteristic:

"I beg to congratulate you and the brave troops under your command on the signal victory which you gained on the 5th instant [5th of March, 1811]. I have no doubt whatever that their success would have had the effect of raising the siege of Cadiz, if the Spanish troops had made any effort to assist them; and I am equally certain, from your account of the ground, that if you had not decided with the utmost promptitude to attack the enemy, and if your attack had not been a most vigorous one, the whole allied army would have been lost. . . . The conduct of the Spaniards throughout this expedition is precisely the same as I have ever observed it to be. They march the troops night and day without provisions and rest, abusing everybody who proposes a moment's delay to afford either to the famished and fatigued soldiers. They reach the enemy in such a state as to be unable to make any exertion or to execute any plan, even if any plan had been formed; and then, when the moment of action arrives, they are totally incapable of movement, and they stand by to see their allies destroyed, and afterwards abuse them because they do not continue, unsupported, exertions to which human nature is not equal."

For General Graham's other services in the field want of space compels us to refer our readers to the book we are reviewing. They were of the most brilliant description. In the decisive campaign of Vitoria he commanded Wellington's left, consisting of forty thousand troops. The extended nature of the operations made of this what was virtually an independent command. He arrived in the basin of Vitoria after a march through a country so difficult that to traverse it at all was no small achievement. On the day of battle he overthrew the French right and, getting in their rear, cut off the retreat of the defeated army by the main road leading to France. Subsequently he conducted the siege operations against St. Sebastian, which terminated in the storm and capture of that place. His last military exploit was an endeavor to carry the fortress of Bergen-op-Zoom by a coup de main. The endeavor was defeated, but the combined skill and daring manifested in the plan of attack evoked the hearty commendation of the Emperor Napoleon. On the conclusion of peace General Graham was raised to the peerage as Lord Lynedoch, and died at the ripe age of ninety-four, full of years and honors, in 1843.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

PROF. GRIFFIS'S 'Japanese Fairy World' (Schenectady: James H. Barhyte) fills an undoubted gap in child-lore, and needs chiefly a more literary finish to give it an assured place in our standard collections. The tales are well chosen in point of interest, and their infrequent bloodiness never approaches that of "Hop o' my Thumb." The first dozen of the two or three dozen are without exception readable, and we have set a mark against several which follow—"The Fisherman and the Moon-Maiden," for its pretty sentimentality; "Smells and Jingles," on account of its identity with a well-known Western fable, etc., etc. The great feature of this little book, however, is the twelve illustrations by Ozawa Nankoku, of Tokio, drawn expressly to fit the stories. Not only is there real enlightenment in thus having a key to Japanese art (for we really deal here with a symbolic mythology), but we must often admire the ingenuity of the Eastern imagination—for example (p. 54), in the difficult subject, "The Egg, Wasp, and Mortar attack the Monkey," with which one may compare Mr. Tenniel's designs in the Alice books. In another edition Mr. Griffis should correct the redundancy on p. 38 of "Princess Hotaru-himé," and the ambiguity, on p. 59, of the sentence "to paint scenery, with Fuji yama and cranes flying in the air," where a child would naturally take the mountain for a bird. Elsewhere we have "Fuji mountain," and "Fuji Yama" with the interpretation (p. 217). It would be well to abandon the French orthography in this name.

It is pleasant to record another notable success on the part of Miss Mary De Morgan, who made her début some years ago in 'On a Pincushion.' Her 'Necklace of Princess Fiorimonde' (New York: Macmillan) is as charming and fresh and genuine a fairy-tale collection as the former, and of perhaps a still more even merit. The first three of the seven stories have to do with malignant witchcraft; the last, the "Wise Princess," is an allegory, teaching that happiness and duty are inseparable; while the "Pedlar's Pack," the "Bread of Discontent," and the "Three Clever Kings," are so many clever satires with very obvious morals. In the "Pedlar's Pack" the dramatis personæ have promised each other payments which they cannot make, the vicious circle beginning with the pedlar's engagement to pay the donkey two pieces of gold when he has not a penny to his name. The hedge-sparrow, the last in the chain of hired service, offers the pedlar four pieces for a blanket, and at once duns her employer, the raven, for her wages; he thereupon beats her down one piece, and in turn duns the donkey, who likewise scales his debt, and turns to the pedlar with—

"'Now, good sir, your two pieces of gold, if you please.'

"'In a moment,' said the pedlar; and turning to the hedge-sparrow, said, 'I really must have the money for the blanket at once.'

"'So you shall,' answered the hedge-sparrow, and cried angrily to the raven, 'I want my money now, and cannot wait.'

"'In an instant,' answered the raven, and again whispered to the donkey, 'Why can't you pay me honestly? I should be ashamed of trying to slip out of my debts in such a way.'"

And so the round continues, until the whole party is hauled before a magistrate for wrangling. Now, let the blanket stand for the "national faith," or the total acreage of the country, or any other inconvertible "base," and the promise to pay be represented by a greenback, an assignat, or any other form of fiat money, and we have, as we may say, a fable for the times. In the "Wanderings of Arasmon" Miss De Morgan's fancy takes on an especial beauty, but this quality predominates throughout. Walter Crane's illustrations need no praise, but we like most his initial letters and head and tail-pieces, which are very dainty.

'Queer Pets,' by Olive Thorne Miller (New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.), comprises a collection of stories descriptive of the pets of a little girl named Marcia. These pets are procured by an amiable uncle, who visits for the purpose foreign ships arriving at an adjacent port. Birds and animals from all parts of the world are purchased for his niece by this self-sacrificing man. Their habits and peculiarities are charmingly described. The uncle is the only unreal personage in the book. He is of the bachelor type. Under the guidance of Miss Miller he develops but one organ—that of benevolence—and uniformly conducts himself with the self-denial so dear to the feminine heart. The illustrations by Mr. Jas. C. Beard, admirably engraved, are full of originality and character, and far in advance of those of his foreign competitors in this direction. The volume, as a specimen of book-work, is brilliantly decorative, and reflects great credit on all engaged in its production.

Mr. Thomas W. Knox's 'Boy Travellers in the Far East (China and Japan)' went last season into so many households that Part II., Siam and Java (New York: Harper & Bros.), requires scarcely any introduction. What this extensive tourist himself has seen is again deftly supplemented by selections, with due credit, from approved works on the various countries under consideration—e. g., for Siam, Vincent's 'Land of the White Elephant.' Col. Yule's 'Marco Polo' and Mr. Edwin Arnold's 'Light of Asia' are likewise made use of, and the result is a surprising variety of information, which frequently becomes episodical, as in the case of alligators, elephants, pearl-diving, etc. The travellers are of course the same, and Mr. Knox, speaking of and through the trio, remains the keen Yankee ready to suggest improvements on the slow ways of the East, and seeing "millions" in ice-machines and direct trade with the United States; whose English has been formed on newspaper models, and whose humor is typically American. Thus, in one of their home letters, the boys, describing their efforts to eat the ill-smelling durian, are made to say: "We are told that the best way is to have the servants cut it up and put the pieces in milk, and by taking them out of the milk and swallowing quickly the smell is avoided. Perhaps this might work; but a better plan would be to have the servants eat the stuff up when it was properly prepared, and let you hear nothing more about it." Some wholesome checks on hasty censure of Eastern morality are furnished by citing parallel practices or institutions in the Western world. The prudent administration of the Dutch in Java is clearly set forth, but the moral drawbacks, especially to the ruling race, are overlooked. In general we may safely commend this handsome and profusely illustrated volume as an informal geography; its utility would have been greatly enhanced by an index, for the sake of which some of the gaudiness of the binding could have been dispensed with.

"Third edition" is inscribed on the title-page of the Rev. Forbes E. Winslow's 'Children's Fairy Geography, or a Merry Trip round Europe' (New York: Pott, Young & Co.), and all the incidental allusions point to a recent date of composition; but on p. 8 Paris, St. Petersburg, and Constantinople are ranked next in population after London, while on p. 282 St. Petersburg is allowed only 700,000 inhabitants, and on p. 163 Berlin is said to have "now nearly a million." This inconsistency will perhaps pass in fairy-land, but it needs explanation in a work actually offered as a substitute for the repulsive school geographies. A more complete and unfortunate contrast to Mr. Knox's 'Boy Travellers' could hardly be found in print. The fiction is substantially the same: a father with his little boy and girl are whisked through the air from place to place at pleasure, but this is the only action in the narrative. The father does all the talking, now and then flinging a remark to the children, like "Ah, Ethel, did you ever see such lovely dolls?" or "What is the matter with you, Jack? You are white as a sheet"; and all the time crying and pointing, Look here —— This is —— You now see—like the showman at a panorama. Guide-books supply the padding, and the result is insufferably tedious, with its air of hurry and cram, the solemn jokes of Mr. Winslow, and his bad verses prefaced by bad English—e.g., "I feel up to a song to-day." It is a pity that so much pains as the author says he has taken, and as we know the publishers have, should have been wasted in this manner. The book is beautifully printed and carefully illustrated.

We cannot discern any superiority in 'Shakespeare's Stories Simply Told,' by Mary Seamer (New York: Thos. Nelson & Sons), over Charles and Mary Lamb's classic version, except that it is more complete by six plays, with "Much Ado About Nothing," "Two Gentlemen of Verona," "All's Well That Ends Well," and "Measure for Measure" omitted. The narrator expurgates freely, of course, and seeks "to introduce all the familiar passages so aptly termed the 'Beauties of Shakespeare.'" This does not always result in giving us more of the words or of the spirit of the dramatist, as in the "Winter's Tale," for example. But the "beauties" are printed separately as verse, and this may be well. The text is embellished with outline engravings of good design.

Mr. Sidney Lanier makes an acceptable addition to his 'Boy's Froissart' of last year with the 'Boy's King Arthur,' abridged from Sir Thomas Malory's History (New York: Chas. Scribner's Sons). His introduction gives all needful data concerning the original material which Malory worked over, together with specimens of Walter Mapes's French version of the search for the holy grail, of Layamon's English, of Caxton's apology for printing Sir Thomas's work—all very instructively knit together. The manner of his editing has been to modernize the spelling but preserve the language of his author, and to enclose in brackets his own piecings where the narrative has been abbreviated. The harder words are explained, and foot-notes embody a sufficient but not redundant amount of interpretation and suggestion. The arbitrary arrangement into books has been abandoned for one more logical. In short, the editing has been executed with very scholarly taste, and the handsome volume, adorned with spirited illustrations by Alfred Kappes, can with perfect satisfaction be placed in the hands of any boy or girl.

Two series of historical biographies for the young, both of high merit, have been issued in the last year, and our young folks will welcome a new volume in each series. Mr. Eggleston's hero in the present volume of 'Famous American Indians' (New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.) is Montezuma, an American Indian in the strict sense of the term, but a hero of a different type from the Red Jacket, Brant, and Pocahontas with whom his earlier volumes have made his readers familiar. In classing Montezuma with these he tacitly accepts Mr. Morgan's view, that the Mexicans were but more advanced Indians; we are surprised, therefore, to find here the old view of the character of the Mexican empire as an absolute monarchy, with a court of great splendor and elaborate ceremonial. This notion we supposed had been completely disposed of by Mr. Morgan and Mr. Bandelier. If their doctrine is correct, it is certainly important that our young people should not have their minds preoccupied with false conceptions; and the true view is certainly as picturesque as the false, and far more interesting. Apart from this, we have nothing but praise.

Mr. Towle, in his 'Young Folk's Heroes of History' (Boston: Lee & Shepard), has a subject of the first interest and importance—Marco Polo. Perhaps Polo's adventures are less exciting and attractive than those of Pizarro and Magellan, the heroes of his former books, and at any rate their interest is for more mature readers. Mr. Towle's style, too, is not so well adapted to children as Mr. Eggleston's, and is in general rather more artificial. He has done his work very well, however, and has made a book which is not only entertaining in itself, but will be wholly new to most of his readers. The story of Montezuma everybody has read, but how many of the class for whom the book is designed have ever heard the name of Marco Polo? We wish that both of these books were provided with maps; they would be useful in all the books of this series, but in this volume especially we should like to see a map which should mark out a route from Balkh to Samarcand by the way of Pamir. We think Mr. Towle was caught napping here. Marco Polo, in his memoirs, describes Samarcand, as he does, for instance, Cashmere; but he does not say he visited it, and it is plain that he could not have done so. It is rather venturesome, therefore, to say (p. 58) that "Marco was greatly impressed with the wealth and splendor of the city."

Mr. Stockton's 'A Jolly Fellowship' (New York: Chas. Scribner's Sons) has already had a success among the readers of St. Nicholas. It is the record, recited by the elder, of the travels of two boys, aged respectively sixteen and fourteen, through the South and the Bahamas. The addition of a bright young girl to the party, with a hint of chaperonage in the person of an erratically sensible mother and an eccentric father, lends interest and piquancy to the adventures, which are not too improbable. The midnight scaling of Fort Marion by the two boys, which ended by their gladly backing out of the scrape after being badly victimized by the Indian sentinels, is very funny. So is the farcical attempt of the three friends to restore the African queen to her rights in the African colony in Nassau. There is a shipwreck on the way home, the separation of Corny and the boys from the father and mother, who were in another boat, and much suspense, but of course a happy conclusion. The relations between the boys and Corny are very nicely managed, and the book closes with a hint of school and college instead of hymeneal prospects.

'The Fairport Nine,' by Noah Brooks (Scribner), is the base-ball variety of the boy's book, with the especial peculiarity of the only black boy in town being made, not too obtrusively, the leader in sports and studies. The base-ball games described show that the boy audience has been growing more critical in its demands, and the old scores with numerous runs have given place to the scientific game in which there are fewer runs than innings. The best chapter, as a description of the unconscious mischief which boys manage to get into, is "The Kingdom of Pedan"—an imaginary empire of which the boys are the military defenders. The dialect ascribed to the Fairport Nine is rather exaggerated, we should say, and would have been more in place in the mouths of their rivals "The White Bears."

Like all Mr. Ballantyne's books, 'Philosopher Jack' (London: Jas. Nisbet & Co.) is full enough of incident to satisfy the most exacting juvenile demand for adventure. There is a shipwreck in the Southern Seas on a coral island, rescue by a ship bound for California, an expedition to the gold-mines, where the shipwrecked party pick up a large fortune in a short space of time, another shipwreck off the English coast with the loss of the gold-chests they were bringing home, and the news on landing that the failure of the Blankow bank has sunk all the money they had sent home before them. Being shareholders in this bank their gold may as well as not be at the bottom of the sea so far as they are concerned, as, if it could be reached, it would have to be surrendered. Accordingly the author leaves it there for eight years, until if recovered it will be safe in its former owners' hands, and then has divers find it and provides comfortable fortunes all around. The notion must be acknowledged to be novel and neat, and far better than "making over" one's property to his wife.

Illustrated Text-Books of Art Education. Edited by Edward J. Poynter, R.A. 'Classic and Italian Painting. By Edward J. Poynter, R.A., and Percy R. Head.' 'Architecture, Gothic and Renaissance. By T. Roger Smith, F.R.I.B.A.' (New York: Scribner & Welford; London: Sampson Low, Marston, Searle & Rivington. 1880.)—In his preface to this series, of which the books before us are but the first two, Mr. Poynter says that if the present interest in art "is to be more than a fashion," "a definite and systematic knowledge of art must be its foundation," and that the object of his text-books is "to provide that such a knowledge should form part of general education." It would be unnecessary to insist on the value of this, he observes, if it were not widely assumed that æsthetic appreciation is a mere matter of taste. He accordingly offers such suggestions as occur to him in proof of the contrary, and what he says seems so sound that it is easy to agree with his conclusion at the end of it, that "it would be easy to fall into truisms and platitudes by extending these observations." As his collaborator chronicles further on, the same general notion was promulgated by Pamphilus of Amphipolis about 350 B.C., and perhaps the point best worth discussing is how to accomplish a result so long held to be desirable. Text-books of this sort are not new: the past few years have been very prolific of them; but exactly how much good they do has not yet been settled as definitively as could be wished. Invariably we have noticed in their several apologies a modest profession of satisfaction if they shall prove to have stimulated an interest in the subject. Mr. Poynter wishes his "to act as an incentive" to the reader to follow up the matter for himself, and says he will gain "but little learning" from them. But about their specific success here we confess we are a little sceptical. Neither these nor art text-books in general we believe do much to this end. Most people who need the stimulus in question, except the very young, will probably be content with the amount of "learning" to be got from them; they are not conspicuous, as a rule, for the insidious inveigling of indisposed minds, for which purpose a different sort of thing altogether would be undoubtedly more potent—something romantic, or literary, or critical, or in some way positively attractive in itself. We suspect they are valuable chiefly as all digests and summaries are, and, of course, have the same limitations and drawbacks. These drawbacks are inherent in the scheme, of course, and it is difficult to see how to get over them; indeed, it is almost safe to conclude, after the abundant experimentation which has taken place, that it is impossible, unless the editor will consent to forego either comprehensiveness or explicitness. So that the only way that occurs to us in which this 'Classic and Italian Painting,' for example, could be improved would be to omit many of the details which it includes, and which not only confuse the general drift (that, by the way, might be more explicit with advantage) but are simply beyond the capacity of any one to remember, owing to the slight impression left by their necessary meagreness. Vasari himself, voluminous as he is, would be benefited by this treatment, and we have wished that he might be edited by some one, Mr. Poynter say, as Johnson's 'Lives' have recently been. This is really all we have to remark upon the way in which Mr. Poynter and Mr. Head have executed their task, for, though it would not be difficult to pick flaws in its relative proportions and so on, an answer in each instance would be equally easy, and after all it would not be touching the heart of the matter.

Mr. Smith's book on Gothic and Renaissance Architecture is much better in this respect, and seems to us a book worth writing. He does, to be sure, confess to having been hampered by the conflict between comprehensiveness and detail. Architecture is considerably more technical, and to the general reader more abstruse, it may be said, than painting; it is more of a science, and accordingly a smattering of it is harder to acquire; further than which, the intricacies of its development are more numerous than even the biographical and artistic peculiarities of Italian painters. Mr. Smith, however, accomplishes much by an intelligent use of divisions and subdivisions, and the reader who will study his book and not rest content with skimming it may feel sure of a notion of the subject at once pretty definite and comparatively easy to retain. We wish, nevertheless, that Mr. Smith were a little more inclined to the German method of pursuing such tasks. Instances of its flagrant abuse both by loose and exact transcendentalists are abundant enough, but as a method it has the incontestable advantage of a natural sequence over a congeries, and we should say that Mr. Smith was in no danger of exaggerating it unwisely. More nearly than any other art architecture argues not only the architect but the general mental condition of his contemporaries and entourage, because it is the only art with which masses of people have directly to do, on account of its prominent material side. In what he says of the distinguishing characteristics of Gothic and Renaissance Mr. Smith seems discriminating and fair, but at some cost to directness. In his carefulness to be impartial he loses some force. He will probably fail on this account to suit any of the three classes into which architects may broadly be divided: those who believe forms to be the logical expression of specific necessities and almost inevitably inherent in conditions; those who think them substantially settled by the accumulated experience which has resulted in "styles"; and those who are guided solely by a feeling for what is agreeable to the sense. But he will grievously offend none of them. His objection to the shams inseparable from exaggerated Renaissance is sufficiently mild; his recognition of the intrinsic merits of Gothic principles is reasonably cordial; and he is tolerant of pure whim. Perhaps the thick-and-thin Gothic devotee will be least pleased; to the thick-and-thin Gothic devotee his definition of Gothic as "pointed," instead of "the only rational," will be unsatisfactory; and we confess he seems to us to have missed the point of distinction between the Greek temple and the mediæval cathedral, for example, which is perhaps a test of true comprehension of the general development of architecture. He speaks of the symmetry of the one and the variety of the other, and so on. The essential difference is that between a cell and an organism. Nevertheless his readers will get a very fair conception of the main characteristics of "styles," so-called, and without bias in favor of any one, which is a great merit in a writer of even so impersonal a thing as the uninitiated might assume an elementary work on architecture to be. The indispensable glossary is better than most in such books, and is illustrated, but in some instances it is too vague. For example:

"Apse.—A semicircular or polygonal termination to, or projection from, a church or other public building.

"Chancel.—The choir or eastern part of a church.

"Choir.—The part of a church in which the services are celebrated; usually, but not always, the east end, or chancel. In a Spanish church the choir is often at the crossing."

The illustrations are abundant and really illustrative in the main. Detailed criticism is commendably rare; of such as creeps in, the eulogy rather than the censure is the doubtful part. Critics will differ, perhaps, as to whether this or the reverse is a merit in a text-book.

The Life of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort. By Theodore Martin. With Portraits. Volume v. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1880.)—This concluding volume of Mr. Martin's life embraces the years 1860 and 1861. We have the history of the Prince's connection with, or the expression of his views upon, the diplomatic intrigues which succeeded the Italian war, Lord John Russell's Reform Bill, the invasion of Naples by Garibaldi, the advance on Rome, the Schleswig-Holstein affair, the visit of the Prince of Wales to this country, and the Trent affair. An appendix contains a full description of the ceremonial observed at the funeral of the Prince Consort. It is, of course, Mr. Martin's aim to emphasize, if not to magnify, the importance of the position taken by Prince Albert as the husband of the Queen; and, considering the difficulties which the task presented, his success must be considered remarkable. In all the five volumes we believe that no mistakes or misstatements of fact have ever been detected, and yet the picture presented by the book as a whole is that of a laborious, deserving, efficient, and respected monarch governing or directing the Government of his country with consummate skill, tact, and wisdom. To a reader familiar with the actual course of English history during the period of Queen Victoria's reign, the picture, of course, seems that of a eulogist; but Mr. Martin is a eulogist. To write a life of the Prince Consort with the perspective which the cold, clear light of history accords it, would be to reduce the five volumes to a very slender page, and sadly to curtail the proportions of the influence exerted by Prince Albert upon the destiny of Great Britain or the Continent. But it is not fair to examine Mr. Martin's work in this light; he is by virtue of his office a eulogist, and it is as a eulogy that the book should be regarded. As such it is an excellent piece of work.

To Americans the most interesting chapter in the present volume is that which deals with the Trent affair. In this matter the influence of the Prince Consort was, as usual, exerted in the direction of peace, and the temper of both countries was at the time so warlike, and the issue depended for a few days upon so many accidental causes, that he may fairly be considered to have helped to turn the scale against war. It is well known that he did not approve the draft of instructions prepared by Lord Russell for Lord Lyons, and made several emendations, which were acted upon by the Queen, and finally commended themselves to Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston. The pacific temper thus fortunately brought to bear upon the negotiations is best shown by the memorandum, the joint work of the Queen and the Prince, of which Mr. Martin gives a fac-simile. The original draft is not given, but its general tenor was simply that the Government of the United States should be told that the action of Captain Wilkes in boarding the Trent was a violation of international law and of the rights of Great Britain; that the British Government trusted that the act would be disavowed, the prisoners set free and restored to British protection, terminating with an instruction that, in case of the refusal of this demand, Lord Lyons should retire from the United States. The Prince's memorandum adopted by the Queen characterizes this draft as "somewhat meagre." It is suggested that it should have contained "the expression of a hope that the American captain did not act under instructions, or if he did, that he misapprehended them; that the United States Government must be fully aware that the British Government could not allow its flag to be insulted and the security of her mail communications to be placed in jeopardy; and Her Majesty's Government are unwilling to believe that the United States Government intended wantonly to put an insult upon this country, and to add to their many distressing complications by forcing a question of dispute upon us; and that we are therefore glad to believe that upon a full consideration of the circumstances of the undoubted breach of international law committed they would spontaneously offer such redress as would alone satisfy this country—namely, the restoration of the unfortunate passengers and a suitable apology." There seems to be no doubt that the alterations adopted in accordance with these suggestions were really the work of Prince Albert.

A very large part of this volume is, as usual, made up of details of the private life of the royal family, and it is impossible to lay the book down without speculating upon the moral effect of such publications as the Queen has authorized with reference to her private life upon the fortunes of the British Crown. Mr. Theodore Martin has been made the channel through which Queen Victoria has taken the entire world into her confidence as to her domestic life. Nothing has been held back that could have been made known, and the result is that we have an account of a royal household and its private affairs such as has never before been given to the world. On the one hand, of course, the result of all this is to confirm the prevailing impression of the high tone of morality encouraged and fostered at the court by the Queen and the Prince Consort. An atmosphere of goodness and purity pervades the whole life of the Queen and all who surrounded her, which, to say the least, is unusual in court chronicles. On the other hand, if the institution of monarchy is to be preserved and hedged about with respect and reverence, is it advisable that so much should be known about kings and queens and their ordinary human interests? This reverence and respect are somewhat artificial, and nowhere more artificial than in England, where the actual government is parliamentary, though the head of it possesses royal powers transmitted by descent. In an hereditary monarchy the chances must be that for one pre-eminently virtuous monarch there will be a greater number of insignificant and bad ones, and if the institution is to be preserved it would seem as if, in the long run, a discreet silence on the subject of the private lives of royal personages were the safest course. Familiarity breeds contempt in this no less than in other matters, and the line which divides the public feeling that a monarchy should be preserved as a fine and noble piece of pageantry, and the feeling that the day for all political pageantries is over, is, after all, a narrow one.

A History of the Huguenots of the Dispersion at the recall of the Edict of Nantes. By Reginald Lane Poole. (London: Macmillan & Co. 1880. 208 pp. 8vo.)—The title of this work, the Lothian historical prize-essay for 1879 at Oxford, is somewhat misleading. It is not strictly a history, but a collection of references to the materials for a history of the "emigration consequent upon the revocation of the Edict of Nantes." These materials are very voluminous, especially in Holland, Germany, and France. In Germany there is "hardly a church but has its separate chronicler," while in France the twenty-eight volumes of the 'Bulletin de la Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme Français' contain a rich store of documents, statistics, and local traditions invaluable to the historian. All these authorities the writer seems to have faithfully examined, and the result is a work which will prove a trustworthy guide to the student of this subject.

The fugitives are first traced to the Netherlands, and a just tribute is paid to the generously hospitable reception of their co-religionists by the people of this country. Various measures in behalf of the emigrants, such as the granting of all rights enjoyed by natives, gifts of land, exemption from taxation and military service, and permission "to practise their crafts without fee," were adopted by the different provincial and municipal governments immediately after the Revocation. In addition, large sums of money were contributed both by the governments and by private individuals of all classes and religions. The Jews of Amsterdam, for instance, gave in 1685 "as much as 40,000 gulden." The result of this wise and well-timed liberality was that at least one hundred thousand of the fugitives settled in the Low Countries. The exact numbers will never be known, "for in February, 1686, the Estates of Holland, urged by the Estates-General, forbade all mention in the public prints touching the refugees; above all, as to the manner of their escape." In strong contrast to the reception by the Dutch was that which the Huguenots received in England in the early years of the dispersion. The distrust with which the foreigners were regarded, however, soon melted away in the Protestant reaction against the religious and foreign policy of James II., and "the nation raised a splendid fund of relief, and left no opportunity unused of showing the exiles the kindness they sorely needed." From London, where there were soon twenty-eight French churches, they spread to different parts of England, chiefly in the south and east, establishing valuable industries wherever they settled. Considerable colonies went to Ireland, from one of which sprang the manufacture of linen. Their influence upon the political history of Great Britain was possibly more important and valuable than the gain which they brought to the wealth and population of the country. Speaking of the zeal with which the leading Huguenots entered into the discussions of the great questions of the day, Mr. Poole says: "They helped not a little to formulate the public opinion that offered the kingdom to William of Orange."

Though Switzerland was chiefly a country of passage for the refugees, yet many thousands found a home there. The generosity of the people was unbounded. The public charity of Geneva alone during the forty years of the dispersion was 5,143,266 florins; "and the bounty of individuals may have nearly rivalled that of the city." The contributions of Berne amounted to about four millions of florins. The German Lutherans received the Huguenots generally with a distrust and coldness similar to that of the English. Notwithstanding this, probably seventy-five thousand settled in Baden, Hesse, Würtemberg, Saxony, and Brandenburg, repairing in many places the desolation wrought by the Thirty Years' War. The Great Elector of Brandenburg, Frederic William, showed a far-sighted wisdom in his treatment of the emigrants. The Edict of Potsdam, issued within a fortnight after the Edict of the Recall, threw open, as it were, all his dominions to the French refugees. Gifts of land, immunities and privileges of all kinds were promised. Agents were placed in the principal cities on the frontier of France to aid the fugitives with advice, provisions, and money. So strong and sincere was his interest in his new subjects that he supplied "from his privy purse the unaccustomed charges which else had drained his exchequer." It is difficult to overestimate the influence which the emigration had upon the somewhat rude inhabitants of the future kingdom of Prussia. The Huguenots brought a refinement of manners as well as an improvement in husbandry. Their officers and soldiers formed no contemptible part of the army, while the manufactures which they established were a source of great wealth and prosperity. "The society of Berlin was, in fact, the creation of the exile; and it was the refugees who gave it that mobile course of thought, that finer culture, that tact in matters of art, that instinct of conversation, which had before been the unique possession of France."

To the emigration to North America Mr. Poole devotes but half a dozen pages, which he explains by the remark that "the history of this settlement has yet to be written, and it is not likely that its materials will be found on this side the Atlantic." In his brief outline of the history of the colonies in Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, and South Carolina he gives this fact concerning the life of the planters of New Rochelle: "For many years they could not support a church, and these zealous people, after laboring hard the week through, spent much of the nights of Saturday and Sunday in walking the sixteen miles to and from the nearest church at New York."

The number of those who fled from France in consequence of the Recall has been variously estimated from one hundred thousand to two millions. Our author says "it will be clearly within the bounds of moderation to leave the total exodus a range between 300,000 and 350,000." To trace the effect upon their native country of this disastrous measure, except very briefly, lies beyond the scope of the work before us. The Gallican church of Bossuet and Fénelon almost ceased to exist. "The Protestants," says Jurieu, "have carried commerce with them into exile." And "the one class trained to a talent for affairs was removed from the nation." Thus, what Lord Bacon calls "the four pillars of government—religion, justice, counsel, and treasure"—were weakened, and it is no wonder that "when the storm burst upon the French monarchy a century later" it fell.

Mr. Poole's style is somewhat harsh, and at times disfigured by certain mannerisms. From the very nature of his subject the narrative is disconnected, but there is an appearance of notes made while reading having been embodied unchanged in the text. The spelling of well-known names in this fashion—"Zuerich," "Wuerttemberg," "Tsar," and "stadhouder"—seems like an affectation of precise scholarship. At the foot of each page is a copious array of references to authorities. The essay, as a whole, is more German than English in its methods of treatment, as well as in the exhaustive research displayed.

Introduction to Latin Prose Composition. Revised and enlarged, with introductory exercises on elementary constructions, by William F. Allen, Professor in the University of Wisconsin. (Boston: Ginn & Heath. 1880. 12mo, pp. vii.-181.)—A second edition of a small Latin text-book is usually entitled to no special notice, but the new edition of Prof. Allen's 'Introduction to Latin Prose Composition' is in some respects exceptional. The first edition was published about ten years ago. The present edition has been enlarged so as to include the more elementary constructions of Latin syntax, and the whole work revised. This addition and revision have been executed by the Rev. J. H. Allen, a brother of the author, and Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Harvard University. He has been assisted by Mr. John Tetlow, Master of the Girls' Latin School in Boston, and their joint labors have been subjected to the criticism of Prof. Peck, of Cornell University. It is seldom that so much learning, experience, and intellectual ability are brought to bear in the construction of an elementary text-book.

The number of persons to whom it is worth while to spend the time and labor necessary to learn to write Latin easily and fluently is very small, and is probably decreasing the world over. Latin composition is generally studied less for its own sake than as one of the best means of learning to read and appreciate the Latin authors. For this purpose the present work seems all-sufficient. For those who intend to make the Latin language a special object of study after leaving college it is, of course, what its title declares, only an introduction.

The following points seem worthy of attention. The English examples which are to be translated into Latin are themselves translations from passages actually occurring in the Latin authors. Experience unmistakably testifies to the advantages of this plan in an elementary work. The constant, even minute, references to the grammar accustom the student to solve difficulties by the application of general principles. The references are to the grammar of Messrs. Allen and Greenough, but accompanying every one there is, in a parenthesis, a reference to the grammars of Prof. Gildersleeve and of Prof. Harkness; the work is thus rendered equally convenient to those who have any one of the three grammars. Those who have access to them all will find it worth the trouble to compare the different ways in which the same matters are viewed and stated by these accomplished Latin scholars. The best thing those students who have none of these grammars can do, irrespective of the use of the present work, is to get one as soon as possible. Lastly, but not least,

Prof. Allen says "he has made the experiment of marking the long vowels in the Latin words employed." This is a matter of more importance than even Prof. Allen himself is perhaps aware. There is no doubt that if the pronunciation of Latin prose is properly taught—a point to which the marking of every long vowel is indispensable—the proper method of reading Latin poetry comes almost of itself, and the greater part of the stuff with which learners are tormented, under the name of prosody, may be dismissed at once as mere rubbish. This is not, as Prof. Allen seems to think, an experiment. The marking of the long vowels was systematically carried out several years ago in the text-books of Prof. Morris, now of the Johns Hopkins University.

We suggest to Prof. Allen the propriety of publishing, for the use of teachers, a key to his exercises. We have no room to discuss the question, but long observation and experience lead us to think that the advantages altogether outweigh the objections.

Saint-Simon. By Clifton W. Collins, M.A. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1880. 16mo, pp. 216.)—This is a brief summary of the memoirs of Saint-Simon, or of the fragment of them thus far published (in Chéruel's edition), with biographical and other comment by the editor. The book is a reprint of the latest number in Mrs. Oliphant's 'Foreign Classics for English Readers,' and in deference to her taste Mr. Collins has excluded the more piquant passages of the original memoirs. One need not complain of this; the serious fault of Mr. Collins's work is that it shows little real knowledge of the time or of the man described. He blames, for instance, the elaborate minuteness of Saint-Simon's genealogies, complaining that the old duke "takes a singular delight in tracing the exact family history and relationship of nearly every personage he mentions," which is to measure the ideas of a time when a title of nobility meant much with the ideas of a time when it means little; and he calls the famous "affaire du bonnet," Saint-Simon's long vexation—the question whether the president, when he addressed the peers in parliament, should wear his cap on his head or place it before him on the table—"only a trivial question of etiquette." It is like calling the approaching deluge only a shower. The critic who misconceives like this the data and the tendency of history and of historical studies is scarcely the writer who will speak to advantage of the times of Saint-Simon. Of Saint-Simon as an individual two sentences translated by Mr. Collins from Sainte-Beuve tell us, though mainly pictorial in their effect, more than pages of Mr. Collins's own commentary: "Do not repent, Frenchmen, of having had among you in the heart of court life at Versailles, and ever on the track of the human quarry, this little duke with the piercing eye, cruel, insatiable, always on the chase, ferreting about, present everywhere, swooping on his prey, and laying waste on all sides. Thanks to him, a Tacitus with natural humor and with unbridled fancy, we have nothing to envy in the earlier writer." It is to be added that Mr. Collins's translation, generally good and spirited, is sometimes careless, as where he renders roseau as "rosewood," a blunder from which the knowledge either of Pascal's pensée, "Le Roseau pensant," or of Mr. Bayle St. John's partial translation of Saint-Simon's memoirs, might have saved him. Readers of a recent letter on "The Manuscripts of Saint-Simon" (Nation, June 3, 1880) will be interested in Mr. Collins's statement that those manuscripts fill two hundred and sixty-six volumes and portfolios, of which hardly more than a tenth part has yet been published.

MLLE. BERNHARDT AS GILBERTE AND MARGUERITE.

MLLE. BERNHARDT'S selections, since "Adrienne Lecouvreur," have been "Froufrou" and "La Dame aux Camélias." The choice was at once business-like and humble. It would have been by no means hard for an actress of her style and physique to have kept up public interest on the line of discussion as to whether or not she was another Rachel, and to have stepped into a place in the Rachel legend almost without a sense of change. America, which has long been collating all sorts of notorieties from abroad in a spirit of collectorship, would be very willing to consider an actress who should adhere to Racine, a writer whom it knows nothing about and respects. To appear very visionarily and impalpably, to imitate statuary and expire every night in parts from the French-Greek drama, to come only once and die of an American cold, is the career of a heroine in this peculiar mythology. The part was waiting for Mlle. Bernhardt, if she had been willing to assume it. To take the lower place almost at once in mere dramas of disease, dramas which make "Adrienne" appear like a classic by contrast, was very human, very modest. It was modest because there are inherent dramatic vices in both the more modern plays which frustrate the best efforts of the artist to personate an interesting and sympathetic character.

In "Froufrou" the dramatist makes his heroine work up an elaborate quarrel with a faultless sister, without providing the ghost of a pretext, merely to start a couple of extra acts, thus reducing to nothing the fine intuitive sense of things which she displays in the rest of the piece, and making the actress's efforts to express native tact and intuition a derision. As for Marguerite, of all the characters who have sawed perpetually on one string, without the ghost of intelligence, and have produced effect by constant pressure on an auditor's nerves instead of by stimulating and inspiring him, she is the most vapidly intolerable. The thinness of motif, the want of relief, in both book and play, are as little as possible to Dumas's credit; iteration is all the emphasis he has learned. Accordingly, the actress's best-directed efforts to play at delicate feelings or perceptions were very much thrown away. Gilberte's exquisite intelligence, her flashes of discernment, her declaration to her sister that she proposes to keep her faults of character, her correction of the statement of the proposed appointment from "ambassador" to "ambassadress," her selfishness as of a blameless and consistent product of nature, her quick objection to a duel on her account which would for ever tarnish the naïf prettiness of her character—all these delicate hits, which Mlle. Bernhardt delivered with precision and relish, were made as nothing because the character of Gilberte is forced into a gawky fraternal quarrel whose attitude on her part would have been impossible to her nature. After that quarrel—which the actress made a superb separate success, playing for the moment an independent rôle, and leaving on the mind an ineffaceable image of the hissing, serpentine, voluble victim—the part became a blemished ideal, and sympathy with Gilberte, here misconceiving things so stupidly, and elsewhere conceiving everything with flashes of tact, was lost. So with Marguerite Gautier, there is a fonds of self-consciousness, of posing as a victim, of harping on disadvantages, in the conception, which made it quite labor wasted for the actress to receive her lover's father as sweetly as a pastoral ingénue, to entertain her guests with the good-heartedness of a housekeeper and the caprices of a kitten, to die like a saint. The story is patched with traits foreign to its tissue, and it was necessary to rub one's eyes and convince one's self that the same person was still treading the boards, when the dramatist made the most contrary rôles thus into one.

Mlle. Bernhardt shows all the time the most fascinating sense of manners, of behavior in exigencies. In Marguerite, her way of listening to the doctor's aside which delivers her death-sentence, while busily writing a feminine billet, was perfection: so was her insult to Varville, who has computed his visits foolishly—"Vous ne dites jamais que des bêtises"; this was not thrown at the interlocutor, but delivered in the lowest, most rapid tones of self-reflection, as if the observation were forced by circumstances, and as if she half-hoped the other would not hear. Sometimes the style was a little more pronounced, as with Gilberte burying her chin in her fists, immersing herself in her book, and saying "Je vous écoute" to her husband. These sketches of manners, as important to our century as the illustrations of Restif de la Bretonne to a past one, were not unmixed with inspirations, the great moments of the artist, which were so rich and deep as almost to efface all minor impressions. The scene with the elder Duval, in Dumas's play, was such a masterpiece of pure pathos as has seldom been seen on our stage; the pity it evokes is stainless, is separate from the character, and does the heart good; it is femininity revealed. The quarrel-scene with the sister in "Froufrou" was equally great, as a piece of concentration; the boiling-up of hot, thin, fine-cut words had a brilliant air of spontaneity. It was not like a rôle studied, but like an impromptu shot at a mark and hitting. The death-scenes of the two characters were not unlike, and were models of pathetic grace. A painful company, of the sort of outre mer inane we have been accustomed to with Salvini and Ristori, endeavored to annul the labors of the star.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1880.

The Week.

THE Times, after a week's effort, has withdrawn the Grant subscription from the public gaze. It never reached $15,000 of the proposed $250,000, and the greater part of this was made up of a few large donations from rich men. The popular end of the movement has been lamentably small—the gifts of ten dollars and under amounting in all to $120 only. One dollar and a half seem to have come from children with more pocket-money than was good for them. The reason of this is obvious enough. General Grant cultivates and associates with rich men mainly, and appears to value them mainly for their wealth, and plain people with but little money are therefore disposed to think that the rich men, if he needs pecuniary assistance, will take care of him. He is just now engaged in a Mexican railroad enterprise, of which the two principal promoters are Mr. Jay Gould and Mr. Russell Sage. No one whom these eminent men find useful ever suffers from want of money, and we may be sure that as long as he is in their hands they will see that his needs are satisfied. We trust that his other friends have no further humiliations in store for him; a greater one than this last attempt to raise a subscription for him they could hardly have devised. It is the more deplorable because he has as a soldier solid claims on the gratitude of the country which the country, as is well known, is fully prepared to meet. Mr. William E. Chandler has, in a recent letter to the Tribune, called attention to the fact that there would have been no difficulty in getting a bill through Congress in May, 1878, putting him on the retired list of the Army with the rank of general, and a salary of $17,500, had it not been opposed by "some of his most devoted and conspicuous friends." The reason was, of course, that they wanted him for "politics." Now, the people, in the clearest manner by the elections of 1874 and 1876, signified that they had had enough of him in politics. The Republican party has signified the same thing in the Chicago Convention, for it must be remembered that the famous band of 306 who stuck to him in that body was mainly composed of Southern delegates of both colors, who could have given him no votes if he had been nominated, and whose opinions on public questions are naturally regulated by their personal necessities. If he needs money, therefore, and wishes to preserve the hold on popular respect and gratitude given him by the war, all he has to do is to take the well-paid military rank which Congress, we feel sure, is still ready to bestow on him, and quit politics for ever. He is steadily frittering his fame away by allowing the impression to sink into the popular mind that he is letting himself be used by political and financial speculators and adventurers.

We believe that the use to which Messrs. Jay Gould and Russell Sage propose to put him is to make him president of a great Mexican railroad combination, and the former is so much in earnest that he would have subscribed $200,000 to the Grant fund if it had been thought prudent to accept such a sum from such a source. But the moral stomachs of the General's friends, strong as they are, do not appear to have been strong enough for this. They may be even now bracing themselves up with tonics, for all we know. The subscription scheme was weighted from the outset by the fact that it was started by one newspaper. This at once brought it into disfavor with all the others, and even exposed it to the shafts of their ridicule. It ought to have been started by a committee and communicated to all the Grant newspapers on the same day, and then a competition might have sprung up amongst them as to which should rake in the most money. It might have been stimulated, too, by secret promises of consulships, post-traderships, appraiserships, and store-keeperships in 1884.

If we must concern ourselves with the fate of our ex-Presidents there is another class of past officials who make a similar appeal to our sympathies: we mean the heads of departments. Whether they have been taken from political or professional life it is often extremely difficult for them to recover the ground lost in four years' absence from the current; their places have been filled, and their clients or constituents have put their trusts into other hands. Foreign missions cannot always be provided for them, and in a reformed civil service would be hardly more exposed to "rotation" than domestic offices. If representation by districts were abolished such men might hope to recover speedily their political standing at least. As it is, acceptance of a seat in the Cabinet often, if not generally, means for them a deliberate sacrifice of the future. Secretary Sherman will, or probably may, be one of the disengaged after more than a quarter of a century's steady devotion to public affairs. General Garfield's timely elevation from Senator-elect to President-elect seemed to open the way providentially for Mr. Sherman's return to the body which he quitted for the Treasury. On personal and on public grounds it should be a gratification to see him re-elected by the Legislature of Ohio. He has, with his usual frankness, announced his candidacy, but is met by the objection that he has had a monopoly long enough, and by a fresh crop of stories like those by which it was sought to prevent his nomination at Chicago.

There happens to be an unusual number of Senatorial aspirants, and it cannot be said that they make a very reputable array. Some of them stand in the line of promotion from State Boss; some are blatant members of the Lower House who, without Mr. Blaine's experience in managing the Machine, would bring to the Senate the same aptitude for violating the traditions and proprieties of that body; and in general the scramble decidedly implies a prevailing belief in a revival of the Senatorial Group. Mr. Wheeler, in modest fashion, indicates his willingness to be complimented with a seat in the Senate from New York, but we are told that his open opposition to the nomination of Gov. Cornell has sealed his chances; he cannot be "Conkling's man." If we are to have Conkling's man, by the way, we must resign ourselves to a Conkling group, of which Vice-President Arthur will be the third constituent. All this shows that somehow the Bosses are confident that Mr. Hayes's successor is going to hold a different attitude towards them, and it would be worth Gen. Garfield's while to enquire what is the basis for such encouragement, and whether, if there be any ground for it, it is altogether creditable to himself. The talk about a "bargain" at Mentor, during the Conkling-Grant visit, has, after all, less significance than the signs of hopeful activity in the corrupt leadership of the Republican party; for these must mean that Gen. Garfield's character has been "discounted." We remark that the Massachusetts senatorship is, in accordance with a respectable custom, likely to abide with Mr. Dawes, who, as if dropping an anchor to windward (we do not mean of the President-elect but of public sentiment), has lately declared himself, in a speech, in favor of civil-service reform.

The week witnessed a revival of speculation in many articles of merchandise as well as at the Stock Exchange. United States bonds advanced to 112½ for the 4 per cents, or to a price which yields the buyer only a trifle more than 3¼ per cent. on his investment. Railroad bonds advanced ½ to 6¾ per cent., and stocks which are speculated in advanced 1½ to 17 points, the rise being led by the better class of stocks on which dividends have been regularly paid for years. All that is surprising about the revival of speculation and the advance in prices is that it should occur at a time when the banks are fully expanded, and at a season when each week, so far as domestic influences are concerned, reduces their lending facilities. The imports of specie are larger than a few weeks ago, but they are not yet sufficient to replace in the loan market the drafts upon it by reason of the payments into the Treasury, and the shipments of money to the South and West. The speculation may be said to be anticipatory of a great accumulation of money here early in the new year, of a very large demand from Europe for American securities, and of a reduction of the rate of interest, by refunding, on more than $600,000,000 of the public debt to 3½ and possibly 3 per cent. per annum. All these favorable events can be reasonably calculated on as likely to occur in the not remote future; and yet the interval is sufficient to permit of a reaction amounting to a panic. On this account conservative holders of securities have, as a rule, been sellers of stocks at the advanced prices, while speculators have been the chief buyers. The price of silver bullion in London declined to 51⅝*d.* per ounce, and the bullion value here of the "buzzard dollar" fell to $0.8623.

There could hardly be a better illustration of the way the best settled maxims of government are sometimes disregarded in the administration of Federal affairs at the South than the case of Deputy-Collector Lanier, of Louisiana. One of these maxims is that when you have to deal with a turbulent or disaffected population you should employ agents, and especially tax-collecting agents, who will have nothing specially provocative about them—that is, nothing to rouse hostility beyond the fearless performance of their duty. This man Lanier is, however, we believe, an old defaulter of the State service; he is also editor of a Radical newspaper, and has been running for Congress, and, we presume, "working" vigorously as an agitator in his district. The result is, as he pitifully writes to Washington, that he is "now a prisoner in his own house, and dare not go out for fear of assassination," and "finds it necessary to leave the collection district to secure his personal safety." "Please advise me," he adds, "what to do in the premises." The advice Commissioner Raum ought to give him is to resign and attend exclusively to his newspaper and his political work. Instead of this, however, he has sent him an armed guard from New Orleans to go about with him on his collection trips, like the Irish constabulary with the landlords and process-servers. It may save some Stalwart the trouble of writing us a letter accusing us of sympathizing with bulldozers and Red-shirts, to say that we are in favor of enforcing the law at the South with every kind of weapon known to modern warfare; but we hold that the officers of the law ought first to be selected simply for their official duty, and that the more difficulty they are likely to encounter in the discharge of this duty, from the character of the population they have to deal with, the more careful should the selection be. Lanier, on his own showing, is an unfit person for his office. An editor of a newspaper and working politician has no business to be a collector of revenue in a disturbed district.

Some Stalwart papers are angry because we have appeared to share in General Schofield's apprehension that the standards at West Point would be lowered in ordered to help colored boys to get through. Now, we assert that it is literally true that the standards have been lowered by some form of indulgence in order to help the eleven colored cadets to graduate, and that Whittaker, too, has enjoyed favors which would not have been accorded to a white boy. Since he left the Academy a petition has already been signed by ministers and others in this city asking the President to put him back, although his inability to pass the examination has been fully ascertained. This has all grown out of the anxiety of the Republican party to have the negro justify the sacrifices made on his behalf and the expectations excited about him. The motive is praiseworthy, but the means resorted to are not defensible. The Government has no right, either at West Point or anywhere else, to mix philanthropy with business. West Point is a scientific school for the training of experts for the public service, and it is as much an abuse of a public trust to use it for missionary or reformatory purposes, as it would be to give some of the funds of the Naval Observatory to a colored orphan asylum. One unfortunate effect of the Stalwart view of the school was only too plainly revealed in Whittaker's diary, where he denounced the professors who gave him low marks as enemies of his race, and treated himself as a martyr whenever he broke down in his recitations.

The consensus of the Buffalo Courier, the New York World, the Louisville Courier-Journal, and perhaps other Democratic journals, in recommending the majority in Congress at the coming session to take up and enact civil-service reform, might lead to something if Mr. Hayes should dextrously pave the way in his forthcoming message, and if the South were ready to seize this opportunity, while still acting with the Democratic party, of demonstrating their interest in legislation which concerns all sections alike. The Southern press made the most of Mr. Garfield's defection from the principles of reform in his letter of acceptance, and used it as an argument for the hopelessness of any improvement in the Federal officers at the South under his Administration. Their representatives in Congress now have it in their power to forestall his accession, and to bind him and the succeeding Republican Congress to a system making capacity and fidelity the tests of admission to and tenure in office. One result of this would be the immediate emancipation of the Federal office-holders from forced assessments. Four years hence they could not be counted upon at all for the sinews of the campaign; so that, viewed merely as a stroke of party policy, the reform commends itself to the outgoing majority. It would, of course, challenge the support of an influential portion of Republicans in Congress, and of President Hayes. Moreover, it would be the beginning of a new "record," of which the Democratic party stands so sorely in need; and something would have been done to offset resumption or any other trump-card of its opponents.

An independent Republican organization in Auburn, N. Y., the Young Men's Garfield and Arthur Club, formed in spite of the opposition of the ring politicians of the county, and having a large membership, had much to do with the success of the Republican ticket in that city. Encouraged by its performances, it has within a fortnight adopted a permanent organization on a somewhat novel basis. Its object, according to the constitution, is "to provide mental instruction on questions of public policy," to sustain the principles of the Republican party, to preserve the purity of the caucuses, and to make incessant war on the Machine—i.e., "those who would use its [the party's] name to subserve personal and selfish purposes." To this end the members pledge themselves to attend caucuses, and no public officer is permitted to be president of the club; which is carrying out President Hayes's "executive order." For the purpose of mental instruction it is proposed to have assembly rooms with reading-room and library attached, and to provide for lectures by prominent politicians of the better sort. Already nearly 700 members have been enrolled in Auburn alone, and the county will be well represented too. In Rochester, as we are informed, a similar organization has grown out of the Young Men's Lincoln Club, a very influential body.

The report of the United States Treasurer shows that of nearly $73,000,000 standard silver dollars coined since 1878 only 34 per cent. has gone into circulation. Over $47,000,000 are in the Treasury vaults. It will be one of the first and most pressing duties of Congress to deal with this state of things. The hopes which the bi-metallists have been trying to keep alive, that the nations of Europe would come to the rescue and help us out of the silver difficulty, are now substantially given up, if, indeed, there was ever anything substantial about them. Every now and then there comes a rumor that Germany is going back to bi-metallism, but it is almost immediately followed by an emphatic denial from the men in authority. The experience of France in trying to be bi-metallic is at this moment very instructive. She is steadily losing her stock of gold in spite of all efforts to prevent it. Within the past few months she has lost about $50,000,000, although it was hoped that the drain would be stopped by ceasing to coin silver. A month ago the plan of raising the rate of interest at the Bank of France was tried, but the result is that the bank instead of gaining gold has gained silver, of which it has already an enormous stock. Frenchmen who have payments to make in mono-metallic countries make them in gold, because silver will not be received, and then lately it is said, as the stock of gold has been visibly diminishing, people have begun to draw on it, even when they do not need it for transmission abroad, fearing that it may before long disappear altogether. Another rise in the bank rate is now looked for, and in Europe it is believed that a sharp struggle for the gold between England, France, and this country is impending.

One of the cries against the South with which the Republicans opened the late canvass was that there were great frauds committed in taking the present census in the Southern States, with the view of increasing or maintaining the Southern representation under the coming apportionment. A good deal was made of this charge both by newspapers and orators, on the plausible ground that the increase reported in South Carolina over the census of 1870 was simply impossible. General Walker thereupon probed the matter to the bottom, by having the enumeration made over again in the suspected districts, and made the unpleasant covery that it was the census of 1870 which was defective. It was taken by the carpet-bag government, whose officers, in this as in most other things, pocketed the money and did not do the work. Some of the Stalwart Senators in Washington cannot bear this, however. They had settled that à priori the South must have cheated in the census, whatever the figures may say, and they have persuaded the President to have still another careful enumeration made by persons in whom they have confidence. Mr. Wallace, the United States Marshal for South Carolina, first raised the cry of fraud, but has since acknowledged his error; but this produces no impression on the Stalwart mind. If this last count should reveal nothing wrong, the condition of this mind, which in all that relates to the South is a very peculiar organ, will be really pitiable.

We print on another page, as an answer to numerous letters of enquiry, the constitution and a list of officers of the reorganized Civil-Service Reform Association. It will be seen that ample precautions have been taken both in the constitution and in the composition of the executive committee against any partisan use of the association. Copies of the constitution will, we are informed, be sent to any one applying for them to the secretary. The annual dues are low enough to enable even those of very limited means to give some help to the undertaking, but those who are more fortunate will remember that larger donations can, and we feel sure will, be turned to good account. The work of the association, too, has equally strong claims upon those in both parties who think that the country ought to be governed by the unbiassed opinion of the majority of the voters. Civil-service reform aims at removing one of the greatest obstacles to the free play of this opinion on the Government, and this is something which every honest man of both parties must desire, and will desire the more earnestly the more importance he attaches to his own views of public policy. But civil-service reform cannot, any more than anything else, be forced on the public. Unless it is the product of clear comprehension, brought about by thorough discussion, it will either prove defective or will not last. This discussion the Association proposes to start and keep going.

There is nothing new in the condition of the Irish question. Both sides are getting ready for the prosecutions, but the interest in them is apparently very small, so completely have all political prosecutions lost their gravity. Everybody knows that, even in case of conviction, the sentences will be slight, and probably will be greatly mitigated in the execution. Moreover, the decay of eloquence at the Irish bar since the O'Connell trials in 1844 has been considerable. There is nobody who excites the same expectations as the lawyers who figured in those trials, and the defendants, except Mr. Parnell, are mostly agitators from obscure positions in life, for whom the prosecution is a distinct social gain. The most important contribution to the literature of the land question since last week is a letter to the London Daily News from Professor Thorold Rogers, the well-known English political economist and member of Parliament. He declares that he has "never met an Irishman, not an absentee or land-agent or a land-jobber or a survivor of the Protestant ascendency party," who did not affirm that "the remedy for Irish agrarian disaffection was to plant, by fair and legal means, the Irish occupier on the soil of his native country." He further declares that he has never "met any person who doubted" that the small Irish tenant was only able to pay the rent now exacted of him under competition, by the help of annual gains in England during the harvest; that he "has invariably found on enquiry" that if the Irish land-owners had made in 1878 and 1879 such reductions of rent as were made by English land-owners, "no one would have heard of Mr. Parnell or his Land League as serious political difficulties"; that he has never heard it "seriously denied" that in the vast majority of cases in Ireland improvements are made by the tenants, and that under these circumstances to exact competitive rents is "tyranny and robbery," and that the maintenance of the Irish constabulary out of the imperial exchequer is, under these circumstances, complicity with wrong-doing; that "he would be surprised to hear that during the last two disastrous years Irish landlords have not received a larger percentage in the rental of agricultural land than the English landowners have." He then points out in strong language the justification given to Mr. Parnell's assertion that Irish questions can get no justice from an English Parliament, by the contemptuous rejection by the Lords of the three Irish bills of last session, two of them—the Limitation of Costs Bill and the Irish County Registration Bill—"without a shadow of an excuse."

What is to be done or whether anything is to be done in the matter of coercive measures is still a matter of uncertainty. The Radical wing of the Cabinet, represented by Mr. Bright and Mr. Chamberlain, are known to be opposed to any extraordinary repressive legislation, and are prepared to bring in and pass the proposed land bill, even in the presence of the disturbances and outrages. The Tories, therefore, who have all along insisted that the Liberal party was made up of two hostile and irreconcilable camps, will have it that the inevitable split is to come now from the Irish question, and rumors to this effect are constantly set afloat every week. There does not appear, however, to be much foundation, if any foundation, for them. Mr. Forster, though looking to coercion as a possibility, seems disposed to compromise with his Radical colleagues by holding off as long as possible, and trying whether the ordinary process of law will not do the work of pacification, or, at least, do it sufficiently. One of the best signs of the times for Ireland is, that the Radical English constituencies seem for the first time ready to treat Irish grievances as popular grievances, which English Liberals should make their own. Whether this is or is not owing to the fact that many of these constituencies contain a large Irish vote, it is for Ireland an important and encouraging phenomenon.

There has been a very singular debate in the Prussian Parliament on a petition, signed by various eminent and influential men, praying for the exclusion of the Jews from office and the infliction of other disabilities. The movement is said to have been got up by Herr Stoecker, one of the Court chaplains, and to have had lately more or less of Prince Bismarck's sympathy. The principal charge against the Jews is the old one of spoiling the Christians by stock-jobbing and usury, but the whole string of charges produced by Professor Treitschke in his pamphlet is freely used. The real trouble is that the Jews, owing to various conditions both of life and character, are beating the Christians badly in pursuits which the Christians have only taken up with eagerness within the last twenty years. As long as Germany was not a great commercial and stock-dealing country the financial success of the Jews excited no apprehension. The Emperor is said to side strongly with the Israelites, and we presume they have nothing worse than abuse to fear.

The French are busy reforming their magistracy, which has ever since the "Seize Mai" been a sore subject with the Republicans of the Left. The hostility of large numbers of the judges to the Republic seemed to make many changes necessary, but how to make them without attacking the principle of irremovability was the question. The Assembly has now taken the bull by the horns, and has suspended the irremovability rule for one year, during which, of course, the disaffected or ill-affected judges will be got rid of. So strong does the feeling against the bench as at present constituted seem to be that there was a heavy and nearly successful vote in favor of making the judges elective by universal suffrage, on the American plan. The explanation of this is to be found in the fact that the mode of appointing and promoting French judges trains them in subservience to the Government, in spite of the fixity of their tenure. They are not taken, as here and in England, from the prominent members of the bar. Judging is a profession to itself, which a man enters young and in the lower grades, which are wretchedly paid, and he is then promoted if he finds favor with the appointing power. Long before he reaches the upper courts he is apt to have acquired habits of servility which his irremovability only makes the more obnoxious and dangerous. That the bench has not heartily accepted the Republic must be ascribed to the monarchical traditions in which most of the judges have grown up, the Conservative temper of the profession, and to disbelief in the durability of the new régime. But the suspension of the irremovability must be considered a most dangerous weapon. It has not hitherto been resorted to after any of the recent revolutions. That it will be in any future revolutions appears very sure.

THE ART OF CABINET MAKING.

THE Washington correspondent of the Herald, in giving some account of the speculations current in that city about Mr. Garfield's Cabinet, describes the three kinds of cabinets which he may form. He may, it is said, as a recognition of the hostility to "a change" expressed by the election, keep President Hayes's Cabinet. Or he may follow the old rule, which Mr. Lincoln followed, of surrounding himself with the most prominent competitors of his own party, with more or less reference to the claims of locality. Or he may adopt General Grant's plan, and choose persons to whom he himself takes a fancy, without regard to their political or other standing. As regards the first of these suggestions, the objection to it is that it would make certain a prolongation of that hostility to the Administration on the part of the more prominent Republican politicians and managers to which Mr. Hayes has been exposed ever since he took office. Mr. Garfield will probably shrink from this, and not unnaturally. Moreover, he will, if he seeks to make a mark of any kind on affairs during his Administration, wish to select his own advisers, and this he may do even if he intends to follow the lines of policy laid down by his predecessor. The third plan is hardly worth discussion. It was unique; nobody has a word to say for it, and it is not likely to be tried again.

The second is the one Mr. Garfield is most likely to follow, or try to follow, and the one which may be most easily defended. It not only has precedent on its side, but it seems a logical result of the theory which has now been long accepted in the working of this Government—that the President is the head or leader of his party and not a mere executive officer, like a constitutional monarch, raised above parties. Being the head of his party, he may fairly be expected to make up his cabinet as an English Prime Minister makes it up, from among those who have been most prominent and active in the party management. This theory, it is true, cannot always be made to square with the facts. The nominee of the party for the Presidency is by no means always its most prominent politician. In fact, in the history of the Republican party, no selection of this personage for the Presidency has ever taken place. Neither General Fremont, nor Mr. Lincoln, nor General Grant, nor Mr. Hayes was the foremost statesman or leader of the party when elected. Only one of them, Mr. Lincoln, ever attained the position of the real head of a party—that is, of a man who could, if he chose, originate and carry through legislation. He was the only President of the Republican party whose recommendations the majority in Congress heeded and carried out, or tried to carry out. He did, however, in making up his Cabinet from his competitors for the Presidency, surround himself with men who had either been prominent in furnishing, enforcing, and spreading the ideas on which the party was built up, or in putting its policy into execution. The expediency of giving Seward and Chase, for instance, the chief places as his advisers lay in the fact not that their nomination had been talked of or voted for in the convention, but that they had been largely instrumental in forming and diffusing the opinions which finally brought the party into power, and were, therefore, presumably the best men to assist in converting these opinions into action. And this is unquestionably the true rule of cabinet making. A President has to ask himself when he takes office, first, what it is the party which has put him in possession of the Government seeks to accomplish, and then, who are the men who have been most active and successful in bringing the party to desire and strive for this thing. The fact that a man has been much voted for at the convention may mean little or nothing. It may be due to a mere accident, or may be the result of a "boom" prepared by the now familiar process of packing caucuses. It furnishes of itself no indication, or at most only a very faint one, of his real value and fitness as a counsellor.

This view of the proper composition of a cabinet has been greatly obscured, if not destroyed, since Lincoln's day by circumstances in the party's history with which everybody is familiar. Up to the passage of the reconstruction measures the Republican party was a moving body. It started to prevent the extension of slavery to the Territories. It found its attempt to accomplish this by legislation foiled by the Southern revolt. It then set to work, still following the line it had traced out for itself from the beginning, to carry the war to a triumphant conclusion, and, this done, to restore in some shape or other civil government in the territory which the war had placed at its disposal. Through all these transactions there was no difference of opinion in the party ranks on the question of party responsibility and the duty of party action. There was difference of opinion as to the mode of reconstruction, but none as to whether the party was not bound to act in the matter of reconstruction. No one in the party denied that the party was obliged not simply to reign, but to govern—or, in other words, to put its ideas into legislation and administration. Since the work of reconstruction was finished there has been, however, a gradual but steady decrease of the party momentum. Indeed, for the last ten years it may be said to have ceased. The only really important piece of work the party has accomplished has been the return to specie payments, and we all know that this was by no means accomplished by resolute and fixed design, but rather by a sort of drift and the concurrence of several happy accidents. There has been great division of party sentiment about the duty of resuming at all, and greater still about the expediency of resuming soon. In 1868 the party, in fact, began to "point with pride," but always backward, and this, in a party no less than in a man, is a sign that its natural force is abating, that it begins to shrink from action. It began at the same time to maintain that the only duty that could now be fairly expected of it was the duty of keeping the Democrats and the South out of power, and its newspapers and orators devoted themselves almost exclusively to descriptions of the evils which would result from their advent to power. Under these circumstances the work of party leaders naturally and rapidly became the work, not of originating and disseminating ideas and embodying them in legislative acts, but of distributing offices in such manner as to make it difficult for the Opposition to win elections. This work has accordingly created and brought to the front, by the usual process of natural selection, a group of statesmen who are skilled in it and familiar with it, and who make it their chief business—men who save their country not by planning great measures, but by the judicious officering of custom-houses and post-offices and the withdrawal from nominating conventions of the function of deliberation. They no more resemble the material from which Lincoln drew his Cabinet than Napoleon's marshals, who, old and rich and war-worn, forced him to make peace in 1814, resembled the same men when they followed him in all the fire of youth into Italy in 1796. The inventiveness, the enterprise, the faith, the ardor, the unconquerable determination are all gone. The interest in questions on which party action is possible is gone too, and in its place has come a sort of mock fury about things which are nearly as far removed from the sphere of governmental control—such as the condition of Southern character, both black and white—as the climate of Jupiter.

We may easily illustrate this from the history of Mr. Hayes's Administration. If we were to consult one of the Republican politicians who are now most prominent in the party management as to the character of this Administration, we should get from his criticisms in five minutes a most instructive explanation of the change which has come over the ideas of statesmanship entertained by some Republicans. He would tell us at once that it is the feeblest Administration known in American history, that it has been a total failure, that Mr. Hayes is going out of office amid general contempt, and that Mr. Garfield will be warned by his "fate."

If we ask him in what Mr. Hayes's failure has consisted, he will admit that he has faithfully executed the laws now on the statute-book; that he has made all the recommendations to Congress which the state of the country seemed to call for, or which his party expected him to make; that he has vetoed all bills which he ought to have vetoed, or which the united party expected him to veto; that he has made no treaty by which any national interest was sacrificed or the national pride wounded, and has not failed to make any treaty which could be made and which the national welfare and security plainly called for; that he has not tolerated jobbery and corruption, so far as is known, in any department of the Government; and that he has not abused the pardoning power. When all these admissions are made it seems as if Mr. Hayes had done his whole duty under the Constitution and was a great success. But our politician will go on to say that, in spite of all this, he has betrayed and weakened the party, and if we press him for particulars, will tell us that Mr. Hayes has not taken the party leaders into his confidence, or consulted their wishes in the distribution of the offices. So that, after a little sifting and analysis, we get down to the fact that leading Republican politicians in our time look on a fair distribution of the offices among senators and representatives as the chief duty of the President; and that the party is an instrumentality not for promoting legislation, as it was in the beginning, but for procuring offices for distribution. The plain truth is that neither Mr. Conkling, Mr. Blaine, Mr. Logan, nor Mr. Cameron has anything against Mr. Hayes, except that his distribution of the offices was not to their liking. They do not allege that the actual incumbents have not done their legal duty; they simply say that they were not selected by them, and that, inasmuch as they were not, Mr. Hayes's Administration, whatever it may have done for the country at large, must be considered a failure, and Mr. Hayes's "fate" as conveying a most impressive lesson to all who come after him.

There is one other illustration of the change which is, perhaps, still more pointed. It would in 1860 have excited great surprise if announced that Mr. Chase or Mr. Seward or Mr. Sumner or Mr. Fessenden did not care to enter the Cabinet himself; that all he asked was to be allowed to "name" some one to sit in it as in some sort his representative. This surprise would have been still further increased if it had been ascertained that the person he wished to "name" was not a man of his own standing, who shared his opinions and who had shared his labors, but a "worker" or "henchman" who attended to his local electioneering business for him, and that his object in wishing to put him in his Cabinet was not to furnish the President with a counsellor, but to have some one at headquarters to let his chief know all that was going on and to see that when the spoils were being divided he got his fair share. Yet this phenomenon, which would have been considered so extraordinary twenty years ago, we are witnessing to-day without any wonder at all. In 1876 party managers first began to demand Cabinet positions for their own henchmen, and in doing so perhaps gave the finishing touch to the "spoils system." At this moment we read in the speculations about the Cabinet, and without either surprise or indignation, that Mr. Conkling does not want a seat in the Cabinet for himself, but will insist on "Tom" Platt getting the Post-office, and that Mr. Blaine, too, would sooner stay in the Senate, but will expect Mr. Eugene Hale to get the Navy Department, and so on. Of course it is not pretended that either "Tom" Platt or Mr. Eugene Hale has reached any such position in public estimation as to make his presence in the Cabinet desirable either as an adviser or administrator. His function in the Cabinet would be, first, to play the part of a standing sign of his chief's power over the President, and, secondly, to watch over his chief's interests in the matter of nominations. The chief himself would remain in the Senate, as the place in which bargains could be best consummated and "perfidy" most effectively punished.

It will thus be seen that it will not be possible for Mr. Garfield to follow the Lincoln plan, even if he desires to do so, owing to the great change in the conditions with which he will have to deal. He will have to choose at the outset whether he will be a President of the Lincoln type—that is, a real administrator occupied above all things with real problems of government; or of the Grant type—that is, a distributer of offices under the supervision of a group or committee of Senators. If he chooses the former, he will, in the existing political situation, trace out for himself a stormy career which no man should enter upon who is not satisfied that he has stomach for a prolonged fight. It is not a rôle which a peaceable or commonplace man ought to take up. But if he does choose it he will find it impossible to make up his Cabinet as Lincoln made up his. If, on the other hand, he elects to be a President of the Grant type, and resigns himself to keeping a kind of "intelligence office" through which Republican Bosses can communicate with their "workers," he will have whatever comfort comes from hearing his praises from the lips of the Bosses on every stump, and he will receive $50,000 a year, paid monthly; but this will be all.

Two or three questions, to which recent history furnishes the answer, will, if he asks them, throw a great deal of light on his path. "What do I gain beyond the friendship of the Bosses by putting 'Tom' in my Cabinet? I do not help the party, it is clear, because 'Tom' was in General Grant's Cabinet when the party lost most of the leading Republican States and nearly lost the Presidency. I do not furnish myself with any valuable assistance either in executing the laws or recommending legislation, because no one thinks 'Tom's' opinions on these subjects are of any value. I shall doubtless win the friendship and support of some leading Senators, which would be useful if I were to confine myself simply to the distribution of offices for the promotion of Senatorial interests. But would this support be of much use to me in administering the Presidency as the Constitution creates it? I think not, because I know that none of these Senators takes much if any interest in such measures or questions as should occupy my mind. What should I lose, then, by offending them? Simply what Mr. Hayes lost—their company and advice at the White House. It would be pleasanter and more comfortable to be on good terms with them, but Mr. Hayes has got on very well without their friendship; why should not I? Moreover, is 'Tom' a safe person to have in a cabinet? Would he not be constantly engaged in jobs and bargains which would bring discredit on me and the party, and lead to defeats at the polls of which I alone should have to bear the blame, inasmuch as 'Tom' would pretend that it was all due to my not having taken his advice?"

A REAL DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

THE efforts to obtain a seat in the Cabinet for the head of the abnormal executive division bearing the above title have hitherto been suspected of being intended to promote personal interests. The incoming of a new Administration furnishes an excellent opportunity to give the proposed dignity to the Department of Agriculture, while leaving the President perfectly free to dismiss or retain the present Commissioner. In what we are about to say we shall leave this consideration entirely untouched.

In 1862 Congress created a so-called Department of Agriculture, independent of all others, but without representation in the Cabinet. Its head was entitled "Commissioner of Agriculture," and its objects were "to acquire and diffuse among the people . . . useful information on subjects connected with agriculture, . . . and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants." The Commissioner was directed "to acquire and preserve . . . all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by means of books and correspondence, and by practical and scientific experiments, . . . by the collection of statistics, and by any other means within his power; to collect new and valuable seeds and plants; to test, by cultivation . . .; to propagate such as may be worthy, . . . and to distribute them among agriculturists; to make annually a general report to the President and to Congress, and special reports when required or whenever he thought the subject required them, etc." No subsequent laws have modified the general organization or scope of the Department. It will be seen that, within certain narrow limits, the Commissioner's powers to organize and equip were indefinite and unhampered except by the amount of appropriations. The salary of the Commissioner was placed at $3,000, and is still the same—that is, one-third that of the heads of other departments, one-half that of the United States Geologist, two-thirds that of the Commissioner of Patents, three-fourths that of the Commissioner of Public Lands, and three-fifths that of Congressmen. As a consequence of the meagre compensation and the inferior status of the Department men of large abilities have rarely sought the Commissionership, and even under the present improved management the Department has failed to impress Congress with its ability to cope with the enquiry for which the Entomological Commission has been independently instituted.

If it be granted that the only way to raise the standard and increase the efficiency of the Department of Agriculture is by elevating it to a secretaryship, it is difficult to imagine what objections can be raised to such a step. It may be said that for the first time a single class in the community would be represented in the Cabinet. To this the reply will be that half the population is engaged in the production of bread and meat for the food, and of cotton and wool for the clothing, of the whole people; and it is of the first importance that crop production be carried on under the most favoring circumstances, in order that the necessaries of life may be plentiful and cheap. The farm furnishes more than fifty per cent. of the raw material for all our manufactures, the greater portion of the business of railroads and water transportation and of the material of trade, especially of the foreign commerce to which our present prosperity is attributed. During the last fiscal year the total exports of the country amounted to $823,946,353. Of this vast sum, $529,944,779 represents the products of agriculture as they come from the farm, or more than five-eighths of the whole. Add $115,690,670 as the value of the raw materials in flour, provisions, timber, etc., and $8,506,038 for the farm products used in other manufactured articles, and there results the magnificent total of $654,141,487 as the proportion of our exports to be credited to agriculture, against $169,804,866 to manufactures, mines (except gold and silver), and fisheries.

The proposed enactment would be, even if it created instead of amplifying a department, less class legislation and less "paternal" than a system of foreign consulates, which is chiefly of value to commerce; than the light-house, coast-survey, marine-hospital, and life-saving service, for commerce; the signal service, of most value to commerce; the banking system, for commerce; improvement of navigation, for commerce; subsidies to steamship lines, and land-grants to railroads, for commerce. Manufactures, which employ but one-third as many of our people as does agriculture, are nurtured by Government more than in the most paternal of governments, by a gigantic system of protective tariffs and by our patent laws. In fact, the Departments of the Treasury and the Interior are, for the most part, occupied with the interests of commerce and manufactures.

Now, the protection which agriculture needs is protection from the scourge of animal diseases, which is already causing a loss of more than $300,000,000 annually; from the spread of contagious diseases like pleuro-pneumonia, which alone will cause a direct additional loss of fully $60,000,000 per year, and destroy a profitable foreign trade; from the insect hordes, which work incalculable destruction—forces quite as harmful to our industries as "foreign pauper labor" or "Chinese cheap labor." Agriculture requires in foreign consuls men of sufficient ability to examine and report upon systems and methods of cultivation, as well as upon current crops and crop prospects; a coast survey in a form of a comprehensive system of experimental stations, as in France, Germany, Austria, Russia, and Italy, for the testing of new plants and methods, and for other scientific research; a signal service which shall do for the farmer what is now done for commerce; and internal improvements looking to the saving of fertilizing material now wasted in city sewers, to the reclamation of the deserts and swamps of the West and South, and the protection of rich river-bottoms from overflow. All these things are comparatively easy of accomplishment, with the help of a well-organized and authoritative (because respected) Department of Agriculture.

We have seen what the United States Department of Agriculture is—a "department" without representation in the Government, and with many of its proper functions lodged with other departments. It is struggling hard against destructively small appropriations and consequent incapacity in a field of vast necessities, and yet its probable success in solving the great sugar problem* will eventually produce an income to the country of more than 2,000 per cent. on the total cost of the department to this date. A full department should comprise not only the present so-called Department of Agriculture, but also the Land Office, care of the public forests, and the Geological Survey. Its existing statistical, chemical, veterinary, entomological, botanical, and forestry divisions should be enlarged and organized on a substantial basis, and such means provided for their work and maintenance as would tempt scientists of ability and influence to seek their direction. A Veterinary Division is demanded of such scope as to include inspection at all important trade-centres and ports of shipment, and with power to stamp out cattle-plagues. With such an organization there need be no difficulty about the foreign trade, and the transportation of animals would cease to be the flagrant abuse it now is. A Forestry Division, with the resources of the Land Office and the authority of a Cabinet Secretary who would be interested in the subject, could easily be made of great value for the preservation and extension of our wasting forests. Several experimental farms, as above mentioned, are imperatively needed—one in the Southeast, one Southwest, one Northwest, one Central, and one Northeast.

It would also be the duty of the department, through its various stations, to experiment with a view to the production of such articles as may possibly be raised within our borders, and for which many millions of treasure are now sent out of the country, as enumerated in the following table:

Sugar (not including duty)	$85,000,000
Coffee " " "	60,000,000
Tea " " "	20,000,000
Wool, raw, " "	24,000,000
Silk, raw, " "	12,000,000
Jute, hemp, flax, etc., "	9,250,000
Breadstuffs, fruits, etc., "	13,000,000
Tobacco (not including duty)	7,500,000
Wines " " "	7,500,000
Total	$238,250,000

As the sum of our total imports is but about $670,000,000, it will be seen that herein alone is an ample field of operations for a great department, and employment for the ablest scientists of the country. We must not expect, of course, to see such a department created at once. But the first step, the elevation of the department to full rank, should be taken immediately; this is a duty which both political parties owe to the country, and which should be fulfilled for the common good without reference to party glory. The rest will follow by gravitation and natural growth, and by wise and liberal management.

BISMARCK'S FINANCIAL POLICY.

BERLIN, November, 1880.

OUR parliamentary season has been reopened by the meeting of the Prussian Diet, whose first sitting took place on October 28 without exciting much public interest. In Bismarck's absence Count Stollberg, his substitute, and a gentleman of less than ordinary ability, read a rather dull address from the throne, which was listened to almost silently by only about a hundred deputies.

The financial state of the country is the most interesting part of the Diet's business. The address in rough outlines gives the plans of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year, its views on the material development of the country, and its propositions for the best way of defraying the necessary expenses. As it was generally known that there was a deficiency in the Government's income which required a new loan, the Diet was the more surprised by the King's announcement that fourteen millions of marks (4.25 marks equal one dollar) should be devoted to the alleviation of the heavy burdens of the poorer classes by remitting one quarterly payment of their income-tax. This measure, if carried out, is to benefit those who pay taxes on a yearly income of less than 6,000 marks. These humbler taxpayers number altogether 8,843,702 souls. The lowest class, which has a yearly income of less than 420 marks, and which amounts to 3,611,287 souls, is and has been free from taxation, and consequently gains nothing. The next lowest, consisting of 2,697,365 souls, with a yearly income of from 420 to 660 marks, will be relieved by 21 pfennigs (a pfennig is the hundredth part of a mark), or 5 cents, per head; and of the third lowest class, numbering 1,074,893 souls, each will pay 41 pfennigs (10 cents) less for the next year. Thus, 7,583,485 out of 8,843,702 (in a total population of 25,000,000) will derive a very insignificant advantage, if any, from the proposed reduction. Even the highest class, composed of only 10,483 taxpayers, with a yearly income of 6,000 marks, will gain but 11.20 marks—about $2 50 per head.

The reason for the ministers inserting this fine promise into the King's address is rather perspicuous. It was intended to make a favorable impression on the popular mind; it was to prove that the new financial policy of 1878, based on indirect taxes, has been attended with so much success that the Government can afford to make a moderate reduction in the amount of the direct taxes for the present, and a more considerable one if the plans of the Chancellor shall be adopted. Will the poor man swallow this bait? If he has not forgotten the first elements of arithmetic he will reach a conclusion the reverse of what is expected of him. What do 5 pfennigs', what does even a mark's abatement of direct taxes mean, when by the new tariff he is compelled to pay 25 pfennigs more for every hundred weight of rye, 5 pfennigs for every pound of American lard, 6 pfennigs for every pound of bacon, 3 pfennigs for every pound of petroleum, and 30 pfennigs for every pound of tobacco? The Secretary of the Treasury, however, added a depressing commentary to the King's words. He admitted that the ordinary budget had a surplus of 14,000,000 marks, but he had to state at the same time that the extraordinary budget (consisting of all payments which do not recur in the same shape and amount every year) closes with a deficiency of 42,000,000 marks, and that consequently, in order to balance accounts, a new loan of 28,000,000 must be negotiated. Other governments reduce the burdens of their subjects from a surplus of their income. Our secretary admits a deficiency, but, nevertheless, reduces the taxes by borrowing the non-existing surplus and by increasing the Government's liabilities! The prospects held out for the future are still less encouraging. In order to carry out Bismarck's policy, and especially to abate the direct taxes, the Secretary declares that about 110,000,000 marks more indirect taxes must be raised for the next fiscal year. Now, a duty on malt and beer, on receipts and stamps, and on persons unable to serve in the army (Wehrsteuer) amounts to only one-half of the above sum. Consequently tobacco will have to sweat again, while the one article which would yield more than any of the above-named—i.e., whiskey—will not be taxed at all, or, at least, very moderately, because the tax would fall on the large real-estate owners and the gentry, who have been converted into bottle-holders of the present system.

Legislation of this character, acting exclusively in the interest of the well-to-do classes and throwing the heaviest burdens on the poor man's shoulders, will necessarily lead to wide-spread discontent and to the dissemination of communistic doctrines. How easy it will henceforth be for a Social-Democrat to prove to his credulous hearers that he is an innocent victim of the rich, that the present order of things must be radically changed, and that only a revolution can put an end to his cruel sufferings! In itself the Social-Democracy would not be able to create serious disturbances and civil war, but the present plans and proceedings of the ruling classes drive the taxpayers into the arms of the Communists and make them their docile disciples. On the other hand, the Government lets loose the war-dogs of class hatred, and supports the very enemies of the present order of things. Bismarck's leaning towards the social doctrines of Lassalle and other adventurers is well known. In spite of his other heavy duties, he is now acting Secretary of Commerce, and as such has fallen back on his old love. He now proposes to compel the industrial workingmen to form insurance companies against every kind of accident befalling them in the performance of their craft, against sickness and death. To carry out this plan is impossible, as there are so many provisions and conditions that in order really to secure himself against all chances of injury and sickness or death the poor workingman would have to pay two hundred marks a year. Our large manufacturers, however, extol the Chancellor as the great iron prince who, by this bold measure, would relieve them of a part of their responsibility for their employees. Some of the most impudent representatives of the manufacturing interest, wishing to avoid too great an expense, even go so far as to demand that the respective towns and villages should pay one-third of the insurance premiums and give the control of the business into the hands of the Government. They will, of course, not succeed, but only create animosity and difficulties which will at least prevent the springing up of good feeling among the working classes.

To add to the general dissatisfaction the eyes of the discontented Germans are more than ever turned towards the United States. President Hayes's Administration has done more than it is credited with to re-establish the respect, good-will, and partiality which the German people entertained for your country before the unfriendly sale of arms to the French and the corruption under Grant had made it a byword among decent men. You will appreciate the results of this change of mind in the largely increased immigration which has found its way to the United States, although other countries have tried their utmost to divert it from its old course. Your late Presidential campaign was watched here with more attention than any one since the war, and the news of the election of General Garfield was received by our Liberals with univeral joy and gratification. It was greeted as the coup de grâce to the mediæval aspirations of the Southern aristocracy, as the harbinger of the peaceful and prosperous development of the political and social life of the United States, and as a step in the right direction for facilitating the springing into existence of new parties not based on sectional differences and bygone strife, but on actual interests and practical issues. The German edition of your former Southern planters and Northern snobs, our gentry (Junker), old feudal and orthodox gentlemen as well as lately manufactured noblemen, either know too little of American matters or are misled by the party name of Democrats, or at least feign a haughty indifference to the politics of the United States. They hate your country the more because by its production of breadstuffs it makes the German rye and wheat duties illusory, and is always able to prevent a famine in Europe. All their papers, therefore, do is to copy the often rather mutilated and hardly intelligible American telegrams.

The reasonings of the Liberal press are also very poor, while their feelings are on the right side. The editors are quite ignorant of American constitutional and political history. I could fill volumes with refutations and corrections. They do not even look into the written Constitution, and consequently have no idea how the election takes place, how or when the result is ascertained or the President officially declared elected. The most ludicrous mistakes occur in cases like the present, where the mail arrives about a fortnight after the telegraphic despatches have been published; in the absence of even a shimmer of positive knowledge the large papers must manufacture their leaders in their offices. One editor thinks that the party slang of "Black Republicans" refers exclusively to the emancipated negroes; another informs his readers that the exact result of the election cannot be ascertained before December in Washington; a third assures his public that the Democrats entered upon the campaign with the shibboleth of free-trade and the Republicans with that of protection; and a fourth is quite positive that the inhabitants of the Territory of Dakota have given Garfield a majority. As far as I know, only the Augsburg, Cologne, Frankfort, and Bremen (Weser) Gazettes and the Hamburger Nachrichten have regular correspondents in the United States. The Vossische and National Zeitung of Berlin and the Breslauer Zeitung have or have had their regular correspondents in Leipzig, Berlin, or Breslau; other large and well-paying newspapers, like the Magdeburger Zeitung and Berlin Tribune, do not go to the expense of paying for special letters, but reprint editorials of the New York Handelszeitung or of English journals. When I once expressed my surprise at this to an editor of a well-to-do paper, he answered that he had tried in vain to engage a regular correspondent in New York or some other large Eastern city; that the influx of educated Germans, able and willing to write for the press, had ceased, and that the old stock of men who came in and after 1848 either had gone back to Germany or had died out or devoted themselves to other pursuits in life. Whether this be the case I cannot say, as I have not followed the literary German movement in the United States; but under any circumstances it would benefit both countries if able German-Americans would volunteer to give correct information on American topics to our press, the more so as German papers pay their contributors more liberally than the German-American press. ??

Notes.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS' latest announcements include a new volume of verses by the Goodale sisters, 'All Round the Year'; 'Womanhood,' by the Rev. R. Heber Newton; Isabella Bird's 'Unbeaten Tracks in Japan'; Prof. Palmer's 'Haroun al Raschid, and Saracen Civilization'; and 'A Romance of the Nineteenth Century,' by W. H. Mallock.——W. E. Dibble, Cincinnati, will publish 'Idyls and Lyrics of the Ohio Valley,' by John James Piatt.——"An entire new, complete, and uniform edition of all the celebrated works written by Mrs. Emma D. E. N. Southworth, the popular American Female Authoress," is promised by T. B. Peterson & Bros.——The 'Publishers' Trade-List Annual for 1880,' making the eighth of the series, has just been issued by F. Leypoldt, 13 Park Row. Besides the publishers' catalogues which make the bulk of it, the reading public should not overlook the classified summary (by authors) of works published in 1879–80; the annual reference-list of books recorded in the Publishers' Weekly from July 1, 1879, to June 30, 1880; and the educational catalogue for the current year—three extremely handy and valuable indexes.——'The Loyal Ronins,' an historical romance, translated from the Japanese of Tamenaga Shunsui by Shiuichiro Saito and Edward Greey (Putnam) is a new version of the story with which amateur students of Japanese literature probably first familiarize themselves. We have already (No. 575) spoken at some length of a previous translation. This one is marked by less condensation (or greater elaboration), by a cover decorated à la Japanese by the American translator, and by the literal translation of proper names. The cover design is a good illustration, lucus a non lucendo, of Japanese art, but the other two differences are improvements, though the nomenclature occasionally seems rather stark, as, e.g., "Also-five-boy is now old enough," etc. We need not add that the book reads itself and is worth reading.——A new edition (Osgood, 1880) of 'The Poems of George Arnold' gives Mr. William Winter, the editor, an opportunity to revise his affectionate and sentimental introductory remarks, of which to a slight extent he has taken advantage.——A number of pleasant and more than temporarily valuable books have been made up from the papers in Lippincott's Magazine, and have all enjoyed, as regards their style, the benefit of very careful editing. 'On the Rhine, and Other Sketches of European Travel,' is the latest. Like its predecessors, it is illustrated, and a tasteful cover and gilt edges give it a holiday intention.——Of a similar character is 'The Pictorial Tour of the World' (New York: Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co.) But it is a compilation without the unity of revision and without geographical sequence.——Macmillan & Co. publish 'The Trial and Death of Socrates,' by F. J. Church. An introduction gives a sketch of the life of Socrates, embracing all the facts that are definitely ascertained, and though it contains no very profound views of his character and influence, is perhaps none the less suited to the younger class of readers. The body of the work consists of a translation of the four dialogues of Plato which are most intimately connected with the trial and death of Socrates—viz., the "Euthyphron," the "Apology," the "Crito," and the "Phædo." Why Mr. Church permits Euthyphron to retain the final n of his name and denies the privilege to Crito and Phædo we cannot tell. The meaning of the Greek text is generally very well rendered, but the ease and artistic grace which form one of the principal charms of the original do not seem to have been preserved to as great an extent as was practicable.

Such expressions as "I do not mean to give in till I discover that," "I thought that nothing was more impudent than to have the face to say that," and the pettish school-girl expression "let me be," which occurs more than once, are undoubtedly easy English, but give a false notion of the tone of the original. Compared with Prof. Jowett's translation, Mr. Church's adheres more closely to the text, but Prof. Jowett's leaves a general impression more like that produced by reading the Greek. In a word, the interval between the minds of Plato and Prof. Jowett is much less than between those of Plato and Mr. Church.——A sketch of the life of Andrew Porter, a colonel in the Revolutionary Army, is the leading paper in No. 15 of the Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography. It is accompanied by an etched portrait; and two other portraits, after Stuart, in mezzotint, adorn the number—viz., of the Rev. William Smith, D.D., first provost of the College of Philadelphia, and his daughter, Mrs. Blodget—both in the grand style.——On Oct. 20 the Comédie-Française celebrated the two hundredth anniversary of its foundation with a special and archæological reproduction of the "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," with the original music of Lulli and a reconstruction of the original dances. This was accompanied by a delivery, by M. Got, of the "Maison de Molière," an occasional poem by M. Coppée, and by the revival of Molière's "Impromptu de Versailles," with M. Coquelin as Molière himself. In commemoration of the centenary and the performances of the jubilee week which followed it, M. Jouaust has printed and M. Ollendorff published a beautiful little volume containing Molière's two plays, M. Coppée's poem, and an introduction by M. Regnier. The book is adorned with two fancy etchings of Molière, of no special value.——Noteworthy is a translation into French of Fritz Reuter's 'Ut de Franzosentid' ('En l'année 1813'), by E. Zeys, a member of the Court of Appeals at Algiers. American readers have long since enjoyed 'In the Year '13' in Henry Holt & Co.'s edition.——Mr. George G. Rockwood, 17 Union Square, sends us a photograph of kittens—a tableau vivant—of which the sharpness and naturalness bear out his announcement that a European process, of which he has acquired the right, enables him to take likenesses in a few seconds' time, making the sitter independent of the odious head-rest, and the operator independent of the weather. For interior views its capacity is said to be quite as surprising.——Geo. A. Leavitt & Co. will sell by auction, commencing Monday evening, December 6, the "Library of a Bibliomaniac." The carefully-prepared catalogue (by the hand of Mr. Alexander Denham) comprises 1,296 numbers, and is rich in veritable "nuggets." Among the works described we find the Elzevir Cicero of 1642, the gem of the productions of the famous Leyden printers. As for the Dibdins (twenty-eight numbers of the catalogue), some of them on "large paper" and with extra illustrations, we do not hesitate to say that (taking the description to be exact) a finer or completer set never came under the hammer of an American auctioneer. The collection contains specimens of the binding of Hayday, Riviere, Bedford, and Lewis.

—A letter from Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, in reply to our strictures last week upon his connection with the Morey letter case, reaches us too late for insertion this week. It will appear in our next issue.

—Some remembrance of past good things not yet out of date is wholesome in the midst of the current display of holiday gift-books. On this principle new editions have been issued, by Charles Scribner's Sons, of Mr. Clarence Cook's 'House Beautiful' and Dr. Schliemann's 'Mycenæ,' on which critics and the public have already passed a judgment wholly favorable, so far as beauty of type and illustrations and binding is concerned. In Mr. Cook's work no textual changes appear to have been made. The cover, of a light drab cloth, is stamped with a tasteful design in red and black, with which a deep orange tint on the edges of the leaves harmonizes well. The 'Mycenæ' has been enlarged by several interesting appendices, in which new plates are inserted, one and the most curious of these showing the engraved design on both sides of a sword-blade originally represented with all its incrustations before cleaning. The recovered decoration depicts a lion-hunt and is valuable in many ways. An analysis of several Mycenean metals is also given. Geo. Kirchner & Co. have prepared a quarto edition of Theodore Martin's translation of 'Faust,' with reduced plates, after Professor A. von Kreling's designs, of which alone it is necessary to speak here. They have the qualities of correct and graceful draughtsmanship, and bear a consistent relation one with another, but stop considerably short of imaginative genius. Besides the photogravures numerous woodcuts, illustrative and symbolically ornamental, are scattered through the volume. The binding has the requisite elaboration, of formal pattern.

—Walton lived to see his 'Complete Angler' pass through five editions, and since his time enthusiastic admirers of the charming pastoral have taken it up, supplied it with prefaces, notes, and plates, and presented it to English readers in almost every possible shape, from 32mo to quarto. The sums that have been expended upon it by "extenders" we have no means for calculating, but as a matter of fact we can state that some years ago, at an auction in this city, a copy extended to four volumes, and enriched with more than two hundred and fifty plates, was sold for $600. In the list of its editors we find the names of poets, divines, and historians, whilst printers, engravers, and binders have bestowed some of their best work upon the "Father of Angling." What may be properly styled our American edition was printed first in 1847, and again, we believe, in 1848. It was edited by the late Dr. G. W. Bethune, and certainly no man possessed better qualifications for the task. His collection of Waltoniana was so extensive that it formed in itself a library the mere catalogue of which covers one hundred and fifty octavo pages. He was a learned man, he was an enthusiast, and he worked from pure love of his subject. Bethune's edition, then, must rank with the best issues of the English press. If, in regard to art, it is inferior to Sir Harris Nicolas's edition, its literary excellences—its preface and original notes—place it second to none. For several years now it has been "out of print," and we therefore very gladly welcome the reissue that has been undertaken by John Wiley & Sons, with the benefit of the corrections and improvements made in the editor's own copy. This edition, it should be mentioned, like the original, contains Cotton's "Instructions how to Angle for a Trout or Grayling in a Clear Stream," and several bibliographical appendices.

—We opened the December Scribner's at the article on "Montenegro as We Saw It," by an English writer, Mr. Athol Mayhew, and of the new matter we incline to think there is nothing better in the number. Even those who have read the second chapter of Mr. W. J. Stillman's 'Herzegovina and the Late Uprising,' will find here, apart from the capital illustrations, some additional details for the picture of the forlorn country that lies between the Ladder of Cattaro and Cettinje. Mr. Mayhew describes the new road designed to circumvent the "Ladder," and which there is every reason to hope will prove a highway of civilization, and not a fatally easy approach for modern artillery, as Mr. Stillman foresaw in 1877. Mr. Mayhew and his companion found themselves, to their surprise, better marksmen than the Montenegrins. If this paper, with Dulcigno still unsurrendered, is timely, so are Mr. J. Brander Matthews's "Sheridan's 'Rivals,'" anticipating the revival of that comedy in this city with Mr. Jefferson and Mrs. John Drew in the leading rôles; Mr. John B. Thompson's "Alessandro Gavazzi," this orator having just revisited America; and Miss Kate Field's "An English War-Correspondent," meaning Archibald Forbes, now lecturing among us. M. Sensier gives us another chapter of his tragic biography of Millet; Messrs. Henry Bacon and Frederick H. Allen begin a readable series of illustrated articles, entitled "Glimpses of Parisian Art"; Mr. Rowland E. Robinson's "Hunting the Honey-Bee" is in this writer's peculiarly happy vein of natural description. In the editor's "Topics of the Time" a good word is spoken for the Civil-Service Reform Association.

—In Harper's, Mr. James's 'Washington Square" is concluded firmly and logically, and leaves the impression of a powerful if singularly chosen study. The new serial, with which the English readers of the magazine are to make first acquaintance, is "Anne," a novel by Miss Constance Fenimore Woolson, which is both cis-atlantic and of the northern frontier. It makes a good beginning, with strong contrasts of character and a milieu that has seldom been employed in fiction. Mr. Conway discourses of the "English Lakes and their Genii," and incidentally pays a tribute to Mrs. Hemans's muse which many who are far from being grandparents will approve in the spirit in which it is paid. Mr. G. F. Muller's "City of Pittsburgh" is a well-ordered description of that city and its prodigious industries, with a slight historical retrospect and a single episode not purely material: Stephen C. Foster, the most genuine American song-writer, was a native of Pittsburgh, and lived and died there. Mr. Muller states these facts, and shows by statistics the continued popularity of Foster's melodies, of which "Oh! Susannah" is the earliest in our recollection; but he does not speculate on the cause of their generally African complexion, nor on the effect of them judged by the fallacious old maxim that if one can make the songs of a country he need not envy its lawgivers. We do not, for our part, think the historian will ever class the negro minstrels among the auxiliary anti-slavery societies of the past half-century. A likeness of Foster accompanies Mr. Shirlaw's often admirable designs for the paper on Pittsburgh. While speaking of songs, we may call the attention of any enterprising composer to Mrs. Lathrop's little ballad called "Fancy's Chances"; and speaking of designs, we should praise Mr. E. A. Abbey's "To Be Merry," after Herrick, as among the most successful in the series to which it belongs. The jollity, the movement, the grouping are exceptionally well rendered.

—Close upon the heels of the Dorchester volume of the Boston Record Commissioners a much more comely reprint of the 'Early Records of Groton, Mass., 1662–1707,' reaches us from A. Williams & Co., Boston. The town ordered this undertaking, but we probably owe its elegant execution to the munificence of the editor, Dr. Samuel A. Green, and certainly to his good taste. It is a matter-of-fact chronicle, about the minister's pay and the customary quarrels over it, the church seatings, the felling of trees, the maintenance of roads and bridges, the town rates, elections, etc., unrelieved except by the abominable spelling of the town clerks, one of the most illiterate of whom, be it said for the encouragement of all cacographers, was Jonas Prescott, grandfather of the Col. William Prescott who commanded at Bunker Hill, and who in turn became grandfather of the historian. Capt. James Parker, too, was a worthy rival as well as predecessor of "Prescod" (as he calls him), writing, among other "instruckyons" to the "seleckt men," "2 they are too tack car that there be a cooll or colleg of larning of children the inglish tung too Red." And John Morse outdoes both, and taxes credulity, by telling of "the Towne rat for the powder and ammunetion beeing truly cast vp by the sellect men"—unless, indeed, we should here read "the powder for the town rat," etc. Among obsolete senses of words one is struck with the application of the term "artist" to the surveyor, as (p. 23) "to pay the Artest and the men that attended him and his diet for himself and his horse, and for two sheets of parchment, for him to make two platts for the towne," etc., and again on p. 122; the date of the first entry being 1667, and that of the second 1702. There is but one entry in regard to irresponsible sojourners, and that reads as if penned by Stephen Girard: "the [the selectmen] shall tack speshall care that no parson or parsons whatsoeuer shall abide in this town upone any pretenc whatsoeuer, unless," etc. Among all the names of the early settlers, that of "Ben garfell," on p. 56, has greatest present interest, for this surname appears in its true guise on p. 144 as Garfield. A few of the early land-grants, of which the records escaped destruction at the hands of the Indians when the town was temporarily abandoned (1676–78), are given with an interesting and valuable introduction on the nature of colonial land-grants—only one of the many ways in which the editor has elucidated the text. In the course of this essay we have an explanation of the Americanisms "lot," as applied to any measured portion of land, and "meadow," as applied to low, swampy land. Even after King Philip's War, in 1684, the town of Groton extinguished the Indian title by purchase.

—An experience to be enjoyed just now in Fourteenth Street recalls the days of the exhibition in this city of "phenomenal" paintings as such. Mr. Holman Hunt's famous "Shadow of the Cross," well known by the engraving of it, is there to be seen under the old circumstances, but the methods of popular art education have been so completely altered within a dozen or more years that the whole affair appears an anachronism, and the receipts must suffer accordingly. The curieux finds the outer door opening before him as he approaches, and as he enters an impressive mute singularly devoid of Oriental habiliments waves him down a long and dark corridor to a draped desk, at which he purchases an admission ticket of a silent young woman. Then he turns to the left and proceeds amid maroon hangings and increasing darkness to another turn, where an usher receives his ticket and, as it were, bids him God-speed. After doubling two more corners, and having wholly lost his bearings, he finds himself suddenly in the penetralia of a temple. There are a score or so of worshippers gazing enrapt, except the two or three men who look perplexed, at an altar-piece focussed by receding planes of maroon, and but for whose brilliant lighting the apartment would be dark. On a transept altar is a framed copy of an engraving of the masterpiece, with a subscription-book lying open like a "Gospel" before it; all around are scattered, like liturgies and hymn-books, descriptions of the picture and commendations of it by eminent persons, chiefly ecclesiastics. You get a kind of confused notion that the Archbishop of Canterbury has pronounced it "like." Profound stillness reigns; there is less whispering than in a church. The only defect is the absence of the pasteboard cylinders with which to make the details "stand out" stereoscopically; but using your hand instead you get an excellent effect. In this respect, indeed, consists the notorious "realism" of the picture; in others it does not seem real so much as laboriously unimaginative. The colors, it is worth noticing, look like acrid and poisonous earths, to touch which with the tongue would be instant death. There is, after all, a certain fitness in the way it is exhibited—one is as much of an anachronism as the other, and few things have shown the growth of a just appreciation of art in New York so well as the unanimity with which the critics of our esteemed contemporaries of the daily press have fallen foul of it.

—The report of the working for the first year of the "private collegiate instruction for women in Cambridge," popularly known as the Harvard Annex, shows that twenty-five ladies pursued their studies in a great variety of branches, literary and scientific, during the year which began about Oct. 1, 1879, that they passed their examinations with credit, and that the present term opens with forty-three ladies, or nearly twice the number, of whom 18 take Greek, 16 Latin, 10 English, German, and Mathematics respectively, 8 Philosophy and History, 4 Physics, 3 Astronomy, 2 French, Italian, and Botany, and 1 Political Economy—in all, twenty-nine classes, taught by seven professors, four assistant professors, and twelve instructors. "Ten ladies are pursuing the regular course of four years." The financial exhibit is interesting. A fund of $16,000 was subscribed "on call," and $7,500 of it paid in. The pupils' fees aggregated $3,725, the expenses some two thousand dollars more; thus ensuring the pecuniary support of the experiment for eight years, supposing there is no nearer approach to a balance of receipts and expenditures. The pamphlet containing this report also announces the courses of study for 1880–81, with requisitions for admission. It may be had of the Secretary, Mr. Arthur Gilman, Waterhouse street, Cambridge.

—The programme of the first concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, which took place on Saturday, was modelled upon that given by the New York Society the week before. In place of the majestic "Eroica," Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F, Op. 93, was substituted. Among all the compositions dating from the later and sadder period of the master's life, this delightful symphony is the brightest and most cheerful. There is not an unhappy thought in one of the four movements, which all breathe grace, light, and beauty. Mr. Thomas's rendering of this work, which is as familiar as household words to his musicians and to his audience, was faultless in expression and execution. The "Siegfried Idyl," by Wagner, which next followed, was written in honor of his first-born son, whom, in remembrance of the hero of his "Nibelungen" Trilogy, he had christened "Siegfried." This beautiful lyric tone-picture consists chiefly of some of the gentlest motifs of the opera "Siegfried" mingled with soothing German cradle-songs. It was first performed as a serenade to Madame Wagner, shortly after the birth of her son, in the villa in Zürich. Mr. Thomas first introduced it here a few years ago. It has not often been heard, and its reproduction in Brooklyn, in a masterly manner, was a delight to all present. The "Harold Symphony," by Berlioz, was repeated, with the same excellence as on the previous Saturday, at the New York Academy of Music. If Mr. Joseffy astonished his hearers in this city by his performance of the Henselt Concerto, it is no exaggeration to say that his rendering of the same work, and of a Scherzo by Litolf, in Brooklyn last Saturday, was perhaps the greatest achievement of mechanical skill that has ever been witnessed on the piano-forte. There are perhaps two or three living virtuosi who can approach it.

—The two last of Miss Anna Bock's recitals have revealed in stronger relief her many admirable qualities. It is no small compliment to say that she shows to greatest advantage in her interpretation of Beethoven. Both the violin sonata in C minor, Op. 30, which she played with Mr. Brandt, and the "Sonata Appassionata," Op. 57, which she played on Saturday, present great technical difficulties, but she overcame them with delightful facility. She did more—her interpretation of these two great works was remarkable for good taste and purity of conception. One of the features of the second recital was a remarkably powerful yet perfectly clear performance of Chopin's celebrated Polonaise in A flat, one of the most trying and difficult pieces by that composer. The crescendo and decrescendo effects in the difficult octave passages of the second part of the polonaise were particularly well given. In these three recitals, comprising nearly forty of the most difficult compositions of piano-forte music of all ages, Miss Bock has proved herself entitled to a foremost place among pianists now living in this country.

—Of all clever French playwrights Sardou is undoubtedly the cleverest, and his cosmopolitan success speaks volumes for his talent. A priori, no one of his plays would seem less likely to make a hit in a foreign country than "Daniel Rochat." It is French in plot and situation, and though Lea Henderson is an American, she is an American seen through French glasses. The conflict between religion and love with which it deals is, of course, a conflict which might arise in any country, but in no country save France would it be likely to take the form depicted in Sardou's last play. Indeed, it would have been possible a few weeks ago for an unregenerate critic to have ridiculed the idea of playing Daniel Rochat in New York. In Paris the production of the drama created almost a riot. Rochat is described in the bills as a "statesman and philosopher," but really he is a modern French radical of the extreme atheistic type—no cheerful agnostic such as may be found in England and America, who knows too much about the place which religion occupies in the eyes of science to have the slightest taste for martyrdom, but an out-and-out atheist, and a preaching atheist at that. He may, in fact, be truly described as a leading, progressive atheist, who looks upon all religious observances as relics of barbarism, which he is obliged, as a matter of religious faith and duty, to discountenance actively. Lea Henderson is a young American girl, betrothed to Daniel, but ignorant of his principles. In the ordinary course of things their marriage would consist of the civil and the religious ceremony. There is no difficulty about the first, but the principles of Daniel will not allow him to have the second performed. He now tries to persuade Lea that they are man and wife, while she tries to persuade him to go to church. In the end she is victorious; but meantime she has discovered that he is a very different Daniel Rochat from what she had supposed. He is of the earth earthy, and, moreover, an atheist, and her interest dies out. The tragedy ends in a dissolution of the civil marriage, by the laws of Switzerland, which it is well known facilitate the nullification of unions entered into under a misconception of facts. This is the whole of the play, all the other characters being introduced as foils to these two. Dr. Bidache and William Fargis serve as a sort of background for Daniel, just as Esther Henderson and Mrs.

Powers answer a similar purpose in the case of Lea. The comic love-plot of Casimir Fargis and Esther contrasts with the tragedy of the main plot, but it is introduced solely for purposes of contrast. There can hardly be said to be any action in the play, the interest of the situations being purely sentimental, or what is nowadays known as "emotional." The boudoir scene between Lea and Daniel in the fourth act could probably, in the hands of competent French actors, be emotional to a shocking degree; but there is an abundance of conscientious frigidity about Miss Sara Jewett which can but satisfy the most prudish critic. Mr. Thorne's Rochat is a good specimen of his acting, but we like him best in his earlier style, as we knew him before he had undertaken modern realistic parts. He is really a romantic actor of the old-fashioned muscular school, and his genius is fettered in quiet parts. The other parts are all well, some of them excellently, taken. There is no better actor on the New York stage than Mr. John Parselle, who plays William Fargis, and Miss Maud Harrison and Mrs. Phillips are both competent actresses in their respective lines.

—Mr. Daly appears to have convinced himself, as a great many other managers have done before him, that the public has become thoroughly tired of tragedy, comedy, farce, and all other recognized forms of the drama, and in order to be pleased must be provided with pure nonsense. The public is no doubt capable of great folly, but not of folly so great as to endure long such a monstrosity as "Needles and Pins." What it is all about we will not pretend to say. The plot is so complicated and mysterious that we have grave doubts whether we know what it is ourselves, and any attempt to describe it would be futile. It appears to have once been a good German farce, of the sort which Mr. Daly has recently taken to adapting; but when this versatile dramatist seriously undertakes a piece of adaptation and Americanization of a foreign play the result, whatever else it may be, is pretty certain to be original. In the way of original and wild absurdity we have seen nothing at all like "Needles and Pins" for a long time. In fact, Mr. Daly seems to feel that in it he has reached a level from which further descents are impossible, for he announces that he is now temporarily going to abandon the drama and bring out a troupe of Nautch girls. But, seriously, we trust that after this Oriental interlude is over there may be some hope of a dramatic reform at this theatre. The company which Mr. Daly has got together is too good to be wasted on plays like "Needles and Pins." Mr. Daly has always known that the drama was in a bad way, and that the path of reform in it was not a path of roses; but there is nothing more painful or depressing than to see a manager who begins as a reformer end as a cynic.

—Twenty-two periodicals of all sorts are recorded by Le Livre as having been launched in Paris during the month of August. At the bottom of the list we find Le Pornographe, "journal des cochons, monarchique et clérical." "Prostitute's Own," we suppose the main title might be translated; and the sub-title is clearly only an ingenious propitiation of the republican authorities, whom the monarchists and clericals are daily charging with criminal negligence in not suppressing the journalism of filth. The Government, indeed, did act promptly in arresting a man who was openly distributing on the streets the first instalment of an obscene romance; apropos of which a writer in the Français candidly recalls the circumstances attending the admission to the Vaudeville of the "Dame aux Camélias." The censorship of the Second Republic rejected it, but the success of the Coup d'état transferred the power of deciding to M. de Morny, who saw the account of the new régime in encouraging corrupting amusements. He gave his sanction to M. Alexandre Dumas, who in return gave him a dedication of the rescued play. Thus, says the writer referred to, was a dike burst in, a barrier overthrown. If the new license paved the way for works of genius like the same playwright's "Demi-Monde" and "Père Prodigue," M. Augier's "Mariage d'Olympe," and Thiboust's "Filles de Marbre," on the other hand there was no reason for excluding from the "terrain de la galanterie vénale" the purveyors for popular theatres who sought more grossly to paint the same immoral world; and in fact they came trooping in. In an editorial article the Français declares that the colporteurs of the "pornographic press" have already dangerous rivals in the peep-showmen at fairs, whose dioramas are now supplemented by obscene stereoscope views before which even the dirty journalists would recoil. To these, women and boys and girls are admitted without distinction for a cent or two a head. Unhappily for the authorities, the showmen "cannot be suspected of clericalism."

—It is a relief to turn from such evidences of relaxed and depraved public morals to the doings of an institution now in its tenth year, the Paris "École Libre des Sciences Politiques," of which the term opened on Monday last. Its aim is to prepare students for diplomacy, public administration, and parliamentary life, in short to provide the civil service and the legislature with men of training and capacity. Last year the attendance at its courses, which cover two years, was 229, and the courses are 23 in number. MM. Laboulaye, Taine, Germer-Baillière, H. Guidoz, Paul Leroy-Beaulieu, Molinari, and Paul Janet are perhaps the most widely known among the managers, committees, or professors; but they constitute only a seventh of the whole corps. Diplomas do not entitle the pupils to a place in the Government employ, but in the competitive examinations for admission the graduates of this school are found to do credit to their instruction, and to carry off a majority of the prizes. Post-graduates of one or more years' standing are allowed to compete yearly for a travelling purse of $200, in return for which the recipient makes report of his special observations at home or abroad. Merely to enumerate the studies taught at the school would make a serious demand upon our space. The grand divisions are as follows. Administrative Section: Administrative organization and practice in France and in foreign countries; financial organization and administration at home and abroad; comparative civil legislation. Diplomatic Section: Geography and ethnography; diplomatic history of Europe from 1789 to 1830; jus gentium; international law resulting from laws and from treaties; statistics and economic geography; political economy. German and English are the only two languages taught.

THE MEMORIAL HISTORY OF BOSTON.*

A NEW method is here applied to the writing of history, and if the general verdict is favorable we shall doubtless have other histories of a like method. It is not enough to say it is co-operative, since other histories have been written by the joint labors of several hands. Notably in this way was prepared what is known as the 'Pictorial History of England'; but the principle then involved has been carried much farther in this new history of Boston, the aim having been to subdivide the subject in such a way that special attainments should be brought to bear upon every point. There are nearly one hundred chapters to be written to compass the entire work (four volumes), and more than seventy writers are to prepare them, twenty-four of these seventy having been engaged on the twenty-eight sections of this first volume. The experiment—if it is to be so considered—has been undertaken, it must be confessed, under the best of auspices in Boston. Hardly another city, in this country at least, can be named as its equal—first, in the length of time covered by, and the general interest pertaining to, its annals; second, in the attention which its writers have devoted to elucidating those annals; and, third, in the body of living students, some of them of wide repute and nearly all of local prominence, who have been willing to come forward and take part in this commemorative exercise. They have been long schooled in this way; their mutual sympathies may have, indeed, at times given rise in other latitudes to the feeling that they have magnified unduly the importance of those annals. The existence in Boston of such associations as the Massachusetts Historical Society (which is the oldest in the States); the New England Historic-Genealogical Society (which has been the great promoter of all the studies which its name imports, and which has sustained so well the oldest periodical devoted to those interests); the Antiquarian Club (in its infancy, to be sure, but with the activity of youth); the impulse to specific studies which comes from the neighboring university; the attention which both the State and the city have paid to garnering and arranging their records—all these elements serve to make it possibly easier than it would be in any other of our American cities to carry out on a large scale the project of a commemorative history on a co-operative plan.

It was, of course, not enough that various writers, however fit, should throw their contributions together. They must have a common fealty to the idea, in a way to subject themselves to some controlling editorial power, and they must work in harmony with each other. Indeed, so far as the entire scheme of the book concerned the individual writer, it was a business in which his assistance could only be advisory at best, while those to whom was left the general direction of the enterprise must curb or let free each and all, as was necessary to keep the book sound and to ensure the general march of the story. And this has not seemingly been done in any exacting spirit. The editor has suffered not a little independence of opinion to prevail; he has not tried to make views conform to any standard or to each other. The result is that we find the book to be in some respects, even as regards opinions, better rounded than if written by one hand. Events and persons come up in succeeding chapters in new aspects. Each writer approaches them with the light of his own predilections streaming before him. Take, for instance, such characters as the Mathers: we find that in the diversity of judgments upon them, and in the variety of angles at which they are observed, their individualities come out with real relief, somewhat as the two eyes of the stereoscope produce its surprising results. This "symposium" quality of the book is not the least of its merits, and probably the whole work needs to be before us, before we can get all the side-lights of the full illumination. The plan of the book, judging from the prospectus which was issued, reserves for the final volume some general summaries, taking the reader back over the entire period of the history, in cases where particular phases of the town's life and development can best be treated in a purely monographic way, which should disregard the divisions that the political life necessarily imposes. Then, again, events and characters lap over these boundaries, and supplemental and even complemental aspects fall into later divisions, and the whole needs to be surveyed to make the impression perfect. The subject already mentioned, the Mathers, is peculiarly an instance. We find them portrayed in this volume as Mr. Barrows measures them in his chapter on Dorchester, as Mr. Foote finds them in the contest with episcopacy, as Mr. Winsor gauges them in their literary relations. The next volume must give Mr. Whitmore an opportunity to present Increase Mather as a consummate man of affairs in his diplomatic visit to London; Mr. Poole, the chance to show how far Cotton Mather was responsible for the hanging of witches, and, finally, Dr. Dexter, in a chapter on the influence of the family, which we observe is promised, to sum up and render the verdict as he believes it should be.

* 'The Memorial History of Boston, 1630–1880. Edited by Justin Winsor, Librarian of Harvard University. In four volumes. Vol. i. The Early and Colonial Periods. Issued under the business superintendence of the projector, Clarence F. Jewett.' Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1880. 4to, 625 pp.

The book certainly goes back far enough to get a good start for its historic treatment. Professor Shaler opens with a careful and lucid sketch of the geology of the Boston Basin. The indigenous animals and plants get similar treatment from Mr. Joel Allen, of the Zoölogical Museum at Cambridge, and from Dr. Asa Gray, and what Harvard could do for the scientific branches of the subject in the present volume is thus early and satisfactorily done. The next of the main divisions is given to the "Early History." Here Mr. George Dexter epitomizes what is known of the first explorations of this part of the coast, during which Viking, Norman, and many other Europeans may have trod the islands of Boston Harbor. Mr. Winsor, the editor, in the next chapter traces the Cartographical History of the Bay down to the coming of the permanent settlers; and then Mr. Charles Francis Adams, jr., in a very readable paper, goes over the story of the early "planters," or, as we might now say, "squatters," who fixed their lone abodes about the harbor before there was any organized government over the region.

The Colonial period begins the proper history; and who so well as the venerable librarian of the American Antiquarian Society, Dr. Haven, could trace the rise of the New England polity in the career and development of the Massachusetts Company? The story, which he brings down to the eve of the departure of the colonists from England, is taken up next by Mr. Robert C. Winthrop in a considerate and graceful narrative, covering the field which he has so made his own, the history of the young town under the sway, benign and yet authoritative, of its founder, John Winthrop, whose statue was so fittingly set up at the recent commemoration in one of its public squares. Col. Higginson carries the story on to the outbreak of Philip's war, the narrative of which, so far as Boston took part in it, comes from Mr. Edward E. Hale. The conclusion of what may be called the general political history is embraced in the extensive and very able monograph contributed by Dr. Charles Deane on the long struggle which the colony maintained with the Crown, to keep off the dreaded day when it should become a royal province. Apart from this procession of incidents, various other chapters take up the parallel flow of events in matters less strictly political. It were hard, however, to separate, in a theocracy, the story of the Church from that of the State, and it needs the chapters we have already enumerated to be set beside a very just and helpful one on "The Puritan Commonwealth" to make them and it mutually significant. No one has given more attention than the writer of this section, Dr. George E. Ellis, to the whole question of the religious controversies, and of the intolerance of the Puritan settlers. His ripest judgments are here rehearsed, and praise and blame, the incentives and the palliation, are set forth calmly and with little occasion to provoke the disagreements of even the prejudiced. Another important subject has fallen to the same pen—the treatment of the Indians, and the reciprocal gains and losses to them and to the colonists which came to these neighbors on the soil. This is another of the special fields in which Dr. Ellis has earned the commendations of historical students. The interesting story of the lingering, and sometimes tumultuous, introduction of episcopacy in Boston is given separate treatment by one whose studies have been for some years devoted to it, the Rev. Henry W. Foote, of the King's Chapel. Two matters have been treated with due thoroughness and discrimination by Mr. Charles C. Smith—one the relations of Boston to the other towns of the colony and to the Colonial government, and the other its relations to the neighboring jurisdictions, whether of the English or other races; and this last involves the story of that romantic episode of Boston's history in which La Tour and D'Aulnay figure. What may be called the outlying fields are then explored in succinct accounts of the history of Charlestown, Roxbury, Dorchester, Brighton, and Chelsea (for Suffolk County is included in the general scheme), each by a local historian. A few specific chapters close the volume—one on the literature of the period, by the editor; one on the books printed in the aboriginal dialects, by Dr. Hammond Trumbull as a matter of course; a third on the life and manners of the time, gracefully grouped and treated by Mr. Horace E. Scudder; a fourth on the colonial landmarks, with their associations, graphically rendered by Mr. Edwin L. Bynner; and, finally, we have the grouping of fifty of the most prominent families of early Boston society, their relations to one another, and an account of the older records upon which our acquaintance with them rests. This comes from Mr. William H. Whitmore, the Chairman of the Boston Record Commissioners.

These are the literary materials of a volume sumptuous to the eye, filled as far as subjects for engraving existed with illustrations of landmarks and portraits of the old worthies, fac-similes of their manuscripts and autographs, and reproductions of their maps. For a frontispiece there is a map of the old and new Boston. Upon a modern projection of the present territory of the original peninsula—if what is no longer such may still be termed so—the old town is laid in colors, showing the space it occupied by comparison, the quagmires and hillocks and hills which have given place to broad streets and what may now be more properly termed "rising ground," so dwarfed have its eminences become.

In less than nine months this volume has been projected, written, illustrated, and printed—a speed which would not have been possible on any other plan, and which seems to have been quite compatible in the hands which have undertaken it with maturity of judgment, shapeliness of proportions, and thoroughness of research. Its ornamental adjunct is an historical poem by Whittier, typical of the spirit that the volume embodies, and the subject is very fittingly the cessation of the persecution of the Quakers, following upon the royal mandate which the King sent over in 1661. Whittier appears here at his best, and the contrast of the Puritan capital and the Boston of to-day is sufficiently gratifying to the venerable poet, when he makes Upsall, of the Red Lion Inn, exclaim:

> "I see the vision of days to come,
> When your beautiful City of the Bay
> Shall be Christian liberty's chosen home,
> And none shall his neighbor's rights gainsay;
> The varying notes of worship shall blend
> And as one great prayer to God ascend;
> And hands of mutual charity raise > Walls of salvation and gates of praise."

KINGLAKE'S INVASION OF THE CRIMEA.*

THE Crimean War grew out of the English "craze" about Constantinople. The ostensible pretext, it is true, was a desire to defend the "sacredness of international law." But if the English had not been entirely dominated by their "craze" they would not have failed to detect the gross absurdity of entering upon a crusade in defence of law in the company of such allies as the Sultan of Turkey and the hero of the massacres of the Paris Boulevards. The nation rushed into the war with a light heart. They remembered the glories of the Peninsular war, and delighted in the prospect of their repetition. But they had forgotten the terrible cost at which those glories were purchased. They understood nothing of war beyond its superficial glitter; and hence the consternation and the clamor when they stood confronted with its dismal realities during that terrible winter when a handful of British troops, scourged by sickness, cold, and privations of every kind, were encamped upon the bleak hills of the Chersonese. There was nothing in such a spectacle and in such a period of acute suspense and anxiety to recall the glories of the Hundred Days.

It is to these "winter troubles" that Mr. Kinglake has devoted his sixth volume, or, to speak more accurately, made a show of doing so. For, as a matter of fact, a very inconsiderable part of the volume deals with the Crimean War at all. Mr. Kinglake's method of writing history is special and peculiar, and the contents of the present volume are partly psychological and partly taken up with historical retrospection. Thus, the first hundred pages are filled with what he calls "A Retrospective Enquiry" into the war administration of Great Britain during the Wellington period and up to the opening of the Crimean campaign. Then, for a brief period, he transports his readers to the Crimea and allows them to learn something of the "winter troubles"; but subsequently he is hurried back to England, and in a long chapter, entitled "The Demeanor of England," we have Mr. Delane, the Times editor, the Duke of Newcastle, Lord Panmure, Mr. Roebuck, and other prominent men of the day psychologically analyzed. Mr. Kinglake dissects the inner life of these gentlemen much as Mr. Browning has dissected Bishop Blougram, or Sludge the Medium, except that he does not make them give out their sentiments in the first person. But he rivals the poet in the intimate knowledge he has of those sentiments:

> "To his deep glance their souls, at large display'd, > Shew all their mingled mass of light and shade."

When one ponders calmly over these amazing revelations it is impossible not to regard them as largely fanciful. But Mr. Kinglake goes through his task with such consummate gravity as if, beyond a question, he was inspired by a spirit of divination denied to ordinary men; and the analysis, whether true or not, has so much of verisimilitude and is so admirably well done, that the imagination, while reading, willingly yields itself to be cheated. Here, for example, is a portion of his picture of the late editor of the Times:

"Deriving from nature large gifts, and by circumstances clothed with vast means of acting upon the volitions of men, and sometimes even ruling events, Delane, as may well be supposed, did not show the real eagerness of his nature in the weak, bustling way of people reckoned for nothing, whose time is of scarce any worth; and, indeed, he had the outward composure, the air of power not yet put forth, that becomes a strong man of action; but it always could be seen that his energies were rather compressed than lulled—that the furnace, if so one may speak, had its fires 'banked up' in the day-time, yet still was always aglow, always ready to blaze into action an hour or two before midnight. When already in his carriage, and moving to the scene of his midnight labors, kind nature used to grant him some minutes of sleep, upon which, because giving fresh strength, he used to set a great value; but from the moment of his entering the editor's room until four or five o'clock in the morning the strain he had to put on his faculties must have been always great, and in stirring times almost prodigious. . . . These were the hours of the night when often he had to decide—to decide, of course, with great swiftness—between two or more courses of action momentously different; when, besides, he must judge the appeals brought up to the paramount arbiter from all kinds of men, from all sorts of earthly tribunals; when despatches of moment, when telegrams fraught with grave tidings, when notes hastily scribbled in the Lords or the Commons, were from time to time coming in to confirm or disturb—perhaps even to annul—former reckonings; and these, besides, were the hours when—on questions newly obtruding, yet so closely, so importunately, present that they would have to be met before sunrise—he somehow must cause to spring up sudden essays, invectives, and arguments which only strong power of brain, with even much toil, could supply."

Mr. Kinglake, as all the world knows, holds a brief for Lord Raglan. The task he has set himself to do is to clear the memory of the British general from any responsibility for the misfortunes of the British army in the Crimea. It is impossible for even Mr. Kinglake's zeal and ingenuity altogether to accomplish this. On his own showing, Lord Raglan, in his anxiety to preserve cordial relations with the French generals, carried acquiescence to the point of culpable weakness. The celebrated "Flank March" was a grievous error. It was weak in Lord Raglan—a weakness for which both armies had to suffer grievously—that he did not persevere in his determination to carry Sebastopol by storm instead of deferring to the dilatory counsels of Marshal Canrobert. But so far as relates to the winter sufferings of the small British army on the Chersonese Heights we consider that Mr. Kinglake's vindication of his hero is complete and unanswerable. The British public, when they learned the dire tale of suffering, were urgent for the hanging of somebody; but as Mr. Kinglake shows, with great fulness, there was nobody deserving of hanging, unless it was the nation itself. The nation rushed into the war, blindly confident that what they had achieved in Spain in 1809–13 they were capable of achieving in the Crimea in 1853. But the circumstances were altogether different. Up to the year 1809 the military expeditions of Great Britain had been little more than a steady series of disasters. Behind every such expedition there had been, in England itself, no properly organized department of war to replace the waste of war, to see that the troops in the field were properly supplied with food, transport, and all the other numerous wants of an army on active service. The consequence was that after a short raid on hostile soil—perhaps a brilliant action in the field—the expeditionary force had always had to beat a hasty, and generally a disastrous, retreat to the point from which it had begun operations. The organizing ability of Wellington, and the ascendency he acquired over both British royalty and the British Government, enabled him to bring about the construction of a war department without which his victorious campaigns would not have been possible. But at the close of the war this roughly-built-up war department was broken up as being no longer needed, and at the opening of the Crimean War the administrative work of the British army was carried on by a machinery as feeble and inefficient as that which had brought about the long series of disasters of which the campaign of Talavera was the last and not the least. There was then no war department, all the various forces of which could be set in motion in obedience to the impulse of a single will, but a vast number of offices, each possessed of its own limited area of independent action, each attached by peculiar ties to other offices either above or below it; and it was only by circuitous and tedious processes that the machinery of these isolated offices could be set in motion at all. The army itself was subject to a divided authority. By a constitutional fiction it was supposed to be, in a sort, the private property of the sovereign, and during peace time was, as a matter of fact, very incompletely under the control of Parliament; but on the breaking out of war it was the rule that the sovereign should formally abdicate his privilege in favor of Parliament and a responsible ministry. Mr. Kinglake's description of the administrative chaos resulting from all this is excellently written and very instructive.

The truth is, that when Great Britain rushed into the Crimean War she had no army in any proper sense of the word. She had a certain small number of magnificent soldiers actually under arms, and that was all. There were no reserves, no commissariat department, no medical department, and, above all, the country was absolutely unprovided with an army transport corps. To crown all, the administrative staff, such as it was, in the British army, had had no experience in the conduct of large operations in the field. The great Indian campaigns on the Sutlaj, in the Punjab, and elsewhere had been carried through by the administrative staff of the Indian army; and in those days Indian officers ceased to have any military or other official rank as soon as they entered the confines of Europe. Consequently the Horse Guards in London deemed themselves forbidden to supply their own lack of experience by drawing upon the rich stores of it that were to be had in British India. The Crimean campaign was itself an after-thought. Originally, the combined French and British armies had been cantoned in Bulgaria, with the purpose of compelling the Russian armies to evacuate the Danubian provinces of Wallachia and Moldavia. This, in consequence of Austrian intervention, the Emperor Nicholas did; and then, had there been any common sense left in the British nation, there would have been no war. The object for which troops had been collected had been achieved without fighting. But the British nation was under the domination of one of its periodical "crazes"; and a war with Russia, if not on this pretext then on that, it was determined to have. All the Jingos of that time set to work, vociferating that a blow must be given to Russia such as should effectually hinder her from again disturbing the peace of Europe, or, in other words, that peace was to be preserved by plunging into war. It was in vain that Bright and Cobden, and a few other public men who had not yielded to the popular frenzy, attempted to turn the tide of national feeling. They were flung high and dry by reason of its violence, and the nation hurried on, regardless of counsel or protest, into (if an unjust and unnecessary war is to be regarded as a crime) one of the least defensible of the crimes which are recorded in its annals.

At the head of the vociferators for an invasion of the Crimea was the Times newspaper. The Aberdeen Ministry, reluctantly and with many misgivings, yielded to the violence of public sentiment. Lord Raglan, a soldier of vast experience, saw with what inadequate preparation the army was being forced into an undertaking of extreme peril and difficulty, and ventured upon remonstrances, but these were promptly thrust aside, and for a time all seemed to promise well. So confident, however, were both the nation and the authorities of the speedy fall of Sebastopol and the collapse of Russian resistance that, despite Lord Raglan's warnings, hardly any preparations were made for a winter campaign until winter had fairly assailed the allied armies on the bleak heights of the Chersonese. Then, in England, there began a reaction of despair as extreme and irrational as had been the sanguine hopes which heralded in the war, and led, of course, by the Times, the nation demanded that Lord Raglan should be offered up as a sacrifice, because the British army was in want of the food and forage, tents and warm clothing, which ought to have reached them from the mother country. The story has often been told. In his present volume Mr. Kinglake tells it once more after his own minute and analytic fashion. It cannot be denied that not unfrequently the reader is sorely wearied by his unnecessary prolixity. But the picture takes shape, brightens, and vivifies unceasingly; and there is so much of intellectual stimulus in the author's style, so much of keen insight and happy satire in his descriptions of men and things, that few will lay aside the book until they have read it to its last page. The following can hardly be called a legitimate interpolation in a book styling itself "a history," but it is excellent reading none the less. The "Crimean Army Fund" had sent out to Balaklava a huge supply of winter necessaries for distribution among the soldiers. This supply was entrusted to the care of Messrs. Tower and Egerton—the former a man of devouring energy. He had twenty Asiatics placed at his disposal for the landing and carriage of his goods. These Asiatics, in camp parlance and with a sublime indifference to facts, were known as "Croats," and it is thus that Mr. Kinglake describes Tower's operations:

"Soon beside Kadikoi, on the road between camp and port, there sprang up wooden storehouses, and stocks of bales and chests, and there, too, men observed as they passed that, under some motive force newly reaching Crim-Tartary, there had been generated a seething activity—mules, horses, carts coming in laden, and finding men to unload them; splendid sailors—the men of the yacht—bringing strength and resource from on board; men entrenching the ground to find shelter for hampers and bales; . . . and, propeller of all, his great eyes flaming with zeal, his mighty beard, laden or spangled like the bough of a cedar on Lebanon with whatever the skies might send down, whether snow or sleet or rain, an eagle-faced, vehement Englishman, commanding, warning, exhorting; swooping down in vast seven-leagued boots through the waters and quagmires upon any one of his Mussulmans who, under stress of piety (when wanting a few moments of rest), stopped kneeling too long at his prayers. If any wayfarer, passing between camp and port, sought to learn what all the stir meant, he might be told, perhaps, orientally, by some of the bearers of burdens, that 'the will of Allah—his name be it blest!—had made them the hard-driven slaves of the sacredly-bearded commander, the all-compelling, the sleepless, the inexorable Father of boxes—the Father of boxes more numerous than even the seed of Ibrahim after ninety-and-nine generations'; while the answer to any such question, if drawn from an English officer, was likely to be altogether neglectful of the spiritual element, and simply explain in five words that the cause of all the commotion was 'Tom Tower working his Croats.'"

TWO PRESBYTERIAN PROFESSORS.*

THE simultaneous appearance of the biographies of Dr. Charles Hodge and Dr. Henry B. Smith may be considered a fortunate coincidence, in view of the prominence which these men attained in the religious world, and especially in the Presbyterian Church. In many ways their lives were parallel—here and there they intersected each other at angles more or less acute—and these biographies will bring their points of agreement and difference freshly to mind, and afford occasion for some natural comparisons of their characters, and the methods of their thought and work.

Dr. Hodge was the older man by eighteen years. His biography is written by his son, whose admiration for his father is profound, and his adhesion to his theological position complete. A critical biography must not, therefore, be expected from his hand, and the assertion of a denominational journal that his book will rank with the great biographies of the time, must be taken with many grains of salt. He has, in fact, made a rather poor biography, where a good one was easily possible. In the selected correspondence there is but a pale reflection of Dr. Hodge's mind. Too many letters to Dr. Hodge, and remarks about him, are given for the praise which they contain, with little regard to the sources from which they emanated. But this is not the worst. Dr. Hodge was a Princeton professor for more than fifty years, and nearly or quite three thousand young men were subject to his instruction. Here was the principal channel of his influence; but of all this we have only the briefest mention and a single anecdote—that of the student who when Paul said "I am sold under sin" thought he meant that he was "taken in" by it. The emphasis of the biography is on Dr. Hodge's work as a writer for the Princeton Review and of various books. This work was important and influential, but we would fain know more about the teaching of those fifty years.

Graduated from the college at Princeton in 1815, and from the Theological Seminary, which had been established only a few years before, in 1819, his path was at once marked out for him, and after some preliminary study, including the reading of Hebrew with the points, which had formed no part of his theological training, as Dr. Alexander's learning stopped short of this, in 1822 he was made Professor of Oriental and Biblical Literature in the Princeton School. At about the same time he married Sarah Bache, a granddaughter of Benjamin Franklin. In 1826 he went to Germany to equip himself more fully for his position, and remained there two years. His letters and his journals covering these two years are the most interesting part of his biography. The celebrated Monod was his friend, and a ludicrous story is told of the surprise of a German student in the lecture-room on being informed that Hodge was an American. He had thought all Americans were copper-colored. His surprise found expression in a great oath, whereupon the excellent Monod accompanied him home and prevailed on him to be a Christian. Tholuck and Neander, Olshausen and Hengstenberg were Hodge's principal teachers at Halle and Berlin. His personal relations with Tholuck were cordial, and even effusive, but the reactionary opinions of Hengstenberg and Olshausen, now wholly obsolete, were most congenial to his mind. Hegel was then electrifying Germany, and the journal reports more or less correctly some of his theories. The freer criticism of the Germans is occasionally noted, but with a remoteness which indicates how little impression it made upon his mind. Returning to America, his life in Germany, except for certain technical results, was to him like a ship's track in the sea. Dr. Alexander had written to him: "I pray God to keep you from the poison of Neology. I wish you to come back enriched with Biblical learning, but abhorring German philosophy and theology." He had his wish. Landing in America, the young man burned his German ships. The break was almost absolute. Nothing characteristically German held over into his later life. Even the eternal friendship sworn with Tholuck seems to have survived only for the exchange of two or three letters.

In these days of flux what can be more refreshing than such a spectacle as the life of Dr. Hodge furnishes in its imperviousness to any sort of newness, its maintenance from first to last of the same set of opinions unchanged and unchangeable? Here is at least one stable figure for the eye to rest upon in the era of 'Scotch Sermons' and similar phenomena. No one will take exception to the statement of his biographer: "The consistency with which, under all changes of time and party combinations, he for fifty years maintained, without shadow of change, absolutely the same principles, was very remarkable, and without any parallel in this age. He held precisely the same doctrines in his old age as in the early controversies of his youth." These doctrines were those of the Westminster Confession in its strictest possible construction. Dr. Hodge found the "New-England theology" of Dr. Taylor sadly heretical, nor was Hopkins, or Emmons, or even Jonathan Edwards without taint. He went back of all these to John Calvin, the fountain pure and undefiled. As averse as Calvin to dancing or card-playing, he was more thoroughly possessed with the doctrine of Biblical infallibility. The Bible teaching was final for him in every case. It permitted slavery; therefore slavery was not a sin. It permitted the use of wine; therefore teetotalism had no warrant. He tells the story of the good woman who said that she would believe that Jonah swallowed the whale if the Bible said so, and he commends this disposition: let us come, he says, as near as possible to this. The system which he held so frankly and sincerely he defended in a long succession of articles in the Princeton Review, established by him, and notably in his 'Systematic Theology,' a ponderous work, which is undoubtedly the best modern expression of the Calvinistic creed, and free of all taint of science or philosophy. Dr. Hodge opposed the disruption of the Presbyterian Church in 1838, and with seeming but not real inconsistency he opposed the reunion in 1867. In both cases a change was contemplated, and he was always averse to change. It was his proudest boast that he "had never had a new idea."

The character of Dr. Hodge contrasts agreeably with the sternness of his creed. Though fierce in his polemics, in private life he was one of the kindliest of men, loving little children so well that he made a chink in his logic to save them from the general damnation. He had many years of suffering, bravely and sweetly borne. By his friends and students he was tenderly admired and loved. His handsome face grew more attractive with advancing years. His semi-centennial was a proud occasion. Incapable of doubt, he watched the spread of rationalistic thought, perfectly sure that his belief would finally prevail; and happy in this assurance he died June 19, 1878, in the eighty-first year of his age.

In Dr. H. B. Smith we have a man whose thought and character differed in many respects from Dr. Hodge's. Like the latter, he went to Germany to complete his studies. He encountered the same teachers at Halle and Berlin, grown a dozen years older, and his personal relations with Tholuck were as pleasant as young Hodge's. Hegel was just dead. From his widow Mr. Smith gathered a delightful impression of his character. With a strong natural bent for philosophical studies, he drank deep of the German fountains, and, unlike Dr. Hodge, he never lost his interest in German thought. Dr. Hodge prayed to be delivered from a "philosophical theology"; it was Dr. Smith's ambition to construct such a theology. The first address which marked him after his return as a man of unusual force of mind was his plea at Andover for the marriage of philosophy and theology. Theology, he insisted, must be rational. See that it is Biblical, responded Dr. Hodge, and it will be rational enough. Dr. Smith found his way into an influential position very slowly compared with the Princeton professor. A suspicion attached to him on account of his German training. Moreover, he had consorted freely with the Boston Transcendentalists and Dr. Channing; even with Theodore Parker he had some pleasant interchange of thought. His personal relationships at this time were determined much more by affinities of philosophical thought than by anything theological. A man who had studied in Germany was a great rarity in 1841. His journals and letters afford some interesting glimpses of the ferment of that golden age. But these dubious associations cost him the positions that he coveted at Bowdoin and Dartmouth. Tutoring awhile at Andover, then preaching to a little congregation in Amesbury, not till 1847 did he attain to a position corresponding to his abilities; this at Amherst, where he taught mental and moral philosophy. In 1850 he came to New York and took the chair of history in the Union Theological Seminary. Later he became Professor of Systematic Theology, and this position he adorned until by failing health he was compelled to give it up shortly before his death.

Dr. Smith's reputation is that of a man much broader in his culture than Dr. Hodge, less high and dry in his theology, and much more liberal in his spirit. The facts make good this reputation only in part. His general culture was much broader than Dr. Hodge's. He never lost his interest in philosophical studies, and an intelligent interest in these was always a passport to his regard. Some of his closest friendships were with men of liberal creeds: his friendship with Mr. George Bancroft was one of the pleasantest of these. But when we come to look at Dr. Smith's theology the difference between it and Dr. Hodge's is hardly perceptible to the man untrained in theological subtleties. The theology of the Union Theological Seminary was supposed to be midway between that of Andover and Princeton. Dr. Smith's biography is not very instructive as regards the nice distinctions of his theological position. The volume is edited by his wife, and either these things had no attraction for her or Dr. Smith was singularly indisposed to make his letters a vehicle of his thought. They abound in external details of work; they show us little of the workings of his mind. But, supplementing the present volume with Dr. Smith's collected essays, 'Faith and Philosophy' and his various reviews, notably one of Dr. Hodge's 'Systematic Theology,' the formal difference between the New York and the Princeton divine sinks "from the smallness of a gnat to air." In fact, Dr. Smith's philosophical studies seem to have left his theological system almost or quite intact; they only enabled him to dress his system in a more philosophic garb. Dr. Hodge could hardly have written a review of Renan's 'Life of Jesus' or the famous 'Essays and Reviews' more completely unsympathetic than the reviews of these books printed in Dr. Smith's 'Faith and Philosophy.' Nevertheless, the broader culture of Dr. Smith was not without its effect upon his character. With Dr. Hodge theology was all in all. With Dr. Smith philosophy was much, and, as we have said, his personal intercourse was profoundly affected by his generous scholarship. To both of these men science was an unknown world, and herein is to be found the reason why, despite their difference of training, there was so much harmony of belief. It is science, not so much by its particular results as by its method, that is disintegrating the traditional creeds. Metaphysic seems to ally itself equally well with any dogma. From Hegel's armory Marheineke, Rosenkranz, and Göschel on the one hand, and Strauss and Feuerbach upon the other, drew out opposing weapons. Metaphysic will always furnish an ingenious mind a justification for its favorite creed. Science is less accommodating.

Drs. Hodge and Smith were arrayed on different sides of the great controversy respecting Presbyterian Reunion in 1867—in fact, they were the principal protagonists of their respective sides. Dr. Hodge opposed the Reunion; Dr. Smith was its most earnest advocate, and the victory was with him. No personal ill-will was engendered by this heated controversy, and at Dr. Hodge's semi-centennial the praise of Dr. Smith was as sincere as any given, and fell as soothingly upon the veteran's ear. After a wearisome sickness Dr. Smith died in February, 1877, and was buried in beautiful Northampton. Much has been said of late concerning clerical sincerity, but whatever the differences of these Presbyterian scholars, Drs. Hodge and Smith were certainly alike in a sincerity that does not admit of even the faintest shadow of a doubt.

RECENT NOVELS.*

THE literary interest of a novel by the Rev. Mr. Roe is subordinate to the interest of the sociological problem suggested by the size of his audience taken in connection with the quality of his work. A first edition of 'A Day of Fate,' for example, is, we see, twenty thousand; and yet it is of a simple character. It contains an overworked editor in search of heal h, his rival a pompous and heavy Fifth Avenue millionaire, a music teacher who is debating the propriety of accepting the millionaire, and a pretty Quakeress who stands ready to take the rejected one, whichever it may be. It is upon her father's farm that most of the action takes place. The stock includes a plough-horse, "Old Plod," which the heroine's fancy connects with her elderly lover, and on which she showers many caresses when his double's star is in the ascendant; a fiery young charger named "Dapple," which prefigures the editor and is similarly favored in turn, and a cow, whose symbolic significance is occult. The editor of course wins, which is the only immoral thing in the book. But he is a good editor, as is explained by the following illuminated placard which hangs above his desk: "The editor has exceptional opportunities, and might be the knight-errant of our age. If in earnest and on the right side, he can forge a weapon out of public opinion that few evils could resist. He is in just the position to discover these dragons and drive them from their hiding-places." After contemplating this, and after "the labor of weeks," it is not strange that he wrote an "editorial entitled 'Truth vs. Conscience'" and "shot it like an arrow into the West." This is spirited, and twenty thousand readers probably are affected by it in the same way as immature youths are by root-beer; that is to say, for a brief and blissful moment they feel as if they had experienced a sensation.

There is the familiar flavor of the German legend about 'The Hour Will Come.' The Count of Reichenberg drives his young wife from his home and his son is born on the moor, where both mother and child would have perished but for the monks of St. Valentine. The mother dies after all, and begs that her offspring be taken to Marienberg, where her brother is a monk, that by being brought up in the holy order he may escape his father's curse. Of course the curse cannot be averted, and though the father relents it is notorious that nothing comes of relenting in a Teutonic legend. The world of beauty appeals strongly to the imprisoned boy; the stern monk, who has hated him from his babyhood, counsels him to blind himself to avoid temptation; he does so, and walks over a precipice. It is not a cheerful tale, but also it is not unpoetically told.

'Mother Molly' is a "quiet" story. The little action it contains happens off the stage, and is told by the character who writes the book as if it were of the last importance, but still too well known to need more than an identifying allusion now and then, while she talks all around it. The effect is naturally unspeakably dreary to the unsympathetic reader, who will probably become too nervous to recognize the negative merits the tale possesses. These, however, are not sufficient to dispense the author from the prime necessity of being entertaining, edification being out of the question. It is an English story of how "Mother Molly's" parents died and she earned her title by bringing up her brothers and sisters, how she did this and what became of her and them, the scene being laid in Devonshire at the end of the last century, when the people were expecting a descent of the French.

'Tit for Tat' has a good scheme. A youth in Germany is victimized by a pair of blue eyes, and is ridiculed by his friend to whom he recounts his adventure. The friend has a similar experience with the same adventuress in New York, whence the title. There is, nevertheless, so much pure surplusage, and so much literary crudity about what is pertinent, that its effect is, on the whole, absurd. It would in practised hands have made a good short story, but no one could successfully stretch the same material to its present length of one hundred and ninety pages, small though these are.

'Alton Thorpe,' as a testimonial to the strength of a noble, womanly character, suffers the disadvantage of showing the said character very wilful and headstrong. She runs counter to social conventions, refuses all advice as to the management of her estate, engages herself to a man who seeks only her money, conceives and executes schemes of reform which benefit no one and which would be the despair of political economists, when, the book drawing near its end, the author brings her creation up with a round turn, reduces her to submission, and by means of a bank robbery and suicide disposes of the unworthy lover and unites the heroine to her cousin, who has loved her from the start. To do this two hundred and forty-two octavo pages, typographically close-packed, are required.

'Magdalen Férat,' though the last translated, we take to be an early work. It is long, the logic of it close, and the plot unusually compact for Zola. The last, however, only emphasizes his lack in the specially French quality of form. The ingenuity of construction which makes the typical French novel read like a play is replaced in him by a subtle study of occult and inherited causes, and one is never quite sure whether to place them in the category of pathology or that of art. The heroine here is overshadowed by a past which is the result of innocence, ignorance, and a false education. Become wise by experience and the happy wife of the man she loves, she is unexpectedly confronted by it, and, unsustained by her husband, who is morbidly weak, she falls a prey to remorse; whereupon, crazed by the denunciations of her husband's foster-mother, a religious fanatic, she poisons herself, and her husband goes mad. There is but one thoroughly healthy character in the book. The pathology seems to be quite correct.

'Can She Atone?' is an American novel on a somewhat similar theme. It is dedicated to "The Great Army of Christian Workers and Philanthropists" who are interested in trying "to rescue the perishing and raise the fallen." It is perhaps singular that subjects of this order seem to have especial attractions for inexperience, and only experts recognize the difficulty in society's laying down the precise conditions under which its own code is to be disregarded. It may be noticed, also, apropos of the truthfulness of these two books, that the sin in question is severely handled by the society commonly supposed to be lenient to it, and is leniently dealt with by that which is said never to forgive it.

'Salvage' opens well, but the statement of its "problem" is better than its solution, the notion of which suffers from its execution. A Confederate colonel who has deserted his Northern wife visits London on his return from an East Indian trip, where he hears from his lawyer, through whom he has instituted divorce proceedings, that he has a child. Determined to obtain possession of it, he starts at once for America. On his way to Liverpool he meets and recognizes his wife and child without being recognized in turn, learns that the former is to sail on the steamer on which he has engaged passage under an assumed name, falls in love with her, and determines to win her affections on the journey. She appears on board without the child, having brought it to England preparatory to fighting the divorce-suit. The voyage ends speedily in shipwreck off Queenstown, but there is time enough for many misunderstandings (the colonel's first love, a widow, being also of the company) and explanations, and some very elaborate obstacles to the course of true love; but all ends happily. The most elevated sentiments are expressed by the truly good, and very reprehensible ones by the wicked, but the author gets in the flavor of novelty by so arranging these exhibitions as to suggest that there is little to choose between the two after all. For example, a lady declaiming in public upon matrimonial obligations apropos of her own case is a novelty.

'No Relations' is rather a child's story than a novel, although we fancy that to grown-up readers much of it will prove very attractive. It is the history of a foundling brought up among peasants in France, who, after many strange adventures, discovers his birth to have been gentle and recovers his family. All the early part of the story—the description of the village of Chavanon, of Mother Barberin and her husband, and of the remarkable travelling troupe of Signor Vitalis—is excellent. The animals in this troupe are perhaps trained more highly than would seem possible in real life, but the exaggeration is not such as to spoil the story, and the account of their performances and of the respective fates which overtake them and their master is entertaining and interesting throughout. The melodramatic part of the novel, if we may so term the somewhat sensational adventures by which the plot is thickened and finally brought to a dénoûment, is inferior to this, though not positively bad. To call 'No Relations' a French 'Oliver Twist' would be going too far. We may best indicate its general character by saying that it would be to a French girl what 'Oliver Twist' is to an English or American boy.

About's 'Story of an Honest Man' is hardly likely to add much to his reputation as a novelist. It is a novel with a purpose, though it is rather difficult to state in a few words what the purpose is. The hero's grandfather is a volunteer of 1792 and represents the typical Frenchman of that period. His son represents the generation of Frenchmen intermediate between the revolutionary and the modern period, while the hero himself illustrates the virtues, or what ought to be the virtues, of to-day. The old generation was grandiloquent and patriotic, and the elder Dumont was known among his neighbors as "La France." The second generation was full of philanthropy and dreams of human fraternity, and the second Dumont was consequently known as "Mes semblables." In a terrible conflagration he sacrifices his life for the benefit of his fellow-creatures. The third Dumont is everything that a good modern Frenchman should be, and his life furnishes M. About with the opportunity of giving many valuable hints to his fellow-countrymen as to what ought to be done towards making France a perfect and happy country. In education we have a minute description of the whole series of reforms introduced by an Alsatian in a French grammar-school. He transforms it into something resembling an English boarding-school of the best sort. In industrial matters we have a full account of the reforms introduced into a factory which had previously been managed on an antiquated and uneconomical plan. All this is doubtless valuable and may be very profitable to Frenchmen who study it with attention, but it sadly impedes the progress of the story, the plot of which is so slight that it might easily be compressed into a few pages. It is not a novel which can be expected to arouse much interest outside of France. If it were written by anybody else than M. About or in any country but France, parts of it might perhaps be called provincial in tone.

Sketches of Army Life in Russia. By F. V. Greene, Lieutenant of Engineers U. S. Army. Late Military Attaché to the U. S. Legation in St. Petersburg, and Author of 'The Russian Army and its Campaigns in Turkey in 1877–78.' (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1880.)—To discuss and pronounce upon the question of the right and the wrong of the attitude of Russia in regard to the "Eastern Question" would be a laborious and difficult task. To follow and criticise her military conduct in the recent war with Turkey would require much patient study as well as much time and space. It is fortunate for the reviewer who has to pronounce upon the merits of Lieutenant Greene's book that he need do neither of these things. He may safely commend it to the general reader as a remarkably attractive and fascinating book. It seems to be accurate, impartial, and trustworthy, but whether it be so or not, it is certainly delightful. It is most agreeable reading, and not for those only who take special pleasure in military books. Whether it treats of the singular relation of the Czar to his subjects, or of his subjects to the Czar, with its strange mixture of personal trust, civic loyalty, and religious devotion; of the personal qualities of the Russian soldier; of the "moving accidents" of Shipka Pass, the siege of Plevna, or the winter campaign; of the author's singularly romantic and dramatic entry into Constantinople—or gives us a sketch of war correspondents like MacGahan, or almost incredible generals like Skobeleff—it is always gratifying to the last degree. It is most fortunate for the reputation of our country and our army that we had such an officer to send to the far-away land of Turkey in Europe, and most creditable to our War Department that it sent such a man. His book deserves to be universally read, and we are sure that no person whom these lines may lead to purchase it will fail to rejoice that they have been written.

MLLE. BERNHARDT IN "HERNANI."

THE play of "Hernani," in which Sarah Bernhardt appeared for the first time on Thursday last, occupies an important place in the history of literature and the drama. It represents the most flourishing period of the Romantic school in France and may be considered the chef d'œuvre of the leader of that school. It is also a most excellent acting play. The plot is melodramatic to the point of opera, and indeed it has held the stage as an opera thus far with more success than as a play. At the time of its first production it was at the most extreme remove from the plays of the Classical school, and was designed for the purpose of showing how a Romantic play ought to be written. It abounds in the most generous sentiments and the most thrilling situations. The world which it places before us is that mediæval world of romance in which love and war are the only occupations fit for men; in which woman represents the idea of loveliness, purity, and devotion, and the struggle for her affections is the main motive of the action. The Romanticists, it must be remembered, invented this world by a great literary coup, but at the time they believed in its reality. Well established as it is that the age of chivalry and romance never existed, it is no less a fact that in the early part of this century a large number of the strongest writers of fiction and the drama that have ever appeared either in England or on the Continent did believe in its existence, and chivalry and romance were to them more true and real than even realism has proved with us. Their movement, so far as it affected the drama, was in fact, when we compare it with the preceding state of things, a movement in the direction of realism. Their practical object was to break up the classicism of the old drama, with its iron-bound unities, and to introduce in its place that liberality as to time, place, and action which might be supposed to correspond with the actual facts of life, and which Shakspere had adopted as the dramatic basis of his system. In all this they succeeded completely: classicism was killed and the drama was liberated from the fetters of the classical canon; but reform stopped a long way short of pure realism of the photographic kind, such as the French dramatists of our day have engrafted upon the stage. "Hernani" is almost as far removed from what we regard as reality as "Phèdre" must have seemed to audiences which first appreciated the merits of "Hernani." It is, in fact, now necessary, in order to enter fully into the spirit of the play, to forget everything that has happened since—to forget the very existence of the drama to which plays like "Froufrou" and "La Dame aux Camélias" belong, and to revert to that ideal world of romance and adventure which gave "Hernani" its birth. It is necessary, too, to throw aside for a time one's sense of the ludicrous, for, judged by our present tests, the plot and situations of "Hernani" are ludicrous in the extreme. There are, of course, no characters, in the proper sense of the word, in the play. The development of character never played any important part in the theories of the Romantic school, and Victor Hugo, who is nothing if not an accomplished playwright, cares so little for this branch of his business that he is willing to make everybody in turn display the same traits in the most opposite situations for the purpose of producing a dramatic effect. At the end of the first act we have Don Carlos saving the life of his mortal enemy, Hernani, by a display of that noble generosity which he is fond of exhibiting toward the end of an act, but which he rarely shows at the beginning of one. At the end of the second act we have Hernani playing precisely the same part with Don Carlos. Don Carlos, however, does not hesitate to obtain an interview with Doña Sol by means of the basest trickery, and up to the last moment appears to be determined to ruin her happiness. Notwithstanding this, his elevation to the position of emperor, which gives him the opportunity of carrying out all his worst designs, has such an effect upon him that he gives up Doña Sol to Hernani. Meanwhile Don Ruy Gomez, after sparing Hernani's life from motives of the same exalted generosity which at critical dramatic points determines the action of all the characters in the play, and permitting him to marry Doña Sol, in the end kills them both, although at one period he had offered Hernani to give up the talismanic horn which plays the part of hostage for the hero's life. Hernani, who refused to take his life at the hand of his rival, because of his unquenchable thirst for the life of the king, in the end, having forgotten all the other motives which govern his action, insists on throwing up his hard-won happiness, and dying simply because Don Ruy still possesses the horn, which he had previously offered to give up. It is impossible to see the play without being struck by these peculiarities or noticing that what triumphs over them is the cunning art of an accomplished playwright, who thoroughly understands effective situations and climaxes.

The one consistent type in the play is Doña Sol, and she is natural, like so many other heroines of the Romantic school, without being essentially individual. She stands for woman, woman as understood in romance, the female ideal, the victim of fate, but rising above her fate by the nobility and beauty of her character. It was this part that Mlle. Bernhardt attempted on Thursday last, and if she did not completely succeed in it, it was because she is not essentially a romantic actress. Although we have not yet seen her in "Phèdre" or in any other play of the classical period, it is risking very little to say that with all her eclecticism the school of acting in which she is most at home and most thoroughly herself is that of the present day. The range of fashions in the drama which she attempts to cover includes all the three—classical, romantic, and realistic—but both in her virtues and her defects she rightly belongs to the last. It is not well to be very dogmatic about her acting on any point, for she is full of surprises, and her long and thorough training, as well as her familiarity with different methods of acting, enables her to appear to great advantage in almost any part. She is the most finished, if not the greatest, actress who has for a generation been seen in this country, and it is difficult to apply any test to her talent which it does not easily stand; but a comparison of her acting in "Hernani" with her acting in "Froufrou" will, we think, show that the latter dramatic creation is one which she understands far better than the former. "Froufrou" is in all respects the opposite of "Hernani." It is based, or supposed to be based, upon the real life of to-day. The romantic notions of life which form the staple of the drama as understood by Victor Hugo, have all disappeared. It deals with the ordinary sentiments, comic as well as tragic, of every-day life. It is, in fact, a tragedy of every-day life. Gilberte is the Parisian woman of to-day, light-hearted, amiable, frivolous, fond of pleasure, weak, charming. She is doomed to a tragic end by circumstances and her own weakness, and is, in consequence of this fact, such a character as would never have been dreamt of for a heroine of a romantic play or story. The other characters are merely introduced to heighten the effect of the tragedy of her life and death. It is characteristic of the modern realistic drama that it is to a very great extent a drama of feminine pathos. Its masters seem to take more interest in the analysis of feminine emotions than in the struggles and passions of men. "Hernani" is a man's play. The principal parts are men's parts. "Froufrou" is a woman's play. Froufrou and her sister are the only serious parts in it, if, indeed, anything in the play can be called serious.

In Doña Sol we see a great Romantic feminine type, a lady of high birth in love with a man whom she knows only as an outlaw, displaying under the influence of her love the loftiest traits of character, ready to endure privation and misery for his sake, so far elevated above the ordinary plane of life and action that temptation ceases to entice or danger to frighten. At the end she prefers to take her life rather than survive her lover. In Froufrou we have a weak child, married accidentally to a man to whom she is indifferent, but whom her sister loves. Then there appears a lover, who makes love to her in a frivolous way, while her sister establishes herself in the affections of her husband and child. This suddenly transforms her into a tragic character, and she abandons her home to go off with her lover, who is finally shot by her husband, after which she comes home and dies in the fifth act. It is a play in which there is no consistency or continuity, yet it abounds in telling situations, such as the scene between the two sisters, the scene in which Gilberte tries to prevent her husband fighting with her lover, and the death-scene. Comparing Mlle. Bernhardt in these two parts, the most striking thing about her acting of them is that they should both be so good. It is the fashion to say that she has a limited range in the expression of passion, but the limits fixed by these two plays are very wide. In the way of denunciation what could be finer than her scene with her sister in "Froufrou"? As an exhibition of extreme agony and anguish of mind, her vain entreaties addressed to her husband at Venice could hardly be better done. Her declaration of her devotion to Hernani's fortunes, her rejection of Don Carlos's advances, were equally good. We might go on almost indefinitely, and, taking scene after scene from the plays in which she has appeared, declare with entire safety that her acting was throughout admirable. It is impossible, however, to see her in Victor Hugo's play without feeling that it is really Froufrou acting Doña Sol. The romantic part is a wonderful performance; in the other she is completely at home. The very continuity and coherence of Doña Sol's part interferes with her acting, for it is not altogether natural to her to act coherently or continuously. That absorption in a single feeling which is the essence of the latter part, and which is the really excellent and noble thing inherited by the Romantic from the Classical school, is something which is unknown to "Froufrou" and the writers of the "Froufrou" period. Froufrou is the slave of the feeling of the moment, but an enduring and overpowering passion is out of the question; otherwise she would not have been Froufrou.

It is this lack of continuous passion which probably gives to Mlle. Bernhardt's acting that slight flavor of insincerity which at times mars its perfection. In isolated scenes and passages her expression and action are perfect, but the complete identification of the actress with her part does not last longer; by some little gesture or look, or some unnecessary by-play, the illusion produced by her marvellous acting is dispelled. This is more noticeable in such a part as Doña Sol than in Froufrou. The latter, when she is on the stage, is generally the central figure of it, and has too much to do to permit many of these relapses. Doña Sol, with a comparatively small part, is on the stage a great deal, and has that most difficult of all tasks, to make herself felt when she is not speaking. It is just at this point that Mlle. Bernhardt's want of absorption in the character she is playing shows itself. When she ceases to speak she ceases to be Doña Sol, or at any rate she does not seem to remember so distinctly that she is Doña Sol that she forgets everything else. Her dresses no doubt are very beautiful and her poses very picturesque, but we do not care to be reminded quite so often that they are so.

It might be expected that an actress of this sort would be most effective in scenes which make a steady and rapid advance toward, and end in, a marked climax. There is nothing which carries away an audience like this, and it is fortunate that it is so, for with an audience as plainly unfamiliar with French as those at Booth's, if it were not for the broad effects produced by climax, there would be no play at all. These broad effects are, however, only a small part of a great piece of acting.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1880.

The Week.

THE communications of Mr. Richard Smith, editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, to that journal from Washington City make it clear that Secretary Sherman would prefer to remain at the head of the Treasury Department rather than return to the Senate; that his personal relations with General Garfield have not been disturbed by anything that happened at the Chicago Convention, but that the President-elect prefers for some reason to wait until February before making up his Cabinet or choosing any member of it. It is a matter of doubt, therefore, whether Mr. Sherman will be Secretary of the Treasury after the 4th of March, and the doubt is to be resolved by General Garfield alone, although the contest in the Ohio Legislature may impel him to make a decision earlier than the month of February. If the state of uncertainty continues, and the contest in that body goes on, it is altogether likely that the State of Ohio will vote for Mr. Sherman's retention in the public service in the highest position at her command. Any other decision would be looked upon by the country as not only shortsighted but as an exhibition of great ingratitude. Such services as Mr. Sherman has rendered to the State, the party, and the nation, although open to grave criticism here and there, are now seldom met with in American statesmanship.

As regards the incoming Administration, it may be said that Mr. Sherman stands at the forks of the road. If Mr. Garfield retains him as Secretary of the Treasury, it will be understood that he has not surrendered to the Bosses. If Mr. Sherman is not retained, the sign will be equally clear that the Machine has overmastered him. The bone of contention is primarily the New York Custom-house, of which the Conkling faction are crazy to resume possession. With Mr. Sherman at the head of the Treasury their game would be blocked, as he does not stand in awe of Conkling. The predicament of the other Bosses is very much the same. All of them are anxious to resume business not as advisers but as dictators of appointments in their own States. Their rôle at the present time is that of supporters of General Garfield's nomination for a second term, the senior Cameron having already delivered himself at length upon that point, with a good deal of gush, in the columns of the Philadelphia Press. The junior Cameron, by the way, is reported to be at his wits' end in his endeavors to control the Senatorial election in his own State in favor of somebody who will have no opinions. Cameron himself makes no pretensions to intellectual superiority. He stands, or did stand, for an astute party manager. He staked his reputation on the nomination of Grant at Chicago and lost the wager. His prestige was badly shattered, and it is now of the utmost importance that he should make it appear that he is to control the patronage of Pennsylvania under President Garfield, or else some man of brains may be elected as his colleague in the Senate.

The question of creating life senatorships-at-large for the benefit of ex-Presidents has been much discussed during the week, apropos of the desire of General Grant's friends to provide for him a position of dignity and usefulness in the public service. We were inclined ourselves at one time to think the suggestion a good one, but the objection that the introduction of senators-at-large into the Senate would destroy the equality of the States in that body seems to be fatal. In the existing condition of human nature it would be impossible to make any man a real senator "at large." He would in fact, even if not in law, be a third senator from some one State, and would be so regarded every time he cast a vote on any question on which the country was seriously divided. Moreover, every time he voted he would diminish the weight of the vote of every senator who voted on the other side, and thus pro tanto deprive the States which they represented of "their equal suffrage in the Senate." It seems, if this view is sound, pretty clear that the constitutional amendment which created senators-at-large would have to be ratified not by three-fourths of the States only, but by all of them, and this puts its adoption out of the question. The controversy on the proposal has been most acrimonious. Mr. Blaine started the adverse view, and, to everybody's surprise, his old admirer, the Tribune, fell foul of him, and informed him that his objection was not only not "weighty" but was "moonshine." At this point the unfortunate but well-meaning Evening Post intervened, with what seemed to the common mind somewhat forcible support of Mr. Blaine's interpretation of the "equal-suffrage" clause of the Constitution, but, growing heated, attributed to the Tribune "ignorance," "dulness," and "quibbling." The Tribune was at first blush inclined to attribute all this to a "muddled head," but, on further consideration, concluded that it had a much more serious cause, and refused to "discuss further" with or even to "notice" a person capable of "gross and apparently deliberate misrepresentation." A more melancholy, not to say tragic, end to a great constitutional debate has never, to our knowledge, occurred before in this country.

We print elsewhere in a letter from Mr. D. A. Wells a further illustration of the kind of morality with which both parties conducted the late campaign. The Philadelphia Press also confesses to having been made the innocent medium of spreading a false story of a placard stuck up in Oldham, Lancashire, England, encouraging the operations in this country of the British free-traders against native industry. In fact, we presume the lying done on the stump and elsewhere on the Republican side about the tariff, after the tariff issue was taken up, was unusually great, though the circular produced by Mr. Wells is the most discreditable specimen of it. General Grant's story about General Hancock was also shocking, but it attained no currency. The Republican managers and newspapers refused to touch it after the first day, but they invited its author to take the stump, and spoke of his oratory in terms of adulation not often heard in the modern world. The Democrats prepared the way for the ruin of their reputation by putting a man like Mr. Barnum in the chairmanship of their Committee. When they do such things they forget that they have no press capable of whitewashing them and giving their rascalities a venial air.

Mr. Hewitt, from whom we have also a letter, defends himself successfully enough against Judge Davis, and gives good reason for his belief in the genuineness of the Morey letter, on the evidence of the letter itself and of his own knowledge of the drift of General Garfield's economical opinions. But he does not account for his failure to notice the suspiciousness of the circumstances under which the letter appeared—especially its first production by the proprietors of an obscure and disreputable newspaper in the very last days of the campaign—in spite of his great caution with regard to the evidence on the other side, such as General Garfield's flat denial. This denial he peremptorily rejected as absolutely worthless in his speech at Rochester, October 25, and in his interview with the World reporter, October 27, and in his speech at Tammany Hall, October 28. Supposing this to have been justifiable in the case of a letter produced by a known person of good character, was it justifiable in the case of a letter, the recipient of which did not appear and was not known, and the holder of which was a person of whose character but little was known and that little not good, and into whose line of business fraudulent sensational letters almost naturally fell?

We think Judge Davis should accept Mr. Hewitt's offer of the bull calf. It would be the smallest atonement he could make to him for his attack on him in court. Besides this, the Judge owes a calf, lamb, kid, or some such animal as an expiatory offering to Themis for having delivered a stump-speech from the bench, and the Hewitt calf would be a peculiarly appropriate victim.

Mr. Lanier, the Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue, editor of the North Louisiana Republican, and Republican candidate for Congress in the Fifth District in Louisiana, whose troubles we mentioned last week, has replied to the charge that he was short in his accounts as State tax collector and had been more than once engaged in desperate broils resulting in death. As to the State-tax charge, he says he was "robbed" of the money while holding it unwillingly under an injunction obtained by the Nicholls government to prevent his paying it over to the Packard government; that he was tried afterwards on a charge of embezzlement, but there was a "mistrial," and the Democratic district-attorney refused to try him again and entered a nolle prosequi. As to the broils, he says naïvely: "I have had some serious personal encounters in which I may be said to have been fortunate, but it was only when I have been assailed, and so justifiable has been my position in these encounters that I have never been indicted by any court for what resulted from them." There is much of what Squeers called "richness" in this statement. Nothing can be happier as a euphemism than calling himself "fortunate" in order to express the fact that he had killed his man or men in several fights. But we doubt if it quite equals in assurance the deduction, that he cannot have done anything wrong in his fights, which he makes from the fact that no court in Louisiana indicted him for his manslaughters—as if it was the custom in Louisiana to indict men for participation in murderous affrays. We venture to say, however, that, bad as Louisiana may be, neither in it nor in any Southern State has any peaceable, respectable citizen fit to serve the United States Government in a fiduciary capacity been engaged in "several serious encounters." This sort of experience all the world over falls to the lot of the turbulent, disorderly, and quarrelsome, and we again call the attention of those who think the South has nothing to complain of as regards the character of the men employed to execute the Federal laws, to this Lanier case.

Whether ex-Governor (now United States Senator-elect) Joseph E. Brown, of Georgia, is a man devoid of scruple, a "political acrobat" who profited by Reconstruction and still knew when to return to the Democratic fold, member with Gordon of a ring controlling an infamous system of convict leases, and "true to one party and that is himself"—all this is of consequence to students of Southern politics and to reformers, as well as to the negroes who lately celebrated his overwhelming election. Still, it does not seem to us to bear on the question of the comparative sagacity of Robert Toombs and of Senator Brown, or the advantage to the State of the triumph of ideas as to material development, the education of all classes, and political justice to the blacks, such as the latter has just avowed before a picked assemblage at Atlanta. If there exists in Georgia a Bourbonism indissolubly wedded to the status quo, and unreconciled and unreconcilable to the Constitutional Amendments, and on this account chiefly opposed to Mr. Brown, we cannot for our part doubt that, though the hand which guides it may be selfish, the driving deep of the share is for the immediate and ultimate good of the State. We have felt and said the same thing in regard to General Mahone in Virginia. The hope that "no white man would do this," or "no gentleman do that," is based in the first place upon a childish conception of human nature, and especially the nature of demagogues, and in the second upon a surprising unconsciousness of the decay of the machinery by which public sentiment, or the sentiment of a small class controlling the mob, used to be enforced.

What, let us ask any determined opponent of Messrs. Brown, Gordon, and Colquitt, ought to be the penalty for the Vicksburg Herald's denouncing the recent frauds in counting the ballots cast in the Mississippi "Shoe-string District" by which Chalmers has been returned to Congress and Lynch defeated? The ballots were rejected wholesale on account of a typographical embellishment such as good taste dictates to every printer—simple dashes separating the classes voted for on the same ticket; "distinguishing marks," they were called, to bring them technically within the scope of the law. The Herald is a Democratic paper, but it says this has not been "done in the interest of the Democratic party," as alleged, "or the best interests of the people; and the party, the officials, the district, and the State should positively refuse to countenance it." The defence will probably be set up that only a resort to such methods can avert the return of the carpet-bagger. It may even be said that they are no worse than the methods of the Louisiana Returning-Board in 1876. Still, this leaves the question untouched: Is the Herald right or wrong in reprobating them? If right, ought not every respectable white voter to side with it? If wrong, is there any power now which can make it hold its peace; and if it is not silenced, what hope is there of indefinitely maintaining the color line?

The press and the pulpit have been considerably agitated for a week or two over the threatened production at Booth's Theatre of a version of the "Passion-Play," and the manager has concluded to withdraw it out of deference to public opinion, which, it appears from his exposition of manager's ethics, he has "no right" to ignore. It was to have succeeded the engagement of Mlle. Bernhardt, we believe, and elaborate preparations had been made for its presentation. The author, who has published an indignant but dejected card since its withdrawal, says his work is very different from the "crude show-piece" enacted at Ober-Ammergau, and is "a solemn, moral, religious, well-digested, devout, and instructive composition, intended to live the life of all classical literature" and "composed for the advanced age we live in." If there is anything else it is probably that too. He is going to read it in public and demonstrate this. To a reporter he further said that before writing it he had spent "five and a half years in the monasteries of Palestine, in filth and vermin," had "delved down into old manuscripts that had not been disturbed for hundreds of years," and found what he was shocked to find new, and charmed to find true, concerning the life of the Redeemer. The result was something it was a pity to have the children miss, as they could never get it from the Bible. He had read it to a clergyman, who wanted to confute Bob Ingersoll with it, and to a company of actors, who appeared as if they were at a funeral. He added incidentally that the only fairly correct Life of Christ was Beecher's, which was, nevertheless, incomplete compared with the play. In any event, however, this card came too late to have effect. The papers vied with each other in ingenious reconciliation of abstract free-speech and the concrete suppression of this outrage—all, that is to say, except John Kelly's organ, as the Herald pointed out. There was, of course, a flood of letters from "the people"; rival managers were unanimous in saying that no amount of money could tempt them to produce it; and the ministers of the different denominations preached against it, from a Jewish rabbi to Talmage, who felicitously took as his text "They crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh." The labored and groping attempts to show the essential logical difference between the Ober-Ammergau performance and the one proposed have been very amusing, but in most cases instinct worked out a very fair result.

Foreign specie of the value of about three and a half millions of dollars arrived during the week, and the Treasury bought about $300,000 of the 6 per cent. bonds which mature at the end of this year. Notwithstanding these accessions to the resources of the banks, the loan market gradually became stringent, and the reserve of the banks fell below the 25 per cent. limit. Appearances indicate that several large stock speculators who control many millions of dollars threw their influence on the side of stringency. So large is the mercantile demand for money, and so wild is speculation becoming not only at the Stock Exchange but at the Produce and the Cotton Exchange, that the present lending facilities of the banks are fully extended, and arrivals of foreign specie become a prime necessity even to support the present volume of bank credits. In a few weeks, however, the corner, so to speak, will have been turned, and a very easy money market is inevitable. As this is generally understood, speculative holders of securities cling tenaciously to them and contentedly pay commissions for money to carry them from day to day. The Clearing-house exchanges last week exceeded in extent anything on record; and conservative interests would undoubtedly be promoted if the volume of speculation should be reduced before the close of the year.

The Irish state trials are said to be likely to begin towards the end of December. The indictment charges the defendants with "seditious conspiracy," which is defined by Mr. Justice Stephen, in his 'Digest of Criminal Law,' as "an agreement with one or more persons to do any act with a seditious intention common to both or all of them," and a "seditious intention" as an intention "to raise discontent or disaffection among her Majesty's subjects, or to promote feelings of ill-will or hostility between different classes of such subjects." The offence is set forth as a misdemeanor in the criminal information which starts the prosecution, partly in order to be able to obtain a special or struck jury, and partly to deprive the defendants of the right of peremptory challenge, which does not exist in cases of misdemeanor. Challenges for reasonable cause in reasonable number will, however, of course be allowed on both sides. The chances against an agreement of any jury that can be fairly impanelled are so great, however, that the trials are likely to end in something like a triumph of the defence, particularly as it will be able to produce numerous admissions from members of the Government of the existence of real cause for discontent. The mere introduction of the Disturbance Bill, which the Lords threw out, is a very powerful piece of evidence on this side. On the other hand, the murders and outrages, some of them very brutal, continue, and the horror they excite is likely to tell against the Land-Leaguers. But it seems to be settled that, as we said last week, the Government will not at present ask Parliament for any extraordinary powers of repression, and is confining itself to heavily reinforcing the police with troops, so as to make anything like an organized revolt or a riot on a great scale impossible. The police, however, seem to have no detective capacity whatever. None of the murderers is caught, or even traced. The best thing the Ministry could do now would be to borrow Mr. Gowen of Pennsylvania and his Coal and Iron Police, who hunted down the Molly Maguires in that State, and brought twenty of them to the gallows. A correspondent calls our attention to the fact that it was Lord Denman who made the remark about the probable result of jury-packing in Ireland which we erroneously attributed to Lord Cottenham.

The latest support of the case of the Irish tenantry has come from some very powerful letters in the Daily News from Mr. Russell, Q.C., one of the leaders of the English bar, but an Irishman and a member of Parliament for an Irish constituency. They are but an amplification of the propositions laid down by Professor Thorold Rogers, which we quoted last week. We would strongly advise those who are discussing the subject on this side of the water in the pulpit and elsewhere, and are disposed to settle it out of hand by ascribing the present turmoil to the character of the Irish peasantry, and particularly to their improvidence and laziness, to read more of the evidence about it. The land question in Ireland in no way differs from the land question everywhere. No race has ever submitted long to the tenure under which the Irish peasantry live; and it is as true of them as it was of the French people in Sully's day, that their turbulence and mutiny are due not to natural perversity, but to "impatience de souffrir." The wildness and absurdity of their political aspirations must not blind us to the evils of their economical condition—evils which really make them seem under the circumstances remarkably thrifty and industrious. The "natural perversity" theory has been for ages a favorite defence of bad government, but we believe it has never yet stood the test of experiment. No race which has left the savage state has ever yet failed to labor and save when certain of security and justice.

The French papers received by the last mail are filled with accounts of the expulsion of the religious orders from their houses under the decrees of the 29th of March. More comic reading than most of it is it would be hard to meet with. Many of the societies barricaded themselves in their buildings as if prepared to resist a military assault, and were surrounded by a considerable body of troops, and only surrendered when their defences were forced. In one case the premises were blockaded with the view of reducing the brethren by famine, but one door was inadvertently left unguarded and the place was carried by a coup de main. Some of the monks threw themselves on the floor, and had to be removed by main force, singing psalms lustily while the police carried them out by the arms and legs. In some cases the Superior excommunicated the commissary of police, and in one this officer, being a wag, promptly gave a written receipt for the excommunication. The Chartreuse has been spared, the manufacture of liqueur not being considered dangerous to the state. There seems to have been little popular interest in the matter, the sympathizers with the monks who appeared on the scene being principally men and women of the upper classes.

The decrees were not enforced until after the decision of the Court of Conflicts, that the courts of law had no jurisdiction of the matter. This decision illustrates one of the most curious and interesting differences between French and American or English jurisprudence. In the United States and Great Britain officers of the law, like everybody else, are answerable in the courts of law for their acts. In other words, the courts and the courts alone decide whether in any given case they have gone beyond their powers. In France, however, the administration and the judiciary are treated as separate and independent powers, and if an officer of the administration denies his legal liability, the question is passed upon by a semi-political tribunal, in some sort representing the Government, and called the Court of Conflicts. If this tribunal says that the act complained of was an administrative act, he can only be called to account before a board composed of his official superiors, or, in other words, of the persons under whose orders he acted. The religious orders tried to get their cause into the courts of law, as a question of property, but the Court of Conflicts ruled that the courts had no jurisdiction.

The French Radicals have sustained a severe blow in the conviction of two of their principal editors, Laisant, of the Petit Parisien, and Rochefort, of criminal libel in charging General de Cissey, now a Senator and formerly Minister of War, with gross jobbery and malversation when in office, and in communicating information and giving an interest in fraudulent contracts to a Madame de Kaulla, who was his mistress and a German spy. On the trial they were unable to furnish any proof whatever of their charges, which appear to have been made in sheer wantonness, and they were accordingly convicted and fined; but fined only, though imprisonment is almost always inflicted in such cases. The lightness of the sentence is said to have caused great dissatisfaction in the army, but is defended on the ground that the courts wished to give Radical editors a warning that this sort of thing would not be permitted, but without converting them into martyrs. Laisant is a deputy, and there is a movement in favor of compelling him to resign his seat.

The Gladstone Ministry has achieved a great and well-deserved triumph in the occupation of Dulcigno by the Montenegrins, which has at last been brought about by the energetic action of Dervish Pasha, who superseded Riza Pasha as soon as it became plain that England at least, if not all the rest of the Powers, was in earnest. Earl Granville in a recent speech has explained how it came about. After the Porte had sent out the extraordinary circular despatch in which it declared that it would not surrender Dulcigno unless the Powers abandoned the naval demonstration and promised never again to resort to anything of the kind, and that even in that case it would only withdraw from the place and would not hand it over to the Montenegrins, England proposed to seize the customs duties at Smyrna and hold them until the Sultan came to his senses. Most of the Powers, if not all, declined to share in this operation, but England determined to act alone. News of this reached Constantinople, and "the Palace" was so frightened at the prospect of losing so much good money that a promise to deliver Dulcigno unconditionally was promptly made, and Dervish Pasha, who is noted for his determination and had had some experience in dealing with Albanians, was sent to command the troops outside the place. He accordingly called on the Albanians to withdraw, and on their refusal attacked and dispersed them, and then formally surrendered the town to the Montenegrin commander. This leaves the field now open for the settlement of the Greek question; but this will probably not be taken up before spring, inasmuch as there seems reason to look for active cooperation from France after the next general election, which will take place in March or April. It is believed that when the new Legislature meets, if the election goes to his liking, Gambetta will no longer refuse to form a ministry, and that when he does he means to begin his administration by making French foreign policy a little more self-asserting. Greece offers a field in which this change can be made with the least possible damage to German susceptibilities. But in any case he is committed to stronger action on behalf of the Greeks than France has yet taken. Whether the Greeks will be able to wait so long with their present large force under arms is another matter.

THE DEMOCRATS AND CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

THE sudden beginning of an agitation for civil-service reform among the Democrats since the late election is a phenomenon which is furnishing the Republican press with food for a good deal of ill-natured mirth and satire. The fun they are making of it is not by any means unfair. The sincerity of the post-election interest of the Democrats in a subject which they never mentioned before the election, is naturally and justifiably open to suspicion. But it would, nevertheless, be very unwise for those whose interest in the subject is real to enquire too closely into the motives of such politicians as take it up in either party. We suspect there is not much to choose between them on the score of sincerity. The Republicans have been recommending the reform in their platforms ever since 1872, but they have been careful never to allow it to be brought forward on the stump, and have been as contemptuous as the Democrats in their treatment of it in Congress. They have gone even further than this, in withdrawing all support from the head of their own party, Mr. Hayes, and loading him with contumely because he to a certain extent took the recommendation of the platform on which he was nominated, with regard to the mode of appointment, as seriously meant. We have little doubt, too, that any one who brought up the question of civil-service reform in a circle of working politicians would find himself even more respectfully listened to by Democrats than Republicans. No subject excites at this moment more disgust and annoyance among "the men inside politics" in the Republican party than this one. The account given in 'Democracy' of the feelings with which Senator Ratcliffe regarded Mr. French, the Connecticut Congressman who ventured to broach it in his presence, is but a faint picture of the way in which one of its advocates would be regarded by a Republican Boss and a party of henchmen in a hotel parlor. The mixture of loathing, contempt, and amusement he would excite in them would make all discussion with him impossible. But this does not indicate that the moral condition of the Republican politicians is any worse than that of the Democrats. The greater sensitiveness of the former on this subject has just the same source as that of the slaveholders'—viz., their personal interest in and responsibility for the abuse which is assailed. Most of the leading Republican politicians now on the stage have come into prominence under or through the abuse. It is associated with all their triumphs and struggles. It has helped them into and kept them in place and power. They are familiar with and skilled in its working. They cannot imagine politics without "spoils" to reward the "workers" after the victory, any more than the Duke of Wellington could see "how the king's government was to be carried on" without the rotten boroughs. A permanent civil service, with no assessments, and no "claims," and no officeholders to run the primaries and the conventions, seems nearly as strange and odious and fantastic to them as the notion of a State with negro citizens would have seemed in 1860 to a South Carolina planter.

The Democrats do not labor under this impediment in approaching the subject. It is true they originated the "spoils system," but they originated it in the day of small things, when the Federal patronage bore about the same relation to the Federal patronage of to-day as the plunder of a country grocery would bear to the "loot" of the Chinese Emperor's Summer Palace. What they have suffered during the last twenty years in seeing so many offices distributed and so much money handled by the enemy is probably beyond description; it has certainly never been and never will be described. To have planted such a system and watered it, and then see others gather the increase, is an ordeal such as in all probability no other political party has ever passed through. They have striven hard to regain possession of it every four years since they lost it, but without success, and the result is that they have now lost all sense of responsibility for it, and can talk about it with a calm and absence of emotion of which hardly any Republican politician is capable. A Democrat may not agree with you when discoursing civil-service reform to him; he may even be secretly amused by your earnestness and hopefulness, but he will not be irritated by them, or feel, as the Republican is apt to feel, that there is a personal point in your remarks. His position towards the spoils system now is, in fact, very like that of the Northern Democrat in old times towards Southern slavery. The Northern Democrat believed in and defended slavery, but he did not defend it as the Southern slaveholder did, with the passion and vehemence of a man who is defending his property and the social system under which he was born. So also the Democratic politician may believe firmly in the beauty and propriety of treating the public offices as the personal perquisites of the leading politicians of the party in power, but this beauty and this propriety cannot come home to him with the force and persuasiveness with which they come home to the Republican politician who has passed some of his happiest hours in administering the system, and who has owed to it much of what he most values in his public life. In attacking it in his presence you are, as it were, criticising his furniture and his wife's dress, and the manners of his children, and the wrinkles of his aged mother.

The motives of the Democrats in starting the agitation now are probably mixed, as party motives usually are. The late election has impressed on most of the intelligent men of the party, as it was never impressed before, the necessity of offering something positive to the small body of uncertain voters who now in all the doubtful States turn the scale. Hitherto the party has totally ignored this class. Its platforms and speeches have been addressed simply to the main body of the faithful, who are sure to vote the regular ticket without regard to the platform. By the discontents of the undisciplined Republicans, and by the new aims and expectations of the generation which has come on the stage since the war, it has not sought to profit. Moreover, it has not had in its immobility the Republican resource of "pointing with pride." It has nothing very creditable to point to within forty years, and its exploits of the earlier period have distinctly passed into the history which is read but not felt. What is still more unfortunate, the one or two novelties it has added to its collection of attractions have been things like the paper-money craze, which its older men cannot produce without hanging their heads for shame. It has relied, in 1876 and this year, mainly on a carefully edited story of Republican rascalities, we fear mostly true, but which, as long as the Democratic policy is veiled in obscurity, produces comparatively little result. The Republicans have been able to neutralize its effect by the proffer of reasonable certainty with regard to the future.

This alone might not lead the Democrats to take up civil-service reform as a desirable "new feature," such as newspaper publishers offer their subscribers at the beginning of the new year. But civil-service reform has attractions besides the chance it offers of winning over a small body of Republican independents and malcontents. There can be little doubt that the enormous advantage the "spoils system" gives to the party in power, in meeting all attempts to dislodge it, has at last made some impression on the Democratic mind. It is becoming clearer than it has been that a large and growing civil service used vigorously and remorselessly as an electioneering machine, and compelled to place its salaries at the disposal of the party in power, furnishes that party with a defence which no Opposition can in ordinary times, without the help of some great wave of popular excitement, hope to overcome, and which no ordinary scandals or maladministration can neutralize. The mere contribution of such a body to the campaign fund is of itself a very formidable obstacle to any attack on the Government, in these days when campaign expenses amount to as much as the revenue of a large State. Taking the officeholders' salaries at $20,000,000 in the aggregate, even five per cent. of assessments—the rate in this last canvass is said to have been higher—would put $1,000,000 in the party treasury, and against this the Opposition has to fight with the aid of volunteer contributions only. Of course there is no doubt that the Democrats have ever since 1868 been hoping to get hold of this admirable machine themselves, and if they did get hold of it would work it with zeal and efficiency; but it is more than probable that they have made up their minds, or are making up their minds, that they have little or no chance of the Government with the machine, and are reaching the conclusion that the Government without the machine would not be a bad thing, and at all events would be better than nothing, and if lowering their demands will help them to get it are ready to lower them.

Those who attach supreme importance to the reform will, of course, welcome help from any quarter without enquiring too curiously into the motives of those who offer it. The day is probably far distant when it would be possible to construct a party which could get into power on the civil-service reform issue alone. It is not broad or deep enough to build a party on. It has very wide bearings, but it is after all a question of improvement in machinery, the object of which is to leave legislators more time for their proper work, and to give public opinion free play upon the Government, and to provide for the more careful and efficient transaction of the public business. It is not a question on which men will be divided by those general ideas on the function or province of government out of which parties grow and by which they are maintained. A man may be a free-trader or protectionist, a strict or a loose constructionist, a Democrat or a Republican, in fact, and yet be a civil-service reformer just as readily as he may be a friend of book-keeping by double entry, or of a good system of steamboat inspection. The reform, whenever it comes, will, therefore, probably have to be made by one or other of two great parties which more fundamental questions have created, and it makes not the slightest difference by which it is made, or whether by one or both. Democratic arguments or votes in its favor are, therefore, just as good as Republican arguments or votes, and it is of no sort of consequence what the motives of either party in carrying it may be. If it has to wait until it can command a majority of pure and disinterested members of Congress who will support it simply from a profound conviction of its importance, it will wait for something to which no reform the world has yet seen has owed its success. In politics we have to allow men to do the right thing without furnishing proof of a change of heart, or even being able to clear themselves of the charge of hypocrisy and time-serving. Nor must we be affected too much by the Republican taunt that the Democrats have had a chance of reforming the civil service in this city, but have never done it. This is true; but if they had reformed the civil service in New York, with the kind of constituency they have here, in the teeth of the example the Republicans were setting them everywhere else, they would have displayed an amount of virtue and of capacity of which there has hitherto been no example in American history. Republicans may on this as on other subjects reproach them with not coming up to the Republican standard, but not for failing to rise higher. It is lawful to encourage one's neighbor to live better than one's self, but it would be ridiculous to make his failure to do so a cause of furious censure.

THE SIGNAL-SERVICE SUCCESSION.

THE public apathy on the subject of the future management of the Signal Service affords a striking example of indifference to public questions which, in the parlance of the time, "have no politics in them." Next in importance to the great financial, commercial, and educational concerns of the country we may fairly place those interests which are to be promoted by the meteorological reports of the Signal Office. It is of the greatest importance to every farmer within reach of the telegraph and to every shipowner in the country that the organization which is to issue these reports shall be as efficient as possible, and especially that every available means that science can suggest for securing the certainty of the predictions shall be intelligently utilized. It depends altogether on the future management of the office whether its activity shall be confined to a lifeless routine without any attempt to make new discoveries or introduce improved methods, or whether it shall be animated by that progressive spirit which will not be satisfied until every man within reach can be informed of coming meteorological changes as long in advance as it is possible for them to be foreseen.

Of the importance of a correct policy in this respect no two opinions can be entertained. The great mistake which is at the bottom of the popular and official apathy on the subject is that of supposing that a system of scientific improvement is a mere matter of administration, which can be carried out by any officer of good sense. The question is supposed to be that of a few professors or other experts studying the weather-maps and working out the results to order. The professors are supposed to be so ready to engage in this work that the Government has nothing to do but to avail itself of their labors, without the exercise on its own part of any but the most every-day management. As a consequence of this view not one of the persons prominently mentioned in connection with the management of the greatest meteorological system in the world has any pretensions to a knowledge of the subject, or to any such acquaintance with scientific principles and scientific men as might enable him to go intelligently to work. To see what a mistake is here made we have only to look carefully at the situation. So far as administration and organization are concerned, the meteorological service was wholly the creation of General Myer. Scientifically there was nothing new to originate. Years before, Professor Henry had exhibited a daily weather-map at the Smithsonian Institution, made up from telegraphic reports from a number of stations through the country. In 1869 Professor Abbe established at the Cincinnati Observatory the daily issue of a printed weather-map from reports furnished by the telegraph companies. This was accompanied by a forecast of the probable weather in Ohio, and was, so far as we are aware, the first attempt in this country to issue a regular daily announcement of coming meteorological changes. When the Signal Service was organized General Myer transplanted Mr. Abbe and his system, the latter enlarged in the ratio of the resources at his disposal to those of the Cincinnati Observatory. The leading feature of his policy was to avoid all association with other agencies which might in any way interfere with the complete independence of his operations. He made no attempt to secure active scientific co-operation in the conduct of the work, holding that the office could not make the advance of meteorological science any part of its functions. This course was not so unwise as it might at first sight appear. He had the good sense to see that scientific results could not be ground out by mere administrative machinery. In a country like ours, where there is no great scientific centre of opinion in which the work of individual investigation can be criticised and examined, the danger of charlatanism is great, and the temptation in this direction is especially strong in a Government office, where a newspaper reputation can be secured with such ease. We may lay it down as a safe rule that no difficult scientific investigation can be conducted except by or under the direction of a few of the ablest men. Now, General Myer made no pretensions to an acquaintance with meteorology as a science, or with the branches of physics essential to it. He was a fairly educated man, who had the genius to see that in apprising the public of the motion of storms by a telegraphic system a great field of usefulness was opened, and who was possessed of the organizing ability to put his views into a practical form. It was not at all discreditable to him that he shrunk from attempting what might have proved a failure, and confined himself to making the best use of what was already known of meteorology.

Now, if the public are to be satisfied with a continuance of the present system, if the office is to be confined to a mere routine without any attempt to improve the methods of prediction, then it makes very little difference who is put in charge of the work. One man can run the machinery about as well as another. But it would be discreditable to our enterprise and our scientific spirit to rest contented without a decided effort at improvement. At the present time meteorology is hardly worthy the name of a science, for the reason that the materials for studying it in a scientific manner have never been at the disposal of investigators. It comprises little more than a few practical rules, of uncertain application, and a great mass of disconnected facts which no one knows how to handle. But there is no good reason why this state of things should continue. The observations of the state of the weather at intervals of eight hours over a large extent of country, continued through ten years, now afford a mass of material for the study of meteorology and its reduction to a science such as has never before existed. The question is, whether we can now gain such a knowledge of the laws which govern the wind and weather that the public can be notified of coming changes not merely a few hours in advance, as at present, but one or more days. This question can be attacked only by the Office itself. It requires the co-operation of men of every degree of ability, and therefore cannot be undertaken by a private individual, even if he has the time and inclination. Under the most experienced scientific head it would be a most difficult undertaking to organize a scheme of intellectual labor of this kind. The experimental physicist and the mathematician must unite their powers before any results can be obtained. What a problem is before the head of the service when he proceeds to select his scientific workers! It may be safely assumed in advance that every applicant who presents himself is unfit for any but the most subordinate position, no matter how highly he may be recommended. The men who are really wanted are either fully occupied already and above seeking a Government position, or they are lying hid in obscure corners entirely unknown to men engaged in public affairs. They must be sought after with a skill and diligence akin to those of the prospector for a silver-mine. Then, when men are set to work, who shall judge whether they are doing the right thing? No one but the head of the Office himself. If he is not a man experienced in scientific affairs the chances that anything of value will be done are too small to be worth considering.

The great fallacy which men in political life fall into in connection with this subject is that of thinking that science, like politics, is a subject on which one can count upon co-operation in anything he may undertake, and can select his colaborers without any special exertion on his own part. As there is an unlimited supply of clerical ability seeking employment, and needing only to be selected, so, in the view of the politician, there is any quantity of scientific talent needing only the word to go to work. Not only is this a complete fallacy, as we have sufficiently shown, but the work of putting a scientific bureau into operation is one requiring as much experience in scientific affairs as the organization of an administrative department requires in business affairs. If an inexperienced man attempts it we may be sure that one of two things will follow: either nothing at all will be done, or what is done will serve no more useful purpose than that of furnishing paragraphs to the newspapers.

Closely connected with the question of the scientific administration of the Weather Bureau is that of preserving its connection with the Army. We regard this question as a subordinate one. If a proper administration cannot be secured under military auspices, this will afford a conclusive argument in favor of some other organization. How this may be will depend on what sort of a military man is placed in charge. While it is good general policy to leave well enough alone, the objections to a transfer are far less formidable than commonly supposed. The importance of military discipline in the conduct of its operations has been greatly exaggerated. The failure of any subordinate to perform his duty would be no more disastrous than in any other public or private business. When we hear intelligent men comment upon the danger that observers would not make their observations or send in their reports if they had not the fear of a court-martial to spur them to their duty, we wonder how they would account for the regular appearance of a daily newspaper. There are numerous similar, though less completely organized, services in Europe, and in none of them has a military organization been found necessary. The only result of association with the Army which has any significance is that more than half the expense of the work is borne not by direct appropriations, but by the Army itself. The pay and allowances of all the observers, some three hundred in number, are met from funds appropriated for pay of the Army, while the commissary and quartermasters' departments are called upon to supply the service as fully as they would supply an army in the field. The annual appropriation for the Signal Service is $450,000, the greater part of which is expended for telegraphing, preparation of bulletins, and office expenses. The value of what is annually furnished by the Army is variously estimated at from $500,000 to $1,000,000 or more. Of course the cost to the public treasury would be the same whether the whole sum necessary to the maintenance of the service were directly appropriated or whether it were maintained from the Army appropriations, the main difference being that in the second case the facts of the case are partially concealed. Few will contend that this indirect support is right in principle. If the Signal-Service observers were really a part of the Army, temporarily detached for this special duty and liable to take the field whenever their services were needed, something might be said for the plan. But such is practically not the case, however it may be in theory. The expenses of the Army are actually increased by the whole cost of everything furnished the Signal Service, and it is not in accordance with a frank and just policy to charge the Army with money which is not expended for the Army at all. This position granted, it becomes of little importance what department is charged with the work, the main object being to secure a head with the requisite scientific experience to ensure a successful management.

Correspondence.

MR. HEWITT AND THE MOREY LETTER.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: When Judge Davis was forced to retract the false statement upon which he had founded an extra-judicial attack upon my private character, his partisan animus was demonstrated and his power to injure me was destroyed. There could no longer be any issue between him and me, but the controversy was transferred to the bar, whose traditions he had outraged, and to the press as the guardians of the public, whose rights he had violated.

But while I am thus relieved from the necessity of replying to his personal strictures on my course in reference to the "Morey letter," I am perfectly aware that his abuse of judicial privilege forms no justification whatever for any mistakes or errors of judgment which I may have committed during the progress of this unfortunate affair, and I am fully persuaded that some further explanation is needed from me in order that my motives and action may be properly understood, and the just measure of my responsibility be estimated. I shall limit this explanation to two points, in reference to which it seems to me I have been misapprehended.

It was assumed by Judge Davis that my conduct was open to censure because of the "friendship" which is alleged to have existed between General Garfield and myself. Even on the supposition that there was a warm friendship between us I am at a loss to conceive how the expression of my belief in the authenticity of the signature attached to the "Morey letter" in any way violated its obligations. The sentiments expressed in the letter are not dishonorable, but, although open to dispute, are held by the doctrinaires in political economy to be incontrovertible. They teach that the right to buy in the cheapest and to sell in the dearest market is as applicable to labor and capital as it is to commodities. General Garfield has been a careful student of political economy, and the expression of these familiar views seemed to be the most natural thing in the world for a man who professed to accept theoretical principles as the guide to legislative action. So far as I had knowledge of his opinions, and especially as tested by his votes, I supposed that the letter expressed his real sentiments, so that it never occurred to me that my opinion as to the signature did him the slightest personal injustice, and if I had been his next friend I should not have acted otherwise than I did.

But as a matter of fact we were not and never had been "friends" in any proper sense of the term. We met for the first time at the opening of the Forty-fourth Congress. I soon learned to admire his intellectual ability, his wonderful force in debate, and his unrivalled power of statement, especially on financial questions, where, as a rule, our views were in accord. This admiration I frequently expressed, but there was, in fact, an insuperable bar to the formation of any friendship between us from the outset, and this bar never was, nor by any possibility could ever have been, removed. For four years we were near neighbors; we both kept house, and my mode of life was such as to bring to my table for social intercourse the prominent men of both parties. General Garfield never crossed my threshold, nor did I ever enter his door. If we had been friends such a state of things would have been impossible.

But although we were not friends we were not enemies. As I have stated elsewhere and now repeat, our relations were always pleasant, but they were the pleasant relations of political opponents and not of personal friendship. This statement is only made because it is necessary for my justification, and no doubt it will be confirmed by General Garfield. If any further evidence, however, be needed on this point let your readers refer to my speech in the Congressional Record of February 24, 1879, by which it will be seen that even if the tie of friendship had ever existed it must have then been sundered; and good reason will appear why I was not prepared to accept as conclusive the mere verbal denial of General Garfield, when his sworn testimony on a previous memorable occasion had failed to satisfy his own party associates, his neighbors, and the very newspapers which have reflected most severely upon me for my want of confidence in his unsupported assertion.

Judge Davis does, indeed, in violation of all propriety, refer to the contents of the letters which I produced for comparison only, in order to prove the signature of General Garfield, as the evidence of friendship between us. If Judge Davis had known the circumstances under which I presented to General Garfield a trivial gift which led to this correspondence, he would scarcely have made this fanciful excursion into the regions of "mistaken phraseology"; but I cannot better demonstrate the absurdity of the conclusion that it was any evidence of friendship than by the offer I now make to Judge Davis of a similar gift of the masculine gender, the acceptance of which, as all breeders of unregistered Jersey cattle know, will relieve me from an encumbrance for which even the butcher is not a profitable refuge.

The unfounded charge of treachery to a friend being thus disposed of, it only remains, before giving an explicit answer to the questions propounded in your last number, to explain the circumstances under which I happened to express any opinion at all upon the letter. That the letter was ever submitted to me was purely accidental. If I had not been detained at my house two hours later than usual on the day of the publication in Truth (October 20) I should have departed from the rooms of the National Committee long before Mr. Hart came with the letter, of which I had no previous knowledge whatever and in regard to which no meeting of the Committee had been called, or was, in fact, held. Mr. Hart came with the letter just as I was on the point of leaving, and it was not shown to me at all until after it had been pronounced genuine by Mr. Randall, Mr. Barnum, and Mr. Fox, all of whom had served in Congress with General Garfield. When it was submitted to me I gave it, as is my wont in such cases, a very careful examination, so much so that Mr. Hart characterized it in his testimony as "captious." He has since declared that he was not guided in any degree by my opinion, being convinced by that of the other gentlemen, and that he should have published the fac-simile even if I had pronounced the letter to have been a forgery. But I came to the conclusion that it was genuine. There was nothing in the appearance of the letter to excite suspicion. It was written on the regular Congressional paper, with which I was necessarily familiar. It was not at all fresh in appearance, and the handwriting of the body of the letter did not seem to be an imitation of General Garfield's. The signature alone seemed to be his, and so far as the dot over the letter r in lieu of the letter i was concerned it served to strengthen my belief in its genuineness, because a counterfeiter would have been careful to put the dot in the right place. The opinions expressed in the letter, as I have already stated, were in entire harmony with the sentiments which I had always supposed General Garfield to hold prior to his letter of acceptance, when the Morey letter bore date. And so, not having any suspicion of forgery, I came to the conclusion that the letter had been written by an amanuensis and signed by General Garfield. But, for greater caution, as soon as I reached my office I took from the files three letters which I had received from General Garfield shortly after the Morey letter was dated, and thus refreshed my memory as to his signature. These letters I subsequently compared with the photograph which meanwhile had been taken of the Morey letter. This comparison did not leave a doubt in my mind as to the signature, and hence I decided to refer to the letter in my speech, and accordingly did so in what I then regarded and still regard as cautious language. If these facts, which were substantially embodied in my testimony, convict me of having formed too hasty a judgment I must accept the censure due to an unintentional indiscretion.

But the question is no longer whether a forgery has been committed, but whether at the time when I examined the letter, when the later developments had not been made, the presumption of authenticity was fairly deducible and fairly deduced. I think it was, especially in view of the fact that on the Philp trial the testimony of the experts left the authenticity of the letter in so much doubt that even Judge Davis was obliged, as he says, to resort to "extrinsic facts" in order to make up his mind on this point.

This brings me to the questions which you proposed in your last number. You ask, first, "Did Mr. Hewitt advise it (the publication of the Morey letter) in good faith and believing the letter to be genuine?"

I answer that I gave no advice whatever either to the publisher of Truth or the National Committee in regard to the publication of the letter, which had, in fact, already been published before I first saw it. But I did believe it to be genuine, and referred to it accordingly in my speech at Chickering Hall on the very evening of the day when I first saw it in print.

To your second question, "Did he advise its publication and circulation for the purpose of damaging General Garfield while himself holding the opinions which it attributed to General Garfield?" I answer that I quoted the letter not for the purpose of injuring General Garfield personally, but for the purpose of showing the hollow nature of the claim made by the Republican orators that they were in favor of protecting American labor against lower rates of wages. And I further answer I did not and do not approve of the doctrine with which the letter closes, as will appear by the following extract from the contemporaneous speech delivered at Chickering Hall, when I did not suppose there would be any controversy as to the authenticity of the letter:

"Now, I have no wish to play the part of a demagogue in this matter, but of one thing I have been persuaded ever since I began to observe the structure of society, and that is that the first object and the highest duty of statesmanship is to secure for the mass of the people the highest possible standard of comfort. This standard cannot be maintained without good wages, and is higher in the United States than in Europe because labor is better paid and can earn more here than there. I shall rejoice if the European standard can be raised, but I do not wish to see our standard lowered. This is no new doctrine with me. It is announced and defended at great length in my report on the French Exposition of 1867, and the interest I have taken in freeing our commercial legislation from its restrictive features is because I believe that labor will be the principal gainer by striking the shackles from trade as fast as it can be done without disturbing existing interests; but I would sacrifice my views and any existing interest if I supposed that this course would diminish and not increase the rewards of labor.

"Hence I do not desire to see our manufacturing interests conserved in the matter of labor by any cheaper labor than the workingmen of this country have to dispose of in order to get a living for themselves and their families."

With this statement I submit my conduct to the candid judgment of your readers, but not without expressing the deep regret which I feel that unlucky chance should have brought me where my opinion was asked in regard to the authenticity of a letter which, so far as I was concerned, was a matter of profound indifference, and in regard to which I never supposed that any controversy could arise. This regret is intensified by the fact that I, rather than General Garfield, have been the victim of the forgery, for he has, notwithstanding, been elected President, while I have had the singular experience of a denunciation from the bench in a case to which I was not a party, in which I had no hearing, before a judge who seemed to confound the witness with the alleged criminal. I have, therefore, more reason than General Garfield "to hunt the rascal down" and to insist that due punishment shall be meted out to those who have violated the law. ABRAM S. HEWITT.

NEW YORK, November 24, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the final judgment which is to be passed on this miserable affair, and on those who are responsible for it, it is necessary to consider what would have happened had the votes of the States influenced by the forgery turned the scale of the election. This is, of course, the vital point of the whole matter, and cannot be kept too steadily in view.

The official returns show that the Democratic electors chosen in California received majorities varying from 63 to 143, which last is the highest majority obtained by any of them. It does not admit of a doubt that the number of votes influenced by the Morey forgery largely exceeded these small figures. It is also quite probable that the letter changed the vote in New Jersey, and almost certain that it did so in Nevada. In New Jersey the large (proportionate) difference between the votes cast for Garfield and those for Mr. Potts seems to indicate the Morey letter's influence. And it seems not unreasonable to suppose that at least a small proportion of those influenced to change their votes for President carried this change also into their vote for Governor. If even only one in three or four of those influenced did this it would explain the loss to the Republicans of both the President's and the Governor's vote in New Jersey.

Even independently, however, of these very probable suppositions the case is a clear one. If the Democrats had carried New York the Republican electoral vote would have been reduced to 178, lacking 7 of a majority. Of the three Northern States carried by the Democrats any two would have given more than the needed 7 votes.

The Republicans then would have found themselves in the position of having been choused out of their success by a proved and admitted fraud. This, it is to be observed, is a widely different matter from being defeated by a fraudulent election, because if in an election the fraud can be proved the election can be set aside; but in a matter like the forged letter the evil done is irreparable. The letter has been pronounced a forgery by the courts, but its work cannot be touched: the vote of California will be counted for Hancock, and would have been even if it had been in a position to turn the scale.

Supposing, then, the vote of New York to have been cast for Hancock, the Republican party would have found themselves defeated by a very narrow vote obtained by the other side through a confessed forgery. Would they have submitted or resisted? Probably they would have submitted, but it cannot be certain. With the certainty that their candidate should have been chosen with a decided majority of the popular vote, with a President of their own in power, and with Republican governors in all the more powerful States, the temptation to resist villany by force would have been enormous.

This much, at least, is certain, that the country would have been kept in an uproar from election day to March, with a possibility of civil war to follow. There would have been at least a prostration of every business interest in the country, and a discussion and consideration of violence as a remedy for wrong, such as would in itself have been an evil of great magnitude.

This, then, is the result which Mr. Hewitt and his friends labored to bring about. If it is not now upon us it is only because their efforts were but partially successful. The Morey letter, given to the public by a low newspaper, amounted to but little; vouched for by Mr. Hewitt and the National Democratic Committee, it necessarily had immense weight. The one thing which it essentially needed was the firm support of a man like Mr. Hewitt, in whom his adversaries (his friends did not need to be influenced) might place confidence. How entirely this support was given and resolutely maintained after Mr. Garfield had positively denied the authorship, every one knows.

No one not belonging to the highest class of politicians, and possessing a reputation such as Mr. Hewitt had until lately, could have gained credence for this forgery. Being willing to avail himself of that reputation for such purposes, he must submit to the judgment on his conduct which has been formed by honorable men of all parties. It is, in fact, difficult to know which most to condemn—the object sought, or the means employed to compass it.—Very truly, M. C. L.

MORE MORAL LESSONS OF THE CAMPAIGN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a further contribution to the moral history of the recent political campaign I desire to call attention to the following publication, which in the form of a card was issued from the Republican National Headquarters in New York, and distributed by thousands in New York City, Brooklyn, and probably other places during the week prior to the election:

"From a Pamphlet issued by

"THE FREE-TRADE CLUB OF LONDON.

"'Let it be understood once for all that the salvation of England depends upon the destruction of American manufactures, and that the only possible way in which American manufactures can be destroyed is by free-trade. This can only come through Democracy, and Democracy can only secure control of this Republic by the votes of Irishmen. How England must laugh in her sleeve as she sees the men who left their homes vowing vengeance serve her interests by working for a party which, if it gets control of the country, will inevitably carry out the policy she most desires.'"

It seems hardly necessary to assert that this alleged extract was never extracted from anything, and that the whole publication was a fraud, and as much a forgery as the Chinese letter attributed to General Garfield. The intrinsic evidence to this effect is alone sufficient to establish the truth of this assertion, for no person or paper really favoring free-trade would ever be foolish enough to indulge in utterances so stupid and untrue, and so likely to be used to the prejudice of the very object which it was desired to promote. But, apart from this, the direct evidence is complete, for there is no organization publicly known as the "Free-Trade Club of London," and what does not exist and never has existed of course could not have issued any pamphlets. If the author of the forgery meant in using the term "Free-Trade Club of London" to designate thereby (as he probably did) the Cobden Club of England (which, by the way, is not exclusively devoted to the advocacy of free-trade), then I simply deny that this organization has ever made or authorized any such publication, or that there is anything in any of the numerous economic essays which it has published that is characterized in even the remotest degree by sentiments akin to those expressed in the card in question.

Under these circumstances it is somewhat difficult to see wherein the wrong and immorality of this forgery differ in either kind or degree from those involved in the forged Chinese letter, which the whole community is very justly called upon to reprobate and punish. The animus in both cases was the same—namely, to deceive intentionally with the expectation of influencing votes—with this difference: that the Chinese-letter forgery was probably the work of confessed rascals, while the "Free-Trade Club of London" forgery was, with equal probability, the work of men who would scorn to be characterized as other than gentlemen. Furthermore, there is every reason to believe that ten voters were influenced by the latter fraud where one was imposed upon by the former. But it makes an amazing amount of difference in politics as well as in farming whose bull does the goring.

MARCH OF REFORM IDEAS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your correspondent who objects to my suggestion that voters should sometimes "disfranchise" themselves in the interest of civil-service reform should remember that it was made four weeks ago, and in expectation of an eight years' fight. But the matter has grown eight years in those four weeks, and the suggestion which might have been proper then is out of place now.

Four weeks ago the feeling in favor of reform in the civil service was mainly confined to the readers of a few large journals. Other voters were carefully instructed by their newspapers of both parties that this was a cry raised by a few doctrinaires, undeserving of any serious reflection. You do not know, but some of your correspondents know, the flat impossibility of obtaining even a discussion of the question in local papers. In other respects, contributions, with a free choice of subjects, were eagerly accepted; but that subject was tabu. And so the mass of the people knew nothing about it. Now you can hardly open one of the brighter and stronger Democratic papers without finding all the ridicule of the editorial shaft expended, not on civil-service reformers, but on the stupid persons who cannot see that civil-service reform is the one burning need of American politics. The door, which seemed shut for years to come, is wide open at last, when and where it was least expected; and I hope never to have to "disfranchise" myself again.

Notes.

R. WORTHINGTON will publish Mr. Swinburne's new volume, 'Studies in Song'; 'Pictures and Painters'—lives of the chief artists of the English school; and a new edition of a work out of print, 'Pompeii, its Remains and Re-Discovery.'——New stories by Mrs. Burnett and Mr. Cable will be begun in the February Scribner's. The publishers of this magazine are bringing out for the holidays a new portfolio of proof impressions from the cuts in Scribner's and in St. Nicholas. The edition will be limited to 1,500 copies.——Professor R. B. Anderson's 'Norse Mythology' is being translated into Italian for publication at Milan next year.——The J. B. Burr Publishing Co., Hartford, have completed, by the issue of the second volume, their American edition of Smith and Cheetham's 'Dictionary of Christian Antiquities,' of the merits of which we have already spoken in No. 603 of the Nation. We observe that the present volume bears an American copyright, owing to the collaboration of American scholars. The more important of its articles are Lectionary, Litany, Lord's Day, Holy Orders, Monastery, Money, Music, Names, Obsequies of the Dead, Parish, Penitence, Pope, Slavery, Social Life, Tombs, Wonders, and Years.——A new revised and enlarged edition of Marion Harland's 'Common Sense in the Household' has been printed from fresh plates by Charles Scribner's Sons.——D. Appleton & Co. publish a 'Brief Synopsis of the Collection Laws of the United States and Canada,' whose utility is obvious. Twenty set questions are asked and answered under each State in turn; an arrangement far better than tabulation.——A novel and very convenient 'Conspectus of the History of Political Parties and the Federal Government,' compiled by Prof. Walter R. Houghton, of Indiana University, has been published by Granger, Davis & Co., Indianapolis. The form is folio. The text consists of a brief summary of Colonial, Revolutionary, and Confederation issues and parties, with the chief political events, followed by short accounts of each administration since 1789, and the main statistics of each Presidential election. This is succeeded by the full text of party platforms (including the famous Kentucky and Virginia Resolutions of 1798–9), and by lists of governors. From the 'Census Atlas' is borrowed the graphic colored chart of revenue, expenditures, and public debt; there is a colored political map of the United States, showing party preponderance in each Congressional district; and a folded chart showing the development and course of parties, in snake-like forms, the complexion of each Congress and the length of its session, and much other information ingeniously stowed away. We have noticed a slight error in the account of the rise of the Liberty party, but on the whole this 'Conspectus' is to be recommended for reference.——The Navy Department has, since its determination of West India longitudes by telegraph in 1877, continued the work, and now issues a set of determinations for the east coast of South America by way of Lisbon, Madeira, and Cape Verde Islands. Pernambuco, Bahia, Rio, Montevideo, Buenos Ayres, and Pará are the stations described.——The American Art Review for November opens with an interesting account of several Cincinnati artists—Farny, Duveneck, and Drake—of whose works several samples are given. The American etching, "November," is by Samuel Parrish, and in feeling and design well accords with its name. The foreground is least successful in execution. Mrs. Clement traces the career of the Belgian painter Wiertz, and there is the usual miscellany of news, correspondence, and bibliography.——The Harvard Register will either be suspended at the close of the present year or be converted into a magazine at a higher price. We trust it will find the requisite support. Two articles in the November number merit special attention: that describing the new debating society called the Harvard Union, and the list of female benefactors to the college from its inception—a list which may be expected to lengthen as the Annex prospers.——The issue of the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal for October 14 is called an "educational number," and, in fact, gives a large amount of useful information about the chief medical schools of this country and of Europe, and two original articles on "American Anatomy Acts" and the "Regulation of the Practice of Medicine in the United States."——The current number of the American Naturalist announces the consolidation of the American Entomologist with that journal, in which it will be represented by a new department under the conduct of Dr. C. V. Riley. This seems to be a wise step. The leading paper of this number, copiously illustrated, is on the "Extinct Cats of America," by Prof. E. D. Cope.——In the September-October number of the Library Journal the most suggestive paper is perhaps Mr. S. S. Green's on the "Relation of the Public Library to the Public Schools." The report of the Edinburgh meeting of the United Kingdom Association fills 25 pages. The Journal states that Poole's Index is nearly ready for the press, and that a publisher has been found for it.——The first Bulletin of the Institut Géographique International announces the details of an Italian expedition to the South Pole, under the auspices of Commander Cristoforo Negri and Lieut. Bove, a companion of Nordenskjöld's in the voyage of the Vega. The expedition will leave Genoa by the end of March, 1881, and will be absent three years.——The sixth volume of the annual 'Almanach des Spectacles' comes to us this year later than ever. It is still the same succinct account of the faits et gestes of the French stage, and the same beautiful specimen of book-making: type, paper, and presswork are all well-nigh perfection. The frontispiece this year is a portrait of Mlle. Jeanne Samary etched by M. Lalauze. The little volume resembles its predecessors in all respects save that it contains an interesting and instructive table of the gross receipts of the chief Parisian theatres for each of the past nine years.——The Cofley Medal of the Royal Society of London has been given to Professor J. J. Sylvester, of Baltimore. The medal was founded upon a bequest of Sir Godfrey Cofley in 1709. It was first awarded by the society to Dr. Benjamin Franklin in 1753. In recent years it has been given to Louis Agassiz and J. D. Dana in America, and to Darwin, Helmholtz, Bernard, Clausius, and others abroad. Former mathematical medallists have been Waring (1784), Ivory (1814), Gauss (1838), Sturm (1841), Chasles (1865), Plücker (1866).

—"Our Monthly Gossip" in the December Lippincott's, by a happy coincidence with Scribner's, takes up the subject of the Civil-Service Reform Association by way of directing attention to a paper in the number entitled "Will Democracy Tolerate a Permanent Class of National Office-holders?" It is urged that what the agitation needs and hitherto has lacked is a reflecting opposition which will create and enliven discussion, and so annihilate the apathy of which the people are accused. This is possibly true, though an intelligent and sincere opposition to the reform it seems a trifle chimerical to hope for. It is hardly possible to object to it on theoretical grounds: à priori the case seems pretty clear. Empirically it is even stronger, and only vague and sentimental considerations can be urged with much sincerity. The writer of the article referred to uses such, but not as strongly as he should, we think, if he is to provoke discussion; indeed, his not signing his views, considering what the latter are, and how many shrewd young reformers there are just now, almost throws suspicion on their genuineness. For example, he uses "politics" in the sense of office-getting entirely, so far as we can see; deplores the "political" stagnation that would follow the destruction of the spoils prize-system; deplores "a permanent" class as such, and as he would a bogy, without showing logically or by illustration the evils inherent in "permanency" and explaining why he does not also object to the permanent class of bank clerks, say, or clergymen; and, finally, cites the local "political activity" in Pennsylvania, where eighty thousand men fill or seek township and other offices as—if we make him out—a wholesome state of affairs which permanent national office-holders would somehow stab in the back. Positive propagandism seems more promising to us, we confess, than the discussion which this could lead to. There are two short stories, of which one is good; two illustrated articles, of which Mr. Richardson's "Our Grandfathers' Temples" is interesting, as naturally it could not fail to be; "Adam and Eve" concludes in a diminuendo of merit; Dr. Wood's last paper on "Automatism" is excellent popular science; and Mr. J. Brander Matthews furnishes the literary article of the number in some historico-critical causerie concerning "The Authors of 'Froufrou,'" that is lightly written (which of course the character of its copious information does not prevent), and has possibly the additional attraction of being pertinent to the Bernhardt season.

—In the International Review for December the Rev. R. W. Dale, of Birmingham, repeats the warning about the Roman Catholic danger to our public schools which he first uttered some two years ago in his 'Impressions of America.' His concern seems to have increased in the meantime; he thinks we are curiously blind to peril that is at least possible. "If nothing else will arouse you," he has the air of saying, "think of this argument": "What would happen if any of the more powerful of the Protestant churches—the Presbyterians, the Methodists, or the Episcopalians—began to establish schools of their own, and joined the Catholics in demanding aid from city and State funds?" "If the idea once took possession of a few strong and fervent men belonging to any of the great Protestant churches," he goes on, "that the day-school might be made a powerful auxiliary of the Church," they might make a determined effort to get public funds for their own schools, and then, the principle being admitted, it can readily be inferred what would follow. Mr. Dale is a good friend of America, but superficially it seems the act of an enemy to put such ideas into the heads of our strong and fervent Protestants. Hitherto they have apparently been innocent of such, and Mr. Dale himself observed in his book about America that they are not as militant as their English analogues and "live at home—not in a camp." Indeed, we cannot help thinking that to this paper (which for the rest gives some blue-book information about English elementary schools) some remarks made in an article by Mr. Edward Atkinson further on might be found applicable, though Mr. Atkinson strikes us as rather too abrupt in manner to be effective in winning over an adversary. He entitles his article, "A Reply to Professor Bonamy Price," who recently in this Review ascribed our depression after 1873 to our consumption rather than over-production, and he sets out by saying bluntly that among British anomalies "we may name a certain insularity or narrowness of thought on economic questions, accompanied by a world-wide practice in the economic field of commerce." Professor Price's paper he thinks is an apt illustration, and Mr. Atkinson himself is sure that the whole trouble lay in the irredeemability of our currency. January 1, 1879, witnessed a complete change, but all that had really happened was that "the lawful money of the country had ceased to be a lie." Nothing whatever is said about Providence and the crops, which will disgust the pietists and please Mr. Sherman, but we don't doubt Professor Price's remaining as obstinate as ever. Dr. Felix Oswald discusses "The Drink Problem" from the obsta principiis stand-point, tea, coffee, and paregoric being principia, we infer; Mr. D. G. Thompson writes, with all the competence which thorough acquaintance with his subject affords, of "English Philosophy and English Philosophers," and is as complimentary to Plato and Aristotle, to whom he has frequent occasion to refer, as is consistent with justice to the superior "concrete results" of Mill, Bain, and Spencer; "Alexander von Humboldt in Politics," by Karl Blind, is good enough to witness that it might have been a great deal better; "Bush Life—I.," by Walter Chamberlain, M.P., of Birmingham, is much more than a mere account of Australian adventure, though it is that too. The "Contemporary Literature" (its last appearance, we understand) cannot be said to go out in a blaze of glory.

—American astronomy has sustained a severe loss by the sudden death of Prof. James Craig Watson, Director of the Washburn Observatory at Madison, Wisconsin. Professor Watson first became known more than twenty years ago, while a pupil of Dr. Brünnow at Ann Arbor, by his computations of cometary and planetary orbits. In 1863 he succeeded Dr. Brünnow as director of the Observatory of the University of Michigan. For some years he devoted much of his attention to the search for small planets, and introduced such improvements in the method of search that for a while he was the most successful observer in the work. In 1868 he was elected a member of the National Academy of Sciences. In the same year was published his treatise on 'Theoretical Astronomy,' probably the most extended work on the theories of the celestial motions that has yet been produced by an American author. In 1874 he was chief of the American party to observe the transit of Venus at Pekin, and signalized his stay in China by discovering a new planet with the telescope which he took out for his observations. In 1878 he observed the total eclipse of the sun in Wyoming, and there made his celebrated observations on supposed intra-Mercurial planets, which have since been the subject of so much discussion and such diversity of opinion among astronomers. Notwithstanding the curious coincidence that the distance and direction of his supposed planets corresponded closely with two well-known stars in their neighborhood, he firmly maintained the reality of his discovery, and the last few months of his life were devoted to the design of an instrument for making farther searches. About a year ago he removed from Ann Arbor to Madison, where he had been charged with the direction of the new observatory now approaching completion. His robust health and physical and mental energy gave every promise of a long and active life, and his death at the age of forty-two is a surprise to a wide circle of acquaintances at home and abroad.

—No holiday publication of the present season will, it is safe to say, surpass in extrinsic or intrinsic qualities Prof. Georg Ebers's 'Egypt, Descriptive, Historical, and Picturesque,' of which Cassell, Petter & Galpin have begun the issue in thirty monthly parts. So noble a work could not remain hidden in the German tongue in which it was written, and Miss Clara Bell's translation now places it within the reach of all readers, if not of all buyers. Dr. Birch furnishes an introduction, which will apparently be printed with the latest part, and notes. The size is folio, and the wood-engravings, of which there are to be some eight hundred, are of the first order. These illustrate the scenery, the inhabitants, buildings, statues, coins, relics, etc., etc., and are in the highest degree artistic and authentic. Not that some of the designs are not imaginative restorations; that was to be expected in the work of an author so saturated with his subject that he has produced several historical novels relating to Ancient Egypt. For the rest, the text, while thoroughly popular, and as readable as a novel, reposes upon the sure scholarship and research of Prof. Ebers, one of the younger but also one of the foremost living Egyptologists. In short, in whatever aspect this work is considered, it completely satisfies the ideal of book-making. The narrative opens pleasantly at Ancient Alexandria. Another literary undertaking of magnitude is the 'Hundred Greatest Men of History,' compassed in eight folio volumes, with biographical letter-press and more than a hundred portraits. The American publishers, Fords, Howard & Hulbert, have just brought out two, the first with an introduction by Matthew Arnold, who defends the selection of the poets for the leading division, because they represent what is most solid and enduring in human interest—more so than the plastic arts, or science, or philosophy (Goethe as against the shifting German philosophic systems since his birth), or religion as commonly conceived (Shakspere against the Thirty-nine Articles), though not more indestructible than that religion which is "morality touched with emotion." M. Taine's introduction to the second volume (of artists) is given in French as well as in English, and is a sort of rhapsody on the way in which the great masters have interpreted the races to which they belong. Mr. Emerson will have the American introduction, and so on. As to the choice of the hundred men, it would be idle to criticise it, for a single criterion is not applicable. It is enough to say that Washington, Franklin, and Jefferson are the three Americans admitted to the sacred company—certainly a fair proportion for a society less than three centuries old. Of the portraits there seems just ground for complaint that they are so largely taken at second hand, from engravings or sketches in black and white, when in the case of all the antiques the original busts could as well have been photographed, and in most others the original paintings. This neglect to go to the sources both weakens the authenticity of the portraits and gives an air of cheapness to a rather costly enterprise.

—Boïto's "Mefistofele," which was performed last week at the Academy of Music for the first time in this country, opens a new era in the history of Italian operatic music. Boïto does not follow in the footsteps of Verdi, who, in his last works, "Macbeth," "Don Carlos," and "Aïda," broke away from the traditions of the past, but has created a school of his own. If the influence of any other composer can be recognized in this extraordinary work it should be Liszt's, whose manner of instrumentation and construction seems to have made a stronger impression on the Italian master than that of anybody else. To begin with, the choice and arrangement of the libretto form a revolution in the accepted Italian style. Boïto has attempted to compass within the narrow limits of an evening's performance some of the principal situations of both parts of Goethe's 'Faust,' which to those acquainted with the poem gives a perfectly clear idea of the Faust legend, though to others it must be a mystery how Margaret is transformed into Helen of Troy, and old mother Martha becomes the beautiful Pantalis. The opera consists of a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue. The prologue corresponds with the "Prologue in Heaven" of the poem. Boïto's representation of this scene is exceedingly impressive. The stage shows a background of clouds from behind which sound the voices of the heavenly choir. Mephistopheles appears, and in a highly dramatic recitative asks leave to lead Faust in his own way to taste the fruits of sin. The dialogue is an almost literal translation of the German poem. After Mephistopheles retires a magnificent ten-part chorus, consisting of the angels and earthly penitents, is heard. The finale of this scene, with the full orchestra and harp arpeggios supporting the swelling notes of the chorus, is one of the most effective that have ever been heard on the operatic stage. The first act leads us to the meadows outside the old city of Frankfort, where all classes are assembling to greet the first day of spring on the beautiful Easter Sunday morning. The scene is delightfully bright and full of life, and the music of the choruses of students, soldiers, and citizens with their families is admirably expressive of the merrymaking of a light-hearted crowd. Faust's entrance, "Al soave raggiar di primavera," accompanied by reed instruments and harps, is a lovely and singular piece of melody. The appearance of Mephistopheles in the garb of a gray friar is marked by a gloomy harmony of horns and bassoons. While the merry strains of the chorus die away in the distance Faust and Wagner leave the stage, with the evil spirit following in their wake. The next scene brings us to Faust's laboratory. His entrance, "Dai campi, dai prati" is perhaps the most melodious number of the opera, and was sung by Signor Campanini with great fire and expression. Mephistopheles enters. His pact with Faust is a wild rhapsodical dialogue. Boïto calls in the help of bells and cymbals to give effect to this weird scene, which ends with the triumphant cry of the fiend carrying Faust away on his outspread cloak. The second act presents Margaret's garden, where she meets Faust for the first time. Signor Boïto does not know how to make love, for this pretty scene, so charming in Gounod's treatment of it, is dull and unsympathetic compared with other parts of the opera. His Faust is a cold lover and his Margaret an uninteresting girl. The finale of the scene, a quartet by Faust, Margaret, Martha, and Mephistopheles, is the redeeming feature of the act. The third act is the Walpurgis Night on the Brocken. If we shut our eyes to the absurdities that are going on on the stage—witches and hobgoblins dressed like Sioux Indians or Spanish gipsies—one can enjoy the strange music answering to the witches' sabbath in the Hartz Mountains. The next act takes place in Margaret's prison, and two numbers of it deserve particular mention for the unusual beauty of their melody and harmony: Margaret's song, "L'altra notte," and the duet with Faust, "Lontano, lontano!"—two remarkably touching situations. But the crowning point of the work is the fourth act, the Classical Walpurgis Night, in which Signor Boïto reveals the most delightful qualities of his genius. The serene loveliness of Grecian beauty, compared with the fiendish brutality of the Northern sabbath, is exquisitely expressed in every bar of this great act. The opening duet, Helen and Pantalis, "La luna immobile," the quartet, "Forma ideal," and the finale, "Amore misterio," are unsurpassed in delicacy. The epilogue, Faust's Death, reintroduces some of the leading subjects of the former acts, and is rather weak after the transcendent effects of the previous scene. To sum up: "Mefistofele" is a work of the highest dramatic interest, with not a dull moment, nor a vulgarism, nor a platitude in it. The hearer is spell-bound from the mighty angelic chorus of the prologue to the closing scene, where a shower of roses hides the dying Faust from the eyes of the tempter. The instrumentation is brilliant throughout, and Boïto gives ample proof that he is a master not only of melody but of dramatic recitative.

—In Germany the two most important musical events up to date have been the production of two new operas—Theodore Henschel's "Lancelot" in Leipzig, and Rubinstein's "Daemon" in Hamburg. "Lancelot," in a review of recent musical events in Leipzig in Unsere Zeit for November, is even called the best work yet produced by the young Wagnerian dramatic school. Although by no means a mere echo of Wagnerian ideas and style, it yet in every way shows the influence of that master. This is indicated by the very title, the subject being derived from the same mythical source to which Wagner owes several of his works. The writer considers the ensemble parts to be the best features of the opera, the chorus being managed after the style of "Lohengrin." The solo parts he considers less good, while the instrumentation again is subdued though effective. The reception was favorable, but as the work is pronounced far superior to Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba," it will, in accordance with a well-known law of human nature, require a longer time to reach other cities than that pompous but superficial work, or the inane operas of Ignaz Brüll. This same law has prevented Rubinstein's "Nero" from being accepted by the various German capitals. After its immense success in Hamburg last year, as shown by the numerous repetitions and the commendations of Hans von Bülow and other critics present, one would have thought that at least Vienna, Berlin, Leipzig, and Munich would immediately secure it for their stage; but although at first there was some talk about its being under consideration in Vienna and Berlin, nothing has been heard about it since. In Berlin it has been laid aside for the ostensible reason that Niemann, the tenor, is unwilling to shave off his beard! M. Pollini, the manager of the Hamburg opera, who by his enterprise and keen artistic perception of what people want, has in a few years raised that institution into the front rank, has again secured the gratitude of Hamburg music-lovers by following up last year's triumph with Rubinstein's "Daemon." Rubinstein is an immense favorite with the Hamburgers. He is reported to have said that his treatment in Hamburg fully atoned for the insulting attitude of the Berlin authorities, and has expressed his willingness to assist in the production of a new work of his in Hamburg at any time, whatever his engagements or whereabouts. In accordance with this promise he was on the ground in due time to direct the last rehearsals and first three performances of the "Daemon." H. Ehrlich, the Berlin critic, went over to Hamburg, and gives in the Tageblatt and the Vienna Freie Presse an amusing account of a little bit of "human nature" which Rubinstein betrayed on the occasion of the first public performance. The first act, which is quite inferior to the other two, was somewhat coldly received by the audience. The second has a magnificent duet and many other fine passages, so that at the end there was a perfect storm of applause and calls for Rubinstein, which lasted fully ten minutes. But the Russian lion, spite of all entreaties of manager and artists, refused to appear before the curtain, because the audience had so coldly received the first act. Instead of obeying the calls of the people he spent the interval in remonstrating with the régisseur because the ballet-dancers did not have Siberian fur-caps on their heads. At the beginning of the last act hisses were heard, as a sign that the audience were not quite satisfied with the behavior of their spoiled child. Of the opera itself Ehrlich says that though dramatically inferior to "Nero," musically it ranks higher. The subject itself is thoroughly Russian, and will never appeal to Germans as strongly as to the people of the Russian capital, where it has for many years been a popular opera. As in most of Rubinstein's larger works, the lyrical and oratorio spirit rules supreme. But it must be remembered that in his successive stage works Rubinstein has acquired more and more dramatic skill, and though the Semitic spirit, which is essentially undramatic, may prevent him from reaching the highest perfection of dramatic art, yet his works serve as an agreeable change from those of Wagner, which, as the writer in Unsere Zeit above referred to justly complains, are threatening to assume a complete monopoly of the stage in Germany.

—The long and impatiently-awaited results of the Challenger circumnavigating expedition finally begin to make their appearance. The first volume of the zoölogical reports, prefaced with a "general introduction" by the director of the civilian scientific staff, Sir Wyville Thomson, and containing memoirs by Brady, Davidson, Günther, Kölliker, Moseley, Parker, and Turner, is now ready for distribution, and three more volumes of equal magnitude, according to Professor Huxley (Nature, Nov. 4), are still to appear in the course of the current year. At this rate of progress the completion of the work may be looked for in about four years. It is now more than four years since the Challenger returned from her celebrated cruise and nearly eight since she started from Sheerness, but with the exception of the information received through the various abstract papers scattered in the transactions of learned societies, and the more or less popular narratives of Sir Wyville Thomson, Moseley, Spry, and Wild, the scientific world has hitherto been kept in pretty thorough darkness both as to the absolute and the generally systematic results of the expedition. The apparently unavoidable delay in the publication of the results is no doubt due to the vast amount of material acquired during the voyage and to the difficulties which attach to the conscientious elaboration of such a heterogeneous store. In the period of three years and six months the Challenger traversed a distance of more than 68,000 nautical miles, and the officers of the ship during that time collected zoölogical specimens which fill alone, in alcohol, 4,019 glass jars, large and small, 1,860 glass tubes, and 176 tin cases; the non-alcoholic specimens occupying 22 casks and 180 tin cases. The apportionment of this biological invoice among the recognized chiefs in the various special departments of zoölogical research on the Continent and in this country, as well as in Great Britain, bringing into active co-operation many of the most eminent scientific investigators of the day, though there is ample precedent for it, has been severely commented upon by a portion of the British press, and has given rise to considerable controversy, and still more bitter feeling, between the defenders of this course and those native naturalists who feel their dignity wounded by the preference shown to foreign competitors. It appears to open a question as to what constitutes the national "rights" of scientific men; and although it has, we believe, received the disinterested approval, among others, of such men as Darwin and Huxley, and conversely has incurred the interested attacks of Professor Duncan, ex-President of the Geological Society, it may yet be doubtful whether it would not have been judicious to attach greater national importance to an enterprise upon which the British Government so lavishly bestowed its favors. There is good reason to believe that, as it is, scientists will not be disappointed as to the results obtained, whether directly or indirectly, by the "best-equipped voyagers who ever left the shores of England for the purpose of enlarging the bounds of natural knowledge."

—In the Fortnightly Review for November a contributor discusses the future of Switzerland in a novel and startling manner. He charges the Swiss with relying for defence almost exclusively upon the guaranty of neutrality they have received; and what is true of them in this respect is, we suppose, still more the case with the rest of the world, which deems the position of Switzerland settled for all time. The writer has no difficulty in showing this assumption to be unwarranted, and he expects that a result of the next war in Western Europe will be the partition of the country among its four great neighbors. The French and Germans, he says, have so fortified their frontier that it will be impossible for either of them to get at the other except by a flank movement—i. e., by passing through either Belgium or Switzerland. Military as well as political reasons would prevent their choosing the former country, while the latter has everything to recommend it as a theatre of war—wealth, railways, natural advantages, and an open frontier. "It is now well known," our writer asserts, "that in 1870 General Bourbaki had orders, as a last resource, to cross the frontier, and lead his army through Switzerland into Southern Germany." One would like chapter and verse for this statement, but the further assertion that the French offensive in the next war will begin by this movement is by no means improbable. Owing to the entire absence of fortifications and a trained army, the Swiss would be as little capable of defence as they were in 1798; and after the country had once more become the battlefield of Europe, it would be impossible, the Fortnightly thinks, to give back to its inhabitants the neutrality they are unable to defend. Besides this, the conditions are now much more favorable to partition, and the temptations greater. The only great Powers uninterested would be England and Russia; but England is too far away, and Russia hates Switzerland for its harboring revolutionary propagandists. This dangerously favored region would then no longer excite, by its example, discontent at home; the great railways would fall into the hands of the Governments whose subsidies have built them; and, owing to the differences of language and religion, there would be no dispute about the division of the spoil. Our author does not mention it, but it is interesting also to remember that the nominal and, to a large extent, the real reason for the partition of Poland was its inability to prevent the passage of belligerents.

—The mail brings us intelligence of the death, in Christiania, of Magnus Brostrup Landstad, one of Norway's greatest poets. He was born October 7, 1802, and died on the eve of completing his seventy-eighth year. Landstad was a priest of the national church, and as such enjoyed a wide reputation, but his enduring fame rests upon his important contributions to the literature of his country. He was reckoned one of the twelve great Norwegian poets of this century. He was a fine psalmist, and in this capacity he published a hymn-book which, in 1869, was authorized to be used in the public religious services, and has since been introduced into nearly every parish in Norway. In 1853 he published his collection of Norwegian ballads ('Norske Folkeviser'), a work of the highest rank, filling more than 900 large octavo pages. It is fully interpreted and annotated, and reveals a poet thoroughly in love with his subject. Landstad did for Norwegian ballads what Asbjörnson in Norway and the Grimms in Germany did for Kinder- und Hausmärchen—rescued them from oblivion. His lyric poems constitute a small but very attractive volume.

STEWART AND LONG'S PLUTARCH.*

IN November, 1765, Thomas Hollis, "an Englishman, an Assertor of Liberty, Citizen of the World," writes from Pall Mall, London, that he "is desirous of having the honor to present to the Public Library of Harvard College, at Cambridge in New England, Plutarch's Lives, a work which, at school, he read avidly at times he might have slept, and to which he afterwards became indebted for the honestest and finest dispositions of his mind." He sent the "Dryden Translation," in the revised edition of 1758, which, as revised and corrected by Clough, and published in Boston in 1859, still remains the standard translation of 'Plutarch's Lives.' We agree with Mr. Stewart in thinking that "no apologies are needed for a new edition of so favorite an author." Indeed, in view of the many excellent friends of classical learning whose only bond of union with Greece and Rome is their English Plutarch, it is quite time that there should be a translation of the famous Lives which, without sacrificing the sprightly flavor of the old translations, should yet answer the demands of modern scholarship more fully than these in accuracy of thought and expression. The lack of such an English version, however, is one which Plutarch still suffers in common with both Plato and Aristotle.

Mr. Stewart now gives us the first volume of a new translation, undertaken by him "by way of complement" to the translation of thirteen Lives made by Mr. Long in 1844. To determine the absolute as well as the relative value of the new work, we must compare it not only with the Greek, but with Clough's revision of the "Dryden" Plutarch. We have turned first (quite at random) to the beginning of the Life of Solon. In the first chapter we notice that about one-third is omitted. Perhaps this is no loss; but some warning of such expurgation should be given, especially as Mr. Long tells us in his preface (p. xvi.) that he has attempted to give all Plutarch's meaning, "and neither more nor less," and that he has "not intentionally added to it or detracted from it." Here Clough has given the general sense of the whole chapter. In chapter ii. Clough's version: "It is certain that he was a lover of knowledge, for when he was old he would say that he is surely better and much nearer the original than Stewart's: "He was, indeed, eager to learn, as he wrote when an old man,

"'Each day grew older, and learnt something new,'"

"'Old to grow, but ever learning.'"

Just below, Clough's six lines give little more than we find in the five and a half verses of Solon quoted by Plutarch, which Stewart's three short lines translate very imperfectly, omitting silver, horses, mules, shoes, and a young child, which appear in the original, and adding wine, which is not found there. In chapter iii. Stewart makes Solon say, "The base are rich, the good are poor"; Clough, "Some wicked men are rich, some good are poor"; Solon wrote "many wicked" and "many good men." In the same chapter Clough correctly translates: "In philosophy, he chiefly esteemed the political part of morals." Stewart gives us: "Of ethical philosophy, he was most interested in that branch which deals with political obligations." In chapter v. Stewart gives as Solon's words: "Men keep covenants, because it is to the advantage of neither party to break them"; where Clough translates correctly: "when neither side can get anything by the breaking of them." In chapter vii. (bottom of p. 134) Stewart has "at the loss of their child," where Clough and the Greek have "when a child . . . is sick or dies." At the end of the chapter Stewart twice has "we do not" for "we should not," where Clough is correct. At the end of the same sentence Stewart omits the words "but (we should guard) by reason against them all," in which the chief point of the remark lies; Clough has, "but by morality and reason." In chapter viii. Stewart has: "Solon sailed to Koilias with Peisistratus, taking with him all the women of the city to perform the customary sacrifice to Demeter." Plutarch says: "Finding there all the women performing the sacrifice," etc., which is given in Clough. In chapter x. Stewart gives: "There is an Athenian tribe which claims descent from Philæus, to which Peisistratus belonged." Clough gives the correct version: "and they have a township of Philaidæ, to which Pisistratus belonged, deriving its name from this Philæus."

In the same chapter we find a more serious mistake, where Stewart gives the following as Solon's argument for the Athenian claim to Salamis:

"For the Megarians bury their dead looking towards the east, and the Athenians towards the west. More conclusive even than this was the fact that each Athenian had a coffin to himself, while the Megarians place two or three bodies in one coffin. Besides this, Solon supported his case by quoting certain oracles," etc.

* 'Plutarch's Lives. Translated from the Greek, with Notes and a Life of Plutarch. By Aubrey Stewart, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and the late George Long, M.A., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.' Vol. I. London: Geo. Bell & Sons. 1880.

The argument is here utterly perverted; but it is plainly and correctly given by Clough:

"Solon took a further argument against the Megarians from the dead bodies, which, he said, were not buried after their fashion, but according to the Athenian; for the Megarians turn the corpse to the east, the Athenians to the west. But Hereas the Megarian denies this, and affirms that they likewise turn the body to the west, and also that the Athenians have a separate tomb for every body, but the Megarians put two or three into one. However, some of Apollo's oracles . . . made much for Solon."

This ancient custom of burying the dead with the face towards the west strikingly confirms the opinion expressed in the Nation of Feb. 14, 1878 (No. 659), p. 117, that the bodies found by Schliemann at Mycenæ with their feet towards the west were really buried in a sitting posture with their faces to the west, and that the (generally sloping) stone walls by which the tombs were artificially shortened were built to support the head and shoulders, and were not (as Schliemann and Gladstone have imagined) the final outrage and insult of Clytemnestra to the bodies of Agamemnon and his friends.

In chapter xii. of the new translation the account of Cylon's conspiracy is confused and inaccurate. When the Cylonian suppliants were descending from the Acropolis, clinging to the cord which connected them with the temple of Athena, we read that "the string broke, and Megakles and the other archons, thinking that the goddess no longer protected them, seized them." Plutarch is careful to say that the string broke "accidentally" (this being a disputed matter), and he says that on the breaking of the string the archons alleged that the goddess refused to accept the Cylonians as suppliants. This is all included in Clough's version. Stewart further translates: "some were stoned to death outside the city"; where it should be "out of sanctuary," as the next words show. Again, Stewart says that the survivors of Cylon's party "continued their intrigues against Megakles and the archons." Plutarch says "the family of Megacles," referring to the line of Solon; and all the following references to the Alcmæonidæ and their banishment from Athens at the motion of Solon are confused by such expressions as "those magistrates who were called accursed" and "the archons." When Stewart gives: "the archons were found guilty, and forced to leave the country," it should be, "the accused were found guilty, and as many as were then alive were banished," as we find it in Clough. In the same chapter both Stewart and Clough make Plutarch say that Anacharsis is reckoned among the Seven Wise Men of Greece "by those who do not admit Periander into their number." This should be "by some of those who," etc., Plato and Plutarch himself being among the exceptions!

In chapter xiii. "personal security" is hardly the same as "giving their persons as security"; and "to set free all debtors" (Stewart) is very different from "to liberate the condemned debtors" (Clough), and the context shows that those who had been taken as slaves for debt are meant. The verses of Solon at the end of chapter xiv., showing what (according to the vulgar) a "man of high spirit" would have done in his place, still need a translator. Stewart's line:

"Though the next day he and his into oblivion were thrown," is tame enough by the side of Clough's (unfortunately translated from an amended text):

"I would give my skin for flaying, and my house to die away."

The words literally rendered are: "He (Solon) would have been content (in the case supposed), after gaining power and acquiring unbounded wealth, and being tyrant of Athens but for a single day, then to let himself be flayed alive and his race be exterminated."

It is but justice to Mr. Stewart's translation to say that the fourteen chapters here examined, although chosen by chance, are hardly a fair specimen of the volume. At least, we have examined passages in the lives of Theseus, Lycurgus, Themistocles, and Pericles, without finding so many points to criticise in the same space. Still, there is always a feeling of uncertainty in treading ground where we are never safe against pitfalls. We point out a few of these, which may serve as a general warning.

In the Life of Themistocles, chapter xix., we read in Stewart that "the Thirty Tyrants destroyed the bema, or tribune, on the place of public assembly, which was built looking towards the sea, and built another which looked inland." Plutarch merely says that "the Thirty turned round the bema in the Pnyx, which was built to look towards the sea, so that it should look inland." As this passage is an important document in the Pnyx controversy, we must protest against an alteration of it which seems to be made in the interest of one party. In the next chapter we have the familiar story of Themistocles confiding to Aristides (by order of the people) his secret plan for burning the Greek fleet at Pagasæ. But the answer of Aristides, that "no proposal could be more politic nor more villanous," is given by Stewart, "that the proposal was a most infamous and villanous one"! In chapter xii. the order of Xerxes to his commanders the night before the battle of Salamis, "to surround the straits on every side" with Persian ships, is omitted; and thus one of the most important movements of the Persians, without a knowledge of which no correct idea of the great battle can be formed, is struck out of the story. In the first sentence of the Life of Theseus: "As in books on geography, Sossius Senecio, the writers crowd the countries, of which they know nothing, into the furthest margins of their maps," the commas enclosing the relative clause are rather severe on ancient geographers. In the Life of Pericles, chapter ix., we find: "These offices [those of the various archons] were by ancient custom obtained by ballot, and it was only through them that a seat in the Senate of the Areopagus could be obtained." Plutarch says: "These offices had from ancient times [i. e., since Cleisthenes] been conferred by lot, and through them those who had approved themselves in the discharge of them were advanced to the Areopagus." In all the passages mentioned in this paragraph Clough's translation is essentially correct. We have looked in vain for passages to offset those above quoted, in which the advantage should be decidedly on the side of the new translation.

Apart from the faults we have noticed, the new translation is generally excellent in its style and clear in its expression of Plutarch's meaning. If Thomas Hollis had sent it to America in 1765 it would have been a great blessing, but after a hundred and fifteen years we feel that we are entitled to something better.

FOWLER'S LOCKE.*

MORE than half of this little volume is biographical, and for this part of it the author acknowledges his obligations to Mr. Fox Bourne's recently published life of the philosopher. Only a single chapter of twenty-five pages is devoted to the 'Essay,' while others are occupied respectively with Locke's opinions on religion and morals and his theological writings; the 'Thoughts on Education,' and the 'Conduct of the Understanding'; and works on government, trade, and finance. Almost no attempt is made to estimate Locke's indebtedness to thinkers who preceded him, and but a few pages are given to describing his influence on subsequent thought. The author has evidently read even the less known of Locke's writings with care, quotes him judiciously, seems generally in sympathy with him, and has written an extremely readable book; but he apparently abandoned at the outset the idea of saying anything new about his subject, and thus rarely comes into close quarters with it, while occasionally there is a certain reticence which savors of constraint, and which is in unfavorable contrast with Huxley's treatment of Hume in the same series.

Half-a-dozen pages of criticism of the 'Essay' constitute the most interesting part of the book. Locke derived all knowledge from the experience of the individual, and could give no other account of the "inherent faculties" needful to acquire it than that God had furnished or "endued" us with them. Kant well said that the problem of the origin of these faculties could not be left here, but, although he attempted an analysis of the à priori element of knowledge, he attempted no explanation of its origin. Fowler admits that this "mystery is removed at least several stages back" by applying the principle of heredity, or, "in one word, of evolution. This explanation may have its difficulties, but it is at any rate an attempt at an explanation where no other such attempt exists." Locke's peculiar contributions "consisted in his skilful and popular delineation of the à posteriori element in knowledge, and in his masterly exposure of the insufficiency of the account of the à priori element as then commonly given." The other defect pointed out in the 'Essay' is the "tendency to bring into undue prominence the passive receptivities of the mind, and to ignore its activity and spontaneity." But now "a more scientific psychology than was possible in Locke's day comes to our aid, and shows, as is done by Mr. Bain and other recent writers, that the nerves, stored with energy, often discharge themselves of their own accord, and that movement is at least as much an original factor in animal life as is sensation, while sometimes it even precedes it in time." With far greater propriety than Descartes, Locke deserves to be called the first to apply the introspective method, while, by his frequent references to the mental processes of children and savages, the comparative method is also suggested.

This is good and true as far as it goes. The earliest questions in mental philosophy were those concerning the essence, constitution, seat, origin, and future state of the soul. These, however, are purely metaphysical questions, which stand behind psychology, and may have perhaps a sort of ulterior justification, but are as unscientific now as if physics, instead of confining itself to the specific phenomena of light, heat, sound, electricity, etc., should squander its energy in reasoning about the ultimate constitution of matter and the nature of force, thus beginning where it should end. This is the old deductive method of the so-called "rational psychology," an example of which we have in this country in Dr. Hickock's well-known text-book having that title. The simplicity, immateriality, unity, and indestructibility of the soul are assumed at the outset, and psychic phenomena are derived from such hypotheses and presuppositions. It is, as Wundt has somewhere observed, because psychologists assumed this method and sought so long for new stand-points and new ideas, hoping that some of them would shed sudden light or bring sudden order into a dark chaos of miscellaneous facts, that psychology remained so long stationery, and, more than any other scientific field, was crowded with prejudices and presuppositions. The great significance of Locke's work is, that it is a standing protest against all forms and applications of this method. It is still profitable reading wherever the insidious old method is yet in vogue. By insisting that the fundamental ideas of the soul were products of experience instead of being innate in the old sense, Locke took the first great step toward making psychology at the same time a natural science and central and fundamental among the mental sciences; for, in proportion as it has been more and more clearly seen that philosophy must rest on experience, like other sciences, psychology has received more attention and acquired greater significance, till, for those who can follow Wundt, "it is scarcely too much to say that all our philosophy is at present psychology." Professor Fowler seems more in sympathy with Locke's own limited views than with those larger historic motives which centre in and were mediated by him.

*'Locke. By Thomas Fowler, Professor of Logic in the University of Oxford.' New York: Harper & Brothers. 1880.

Again, Locke was only a pioneer, or at most the first-fruits, of a true psychology. His was the introspective, or, as it has with but partial justification since been called, empirical method. But self-observation can at best give us but a few of the manifold facts of consciousness. It cannot analyze them into their unconscious elements and causes. It can give them no objective certainty or warrant. Its emphasis is only the casual, relative, and variable one of subjective feeling, interest, etc., so that it is peculiarly liable to the errors of dogmatism and individualism. Introspection can never be relied on to give the true organic connection between its so-called facts of consciousness, and it was for this reason, as it is now commonly said in Germany, that the fashion arose of regarding the various forms of psychic activity as due to distinct, arbitrarily assumed mental powers or faculties so loosely connected that Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel, and their followers readily built them, each in its distinct place, into their vast ideal systems, giving them a factitious logical unity, ignoring their real connection in experience, and almost forgetting that there was such a thing as psychology, because they had assumed that knowledge had no limits and its origin was of no consequence. Locke must take his share of responsibility—not a very great one—for such abuses of his method. His mind was, as Schwegler well says, more acute than profound. He did not see very clearly that introspection is only one of the Baconian methods of induction. The necessity of an experimental psychology, now so well established and so universally recognized in Germany, which thus more than atones for its long neglect or disparagement of Locke, we think would have met with a more cordial recognition from him than it seems to from Professor Fowler, who entirely ignores it, and whose psychologic ken does not range beyond Spencer and Bain. It is much for a professor at conservative Oxford—whence Locke was so unceremoniously expelled two centuries ago—to admit, with however much qualification, that psychology is or can become a natural science. It is this and more. Its facts cannot only be observed, they can be controlled, so that it rests on a basis of experiment. Psycho-physic methods have resolved our sensations into their elements, designated the neural centres and conditions for many processes, measured the time of nearly all the simpler psychic operations, established in tangible neurological terms the difference between normal and pathological action, brought a large number of questions but lately thought to be unanswerable within the range of possible experiment, so that the study of mind is just now the most hopeful and promising of all the departments of science, and greatly improved our conception of such fundamental ideas as time and space, as well as of attention, memory, association, etc. How Locke would have welcomed all this! His soul was too profoundly religious to have shared the shallow fear of materialism, for he even held that God might have, and possibly though not probably had, endowed matter with the power of thought.

Locke is thus the intellectual father of all those who believe that the nature of our faculties is the first and fundamental problem of philosophy, and that psychology relegates most speculative systems to the same limbo to which the earlier theories of vision and audition are consigned by physiological optics and acoustics. Leibnitz, and even Kant, who started from the same assumption as Locke, clung to the belief that there were in knowledge elements of a universality and necessity not to be accounted for by experience or association. What the doctrine of innate ideas was to mind the notions of evolution and heredity now are to character. Children, so it is commonly stated, inherit their fundamental traits, dispositions, etc., from the experience of countless ancestral generations, so that these are irreversible. The child must be instructed rather than trained, and allowed and encouraged to develop his bent freely and without restraint. But not only the exceptional non-development and helplessness of the human infant, but also the long period of growth, immaturity, and teachableness, indicate plainly enough that individualism in this sense is very liable to be only the product of caprice or accident. Against this notion Locke's 'Thoughts on Education' is the most able of protests. Virtue, practical worldly wisdom, good breeding, and last, "though this may seem strange in the mouth of a bookish man," learning, as something which may be easily and incidentally had "into the bargain," are the objects of education in the order of their importance. To this extent character is the product of education, as knowledge is of experience, so that here again Locke is most modern and most German.

BUTLER'S TRANSLATION OF DANTE'S PURGATORY.*

IT is not likely that we shall ever have a final version of Homer or Dante. With the steady change in the use and associations of words, and in the approved poetic diction, a fresh translation will from time to time be required that shall represent the old poem on the terms of the new age. Cary's translation of the 'Divine Comedy' suited the somewhat artificial taste of our grandfathers, Longfellow's answers much better to our modern demand for a less rhetorical and more exact rendering; and since its fidelity to the original is achieved with little sacrifice of grace or dignity of English idiom, it will be long before his work becomes antiquated. The difficulty of making a prose version is hardly less than of one in verse. The late Dr. Carlyle's prose rendering of the 'Inferno' is correct, scholarly, and readable as an English composition, but it not infrequently misses the tone of the original, and, though literally exact, fails in equivalence of style. Here is, indeed, the crucial point. A good translation is a matter not of grammar and dictionary, but of feeling for language, of poetic tact, of apprehension of qualities of style; it requires the art to reproduce subtile distinctions of tone, to preserve the sympathy of word and meaning. And, after all, the best translation is but as the plaster cast to the marble: there are the same forms, but the light is absorbed and reflected by them in different degree.

Dr. Carlyle's version is on the whole so good that Mr. Butler, even had there been no other motive for so doing, was wise in taking the translation of the 'Purgatory' for his task. He has aimed, he says in the Preface, "at the production of a 'crib' pure and simple," and he adds, "where a question has arisen between a literal and an elegant rendering, I have preferred the former, my object being, as I have said, not to attempt an addition to English literature, but to aid beginners in understanding that of Italy. Also, wherever it seemed possible to render an Italian word or idiom by a cognate form in English, I have not scrupled to do so, even at the cost of an occasional archaism." Now, this aim is not only a low one, but Mr. Butler's professed method for its accomplishment is a mistake. A good "crib" must be more than a literal rendering. The letter kills in this as in other instances. Munro's translation of Lucretius, to which Mr. Butler refers, does not afford the justification which he seeks in it. It is much more than a literal version; it is the work of an English not less than a Latin scholar, who knows that cognate forms are often far from being equivalent in significance, and recognizes that qualities of style can only be reproduced by obedience to the genius of the language in which the translation is made. Mr. Butler's performance is superior to what might be expected from his statement of its object and method, and deserves more serious attention from the student of Dante than he has claimed for it.

A protest, however, must be entered against the notion of "'a crib' pure and simple" for the 'Divine Comedy.' Doubtless the poem is often used, or, rather, misused as a text-book for beginners in the language, but the object of those who appreciate Dante's work should be to prevent, much more than to promote, such use of it. The 'Divine Comedy' should be reserved for readers who have made sufficient progress in the Italian tongue to allow them to give their attention chiefly to its poetic significance and its moral intention, while its linguistic elements should occupy them only so far as these serve to illustrate its poetic style and the mental characteristics of the poet. It should be given to read only to such youth as have already gained, through some experience of life and feeling, and through some acquaintance with history and literature, the capacity to recognize, in part at least, its supreme quality, and to find in its difficulties only a stimulus to their own exertions; to such, in fine, as can understand, in part at least, the truth of Mr. Butler's own assertion, that "it is not too much to say that there is no one work of human genius which can equal it as an instrument of education, intellectual and moral."

Although Mr. Butler's translation cannot be read with pleasure as an English composition, he has studied the poem with such care that his interpretation of disputed and obscure passages may often be consulted with advantage. He has not shirked the difficulties of his task. His notes are for the most part scholarly and intelligent, but they are not always to the point, and they would frequently be improved by the pruning away of what seems like youthful pedantry and conceit. There are few verses of the poem that have given occasion to more, or more diverse, commentary than two which occur in the famous interview, in the twenty-fourth canto, between the poet and his predecessor, Bonagiunta da Lucca. The passage is of such interest as a piece of poetic criticism of permanent significance that we cite it in full. "Ma di'," asks Bonagiunta:

* 'The Purgatory of Dante Alighieri. Edited, with Translation and Notes, by Arthur John Butler, late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.' London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880. Cr. 8vo, pp. xviii.-458.

49. " 'Ma di' s'io veggio qui colui che fuore
Trasse le nuove rime, cominciando:
Donne che avete intelletto d'Amore.'
Ed io a lui: 'Io mi son un che, quando
Amor mi spira, noto, ed a quel modo
Che detta dentro, vo significando.'
'O frate, issa veggio,' disse, 'il nodo
Che il Notaro, e Guittone, e me ritenne
Di qua dal dolce stil nuovo ch' i' odo.
Io veggio ben come le vostre penne
Diretro al dittator sen vanno strette,
Che delle nostre certo non avvenne.
E qual più a riguardar oltre si mette,
Non vede più dall' uno all' altro stilo.'
E quasi contentato si tacette."

This is translated by Mr. Butler as follows:

" 'But say if I see here him who drew forth the new rimes beginning, Ladies who understanding have of love.' And I to him: 'I am one who mark when love inspires, and in that fashion which he dictates within, go setting it forth.' 'O brother, now I see,' said he, 'the knot which held back the Notary, and Guittone, and myself, short of the sweet new style which I hear. I see well how your pens go along straitly after him who dictates, the which surely did not happen to ours. And he who sets himself to look beyond this, sees no more from the one to the other style.' And as though satisfied he held his peace."

This is a tolerable version, though much force is lost by using the words "him who dictates" instead of "the dictator," and the final words of Bonagiunta are not easily intelligible. On these words and their various interpretations Mr. Butler gives a long note at the end of the canto, concluding with a suggestion of an unauthorized and needless emendation of the text. In the course of this note he says, "Benvenuto, Buti, and the Ottimo give, indeed, various explanations which greatly need explaining themselves." Now, it happens that we do not possess Benvenuto's explanation, the professed Italian version of his comment, made not many years since, having been shown, shortly after its appearance, to be utterly untrustworthy, and only fragments of the original Latin text having been published; while, on the other hand, the explanation given by Buti is not only perfectly intelligible, but affords a simple and satisfactory significance to the verses that have excited so much dispute.* The main intention of the whole passage is clear enough. Dante is setting forth the ground of the superiority of his poetry to that of his predecessors: it is in his closer following of the dictator, his truth to the spirit of Love speaking in his own heart. It is the same lesson that Sidney in one of his noble sonnets represents his Muse as giving to him, when his "words came halting forth" and he was helpless to win his lady's ear:

"Biting my truant pen, beating myself for spite, Fool! said my Muse to me, look in thy heart and write."

Bonagiunta at once admits the solution of his own inferiority and that of the other early poets. "I see," he says, "that our pens did not follow the dictator closely as they ought," and then he adds, in the verses which have been generally regarded as obscure, and almost always misinterpreted, "and he who sets himself to look for other reason than this will find no other difference between the old and the new style, between our verse and yours," or, literally, "and he who sets himself to looking further sees nothing more 'twixt one and the other style." This is Buti's explanation: 'Non vede più di differenzia dal tuo modo del dire al nostro, che quel che ditto è, che tu vai stretto al movimento dell' animo, e noi larghi." There is no better interpretation than this. Of Mr. Butler's six notes on this passage (not including the long one already referred to) two are needless, one is erroneous, and one suggests an unnecessary alteration of the text.

Mr. Butler is, indeed, much too inclined to propose emendations in the text. The poem has come down to us on the whole in a remarkably pure condition. The good manuscripts of it are numerous. It is not like a classic work of which there may be but two or three manuscripts, and those written carelessly and long after the date of the original. There are many manuscripts of the 'Divine Comedy' written during the century after Dante's death, and it may be safely asserted that where there is a general agreement in their reading of the text, no emendation, however plausible, can be admitted.

There are many points in Mr. Butler's work that tempt to minute criticism and discussion, but matter of this sort is fitter for other columns than ours. If we have dwelt rather upon the faults than the excellence of his version, it is because we trust that Mr. Butler may be led to give it a thorough revision, and make it, as he is capable of making it, not merely an aid to reading the poem in Italian, but an addition to English literature.

Uncle Remus: His Songs and his Sayings; The Folk-Lore of the Old Plantation. By Joel Chandler Harris. With illustrations by Frederick S. Church and James H. Moser. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1880.)—Slavery takes its turn with other fossil remains in adorning our cabinets of curiosity and of science, and in being studied under the microscope. Already the negro "spirituals" of the forced-labor plantation, with their characteristic and often beautiful melodies, have been pretty thoroughly explored and published, and, likewise since the war, the hardly less interesting and ethnologically valuable animal fables once current among the slaves have, through various mediums and at various times, found their way into print. The present volume bears to the latter series the same relation in point of fulness that the 'Slave Songs of the United States' does to the former. Mr. Harris, however, unlike his predecessors, is a literary artist, and his thirty-four tales concerning Brer Rabbit, Brer Fox, Brer Tarrypin, and the rest are ingeniously and charmingly set in an episodical narrative, in which "Uncle Remus" figures as the conteur and a little boy as the rapt auditor. This arrangement not only relieves the baldness of the several anecdotes, but gives Mr. Harris an opportunity to display still further his mastery of the negro dialect, of which probably no better representation has ever been given, though when he says of it that "it is at least phonetically genuine," he does not mean that he has used Mr. A. J. Ellis's Glossic, or that the same letter has always the same vowel or consonant sound—for instance, the g in tergedder, sludge-hammer, suvvigus' (savagest), ingun (onion) sets, etc.; or the same sound the same letter, as kaze and kase, him and 'im.

It was, we remember, within a year or two after the founding of the Nation, that we received from an old gentleman in South Carolina a transcript of several of these animal stories; but, though intended for publication, they were given in the language of Addison rather than of Cudjo, and the flavor of them was hopelessly gone. This was our first knowledge of any such African folk-lore. In November, 1868, and March, 1869, eight or nine of the fables (only two of which are repeated by Mr. Harris) were printed in the Riverside Magazine as "taken down from the lips of an old negro, in the vicinity of Charleston." Variants of these have appeared in the New York Independent (Sept. 2, 1875) and in other papers, and Mr. Harris says in his preface that he has had a great number to choose from. Presumably his stories are all of Georgian origin, though he cites a variant from Florida; and he gives no proof of his statement that "they have become a part of the domestic history of every Southern family." However widely they may have been spread, through our domestic slave-trade, we regard it as highly probable that the Sea Island neighborhood from South Carolina to Florida was, as in the case of the slave-songs, the focus of the animal fables; an hypothesis which finds its support in the reference of both to an African and heathen origin. Mr. Harris notices, from somewhat imperfect data, the coincidence between his tales and the Amazonian tortoise myths, as pointed out in these columns upon the appearance of the late Professor Hartt's monograph. In this aspect his book is a serious aid to the study of primitive folk-lore. It would have had a greater etymological and phonetic value if he had been less sparing of explanatory notes. Words like mon, soon, and haslett have escaped our most diligent scrutiny.

The work has five divisions: the fables; plantation proverbs; Uncle Remus's songs; a true story of the war; and Uncle Remus's sayings. The last two may be called contributions to the history of reconstruction. The songs are what the Sea-Islanders designate as "seculars," and it is a pity that no music accompanies them. "The Plough-Hands' Song" is the most poetic of the six. The proverbs are capital: "Save de pacin' mar' fer Sunday"; "Crow en corn can't grow in de same fiel'"; "Rails split 'fo' bre'kfus' 'll season de dinner"; "Hog dunner w'ich part un 'im'll season de turnip salad"; "Winter grape sour, whedder you kin reach 'im or not"; "Kwishins on mule's foots done gone out er fashun"; "De howlin' dog know w'at he sees"; "Looks won't do ter split rails wid"; "Ef you bleedzd ter eat dirt, eat clean dirt"; "Moon may shine, but a lightered knot's mighty handy"; "You may know de way, but better keep yo' eyes on de seven stairs"; etc., etc. To quote at length from the infinitely-amusing fables is out of the question here. We can only give the opossum's excuse to the coon for his non-combativeness on a critical occasion (p. 28):

" 'Dat's des w'at I wuz gwineter tell you 'bout,' sez Brer Possum, sezee. 'I want no mo' skeer'd dan you is right now, en' I wuz fixin' fer ter give Mr. Dog a sample er my jaw,' sezee, 'but I'm de most ticklish chap w'at you ever laid eyes on, en no sooner did Mr. Dog put his nose down yer 'mong my ribs dan I got ter laffin, en I laft twel I ain't had no use er my lim's,' sezee, 'en it's a mussy unto Mr. Dog dat I wuz ticklish, kaze a little mo' en I'd e't 'im up,' sezee. 'I don't mine fightin', Brer Coon, no mo' dan you duz,' sezee, 'but I declar' ter grashus ef I kin stan' ticklin'. Git me in a row whar dey ain't no ticklin' 'lowed, en I'm your man,' sezee.

" 'En down ter dis day,' continued Uncle Remus, watching the smoke from his pipe curl upward over the little boy's head—'down ter dis day, Brer Possum's bound ter s'render w'en you tech him in de short ribs, en he'll laff ef he knows he's gwineter be smashed fer it.'"

Les Femmes qui Tuent et les Femmes qui Votent. By Alexandre Dumas, fils. (Paris: Calmann Lévy; New York: F. W. Christern. 1880.)—M. Dumas's position as a dramatist is well known. As a sociologist, although he has been at great pains to take a prominent part in social discussions of a certain limited class, his fame is not, perhaps, so securely established. Those who have read his very entertaining prefaces know that he has long since, in his own opinion, sounded the depths of various important questions touching the relations of the sexes. In fact, his prefaces are, in a certain sense, manifestoes of his opinions and views as to these relations, as his plays are a dramatic embodiment of them. In his present treatise he goes further than he has ever before attempted to go, and boldly attacks the question of woman suffrage. Any one who can invent or suggest a new reason for the introduction of a reform, ipso facto entitles himself to a certain claim upon our attention and interest, and it is very certain of any argument of M. Dumas's that it will at least be novel. He is a firm believer in the necessity of woman suffrage, and as far as we understand his argument, it is that if women are not allowed to vote they will continue, as at present, to assassinate people with poison and daggers. Stated in this concise form the reasoning is not very convincing, but a little elaboration will show the method by which M. Dumas arrives at his conclusion. Women in our highly civilized and artificial society occupy a position fixed by laws over which they have no control. Consequently in many cases they find themselves forced to choose between misery and degradation or a self-acquired freedom through violence. If they were allowed to vote, if they had an open career, the painful necessity of this choice would not be presented to them. In other words, crimes of violence committed by women are a sort of measure or test of the unfair pressure bearing down upon them through the present system. Of course this does not apply to all crimes of violence. Even M. Dumas would not go so far as to say that woman suffrage would put an end to all crimes of this class committed by women. It is probable that jealousy, envy, and other passions known to exist in the female breast would, even if every man and woman in the world voted every month, still lead to occasional acts of crime; but our author is clearly of the opinion that there is some relation between killing and voting, and if there were more voting there would be less killing.

* Mr. Butler has made very little use of Buti's comment, referring to it only three or four times. But among the commentators of the fourteenth century, whose nearness in time to Dante gives a special value to their work, Buti is the most important both by reason of his general good sense and of his superior culture.

It will be observed that M. Dumas reverses in his argument the order of thought which has been suggested to many conservative-minded people by the facts upon which he bases it. The conservative argument generally used on the subject is this: The strongest of all human passions is love, and this passion plays a more important and constant part in the lives of women than it does in those of men. It is, in fact, the whole of their life, while it is only part of a man's life. Woman, under the influence of this passion, is made a slave to certain other feelings, which frequently overturn her reason and sap at the root her sense of justice—even assuming that sense of justice to be, at the outset, strong. To allow women to take part in the civil administration of society—for this is what permitting her to vote means—to allow her to sit on juries, plead in the courts, decide questions of private right, is to introduce into the delicate machinery of social life certain new and tremendous forces and passions the precise effect of which cannot be very well anticipated, though their general tendency is well understood. When we see a woman mad with jealousy or slighted love put a bullet through the head of her lover, or throw vitriol in the face of her rival, what suggests itself to the conservative mind is the danger in which the social fabric would be involved if such a creature were suddenly permitted to take part in its government. According to M. Dumas, we ought rather to regard these excesses as the result of not permitting her to take part in it.

It is unnecessary to say that M. Dumas's latest manifesto is entertaining. His French is always of the best, and if his reasoning is not very clear, it generally has the appearance of being so, owing to the extreme lucidity of his style. In fact, we cannot help thinking that it is M. Dumas's great power of expression and clearness, no less than his profound interest in the subject, that have led him into the error of supposing that he is capable of reasoning usefully upon it. If any one will take the trouble to analyze the four pages in which he discusses the relation between woman and science he will find a curious illustration of this. M. Dumas first states that science is making and is about to make enormous progress in the world—a progress, from the sentimental or supernatural point of view, positively appalling; in fact, science is the religion of the future, and Comte and Littré are its prophets. This religion, like all others, must have its fanatics, its apostles, its martyrs; and imprimis behold Dr. Tanner! "Dr. Tanner," says M. Dumas, "if he is not an American invention, is already there to prove the truth of what I say." He cautiously adds, however, "If he is an invention, another will prove it soon, and disciples will arise. These disciples will not be found only among men, but also among women." Women are inquisitive by nature. They steal apples from the tree of knowledge; they open boxes like Pandora; they are always ready for anything new, for anything unexpected, for everything that makes them rise above their ordinary daily feminine life. Once carried away by the force of example, women will throw themselves into science as they throw themselves into everything which fires their imagination; taking their revenge for the fixity of status to which they are condemned, they will run, no matter by what roads, side by side with man; before him if they can, against him if it is necessary, to the conquest of a new world. When one remembers with what contempt of all reason and of all pain woman seeks martyrdom, with what oblivion of all shame she gives reins to her passions, one can foresee the audacity and frenzy with which she will attempt scientific investigation. She will, like man, endure the hardest labor. Like man, she will submit herself to the most painful experiments to find the answer to the riddle; to solve the mystery of lactation she will let her breasts be torn out, like St. Agatha, etc., etc. The devotional climax which M. Dumas thinks woman will reach for the purpose of proving the correctness of the Darwinian theory, we cannot very well translate.

This is not an unfair specimen of M. Dumas's logical method. In English it does not carry conviction with it. In his French it sounds less insane, and that is nearly all that can be said for it.

MLLE. BERNHARDT IN "PHÈDRE."

WE ventured to suggest last week that the manner in which Mlle. Bernhardt played Doña Sol almost amounted to proof that her success in Phèdre would be but moderate. Her performance on Tuesday evening of last week justified this anticipation. Her Phèdre was, as usual, an admirable piece of acting, but it was not the Phèdre of a great tragedian. Her conception of the part was, in the first place, essentially superficial. She makes the main feature of the part love-sickness, and it is by no means love-sickness which is the distinguishing mark of the character of the wife of Theseus. There have been love-sick women in all ages of the world who have killed themselves with poison, but in Phèdre's case this is not the secret of the play. She is love-sick because of a visitation, a fatality—the foreordained doom of Venus; and in Racine's tragedy it is the struggle of the natural nobility of her character with this external and accidental fate that makes the essential ground-work of the part.

To the intrinsic difficulties presented by the character itself must be added the extreme classicism of the play. The scene never changes from the first act to the last, the time is restricted within the narrowest limits, and the action, with the exception of the final poisoning, takes place entirely off the stage. In a modern play the simultaneous presentation of the incidents and the emotions which these are supposed to call forth greatly helps out any weakness in the acting. In a play of the school to which "Phèdre" belongs there is nothing to distract the audience, and the play consists almost entirely of what we may call pure acting. Owing to the supremely tragic character of the situation, nothing but continuous sustained power and entire absorption in the character could possibly put Phèdre before us, and Mlle. Bernhardt certainly does not put Phèdre before us. She makes, as we have said, the love-sickness altogether the most prominent characteristic of the queen. She is languishingly, amorously love-sick, and the struggle between her guilty passion and her sense of duty and horror at her crime, leaves an unpleasant physical impression upon the hearer, which it was certainly not Racine's intention to produce. It is not the passion which it is necessary to emphasize, but the guilt, the remorse, the horror.

In criticising any actor it is difficult, if not impossible, to separate our impressions of the acting from our impressions of the person who acts. In every other art the finished work of the artist is embodied in a form quite distinct from the producer, and stands or falls by itself, without reference to the character or personal peculiarities of the latter. To enjoy and properly appreciate the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven it is not necessary to know whether Beethoven was tall or short, fat or thin, or whether he had a fine or ignoble character. In judging of the merits of a work of sculpture it is needless to know anything about the sculptor. A fine painting is a fine painting still, though the name of the master who produced it is totally lost. When we come to literature it begins to seem more natural to establish some relation between the work and the author, but there are great works of literature, even of modern literature, which have long since established their reputation and a lasting claim to the attention of mankind, of which we hardly know more than the author's name. In dramatic art, however, all this is reversed. The actor embodies in his own person, before our eyes, the passions which he undertakes to represent; they cannot be judged apart from him. The success with which he represents them depends entirely upon his range of feeling as well as his power of expression—in fact upon his entire character. By this we do not mean to fall into the vulgar error of suggesting that in order to represent virtue mimetically it is necessary to be virtuous, or that in order to play the part of a murderer it is necessary to have murdered some one off the stage; but it is obvious that the power of expression, mimetic or otherwise, must be derived from actual feeling, and that the line of distinction between the character of the actor and the character of his acting is very often a nice one. It is, for instance, hardly possible to conceive of a frivolous person ever succeeding in conceiving a part like Hamlet or Lady Macbeth, yet we cannot infer frivolity from the fact that an actor failed in either of these parts. So in Phèdre it would be grossly unfair to Mlle. Bernhardt to infer from her acting of the part that she was deficient in passion, as some critics have suggested. Her passionate scenes are invariably her best. What she does lack, as we suggested last week, is sustained force of emotion, which creates absorption in her part and gives rise to a genuine illusion. This is the essence of all great tragic acting. It could be seen to perfection, even in her old age, in such an actress as Ristori. In her Medea she struggles with disadvantages which do not exist in the case of Mlle. Bernhardt. She played in a language less familiar to her audience than French, and she played a young part at an age when most actresses abandon the stage. Yet her absorption and sustained power were so great that in the scene with her children we certainly saw the real Medea before us.

THIRD EDITION OF

Hosmer's Short History of German Literature.

A Short History of German Literature, from the Earliest Period to the Present Time. By Prof. James K. Hosmer. Cloth, 12mo, $2.

It must be admitted that during the present century no foreign literature has affected us so powerfully as that of Germany, and that some knowledge of its great names and general course of development is essential to thorough education.

In this work no attempt is made to mention all German writers. No nation has been so prolific of books as Germany, and to attempt to give their authors' names even would require a good-sized volume. Attention is concentrated on the epoch-making writers.

The 'Short History of German Literature' is precisely the book required by intelligent persons, too busy in other directions to become specialists, for the obtaining of a satisfactory general view, and so giving here proper breadth to their culture. It is also precisely the book to afford the basis upon which, if desired, an elaborate knowledge may be afterwards reared.

It is an excellent book for literary clubs and classes. In fine, in the words of one of the most eminent preachers in America, "it is the most instructive and inspiring account of its subject accessible to the general reader."

The Nation: "The best book for the general reader."

Chicago Alliance: "The best 'History of German Literature' yet written in English."

National Quarterly Review: "The work is by far the best of its kind."

Rivista Europea, March, 1880 (Florence, Italy): "Professor Hosmer has had a clear conception of the errors of his predecessors, and has been careful and wise in avoiding them. The book is fresh, interesting, and vivacious. The author knows how to select from other authors with grace and judgment. English literature has not a book more readable and attractive than this upon the subject of German literature."

"The pictures, however, are the great attraction, and they show a keen sense of humor besides great artistic talent. Of its kind nothing better has been issued than this book."—The Daily Graphic, New York.

Pretty Peggy, and Other Ballads.

Illustrated from designs in Water-Colors by Rosina Emmet. Square 8vo, $2 50.

"Pretty Peggy is not a book exclusively for children, but might very appropriately serve as a table-book, with the full assurance that its pictures and verses would prove amusing to older folk, by whom its humor would certainly stand a better chance of appreciation. The drawings are very clever, by turns delicately graceful or broadly humorous, and the old-fashioned rhymes which they illustrate are most enjoyable."—The Bookseller, London.

THE

Pilgrim's Progress.

With one hundred illustrations by FRED. BARNARD and others. Engraved by the Dalziel Brothers. One elegant 4to vol., beautifully bound in cloth, gilt extra, $5.

Messrs. ANSON D. F. RANDOLPH & Co. have arranged with Messrs. STRAHAN & Co., of London, for an edition of their sumptuous edition of the 'Pilgrim's Progress.' It differs from all others in bold characterization and variety of expression in its illustrations.

The Times, London, says of this edition: "In the immortal work of John Bunyan the figures stand out distinct; one can see Mr. Worldly Wiseman, Ignorance, Pliable, and the lonely pilgrims toiling along the narrow way in the flesh. It is this feature of the book that Mr. Barnard has seized on, and with so much success, in this edition. His strong point is his character-sketching, and he has never been more fortunate in his materials or more happy in his expression."

The Week.

THE Message of a retiring President is interesting mainly for the information it gives. Its recommendations usually make little impression, and to this President Hayes's will furnish no exception. He opens by calling the attention of foreign nations to the fact that the American people peacefully accept the decision of the majority at a Presidential election, and thinks this will satisfy all persons at home and abroad that government based on "the free consent of an intelligent and patriotic people" is stronger than any other. He greatly weakens the effect of this spectacle, however, by going to work in the next sentence to castigate the Southern whites for depriving the colored voters of the rights of citizenship in disobedience to the Constitution; he recommends Congress to investigate thoroughly all contested elections at the South, and also to vote money in aid of popular education in the same region; and then comes to civil-service reform, to which he devotes much space. He adheres to all his former utterances about "the dangers of patronage" and appointments for partisan considerations; describes and praises the working of the system of competitive examinations in certain custom-houses and post-offices; excuses his failure to extend the system by the plea of want of money, and recommends an appropriation of $25,000 to meet the expenses of a commission to devise a uniform system of competitive examinations and supervise its application; and denounces the interference of Congress with the Executive in the matter of patronage. Towards Mormon polygamy he takes a position of unusual sternness and severity, and proposes that, as the laws against polygamy cannot be executed, owing to the sympathy of Mormon jurors with the criminals, a reorganization of the Territory of Utah should take place, by giving the government to a governor and judges or commissioners, appointed by the President; but if the existing form is upheld he recommends that no polygamous Mormon be allowed to sit on a jury. He reports the fishery dispute with Great Britain to be in a fair way to adjustment, through the British acknowledgment of our right to compensation for the Fortune Bay outrage, and assent to the proposal that the regulation of the inshore fisheries secured to the United States by the Treaty of Washington should be made the subject of conference between the two Governments. Of our relations with all other states he gives a most satisfactory account. As a means of extending American commerce he advises increased steam postal communication with foreign countries, "and the frequent circulation of naval ships in the seas and ports of all quarters of the globe." This last is the only startling piece of advice in the message, and we hope no attempt will be made to follow it without careful deliberation. As to finance, he recommends the withdrawal and cancellation of the outstanding legal tenders, and the recoinage of the silver dollar, with such addition to its weight as will make it equal in value to the gold dollar. Against the attempt to keep up a double standard he says nothing. His last important suggestion is that General Grant be made a "captain-general," with a suitable salary for life.

The most important feature of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury is, of course, his recommendations, as coming from a financier who has succeeded in his undertakings, and these very considerable ones. He estimates the revenue of the coming fiscal year at $350,000,000, and the expenditure at $301,554,722, including the payments to the Sinking Fund, leaving a surplus of nearly $50,000,000. Without the Sinking Fund the surplus would be over $90,000,000. If Congress should see in this plethora a reason for reducing the taxes, he recommends that all internal-revenue taxes except those on banks, spirits, tobacco, and fermented liquors be abolished. $687,350,000 of five and six per cent. bonds fall due or become redeemable in 1881. Fifty millions of these Mr. Sherman proposes to meet out of the surplus revenue. The remaining $637,350,000 he could meet in part by the sale of four per cent. bonds now authorized by law, and which he could sell at a large premium, but there are not enough of them. For the difference he proposes to provide by the issue of $400,000,000 of Treasury notes having from one to ten years to run, bearing four per cent. interest, and in denominations so small as to furnish a convenient deposit for popular savings; and also the issue of $400,000,000 of bonds bearing three dollars and sixty-five cents interest. This would be in all considerably more than the amount of the debt maturing next year, but the amount of either notes or bonds to be sold would be left discretionary with the Secretary.

Mr. Sherman reiterates his belief that the amount of greenbacks now in circulation can be kept redeemable at par, but he also reiterates his recommendation that they be deprived of their legal-tender quality, which he maintains adds nothing to their value. He justifies his desire to keep them afloat, in which he runs directly counter to the recommendations of his chief, by the fact that they save $7,000,000 annually in interest, and furnish a safe and convenient medium of exchange. He laments the failure of the Government to get more than 35 per cent. of the silver dollars into circulation, and repels the charge of "unfriendliness to silver" by showing that he has offered to place silver in the hands of the people throughout the country without expense for transportation. In fact, he seems to have done everything to get it afloat except to offer a premium. He now advises, as the best escape from the difficulty, the raising of the silver dollar to par with the gold dollar by putting 456.3 grains of silver into it. The effect of this measure, he says, would be to make our gold and silver coins "the best international standards of value known." He does not say, however, in what manner this would facilitate the circulation of silver. As long as the silver dollar is no more valuable than the gold dollar it will be avoided in home transactions even more persistently than it is now because of its bulk and weight. If it were made more valuable, our gold would at once take flight to countries in which gold only is a legal tender, while all the spare silver of the earth would be sent here. In fact, Mr. Sherman's way out of the difficulty has the great merit of honesty, but no other. The trouble he is likely to have in satisfying the silver-men may, however, be inferred from the fact that one of the chiefs, the editor of the Cincinnati Commercial, after passing a year in furious promulgation of the passionate desire of the American people for their "fathers' dollar" in daily use, and their preference of it to gold, now boldly meets the failure of silver to get into circulation by asking whether gold gets into circulation, whether there is not a great deal of it lying uncalled for in the Treasury vaults? With agitators of this sort it is, of course, hard for a finance minister to know how to deal.

Secretary Schurz's report is mainly devoted to Indian affairs, and inspires regret that its author is not to continue for another four years to control the experiments begun during his administration, and so full of promise and encouragement. He confesses that he at first fell into the traditional policy of keeping the Indians secluded and guarded on great reservations, but has learned that the shortest, most certain, and most humane solution of the problem lies in making the Indians self-supporting as agriculturists and mechanics, and owners of land in fee simple, inalienable, however, for a term of years; in policing them from their own number; in educating their children at distant industrial schools at the Government expense; in making them amenable to the laws of the State or Territory they inhabit, and thus giving a finishing blow to the tribal system. Most of these measures are already in gratifying operation, and Congress is urged to take up and enact bills already submitted by the Interior Department touching the ownership and inalienability of the land, and the jurisdiction of the local courts. In the past four years the agricultural labor of the Indians has been more than doubled in quantity and value, the total area under cultivation being last year 482,738 acres; the Indian freighters have employed this year nearly 2,000 freight wagons; the number of Indian youths learning trades at the agency workshops has grown in twelve months from 185 to 358. The Indian police at forty agencies now consists of 162 officers and 653 privates. Indians have been employed as brickmakers, housebuilders, machinists, and even as foremen, and show no little mechanical aptitude. Their anxiety to have their children civilized ensures the latter against relapsing into savage ways when they return to their homes; the old obstructive spirit has disappeared. Mr. Schurz concludes that "the Indian situation is now more hopeful than ever before." He shows the perplexities of the Indian administration by describing the two opposite currents of public sentiment—that of the Far West and the border, which holds that the Indian will not work and is an obstacle to be got rid of; that of the Far East—most remote "from the ground where the Indian problem has to be solved"—which would turn the Indian loose without further preparation. He seems to imply that the latter is the more difficult to deal with. In regard to the proper place of the Indian Bureau, he still maintains that a civil is preferable to a military management.

Nearly four million dollars of foreign specie arrived during the week, and the rates for foreign exchange at the close warranted further imports. Notwithstanding these arrivals, the New York money market was stringent to a degree not witnessed for years, as high as three-eighths of one per cent. per day, in addition to six per cent. per annum, having been paid for money by stock brokers. The banks contracted their loans nearly $8,000,000, and even then fell short of bringing their credits into proper relation with their resources by the sum of nearly $2,400,000. This condition of the money market was due indirectly to the large legitimate demand for money all over the country, the volume of business being unprecedented in amount, and to the expansion of speculation in stocks, cotton, breadstuffs, and provisions; and directly to the management of a few large Wall-Street speculators who control from ten to fifteen millions of dollars, or enough to hold the balance of power in the loan market. As a result of the stringency, there was a yielding in speculative prices all around, which in turn brought on the liquidation of speculative accounts dependent on borrowed money. The meeting of Congress, with the President's Message and the reports of the Departments, had little influence on the various markets, as the Administration and Congress are notoriously not in accord on any of the business questions subject to legislation, and the recommendations of the Administration do not, therefore, surely foreshadow what legislation will pass. On refunding, the House is understood to be in favor of a long 3 per cent. bond, while Secretary Sherman recommends short-date 4 per cent. notes or bonds and long-date 3.65 bonds. The President recommends paying and cancelling the legal-tender notes; Secretary Sherman recommends depriving them of their legal-tender quality, but keeping them as currency; while Congress is in favor of neither of these propositions. Respecting silver, the Administration recommends stopping the coinage of 412½-grain dollars, now worth less than 87 cents, or, that failing, that Congress shall put 100 cents' worth of silver, at its present price, into the dollar. It is not believed that Congress has yet fully regained its head on this question. Whether taxes should be kept up so as to continue to produce a large surplus to use in extinguishing the debt, appears to be an open question. In London the price of silver closed at 51⅛*d.* per ounce, and here the "dollar of the fathers" had a bullion value at the close of $0.8643.

The Grand Jury has found true bills against the proprietor and editors of Truth for the publication of the Morey letter and articles upon it. It is a pity that Judge Davis's dictum, that to ascribe to General Garfield the sentiments contained in the letter, even in a legitimate way, would be libellous, cannot be submitted to a jury. If it be libellous to say in a canvass that a candidate is in favor of Chinese immigration in order to keep wages down, editors of newspapers ought to know it. The Chief-Justice of the Irish Queen's Bench, by the way, has got himself into much the same sort of scrape as Judge Davis. In refusing an application for the postponement of the Land-League trials the contemplation of Parnell seems to have produced somewhat the same effect on him as the contemplation of Hewitt on Judge Davis. He therefore not only denied the motion, but made a ferocious attack on the defendants, and substantially pronounced them guilty of the offence for which they are shortly to be tried before him. Like Judge Davis, he looks on himself as a guardian of the public morals, and the bench as something in the nature of a pulpit. The incident has, of course, greatly helped the Land-Leaguers, and has called down on the Chief-Justice much indignation in England as well as Ireland. The worst of it is that it will help to deprive the judicial proceedings of all moral weight if the Leaguers are found guilty.

When one reads General Garfield's speech to the Ohio Presidential electors one cannot help rejoicing that the time for election oratory has gone by. The ethical notions he produced on this occasion were of the most extraordinary kind. He laid it down, among other things, that the duty imposed on the Presidential elector to vote for the man designated by the party for the Presidency was "the most solemn obligation of obedience which can be conceived, except that which the God of the universe might impose on him." "The God of the universe" has, however, imposed on the Presidential electors already certain obligations with which the commands of General Garfield's "august sovereign" and "omnipotent sovereign," the majority of the American people, might conflict, and in laying down the moral law of their business it would have been well to take notice of this notorious fact. The "august sovereign," for instance, cannot authorize anybody to carry out a fraud, and yet he might readily be led to try to do so. In other words, the majority is sometimes wrong both morally and intellectually, and he is not a good public servant who talks as if this were an impossibility. Later in the same discourse General Garfield talks of this "great political sovereign having laid his commands upon him, and of his being bound by his will and his great inspiration and purpose, as he could be by any consideration that this earth can impose upon any human being." We are not sure that we know what this means, but every one must regret the growing tendency of which it is an illustration to import into American politics the terms of abasement in which the subjects of Oriental despots have from time immemorial described their relations to their political ruler. No good can come to any community from any man's thinking of himself or talking of himself as the abject creature which General Garfield here describes himself. It is, however, made somewhat ludicrous by the fact that if twelve thousand voters in New York had voted the other way General Garfield's "august sovereign" and "omnipotent sovereign" would have "laid his commands" on another man, and would have refused to employ the Gene ral in any place of trust, and the latter would have been described in the newspapers as a misguided and unfortunate person, who was suffering the consequence of his own follies. These stump deities are not, after all, very powerful or trustworthy gods.

The agitation which has resulted in establishing the Civil-Service Reform Association has had its natural effect in encouraging the press to speak out boldly and sympathetically upon the subject. We see on all sides proof that the advocates of the reform in Congress will not lack outside support for any genuine enactment. Still more gratifying and unexpected was the action of two legislatures during the week, in South Carolina and Vermont—the former, by the way, leading off—by which the Senators and Representatives of those States were exhorted and instructed to promote the reform in question. These resolutions were, we believe, entirely spontaneous, and would be none the less significant even if it should appear that some one member, more zealous than the rest, was really responsible for their introduction and passage. That would show the force of the mere statement of the objects of the reform, which is in fact irresistible to all disinterested minds. There was an old custom which used to prevail fifty or sixty years ago on occasions like these, and which might usefully be revived—we mean the frequent formal transmission of the acts and proposals of one legislature to all the others in the Union, through the medium of the Governor, for the sake of a comparison of views, as, for instance, with reference to a Constitutional amendment, etc. We hope that the next Legislature which follows the example of Vermont and South Carolina, will couple its resolutions with instructions to the Governor to communicate them in this manner.

The appointment of an army officer, General W. B. Hazen, to succeed the late General Myer as chief of the Signal-Service Bureau confirms what we said last week as to the prevailing apathy on this important subject. In this apathy the President is as much involved, it seems, as the public. It is unnecessary to state that General Hazen has never been distinguished as a meteorologist or for his relations to science and scientific men, and has had no previous connection with the Bureau which he will henceforth superintend. It will not even be maintained that his qualifications are superior to those of any candidate mentioned in the late competition. On the other hand, scientifically speaking, he is perhaps inferior to his predecessor only in experience; his executive ability remains to be proved. The motives of his selection it is needless to discuss, though the geographical are at least as obvious as any. We see what kind of influences can be brought to bear on the President when we hear credible rumors that General O. O. Howard is to displace General Schofield at West Point, undoubtedly in order to secure a "philanthropic" administration of the Academy.

Both the present Comptroller and his predecessor have testified this week before the Legislative Committee now engaged in the usual municipal enquiry. They seem to be in but slight accord, and indeed the two men differ so completely that their views of municipal administration could not be expected to be harmonious. Mr. Green was remarkable for his intimate acquaintance with his colleagues' duties and their remissness in the discharge of them, as they themselves were on all occasions ready to testify. Since his retirement his interest in city affairs, it appears from his testimony, has been maintained at white heat, and he thinks his successor spends about two-fifths too much money by employing unnecessary clerks. Mr. Kelly, on the other hand, is anything but a "marplot," or we feel sure that the Herald, which has for a month displayed great enterprise in investigating his character and career, would have discovered it. He is apparently entirely content with the municipal status quo, provided his own department be let alone, and seems to know rather less and have fewer suggestions to make concerning possible reforms in the various bureaus than an ordinary citizen. His answer to Mr. Green's charge was that when he first became Comptroller he had four months' arrears of work to get made up—which is not satisfactory. The Aldermen are not overpaid, he thought, considering the labor they perform—which sounds humorous—and the large amounts they have to pay to get elected—which betrays a kind heart but really no head for public affairs.

Mr. Robert Collyer delivered a sermon last Sunday on the "newspaper," which for some years back has been a favorite topic with clergymen, and which they usually handle in a way that calls for the unqualified approval of the editors the next day. What was most remarkable in the discourse was the indications it contained of the tendency, now not uncommon, to attribute to the newspaper some kind of mystic power, as if telling a thing to fifty thousand persons simultaneously gave it a force or value which it would not have if told to only one person—the fact being that in journalism, as in other things, no machine has more force than is put into it. If twenty men unite to publish a newspaper, their utterances will be the utterances of these twenty and nothing more, no matter how powerful the trumpet through which they shout; and it seems to us that the pulpit would in treating of the press do more good by keeping the world in mind of this fact than by spreading the belief that when a man begins to edit a newspaper any preternatural wisdom or grace comes down upon him. Journalism is a large business with much capital in it, but it is a purely human business, and is conducted on much the same principles as the dry-goods business, though supplying an article in more general and constant demand, and has nothing more sacred about it, even in its loftiest aspect, than any large publishing business. The admiring way in which many ministers allow their imagination to play around the newspaper press is, however, in a certain sense a returning of good for evil, because we doubt if anything in our day does more to bring the pulpit into discredit than the newspaper reports of sermons. Précis-writing is a difficult art, as every one who has tried it knows, and of few compositions is it more difficult to make précis than sermons. As the work is done by the reporters, it makes the utterances of the pulpit seem vapid and incoherent in a way which, we have no doubt, most ministers find mortifying and would complain of if they dared.

The Germans are still occupied with the Jewish question. The report of the debate in the Prussian Landtag on what is called the anti Semitic petition has come out, and it can hardly be said to have a serious sound. The principal figure in it was Herr Stoecker, the court chaplain, and one of the leaders of the "Christian Socialist" movement, which has for its object the reconciliation of the Socialists with Christianity. He seems to be thoroughly in earnest, and yet his speech in places sounded like a burlesque, as when he said that in carrying on his warfare against the Jews he "desired nothing but peace," and he was persuaded that the result of these debates would be peace; not the bad and doubtful peace in which they had been living in Berlin until now, pursued like wild beasts, but the honorable peace of adversaries, who respect each other and fight with arms of courtesy. As a matter of fact, nothing was brought out in the debate against the Jews except the fact that they succeed in a remarkable degree in the lawful callings which are open to every German, or, in other words, that they are very useful citizens, and for this, whatever the mortification it involves, there is of course no legal remedy to which a resort would not put Germany outside the pale of civilization. The best defence of the Jews in the Landtag was made by one of their own number, Herr Meyer, from Breslau, who attacked the Government very warmly for giving covert support to the agitation, and he met the assertion that the Jews are becoming dangerous, owing to the increase of their number through immigration, by a flat denial of the increase. He cited the statistician Neumann to show that during certain periods the emigration of Jews had been larger (in proportion) than the emigration of Christians; that the immigration of Jews has not been greater than the immigration of Christians, and that the immigration of Jews on the eastern side, that is, from Russia and Poland, is smaller than the immigration on the western and northern side. He said the number of immigrant Jews in Germany was to-day smaller than the number of immigrant Dutchmen and Scandinavians, and finally that there were now in Germany only 100,000 more Jews than there were fifty years ago. He met the complaint that Jews so seldom engage in any kind of hard manual labor by alleging that the master-mechanics refuse to take Jewish apprentices. He also warned his opponents that if the Germans made race or origin a reason for persecuting the Jews, or denying them equal chances in commercial or political careers, the same weapon might be used against the Germans who emigrate in such numbers to make their fortunes on foreign soil.

The agitation in Ireland seems to grow, and the practice of "Boycotting," or excluding persons from all intercourse, commercial or other, is spreading, owing to its success in Captain Boycott's case, and is, of course, likely to be used for worse purposes than the improvement of the land tenure, and on people less culpable than he. The organization of the Land League, too, is rapidly extending over the country, and is being turned to very practical account in uniting all the tenants on particular estates in refusing to pay more rent than would be due on what is known as the "Griffith Valuation," which was made some forty years ago as a basis for the rates for the support of the poor, and was even then confessedly much below the value of the land for farming purposes. Of course against a union of this sort the landlord has no real remedy. It is a kind of strike which he cannot meet without ruin. The rumors of dissensions in the Cabinet do not gain strength, but it is more and more certain that the Irish Land Bill to be introduced will be very radical in its character, and will lead to the most exciting debates since the Reform Bill. Mr. Parnell's talk continues to be more reckless than ever, but probably on grounds of policy of some kind best understood by himself. A movement has been started on this side of the water to raise money to send General Butler and other American counsel over to defend the Land-Leaguers in the coming trials, but we trust the poor men and women who will advance the "fund" which is to pay the expense will hold on to their dollars; first, because American counsel could not appear in the Irish courts; and, secondly, because if they could, they would do their clients no good in a legal way. Their speeches would be stump speeches which they might just as well deliver in a hall in Dublin, or even here. Whatever effect can be produced on the jury by this sort of thing will be readily produced by the Irish lawyers; while, if the jury be at all hostile, "Ben" Butler's pleasing manners and appearance would certainly not mollify them.

THE DANGER OF AN "ARISTOCRACY OF OFFICE-HOLDERS."

THERE is at last very good reason for believing that the reform of the civil service is likely to become very speedily a real question in the political arena, and that during the next four years we shall see one or other, if not both, of the political parties taking some definite ground about it, and making it a subject of discussion with a view to some action about it. There are already many signs that the Democrats will use it as an "issue," partly for want of anything better, and partly in sheer despair of ever getting back to power without depriving their adversaries of the powerful defence now furnished by the use of the Government employés as electioneering agents. The great advantage of this to the friends of the reform will lie in the fact that it will for the first time make known the exact condition of the public mind on the subject, by calling out from the newspapers and orators a statement of the objections entertained to the proposed changes, both by those who have bestowed some thought on the matter and by those who have bestowed none. Until these objections are produced no discussion of the subject can bear much fruit, for it is not less true of political than of legal enquiries that the truth is best elicited and people's ideas most readily clarified by attack and defence. Hitherto the politicians proper have either kept silent on the matter altogether or have treated it with simple ridicule as a mere dream of a few visionaries, which it was hardly worth while for persons with practical work to do to examine. The mass of the voters, on the other hand, are not much given to political speculation at all, and have not a great deal of time for even necessary political action, and are generally content to have the subjects which they have to examine and make up their minds upon supplied to them from year to year by the party managers and their newspaper organs. If civil-service reform now comes down to them from these sources, as a thing to be disposed of in some way at the polls and in Congress, there will be for the first time an opportunity of securing close popular attention for an explanation of what is meant by it, and for answers to such objections to any change in the present system as most readily suggest themselves to the mind of a plain man who has heard it more or less talked about, but has not seriously considered it.

If we may judge from such hostile utterances as have already appeared in Republican newspapers, and from the letters we have ourselves received, the objection which first suggests itself to such a man, in advance of all examination of details, is that even the modified form of permanence in office known as tenure during good behavior, which civil-service reformers insist upon, would result in the creation of an odious official class, or "aristocracy of office-holders." We cannot do better than cite from one of these letters a description of the kind of class which it is supposed this would be. "The people mean by this" (aristocracy of office-holders), says the writer, "that a continuation in office of the same set of men creates in the mind of the office-holder the idea that he owns the office, and, instead of being a public servant, he becomes a master, haughty towards those whom he ought to serve. Is it not quite a general experience with office-holders of long standing that they are apt to become somewhat overbearing? I am inclined to think that the people view it in that light, and my opinion is based upon conversation with men of ordinary position in society, who make our majorities for us, who must be educated to whatever of good there is in the reform idea, and must be consulted as to its adoption, if the reform ever becomes permanently engrafted upon our Government and administration."

That this idea is widely prevalent there is no doubt, and that it is, if well founded, a fair and weighty objection to permanence in office, we do not deny. We can well understand the state of mind which prefers the abuses of the present system to greater administrative efficiency at the hands of an insolent bureaucracy. The difficulty of meeting the objection would be very great if the American people had had any experience of such a class of office-holders as our correspondent describes. If, for instance, our present system of appointment for short terms on the nomination of the senators and representatives of the party in power, as a reward for electioneering activity, had been substituted for the system of appointment for fitness with a permanent tenure, as the result of popular irritation caused by the effect of a permanent tenure on official manners, we confess that we should not be willing to take part in any agitation for a return to the old régime. We should admit that, great as might be the abuses of the present régime, it was so clearly the one best adapted to the conditions of American society that we must make the best of it, just as we make the best of the many manifest drawbacks on universal suffrage. As a matter of fact, has the American people had any such experience? Was appointment by senators and representatives for short terms of uncertain length, as a reward for electioneering activity, substituted for appointment for fitness with tenure during good behavior, under the influence of popular impatience with official insolence? This is not a question which one needs historical lore or critical acumen to answer. The change was not made in the early days before newspapers. It took place at a period within the memory of men now living. There are in all departments of the Government officers who were appointed under the old system, so that there is not and cannot be any difficulty in ascertaining the causes which led to the change, and the precise manner in which it was brought about. There is no period of American history about which so much is known, and which is so conspicuous, except the war period, as that in which the "spoils system" was introduced. If it was introduced as a deliberate and prepared plan of adapting the administrative machinery of the Government to the natural prejudices and susceptibilities of the American people, and as a means of ridding the community of the incubus of an overbearing official aristocracy, we would certainly not waste our time or trespass on the patience of our readers by advocating a return to ways which have been tried and condemned. If the Americans of 1830 found that permanence in office produced a body of haughty bureaucrats who acted as if they owned the offices, and as if they were the masters of those whom they were paid to serve, we should not have a word more to say.

Our answer is, however, that the American people has had no such experience; that the old system did not produce an insolent official aristocracy; that it was not overthrown for any such reason, or for any fault found with the character or manners of the office-holders under it; that nobody even pretended that it was; that the history of the time contains no allusion to any such argument against it; that the people were not consulted about the change, and expressed no opinion or desire about it; that there is abundant proof that the change was, on the contrary, considered mischievous and scandalous, and was denounced as likely to have a degrading effect on American institutions and political manners, and was universally believed to have been effected for the purpose of enabling politicians of the dominant party to reward those who had served them effectively in their canvass. If any of our readers can produce any evidence, historical or other, in opposition to this view, we shall be glad to publish it.

If we are right in the foregoing assertions, the dread of a permanence in office, on the score of its effect on the manners of office-holders, and on their view of their relations to the public, must be simply an à priori deduction from observation of human nature, or else an inference drawn from what is known or supposed to be the result of permanence in the civil service of foreign countries. If the former, what is meant by it is that security in any position begets independence of feeling, and that security coupled with power begets insolence or "haughtiness." There is a certain foundation of truth in this. A body of office-holders holding their offices as property, as the French judges used to hold theirs, would probably soon become intolerable in any free community. But it is to be observed that the civil-service reformers do not propose any such tenure of office. They propose tenure during good behavior, and good behavior in a properly administered civil service would include civil treatment of the public, which it would be the duty of an officer's superiors to enforce. These superiors would owe their offices to election, and it would be a fair and probably strong charge against any Administration that it permitted its subordinate employés to be insolent in their demeanor to the persons with whom they had to do business, just as it is a fair and strong charge against an Administration now that it permits its employés to take bribes, steal, or loaf in business hours. But here again it is allowable to return to our former argument, and ask in what respect this guarantee for good behavior towards the public would be inferior to that which now exists? Under the present system the officer in the Federal service is no more dependent on the public than he is in Turkey or Spain—not nearly so much so as in England, France, and Germany. In the first place, he does not owe his appointment to qualifications or achievements which the public has in any way prescribed, or which it admires or appreciates, or which it would, if left to itself, in any way reward. In fact, as a general rule, the class who now seek and get places in the public service are persons who have failed or think they are likely to fail in making their way among the people in ordinary pursuits, and the talents they bring into the commercial or professional labor market are talents for which in that market there is little or no demand. In the next place, there is no consideration whatever in making the appointment—there are, of course, exceptions to this rule—whether the appointee possesses the qualities of character and of manner which are likely to make him acceptable to the business community with which his duties may bring him into contact. The senator or representative who nominates or recommends him, or, as it is called in Washington, his "influence," does not think of these things at all in nominating or recommending him. And no complaints of his manners would, if he were valuable as a "worker," have any more effect in endangering his tenure than they would in the Prussian service. In the third place, when he is appointed every possible pains is taken to impress upon him the fact that he is not the servant of the whole people, but only of that portion of it constituting the party in power—at present about one-half; the remainder he is literally trained to dislike and despise, and treat as of little account. Nay, the very fact that this half complains of something in his conduct is to him a good reason for thinking it something to be cherished and persisted in. No official, for instance, in the bureaucratic countries of Europe—say Germany and France—ever considers himself the enemy of a large portion of the community with the fervor with which a Republican official in the United States to-day considers himself the enemy of the Democrats. Indeed, the latter retains so little sense of the fact that he draws half of his salary from them that he contributes more of it than he can afford to be used in helping to defeat them at elections. We have for the moment exhausted our space, but we have said enough to show that the present system, whatever its merits, has not the merit of making the office-holder feel his dependence on the people and of reminding him of the fact that he is a public servant. It seems, on the contrary, to have been carefully framed with the view of banishing his proper relation to the people from his mind—first, by the mode in which he procures his place; secondly, by the nature of the services exacted from him; and, thirdly, by the use made of the assessments levied on his salary. We shall return to the subject.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE ENGLISH ON THE IRISH LAND QUESTION.

MR. CAIRD, the well-known English authority on agricultural questions, has been delivering an address before the Statistical Society in London on the English land question, which, coming from such a source, throws a good deal of light on one of the most interesting economical revolutions of our time—interesting because it really promises social and political changes of the most startling kind. He gives it as his opinion that the hopeful view taken by Mr. Pell and Mr. Read of the prospects of American agriculture—hopeful, we mean, from the standpoint of the English farmer—is not sustained by the facts; that the immense and growing volume of the American grain yield, combined with the increasing cheapness of transportation, is likely to make successful English competition in English markets impossible for a practically unlimited period. He reminded his hearers, too, that into this contest European countries enter with the burden of heavy taxation, large standing armies, and numerous differences of laws and language. They are contending with what may be considered a homogeneous people, which has no standing army, and which every year sees its taxation lightened by the mere rapid increase of population. Some of the effects of this on English land-owning, already visible, are very striking. He mentions the occurrence in September last in one district of one county of one hundred sales of farming stock by tenants who were throwing up farms containing 55,000 acres of land. In every county, he says, one meets with instances of considerable estates with six or eight farms thrown on the landlord's hands, and he says that certain localities can be named where within a mile or two of thriving towns there are hundreds of acres of clay land entirely deserted, and on which there has not been a furrow turned for two years. In fact, he sees no hope for the corn lands or the clay lands, or for inferior soils generally, except by a resort to cattle-raising and market-gardening and the like, and he alleges that Ireland, having taken to cattle-raising already, has suffered from the present crisis much less than England. Commenting on all this the London Spectator estimates the fall in the value of land in England at twenty-five per cent., and the fall in net incomes—after the fixed charges in the way of family settlements and interest on mortages are paid—at nearly one-half. The result is that the smaller squires have had in considerable numbers to quit their houses, and live in seclusion at watering-places or on the Continent, to cut down their expenses and stop improvements, or, in other words, virtually to abandon their place in English society. All the amusements which the land-owning class supported, such as the turf and the hunting-field, are showing in a greater or less degree the effect of the American competition. The recent fall in racing stock has astonished the sporting world.

Mr. Caird predicts not only a change in the methods of agriculture, but a great increase in the number of small proprietors and in the number of large proprietors farming their own land, and the release of the class of "life-owners," to which the bulk of English landed proprietors belong, from the legal restrictions which now prevent their dealing freely with the land, and the simplification of land transfers. If half what he predicts comes true, the change it will effect in the structure of English society will be great indeed. On this he does not touch, but the Spectator discusses it at some length, and comes to the conclusion that the very great proprietors will hold on to the land they have got as an enjoyable luxury, whether it pays them much or not; that the manor-houses and parks of the next class of squires will be bought by rich men from the cities merely as agreeable places of residence, while the farming lands will be sold in lots to actual cultivators; that the third class will emigrate to the colonies, and the last will either disappear altogether or become simple farmers of their own land, thinking much of their crops, but nothing of social dignity or political power, or of interest on their money.

Of course, a great deal of this prediction may turn out erroneous; but, judging from the experience of other countries, it would seem as if English observers underestimated the gravity of the change which is before them and the extent to which it will go. To the English mind for the last five hundred years "the landed interest" has seemed one of the most solid and permanent and impregnable of human institutions—something in the nature of "the bed-rock" of human society—and nobody can yet say what the effect on it will be of finding that even the land is not stable, and of seeing the heirs of long-descended estates "burst up" like stock speculators. That the strong conservatism of the British temper will resist this spectacle is something of which only the very rash will feel sure. When the opinion of small farmers begins to be felt in politics, we may rely upon it that a great deal of what may be called the splendor of the British Government will not seem by any means so indispensable to them as it has seemed to the class by which English institutions have been built up, and which is now, from all we hear, rapidly losing its hold on power, and, of course, its influence on public opinion and on the standards of public decency and dignity.

In fact, the land question, both in England and Ireland, is simply a question of cutting down what may be called the national expenses. As long as foreign competition was kept down by distance, both countries were or seemed to be able to afford the maintenance of an ornamental class, which contributed nothing to the national production beyond some very trifling superintendence of agriculture. Its services as unpaid legislators have undoubtedly been valuable, and its pecuniary independence, in spite of some periods of great corruption, has done much to make possible the present great purity of English public life. But its political services to the country have of late years, as society grew more complicated and the temptations to pleasure-seeking more numerous, rapidly declined in value, and the agricultural revolution has converted it into an unattainable luxury. In Ireland this land-owning class reached this position long ago. It may be said, indeed, that Ireland has not for a century been able to afford landlords. In other words, few Irish farms have been able to furnish the family of the actual cultivator with a comfortable subsistence and leave something over to be contributed to the support of another family in a certain ease. In England, owing to the greater abundance of capital and the existence of manufactures, the landlord has been compelled to put up with a smaller share, because the farmer's standard of living was higher and his traditions of comfort and respectability so strong that no landlord could compel him to lower them in order to pay a greater rent. In Ireland the landlords have had to deal with a much more dependent class, and a class with a standard of living almost as low as it was in the seventeenth century, and who, in the absence of all other resource, have always been ready to promise to pay any rent in order to escape ejectment. The result has been that, on the whole, the Irish landlords have obtained a far larger proportion of the farming products of the country than their English brethren, and thus have been much more of a luxury. The discontent of the peasantry, shocking as are some of the ways in which it shows itself, is really, therefore, an expression of what seems to be the undeniable economical fact, that most Irish farms can only maintain one family in decency, and that a great many of them cannot even do that. One of the most comic of Lord Beaconsfield's contributions to political economy was his assertion at a dinner, when this land question first began to show itself, that there was no getting rid of landlords—that they were an essential part of every system of agriculture; each farm had to support three persons—the man who owned it, the man who cultivated it, and the man who labored on it for hire. This was a good deal laughed at, but it was a crude utterance of an idea which until now has had a firm lodgment, in a vague shape it is true, in the minds of ninety-nine Englishmen out of every hundred. Its falsity has long been apparent here, ever since the peopling of the great West drove the farms on our eastern coast out of the grain market. Unfortunate Ireland has long furnished a terrible illustration of this falsity, but it would probably never have been recognized in England, as regards Ireland, as it now begins to be, at least by the Liberals, but for the light let in on the land problem by the American agricultural competition. It is this which is causing Irish grievances to receive an amount of thoughtful consideration in England which has never before been bestowed on them, in spite of the provocation to deafness and repression offered by the excesses and follies of the Land League. It is making Englishmen ask themselves for the first time in their history whether country gentlemen and absentee landed proprietors are things which a community like Ireland can indulge in in its present industrial condition. Of course they would not ask themselves this if they had not previously abandoned the belief that the three interests in land were part of the primordial foundations of human society.

THE DECREES AGAINST THE CONGREGATIONS IN FRANCE.

PARIS, November 17, 1880.

THE last session of the Chamber elected in 1877 has opened in a very stormy manner. The facts being known to you I will simply point out their general bearing, so that you may be able to estimate aright our present situation in home affairs, and what may be expected to ensue from it. It must be acknowledged that party spirit runs high; at times it is aroused to fury. This exasperation, which is not without danger, may be justly attributed to the execution of the Second Decree concerning the unauthorized congregations. As I have already stated, although in conformity with the letter of the French law, the Second Decree was none the less a serious political error; the feeling in all other free countries with respect to it was not a mistaken one. The French Republic had other means at its disposal of contending against Ultramontanism, preferable to such as give an appearance of persecution to its proceedings. I maintain that the best of these means was to bring forward a new law on associations, making Government authorization easily obtainable by all societies not constantly conspiring against our institutions; the Government reserving the right of preventing them from reconstituting mortmain property.

In defence of the Government, it must be admitted they could not do otherwise than enforce the decrees for the dissolution of non-authorized religious orders; only they should have hastened their execution and struck the blow simultaneously, before resistance could have been organized. They would thus have avoided the scandalous scenes which have taken place in all parts of the country. It is true this delay proceeded from honorable scruples. The Government always hoped the congregations would finally apply for the authorization required by law, for it must not be forgotten that our so-styled religious martyrs at the very outset placed themselves in an illegal position. Besides, we must not exaggerate their martyrdom: the society once dissolved, its members retain their property and enjoy all their rights as French citizens. They can perform mass in the churches near their convents, and have, in fact, been received with sumptuous hospitality by the Catholic aristocracy. Allow me to relate a familiar little anecdote which will fairly depict the situation of the members of these dissolved communities. I was lately at a Parisian hatter's who is extensively patronized by the clergy. I met there a priest accompanied by a monk. The former was buying a curé's hat for the latter instead of his Jesuit's cap, doubtless with the intention of taking him as his assistant. "That," said I to myself, "is all the efficacy of these famous Decrees of March 29." Was it worth while causing such excitement in France for a mere exchange of hats, since these monks, whether wearing a triangular hat or a square Jesuit's cap, will teach the same doctrines, with the additional prestige of a persecution more seeming than real. The scenes which occurred before the convent doors when the inmates were expelled have produced the liveliest emotion. Doors broken open by the hatchets of soldiers who were obliged to pass through crowds of excited monks forcibly led away by police agents, amidst the passionate protests of their friends—such scenes have no doubt combined to cause great exasperation, and even provoke much indignation amongst a portion of our population. I persist in thinking this is adverse to the interests of the Republic.

On the other hand, this material resistance in convents turned into strongholds is not of a nature to elevate religion in our country; it is only too evident that these religious bodies made common cause with those political parties most inimical to our institutions. How can this be called in question when in all our large towns we find by the side of these monks the leaders of the monarchical coalition, M. Buffet, M. de Broglie, and the most devoted Legitimists—all those who have striven for so many years to bring France back to the "beau régime" which unites the throne and the altar? It was a great mistake on the part of the Dominicans and Capuchins to seek support amongst the cleverest and most zealous leaders of the reactionary party. By so doing did they not show that if at the present time their allies were the most inveterate adversaries of the Republic, they had themselves been accomplices in the attempt to restore the monarchy in France? It must not be forgotten that with us Ultramontanism is never solely a religious movement, but it is at the same time invariably a political faction. Hence it would be wrong to suppose that religious liberty alone is concerned in state measures against Ultramontanism. It is no less certain that great uneasiness pervades the country in consequence of this desperate struggle between the civil power and the religious communities. Civil war was kindled in all hearts, and it was within an ace of breaking out in the streets at Lyons, while at Turcoing, in the Département du Nord, blood was shed. The most serious feature of the case is the league formed by nearly all the secular clergy in favor of the congregations; it includes the French episcopacy, and has received the approbation of Pope Leo XIII. Instead of dying out, as might have been expected after the execution of the decrees, the struggle will be renewed as ardently as before; after a brief delay, the infallible result will be to raise the question of the separation of church and state or the suppression of the "Budget des Cultes."

The session of the two Chambers was opened in a stormy atmosphere. You know that the Ferry Ministry narrowly escaped being overthrown for seeming disposed to defer the bill for the reform of the judicial bench. Many of the judges having in the matter of the decrees passed judgment favorable to the congregations, the Republican majority propose certain reforms, and, although the "Tribunal des Conflits" subsequently took from their jurisdiction the decision on acts of the Administration, the Republican majority are not satisfied; at any cost they wish to suspend the irremovability of magistrates in order to get rid of such as are attached to former parties. The Ministry was only saved by yielding to the will of the Chamber. The only chance the Cabinet has of lasting is the impossibility of replacing it if M. Gambetta intends to await the next election before taking office. One would think that the Republican majority ought to feel the necessity of union in presence of the exasperation of the Right. No one who did not witness the scene enacted at the expulsion of M. Baudry d'Asson can form any idea of the species of delirium tremens which characterizes the Monarchist and Clerical parties. M. Baudry d'Asson had been temporarily excluded from the Chamber in consequence of an insulting remark respecting the Government, the expulsion being in conformity with a formal article of the Regulations, which was ratified by vote of the Chamber. No one was surprised that this Vendean Nimrod, accustomed to chase wolves and boars, as narrow-minded as he is fanatical, should endeavor to make a futile resistance, but what exceeded all expectation was the share gentlemen bearing the highest names—marquises and dukes of the old French aristocracy—had in exciting instead of pacifying him, they themselves collaring, like carters, the soldiers in discharge of their duty.

I was present at the meetings of different clubs during the Commune, but I never heard such furious clamor as rose from benches of the Right during this wrestling match. Vainly do the Royalists try to exculpate themselves by recalling the resistance made by Deputy Manuel and the Left, during the Restoration in 1823; there is no analogy between the two cases. The vote of expulsion against Manuel was an arbitrary one, contrary to the Regulations of the Chamber. His sole offence consisted in having expressed his opinion in moderate terms. His resistance was passive, for, seated on his bench, he awaited the armed force which was to remove him. Neither he nor his friends seized the soldiers by the collar or tore off their epaulettes, as did M. Baudry d'Asson's party. This violence, perpetrated by those who pride themselves on being pre-eminently conservative, shows how deeply political passions are stirred at this moment. The discussion of M. Buffet's interpellation in the Senate furnishes us with another not less conclusive proof. M. Buffet, a serious-minded man, once President of the Cabinet Council, did not hesitate to stigmatize as a crime the application of the Decrees of the 29th of March, amidst the frantic applause of the Right, whose white hairs bristled up like so many war-plumes. Minister Ferry was hooted and almost insulted. Looking on at this outburst of pent-up feeling, one could not refrain from regretting more than ever that M. de Freycinet did not succeed in carrying out the pacific policy he expounded in the senatorial tribune in the discussion which followed M. Buffet's interpellation. One could not help acknowledging he was right when he asked the executors of the Second Decree: "What new friend have you made for the Republic?" The Ministry carried the day in the Senate as in the Chamber; but this victory is no solution of the crisis, and the country is still greatly disturbed. É.

VICTOR HUGO'S 'L'ÂNE.'

PARIS, November 12, 1880.

THE passion for books, or bibliophilism, has never been so intense as it is now in France. There is an old society, called the "Société des Bibliophiles de France," which is constituted on the same principles as the English "Philobiblion." This society of the Bibliophili "majores" is now rivalled by a new society of the Bibliophili "minores," who call themselves modestly the "Société des Amis des Livres." Both societies publish books from time to time, but the new society has devoted itself more particularly to the class of modern writers called the "Romantics," in contradistinction to the old "Classics." It has published and illustrated with much luxury Mérimée's 'Chronique du temps de Charles IX.,' Henri Murger's 'Vie de Bohême,' and a novel of Théophile Gautier's. There are only a hundred copies printed of these editions, and they are all numbered. The next volume which is likely to be published by the "Amis des Livres" is the 'Orientales' of Victor Hugo. The great poet has given his consent; the illustrations will be the work of Gérôme, or, if he cannot undertake this modest task, of M. Benjamin Constant, who has made a reputation for himself by some very remarkable pictures of Oriental life.

It is not rare to hear something of the high prices obtained in the sale of great libraries for the princeps editions of the old writers of the fifteenth, sixteenth, or seventeenth century, and for some of the illustrated works of the eighteenth century. Till a very recent period this search for first editions had not extended to the present century; but the "Amis des Livres" having made it their object to bring to light the first editions of the "Romantics," it was soon ascertained, to everybody's surprise, that some of these are already as rare as the rarest books of the old times. There are many reasons for it. Lamartine, for instance, when he published his first 'Méditations,' had only a thousand copies printed, as his editor, not finding the 'Méditations' dans le goût du jour, would not print more. These thousand copies were almost all distributed by the poet himself to his friends, the newspapers, the reviews, etc.; many copies were thrown away, many spoiled, many lost, in consequence of all which you cannot secure a good copy of the 'Méditations' in their first edition without paying a very great price for it. We call a good copy an unbound copy, with its original paper cover and with its margin entire. The paper of these first "Romantic" editions is of good quality, much better than paper nowadays, and as books these are generally good books, well printed and carefully corrected. The fonds of a Romantic collection will consist chiefly of the original copies of the works of Lamartine, of Victor Hugo, of Alfred de Musset; to these you may add Théophile Gautier, Prosper Mérimée, some works of Stendhal, of Balzac, and of Madame Sand.

It is incredibly difficult to form such a collection, as there is no bibliography of the "Romantics." A few catalogues of public sales can give you some data on the subject, but so far nobody has done for them what has been so ably done in the 'Bibliographie Corneillienne,' in the 'Bibliographie Racinienne,' in the description of the works of Régnard, of Marivaux. We are no longer content with a dictionary like that of Brunet; we wish to have for each great writer a complete description of all his works, in the original and successive editions, made in his lifetime and under his supervision.

It would be no small task to make this description for Victor Hugo, for instance. He has just added a new poem, "L'Âne," to the list of his works, and his poetical vein seems quite inexhaustible. Publishers have now adopted a deplorable plan when they issue a new book: they print, for instance, ten thousand copies, and on the covers of five hundred they put "first edition," on another five hundred "second edition," and so on. If you hurry to buy a new book of this sort you are sometimes offered the tenth edition on the second day of the sale. All these editions are really the same, and all bibliophiles ought to enter a protest against this method, which has been invented simply in order to make it appear to the ignorant public that a book has an extraordinary success. The work of the bibliophile will become very difficult in future if he has to take as separate editions only those in which there is a real difference in the text.

I am afraid there will never be any difficulty in procuring an original copy of 'L'Âne.' Victor Hugo has tried to do what Samson did with the jaw-bone of an ass—he has struck "a thousand men" and made a long war in verse against the Philistines. The ass is now looked upon as a symbol of stupidity and of ignorance; the ancients were more just to him. The patient animal was almost sacred among the early Semitic races; we see man changed into an ass in the old Milesian fables, and afterwards in the novel of Lucius of Patræ and in the 'Metamorphosis' of Apuleius. Balaam's ass is the only animal in the Old Testament endowed by miracle with the power of speech. We find the ass in the mystic stable where the infant Jesus is adored by the angels, the shepherds, and the magi; we find him again carrying Mary and the infant Jesus to Egypt; we find him walking on the palms into Jerusalem. The people see now in the black cross visible on the back of the ass a symbol of this triumphal entry. There is a common legend in many provinces which represents the ass conversing with the ox on Christmas night. The "Feast of the Ass" was celebrated during the Middle Ages in many churches in France—at Rouen, at Beauvais, at Autun. A great ceremony was performed, as the Passion is now played at Ober-Ammergau; a girl carried a new-born child on an ass adorned with the richest clothing; she was let into the choir of the church, and the choristers received him with the famous hymn of Peter of Corbeil:

"Orientis partibus
Adventavit asinus
Pulcher et fortissimus,
Sarcinis aptissimus."

The ass was conducted before a litter and the office was sung. At the end of the mass the priest, instead of singing "Ite missa est," had to bray three times—"ter hihinabit" says the old rubric of the feast, and the people, instead of "Deo gratias," answered three times "Hinham, hinham, hinham." Such ceremonies can, of course, be ridiculed, and to many may seem profane. There is even now every year a "Mass of Saint Hubert" performed at Chantilly, where hounds have been kept from time immemorial for stag-hunting. The master has to bring the oldest dog of the pack into the choir, where the dog is blessed.

The symbolic "ass" of Victor Hugo appears before Kant, the great philosopher; his name is "Patience." He enters into a long criticism of the science with which he has been stuffed. 'L'Âne' is a protest of ignorance, of candid, instinctive, and inspired ignorance, of holy ignorance, against a pedantic, vain, windy science. It is a paraphrase in ponderous hexameters of the beatitude, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of Heaven." Hugo's imagination is always prodigious, though it may be said of him "quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus." Fancy, for instance, with him one of those great libraries of old, in which the smallest pamphlets are to be found with the heaviest folios; there they are, like mummies in their tombs, worm-eaten and covered with dust—the great works

"D'où sortent des lueurs, des visions, des songes, Et des mains que les morts mettent sur les vivants."

This great cemetery is suddenly put in motion; the day of the last judgment begins for all this dead thought. The little pamphlets, the small books take wings; "les livres légers aux pédants redoutables" fix their claws and throw themselves like insects on the massive works in which the theology and philosophy of the old world are buried.

"Je plains l'infortuné qu'une puce escalade,
Si la puce, agitant son stylet radieux,
Saute, atome effrayant, la largeur de la terre Et la hauteur d'un siècle et se nomme Voltaire."

The "ass" attempts to deliver the human soul from all the knowledge which has enslaved it; he looks for the natural man under the pedant. He sings in verse the charm and purity of the child, he sings the inspired genius which is persecuted by science in authority—Socrates, Galileo, Campanella. A poem like 'L'Âne' cannot be analyzed. It is more like a dream than like anything else. It is a dream in which the notions of time and of space are abolished. My sensations when I came to the end of it resembled somewhat those of a traveller who has been in a railway carriage for three days and three nights in succession. What can remain in a mind which has been tossed for many hours on verses like these?—

"Tout marche au but ; tout sert, il ne faut pas maudire ;
Le bleu sort de la brume et le mieux sort du pire ;
Pas un nuage n'est au hasard repandu,
Pas un pli du rideau du temple n'est perdu ;
L'eternelle splendeur lentement se devoile ;
Laisse passer l'éclipse et tu verras l'étoile !"

And I have chosen from the best, the most lucid and transparent. Many of the verses of 'L'Âne' appear more like a parody of Victor Hugo than like Victor Hugo himself—those which tell of God, who

"Joint l'échelon de nuit aux marchers de lumière," and those addressed to the lovers of the past :

"L'ancêtre seul existe, il se nomme Passé ;
Il est l'immense chef vénérable et stupide ;
Sa barbe est la sagesse et le beau c'est sa ride."

There is a terrible monotony in this style ; the hexameter falls like a hammer on a continual antithesis. In this fashion Victor Hugo describes the science of the middle ages, and I wonder from what dictionary he has taken the names of chemists, alchemists, theologians, etc., which are accumulated in his denunciation of forgotten pedants. He has always been a lover of these past names and sounds ; in 'Notre Dame de Paris,' in his first poems, he used largely books which were quite forgotten. His poetical vocabulary was at first drawn from Ronsard. 'L'Âne' seems to me to be a sort of poetical sketch, which had long lain forgotten in some drawer. Hugo found it, and liked it, and gave it its present form, which has something too gigantic and too monstrous. But Hugo is now in what may be called his "monstrous" manner ; the old sculptor can still give life to his statues, but every muscle is contorted, every movement is fanciful ; the ease and grace of youth are gone.

POE'S TALES OF THE GROTESQUE.

To the Editor of The Nation :

Sir : In your very judicial and judicious notice of recent works on Edgar A. Poe (Nation, No. 803) you assume that Mr. Ingram has committed an error in stating that the two-volume collection of 'Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque' made no impression on the public, and in refutation you endorse Mr. Stedman's account of the eager admiration with which it was greeted by himself and his friends. Now, these statements are not irreconcilable, and are doubtless both true. It is perhaps forty years since I have seen the book or read the tales contained in it, and yet I can well remember the impression made on my youthful imagination by the weird and sombre effects so artistically produced in many of them. At the same time they were virtually neglected by the public at large. The book was issued by my predecessors (Lea & Blanchard) in 1839, and a reference to memoranda of that date shows that the edition consisted of but 750 copies, and that it required more than three years to exhaust it. This is certainly not the record of a literary success at a time when the first edition of a novel by Cooper used to consist of 5,000 copies, and it shows that, however much Poe may have been admired by the few who understood and appreciated him, his peculiar genius was as yet caviare to the vulgar.—Very respectfully, Henry C. Lea.

FRAUD AND VIOLENCE.

To the Editor of The Nation :

Sir : What a difference it makes whether it is my ox that is gored or yours ! The case supposed by your correspondent "M. C. L."—that of the Republicans being cheated out of a fairly-won victory by gross and palpable fraud—is precisely what happened to the Democrats four years ago. If "the temptation to resist villany by force" did not then lead to bloodshed, it is no thanks to those who successfully carried through the conspiracy. If General Hancock had now been elected by the Morey fraud—as I am very glad he was not—I suppose the Republicans in their turn would have had the good sense to acquiesce. Marcel.

THE DEMOCRATS AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

To the Editor of The Nation :

Sir : Do you not treat the Democrats rather cavalierly in the matter of civil-service reform ? The history of the party South and various theoretical considerations indicate that they are likely to be in favor of a tenure of office for good behavior. It was a most familiar matter before the war that the South kept their men in office as long as they did well, and sneered at the inefficiency of the extemporaneous Northern public officers. Under the Confederate Constitution the whole civil service held for good behavior, if I remember, and no provision was more applauded at the South.

The most universal political division in peaceful States is between the aggressive middle class who are making their fortunes and the rest of mankind. They grasp at the invested capital of the old, wealthy families with one hand and the wages of the poor with the other, and have them all against them. The aggressive party is, above all things, determined to have its own way, and never likes to tie itself up. The other party is generally controlled by the old, rich members of it, and is cautious, conciliatory, fond of permanent arrangements and provisions. The Republicans are the aggressive party. The Democrats would be much more likely to favor the provision of the Confederate Constitution to which I have referred.

The Democrats, of course, want their share of the offices, and would like to turn out enough Republicans to get them. That is a quite different matter from the permanent regulation of the tenure of office. President Jackson is charged with introducing the "spoils system," but a full half of the blame for that should rest with those who used the civil officers as such to defeat the old general. When that work was once begun the rotation in office was a matter of course. M.

Easton, Pa., Dec. 2, 1880.

DEPUTY-COLLECTOR LANIER.

To the Editor of The Nation :

Sir : I like the views you take of civil-service reform and the proper course to pursue in the appointment of Federal officers, as well as to the conduct of the latter. What you say in your issue of the 25th of November as to the deputy revenue-collector in the Fifth Congressional District of Louisiana is true. Lanier, aside from the causes you mention, is one of the worst specimens of the unfortunate class of Federal officials which the conditions of the civil service as it now stands have thrust upon the Southern communities. The sequel will show this to be true.

CAMPAIGN BRIBERY.

To the Editor of The Nation :

Sir : The letter of your correspondent "M. C." on the subject of "Campaign Bribery," in No. 803 of the Nation, ought not to go unanswered. I cannot imagine in what part of this State "M. C." lives, and therefore cannot deny his statements of my own knowledge. I can only say that my own experience has been such that those statements are utterly incredible to me.

Like "M. C.," I reside in one of the interior counties of the State, in a village of about six thousand inhabitants and a township that casts about thirteen or fourteen hundred votes. My first vote was cast in 1864 for Lincoln, "and in political faith I may style myself a 'young Republican' and a disciple of the Nation." So far my antecedents are a good deal like those of "M. C." But I think I am better qualified to give an opinion upon what are called practical politics than he is, for I have taken an active interest in them ever since I became a voter, always attend party caucuses, frequently go to conventions as a delegate, and generally spend election day at the polls with tickets in my hands. I do not consider myself any part of the "Machine," however, for I never interest myself in the distribution of offices, always vote a split ticket and do it openly, often work against this or that candidate of my own party, and have never held any office except the undesired and undesirable one of inspector of elections for two or three years ; but I am familiar enough with the working of the Machine to know how much truth there is in "M. C.'s" statements. I think you will see from the above that I am much better qualified to give an unbiassed opinion as to the amount of bribery that prevails at elections than he is, and I can state of my own knowledge that nothing in the remotest degree resembling the wholesale corruption he speaks of takes place in this town ; and from what I know of the State at large I cannot believe it takes place anywhere, not even in the large cities, where offences against the suffrage most prevail. There are, doubtless, more or less votes bought and sold at every election in every county in the State. I have two or three times seen transactions at the polls that looked suspiciously like bribery, but nothing that I could positively identify as such. Three or four times I have been approached by men who wanted something for their votes, the proposition usually being that I should "set up the drinks." Once at a town election in the spring, when national politics were not involved and there was a struggle between two prominent men for the position of supervisor, I heard it stated that a good deal of money was used, but it must have been done in a very quiet way and not at the polls. It would be much more easy to use money then than at a fall election, when every man's name and political preferences are down in the canvasser's book for weeks beforehand.

The nearest approach to anything like bribery committed by the regular campaign organizations of the parties in this town consists in hiring influential laboring men of large acquaintance to stand at the polls all day long and peddle tickets, receiving wages therefor. Except sometimes at town elections these always belong to the political party that hires them. At the late exciting election in this large town, containing three election districts, the Republican party hired just one such man (a Republican) and paid him three dollars for his day's work. I can speak from authority on this subject, for I was the treasurer of the Republican organization, all the campaign funds passed through my hands, and I have receipts for all my payments, which receipts I shall be very glad to show to "M. C." or any one else that cares to look at them. If any votes were bought for our side they were bought by private individuals with private funds. But I do not believe that any such were bought.

My own private opinion is that some veteran worker, seeing "M. C.'s" greenness, has been "stuffing him," to use a slang expression. He has either been grossly imposed on himself or else he has been imposing upon you. I have in my time seen a good deal of illegal voting, or what I suspected to be such, on the part of men not naturalized, or not of age, or not residents of the district, or who had made bets on election, or who had voted before. I have once or twice also seen something very like intimidation on the part of employers. These, and not bribery, are the most dangerous offences against the election laws in this country. The charge of bribery is always made by the defeated party after election, and means merely that the party managers want to present to the public a plausible excuse for not having had votes enough.

But if "M. C.'s" statements are in any respect true, his duty is very clear. It is absurd for a reformer to sit down and whine about corruption, as he does, when the remedy is in his own hands. Let him go before the next grand jury of his county and procure the indictment of some of the offenders, or at least let him make the attempt, and then I, for one, will listen to his lamentations with less incredulity than at present. A. R.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

DR. KAPP AND THE GERMAN CONGRESS OF POLITICAL ECONOMISTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Within the last week I have received ten different American papers, partly English, partly German, which all with more or less vehemence or quite childish rage assail me for having treated the last Congress of German Political Economists, held from October 21 to 24 in this city, "to a lugubrious lamentation over the future American wheat production by saying that it must decrease to the standard of the Old World." Against this assertion I most positively declare that neither at the above-mentioned Congress nor on any other occasion have I uttered a word on the American wheat production. I think I had a right to expect that decent papers would give me the benefit of a doubt before making me responsible for such nonsense. As after my unqualified denial the matter ceases to be personal, I beg to intrude upon your kindness for the statement of a few facts which will perhaps be of some interest to your readers.

The Congress of German Political Economists, which first met in 1858, and in its majority consists of German free-traders, has greatly contributed to the late liberal German legislation from 1867 to 1878, by doing away with the usury laws, the laws binding a man to the soil or throwing impediments in the way of his removing from one place to another, by destroying the last remnants of the guilds and other mediæval rules. It has nothing to do with the politics of the day, but confines itself to the discussion of social and economical questions. In past years it has met in almost all the large cities of Germany, and this year it held its session in Berlin for a second time. Although the immediate influence of the Congress has ceased since Bismarck's new protective policy, its indirect weight in moulding public opinion and on all matters of economical and social legislation is still very great. In Berlin from 225 to 250 economists, the majority of whom were Germans, had assembled, but Austrians, Russians, French, and others took part in the proceedings. Among the topics discussed I will mention "Emigration and Colonization" and "The Supply of Western Europe with Breadstuffs," as in the telegraphic despatches to the United States they seem to have been confounded. On the former subject I had to report. The following resolutions, drawn by me, were almost unanimously adopted:

"I. Emigration is one of those great features whose influence has been felt for centuries in the life of nations, and which are sufficiently explained by the real or supposed contrast of the bodily wants and political or spiritual aims of the individual with the temporary economical, intellectual, and political condition of mankind in general. It has its origin in an impulse which has spread the blessings of civilization over uncultivated countries, and has promoted the progress of humanity. This movement, whether convenient or inconvenient to the respective governments, has made its influence more or less felt at different times, and cannot be prevented by police measures, coercion, or by difficulties thrown in its way. There is only one way to avert it—that is, by granting to the individual a space, as unlimited as possible, for the development of his intellectual and economical faculties, by making his country so dear and sacred to him that he need not turn his thoughts and steps to a strange land.

"II. In consideration of the present state of the trade of the world, which in the course of the last century has grown from narrow dimensions to great international relations; in consideration of the abolition of commercial and colonial monopolies which has taken place almost everywhere in consequence of the war of American independence; and in consideration of the free intercourse of the whole world, colonization is an anachronism which neither a momentary state of distress nor the interest of labor forces us to fall into. In our time the perfection of the system of commercial treaties is the most efficient means for the citizens of the contracting states to secure for themselves the advantages and benefits which in former times governments tried to attain by colonization. While in respect to existing laws the Imperial Government is bound to leave emigration unmolested, but at the same time to protect it against oppression and robbery, the German Congress of Political Economists does not think it admissible that, at the expense of the community at large and for the benefit of distinct classes, attempts should be made to found colonies which, however well meant, are highly expensive and offer no prospects for the welfare of the emigrant."

In the present state of our reactionary policy it was of great importance to give the right answer to the question raised by our protectionists. They allege that in the interest of the so-called "national labor" they must protect the emigrant and keep him away from the United States, where, as a tool in the hands of the "Yankee," he will compete with our manufacturers. It was not difficult to refute the nonsense of colonial aspirations in its utter shallowness and to prove that, apart from all other considerations, the United States comparatively offer the greatest inducements and the safest future to the German emigrant. For this my point of view the reactionary German press attacks me as an agent of American landowners and of purely American interests, while in your country the higher wisdom of enlightened editors first represents me as a consummate fool and, holding me up to the contempt and ridicule of its readers, finally confutes nonsense of which I am not the originator. In spite of the old Latin proverb, "Calumniare audacter, semper aliquid hæret," such unfounded attacks shall not frighten me out of my convictions or prevent me from stating the truth whenever I think it will contribute to the better understanding of both nations.

The other subject discussed on October 23 referred to the "Supply of Europe with Breadstuffs." I likewise enclose the resolutions which, having been very ably defended by Messrs. Herbertz and Broemel, were unanimously adopted. I myself did not take any part in the debate. The speakers were distinguished by broad views, great learning, and a complete mastery of the subject. Besides the above-named I may mention the speeches of Mr. Conrad, Professor of Political Economy at the University of Halle, and Mr. Rickert, member of the Reichstag for Danzig. Instead of treating the Congress to "a lugubrious lamentation," the gist of the several arguments, so far as they concerned the United States, was, that their rich harvests secured Europe against a famine; that if the over-production here and there exhausted the soil, there were for generations to come millions of acres of land as yet unoccupied and to be cultivated; that, owing to the large supply from the United States, the new German duties on breadstuffs could not and would not be of any benefit to our producers, and that the sooner they were given up the better it would be for consumers.

The last-named resolution read as follows:

"Whereas, to judge from the observations so far made, the consumption of breadstuffs in Europe is continually growing; and whereas the production of breadstuffs in western and middle Europe does not increase, but, on the other hand, agriculture seems to devote itself more to the breeding of cattle and the cultivation of plants for agricultural industry: Be it resolved, that the import of breadstuffs from other countries appears to be an urgent necessity. A burden upon it encumbers all branches of industry, the products of which make exchange in the markets of the world possible. The profit which individuals under certain circumstances can make by the duties on breadstuffs is not at all proportionate to the damage thereby done to the rest of the population."

FRIEDRICH KAPP.

BERLIN, November 20, 1880.

Notes.

HERMAN GRIMM'S lectures on Goethe, first noticed by us in No. 639 of the Nation, and again a few weeks since, on the appearance of a new edition, has been translated by Sarah Holland Adams, with the approval and inspection of the author, and is now handsomely published by Little, Brown & Co. The dedication is to Mr. Emerson, for whom Professor Grimm also has words of the highest respect in his letter to the translator.——A new and revised edition of a work published in 1876, but by subscription only, Mr. Charles Dudley Warner's 'My Winter on the Nile,' is brought out by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. If any one will compare the woodcut of the "Wooden Man," which here serves as a frontispiece, with that given in Oncken's 'Allgemeine Geschichte' he will have received a valuable lesson in xylography.——A. C. Armstrong & Son offer an edition of the complete works of the elder Disraeli in six volumes, well enough printed and tastefully bound in cloth, at the low price of $7 50. The set is uniform with the same publishers' Hallam and Lamb.——Robert Clarke & Co., Cincinnati, have published a limited edition of Father Hennepin's 'Description of Louisiana,' translated by Dr. John G. Shea, with notes explanatory and defensive, and variants. Fac-similes of the original maps and the view of Niagara Falls accompany the text.——St. Nicholas for 1880 has been bound in two parts for greater convenience in handling and reading. It and the bound volume of Scribner's Monthly, which comes to us from the same publishers, stand in need neither of description nor commendation.——Mr. Lawrence Buckley Thomas, 409 W. 20th St., New York, solicits subscriptions to the third part of his 'Genealogical Notes,' concerning the pedigrees of the Thomas, Chew, and Lawrence families.——Edwin Arnold's new poem, 'The Iliad of India,' will be begun in the January number of the International Review.——The indefatigable compiler of the Nation Index has also prepared on the same general plan and published a 'Supplementary Index to the Atlantic Monthly' (Bangor: Q. P. Index), and announces as in press an index to the International Review; in preparation, indexes to Lippincott's and Scribner's, for which he solicits subscriptions in advance; and in MS., awaiting subscriptions at $3 sufficient to guarantee the cost of printing, an index to articles on history, travel, philosophy, literature, and politics contained in the best English, German, and French collections of essays, etc.——We hope all railroad presidents will be constrained, if they are not readily persuaded in the interest of morality, to imitate the example of the New York Central Railroad Co., which has forbidden the sale of low and indecent literature on its trains, pointing out the objectionable papers by name, and intending, we trust, to keep its list revised and enlarged to meet evasions. We do not know why the great news companies are not under obligation to draw the line somewhere; and by and by we may have the police authorized to take cognizance of what is exposed at the news-stalls. ——A correspondent writes that the translation of 'The Loyal Ronins' which we noticed two weeks ago is the first made from Tamenaga's romance, and that, therefore, our comparison of it with a previous version in English is misleading. We should perhaps have stated more explicitly that the latter (reviewed in No. 575 of the Nation) was from the Japanese of Chikatsu Monzayemon.——Prang & Co. have issued the four Christmas cards for the designs of which prizes of $1,000, $500, $300, and $200 were awarded last year. ——Apropos of Ebers's 'Egypt,' Mr. A. J. Butler writes from Cairo to the London Athenæum that the engraving of the Alexandrine Pharos in that work revives his surmise that this famous structure "served as a model for Mohammedan architects," and thus became "the origin of the minaret."—— Every one interested in the solution of the smoke problem in our great cities should read Dr. Siemens's account of his device in Nature for November 11. ——A recent French work of some literary as well as historical importance is Paul Lacroix's 'Madame de Krüdener, ses Lettres et ses ouvrages inédits.' ——An undertaking which must attract all students of the history of French Protestantism, as well as students of history in general and lovers of art, is the reproduction in heliogravure fac-simile of the copper plates in 'Les Grands Scènes Historiques' of the artists Tortorel and Perrissin (Paris: G. Fischbacher, 33 rue de Seine). They are contemporaneous illustrations of the course of events during the persecuting epoch of 1559–1570, and are doubly memorable as records and as pictures.——Part 20 of Stieler's Modern Hand-Atlas (B. Westermann & Co.) has for its three maps Russia and Scandinavia, North America (wholly new), and Australia, which shows in a striking manner the spread of discovery and civilization since the last edition. We have received also two supplementary numbers of a splendid map of the Mediterranean, to be completed in eight sheets, and so liberally construed as to extend even to the Persian Gulf. Railroads and steamboat lines receive particular attention.——The American Water-Color Society will open its fourteenth annual exhibition at the Academy of Design on the 24th of January, and close on February 23. Works will be received from January 10 to January 12, but those in black and white are no longer invited. The Secretary is Mr. Henry Farrer, 51 West Tenth Street. An autographically illustrated catalogue will be prepared as heretofore.

—One seldom expects the text of holiday folios to be anything but subordinate to the plates, but the Rev. M. G. Watkins's 'Pictures of Bird-Life in Pen and Pencil' (Cassell, Petter & Galpin) is an exception to the rule. What the author has to say about a dozen British birds—the robin, reed-warbler, nightingale, blackbird, oriole, wren, etc.—does not pretend to be original, but is pleasantly gathered from the writings of various naturalists, checked by personal observation in most cases, and is planned to show how each bird figures in poetry, legend, and folk-lore. The designs are by Giacomelli, whose bird-drawings are well known, and are on a large scale, with usually picturesque and graceful accessories. The work is beautifully printed. Passing at a stride to less ambitious undertakings, we take up the holiday edition of Tennyson's 'Dream of Fair Women,' published by James R. Osgood & Co. Besides the heavy paper and decorated cover the special attractions consist in illustrations engraved under the direction of Mr. A. V. S. Anthony. The artists are Mary Hallock Foote, W. H. Low, C. S. Reinhart, F. Dielman, A. Fredericks, and others who present their conceptions of the various women besung. There is nothing inspired about these and nothing striking about their execution. We should say that they were badly "edited." 'The Teacher's Dream,' by W. H. Venable (Putnam), on the other hand, is more valuable for its illustrations than its poetry, which is of the simplest character. The former are by H. F. Farny, and some of them are very happy, both in design and execution.

—'Bibliomania in the Present Day in France and England' is the title of a neat brochure, translated from the French and published in a limited edition of 250 copies by J. W. Bouton. It gives an account of several remarkable book-sales in Paris and London, with prices of the most important works, and, where obtainable, the prices reached at previous sales. The French parentage of the book is conspicuously noticeable in the circumstance that almost a half of it is taken up by the Didot sales, the proceeds of which exceeded 2,250,000 francs. The larger portion of M. Didot's library (in number of books but not probably in value) is yet to come to auction. The little book under notice is one from which the amateur collector can gather instruction; nor will it fail to interest the veteran bibliophile. It is set off with a portrait of George Trautz, and contains a notice of that famous Paris bookbinder which the reader will wish had been more extended or might be extended in a second edition. Trautz was a true artist, and his binding adds hundreds, even thousands, of francs to the price of a book. He was original and inimitable; the merest tyro in binding recognizes his work at a glance. Two hundred volumes are as many as his workshop supplied in any one year; but each was impressed with something of the master's individuality, for no two of his bindings are alike. The distinction of Knight of the Legion of Honor was conferred upon him in recognition of his artistic deserts.

—A few weeks ago we printed a communication from Ann Arbor, telling of a paper on civil-service reform read by the Rev. C. G. Howland before the Michigan State Conference of Unitarian Churches, and of the steps taken by the conference to have the paper repeated as a public lecture and printed and spread broadcast as a tract. We are glad to learn from the St. Louis Congregational Herald, of Nov. 5, that the Missouri Congregational Association, at its session of Oct. 15, listened to a discourse from the Rev. E. B. Burrows on "The Relation of the Churches to Political Reform," for which its thanks were voted, together with resolutions which deserve to be quoted entire as an example to similar religious bodies as well as to the clergy individually:

"Resolved, That the Civil-Service Reform of the nation is a problem of vital and urgent interest in its relation to the public morality and honor, and to all that, as Christian citizens, we hold dear.

"Resolved, that we protest against the political doctrine, 'To the victors belong the spoils,' as criminal and dangerous, threatening the very foundations of our liberties.

"Resolved, That, recognizing the need of an awakened Christian conscience in this matter, we suggest for the consideration of our approaching National Council whether it ought not to make an emphatic utterance upon this subject, and that the delegates of this body be instructed to bring this suggestion to their notice."

—Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," which met with such unprecedented success last season, has evidently lost nothing of its popularity, for, both at the public rehearsal and the second concert of the Symphony Society, Steinway Hall was crowded with enthusiastic and delighted audiences. The two performances were, however, in no respect an improvement upon those of last year; on the contrary, in many points they were inferior, especially in the solos, which, with the exception of Mlle. Valleria's Margaret, were unsatisfactory. Great expectations were entertained of Mr. Henschel's Mephistopheles, which made his rendering all the more disappointing when it was found that he had undertaken a part for which he was altogether disqualified. The music is too low for him, and his voice has not sufficient weight to contend against the overwhelming effects of Berlioz's orchestration. The brightest and most characteristic number of the whole work, the celebrated serenade in the third part, where Berlioz produces with the full string orchestra, in fortissimo pizzicato, the effect of a gigantic mandolin accompanying the voice, was almost spoilt by Mr. Henschel's unsuccessful efforts to make himself heard, and by the unreasonably fast tempo with which Dr. Damrosch took this admirable song. In one number only, the beginning of the seventh scene, "Fields of Roses," which is written in a gently-moving tempo, and accompanied by most delicate combinations of string and reed instruments, did Mr. Henschel have an opportunity of displaying the delightful qualities of his voice and school. Still less suited for his task was Mr. Frederick Harvey, to whom the difficult part of Faust had been entrusted. Mr. Harvey's voice is powerful and of fair quality, but it is entirely unschooled. He sings deplorably out of tune, his notes come from his throat instead of from his chest, his intonation is uncertain, and his phrasing inartistic. But, even if it were possible to overlook these defects, it was evident that, whatever Mr. Harvey may achieve in a different class of music, Faust, and Goethe, and Berlioz are altogether beyond the limits of his intelligence and artistic education. Mlle. Valleria sang Margaret with her habitual unaffected grace and charm. She was in excellent voice, and was, so far as the soloists were concerned, the redeeming feature of the evening. Dr. Damrosch has assembled an imposing chorus of over five hundred voices. They are in an advanced state of training, auguring well for the great work which their conductor is now preparing for the musical festival to take place next May. The work of the orchestra was in most respects excellently done. The stirring strains of the old Rákóczy march, with Berlioz's wonderful instrumentation, were rendered with great fire, and the fine and delicate qualities of Dr. Damrosch's string orchestra showed to great advantage in the whisperings of the "Dance of the Sylphs" and the grotesque "Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps."

—Boïto's "Mefistofele" has been three times repeated since its first production last week, and the public interest in this remarkable work has not abated. The last performances, both as regards soloists and chorus, showed much improvement. Mephistopheles, not Faust, is the leading rôle of the opera, and Sig. Novara fills it with great effect. His voice is of considerable compass and flexibility, and fully equal to the great difficulties which the part presents. He is, moreover, an impressive and accomplished actor. Campanini and Mlle. Valleria seem to have made the characters of Faust and Margaret their own, and are as interesting in this new version as they are in the same parts in Gounod's opera.

—A St. Louis correspondent calls our attention to a singular piece of literary appropriation committed by Mr. George Meredith in the October number of the Fortnightly Review. Our readers are familiar, at least by our own report of it, with a little book published in Germany a year or two since, and much noticed in that country, called 'Meine Beziehungen zu Ferdinand Lassalle,' by a lady who called herself, from the name of her first husband, Helene Racowitza, born Von Dönniges. The book is a description of how she became engaged to Lassalle, how the engagement was broken, and how, in consequence of this, the lover lost his life. Its accuracy in details has been questioned; but there is no doubt that the account is substantially true, and it is so obviously the expression of passionate feeling and sense of injury, simply and tersely described, that the reader's sympathies are at once won and retained to the end. Mr. Meredith has taken this brief but pathetic and dramatic story, and, without the least acknowledgment, made it the basis of one of his fantastic tales. Not only are the numerous personages in the fiction and the memoir identical in character and in their relations to each other, but whole pages of conversation and incident are transcribed without change, except the substitution of Mr. Meredith's turgid, affected, and pedantic rhetoric for the simple narrative of Mrs. Racowitza. We can find room for but a single instance of the similarity. The original reads (Lassalle speaks): "No? A negation, then, is the first thing that I hear from you! So that's how you look, that's you? Yes, this agrees with what I had fancied; this is right." Helene then turns to look for her hostess (the scene is at a party), when he puts his hand on her arm and says: "It is unnecessary; we know each other already. You know who I am, and you are Brunhilde, Adrienne Cardoville, the fox Korff told me about—in short, Helene?" The following is Mr. Meredith's version: "'You are she! So, then, is a contradiction of me to be the commencement?' . . . She gazed for her hostess. . . . 'Why should we two wait to be introduced?' said he. 'We know one another. I am Alvan. You are she of whom I heard from Kollin: who else? Lucrezia the gold-haired, the gold-crested, wise as her sire; Aurora breaking the clouds—in short, Clotilde!'" It is small abatement of the offence that Mr. Meredith, in his second instalment, adds the sub-title, "A New Version of an Old Story," and lets it be known through the Athenæum whence he got his material.

—A good work has been done the past summer in the libraries of the monasteries on Mt. Athos by Professor Spyridon Lampros, of Athens. These twenty monasteries, the oldest of which were founded by Constantine the Great, have been, in times past, the residence of many learned monks. Their possessions and privileges were protected by the Turks, and the whole peninsula became a monastic republic, free from all outside interference. The spirit of learning, however, passed away, and during the first part of this century the ignorant monks repeatedly filled their purses by the sale of books and manuscripts from their old stores. With the revival of national spirit the sales happily ceased, but the jealous residents have refused to scholars even the privilege of freely examining what is left. Dr. Lampros, who had studied in many of the libraries of Europe and had brought to light some records of the mediæval life of the Greeks, was, in 1877, appointed University instructor in Greek history and diplomatics. Desiring to make a full exploration of the treasures of Mt. Athos in the interest of the learned world, he secured from the Greek legislature a vote of approval, which was followed by the promise of material aid from the Government. A hearty commendation was obtained from the Patriarch of Constantinople, the Bishop of Salonica, and other Greeks of Turkey. Three university students were engaged to join in the work, and also a Swiss artist who had been drawing-teacher to the king's children, and would aid the professor in his studies of Byzantine art. With these helpers he sailed to Athos last June and was cordially received at Karyae, the capital, by the council of deputies, who ordered for him the most ample facilities in every monastery. He improved his advantages, went everywhere, and, finding the libraries and archives in the neglected condition previously reported, he encouraged the monks to immediate reforms. Especially did he look up the manuscripts, which he cleaned, sorted, and finally labelled and catalogued. In five libraries only had a catalogue of the Greek manuscripts been attempted, and it was complete only in Batopedi. Here is found that choice codex of the geographer Ptolemy which was reproduced in fac-simile in 1867 by a Paris publisher. In the archives of the several monasteries were found the original parchments, sealed with golden seals, containing their charters and grants of land from the Byzantine emperors. Some of them may be forgeries, but even the genuine are judged by the professor of less general concern than previously supposed. The formal parts are in phrases familiar to the readers of such documents, while the mass of names of places have value only for the topography of Mount Athos, the two peninsulas to the west, and the islands of Lemnos and Thasos, where their lands chiefly lie. They may some time be printed, along with their other archives, by the monasteries themselves, when they have the means, as has been done already for the monastery of Panteleëmon by its Russian patrons. Professor Lampros's report to the Greek legislature gives only the outline of his labors, but he promises particulars hereafter. They will certainly be looked for with interest.

—An important contribution to the literature of proverbs has recently appeared in Italy. We allude to the four volumes of Sicilian Proverbs collected by Dr. Giuseppe Pitrè, and forming vols. viii.–xi. of his 'Biblioteca delle Tradizioni Popolari Siciliane' (Palermo: Pedone Lauriel), the previous volumes of which are devoted to popular songs and tales. Some idea of the extent of the work may be gained when we say it contains, in more than eighteen hundred pages, thirteen thousand Sicilian proverbs and nine thousand five hundred parallels from the various dialects of Italy. In addition to these, the collector has given, wherever it was possible, the Greek, Latin, and Biblical adages and maxims which are either the sources of the Sicilian proverbs or throw light upon them. The collection is preceded by an exhaustive treatise upon proverbs in general, with an examination of the origin and history of the Sicilian proverbs, followed by a bibliography of collections of proverbs in the Italian dialects. Besides the proverbs, which are disposed in ninety classes, there are three appendices containing three hundred proverbs from the Lombard colony in Sicily, a number of poems dating from the sixteenth to the nineteenth centuries made up of rhymed proverbs, and, lastly, popular tales illustrating proverbs. The work ends with a glossary of twelve hundred words of most frequent occurrence. The proverbs show the Sicilians to be a sober, industrious people, with an intense love for personal freedom; of political liberty they have, of course, had no experience until recently. The proverbs on women are marked by Oriental malice, while those on the priests have all the license of the Middle Ages. Pitrè has very properly, we think, confined his comparisons to Italy, but even a cursory glance will show that proverbs, like popular tales, are the same, in the main, in all lands. Embodying as they do the results of man's experience, it would be strange were they not everywhere more or less alike. Still, enough new material will be found here to render the collection valuable and interesting. The book is well printed and reflects infinite credit on the indefatigable collector and his enterprising publisher, from whose press have issued so many works illustrating the history and literature of Sicily.

—In mechanical skill our best map-making establishments show no inferiority to the best European, but, owing to the low condition of geographical science in this country, American cartography, when applied to the production of general atlases, falls lamentably short of that of the Old World. This deficiency is felt both in the family and in the school. We have before us two German works which might serve as models in point of execution and of cheapness—'Andrée-Putzger's Gymnasial- und Realschul-Atlas,' and 'F. W. Putzger's Historischer Schul-Atlas'—both published at Bielefeld and Leipzig by Velhagen & Klasing; the one costing three marks, the other one and a half—say, 75 and 37 cents respectively. The first is a narrow folio with heavy brown paper covers, embracing no less than forty-eight maps, of which more than a third it would not enter into the head of our school-geographers to introduce in their atlases, even such as the Northern and Southern Heavens, the Moon, the Earth mapped according to rainfall, Volcanoes and Coral Islands, Ethnography, Religions; and such maps as Gen. Walker's 'Census Atlas' (bettering the German example) have begun to make us familiar with, e.g. Density of Population, Average Temperature, etc., etc., these last being confined to Europe and Germany. There are, of course, separate physical and political maps, and if those on the smaller scales are somewhat meagre in names of places, there is a partial compensation in side-maps, with a general effect of clearness. The judicious use of colors is well shown in the land and water demarcations of Switzerland.

Some few of the maps, like those relating to nationalities and religions, need the teacher's explanation in addition to those affixed rather briefly to the color-key; nor do we contend that any of them are not susceptible of improvement. What is striking is the intelligence and scope with which the series is conceived. The 'Historical School-Atlas' covers ancient and modern times, and gives twenty-seven maps, not in any respect so remarkable as the foregoing, and having many rivals,—for example, Kiepert and Wolff's, which contains thirty-six maps and costs about 90 cents in boards. Such an atlas, however, is not, to our knowledge, employed in our public instruction at any stage, the ancient atlas being used only in connection with classical studies.

—A new geographical locality, by the way, hitherto unnoticed even by Baedeker, has been recently discovered in Germany, namely, "Funker Forg, on the Wartburg"; "at" which place, various respectable journals are now informing us, Luther made his translation of the New Testament into German. It will do no harm to repeat our announcement that this discovery found its first mention in the London Academy, which, a month or two ago, in noticing the interesting fact that the very copy of the New Testament on which the reformer did his work had lately turned up in an obscure German library, spoke of it as used by him "at Funker Förg, on the Wartburg." To those, however, who remember that Luther, during his hiding at the castle in question, was known by the assumed name of Junker Georg, "squire George," it will appear probable that the locality is less a discovery than an invention, for which the Academy's compositors and proof-reader are jointly and severally responsible.

I.

MR. TREVELYAN has achieved a noteworthy literary triumph. For the second time within the course of a few years he has produced the book of the day, and has made all England talk about Fox—his gambling, his escapades, and his speeches—just as a year or two ago he made all England talk about the career, the character, and the virtues of Lord Macaulay. Nor is Mr. Trevelyan's success as a man of letters undeserved. He has chosen a subject interesting in itself, which his talents enable him to make more interesting than it could have been made by any other writer of the day; for it must clearly be understood that the subject of Mr. Trevelyan's book is not what its title would suggest. His theme is not the life of Fox; and though his book contains a good deal about Fox, just as it contains a good deal more about Wilkes and about George III., students in search of information would find it as impossible to collect from Mr. Trevelyan's pages a complete account of Fox's early years as to put together from the same pages a biography either of the king or of the great agitator. His topic, again, is not a history of the transactions which marked the opening years of George's reign. The true, though not perhaps consciously avowed topic with which Mr. Trevelyan deals is the social and political life of those noblemen, rhetoricians, adventurers, and raffs who, in the middle of the last century, made up the political world of England, and devoted such moments as they could spare from drinking, horse-racing, and gambling to the government or the ruin of the British Empire. Such a society, full of talent, life, and, above all, personality, possesses, and always will possess, a fascination hardly deserved by the merits of its members. As long as England, or for that matter as the United States, endures, the pictures of the generation who for the last time governed, or professed to govern, the whole of the English race will have a strange attraction for their descendants; and among the numerous sketches of the Georgian era with which English and American libraries will soon be filled none will command more popularity than the brilliant piece of literary painting produced by Mr. Trevelyan. His gifts and his sympathies have a curious adaptation to the work he has in fact, though not in name, taken in hand. He writes in an effective, if in a somewhat verbose and pompous, style. He is himself full of life and spirit, and has the rare gift of transferring his own liveliness to his writings. He has even, in a merely literary point of view, marked defects, but he never commits the one unpardonable offence of being dull.

Yet even natural parts and command of style would scarcely have availed much if Mr. Trevelyan had not been thoroughly in harmony with his topic. If he had lacked this one quality he might have been as dull in writing of Fox as is so meritorious an author as Prof. Seeley when writing about so remarkable a man as Stein. As it is, Mr. Trevelyan exhibits at every turn his unconscious sympathy with the age of which he writes. A rhetorician himself, he delights in the rhetorical aspects of a rhetorical era. A keen politician, he enters into the feelings of men who threw themselves heart and soul into politics, just as they threw themselves heart and soul into fox-racing or prize-fighting. He, too, like the heroes whose portraits he paints, identifies politics with the party struggles of English public life, and fully shares their zest for the discussion of constitutional problems, and for the fighting of Parliamentary battles. Mr. Trevelyan is, in fact, the soundest of sound Whigs. He adores the House of Commons; he regards the beauties of Holland House as something too sacred to be fully appreciated by a thorough-going Tory such as Sir Walter Scott, and speaks of even the "Bedford gang" with bated breath. Now, whether a politician can guide himself through all the problems of modern politics by strict adherence to the traditions of the Whig party may be open to question, but no one can doubt that a writer called upon to paint English political life in the latter half of the last century gains much by being imbued with Whig sentiment. No one who hates a titled nobility can describe with effect the political struggles of a profoundly aristocratic age. No one who is not himself imbued with that love of individual freedom which was the noblest trait of the Whigs can enter into the political views of statesmen who, whatever their defects, had the great merit of offering constant opposition to every royal attempt to establish a system of personal government. Mr. Trevelyan's principles and prejudices all favor his success as a painter of political society in the eighteenth century. If, then, his book could be treated as merely a series of discursive and brilliant essays on the superficial but striking aspects of public life between 1760 and 1774, criticism would be all but disarmed. The title, however, of the work, and the whole tone in which it is written, show that its author intended to make a serious contribution to the history of the Whigs. He comes forward as what may be termed a biographical historian. It is, therefore, incumbent on any conscientious reviewer to consider carefully what rank Mr. Trevelyan can claim among historical writers, and to express his opinion with the candor and plainness perfectly compatible with keen admiration for Mr. Trevelyan's very remarkable literary gifts.

The author of the 'Early History of Charles James Fox,' if considered as an historical writer, may be described as an historian of the school of Macaulay; and it is no discredit to Mr. Trevelyan that he should show himself to be profoundly influenced by his uncle's modes of thought, principles, and even prejudices. Unfortunately he lacks a quality in which Lord Macaulay was, like all really great historians, pre-eminent: he has not the gift of narration. From one end of his last book to the other there is the most singular and distressing want both of dates and of arrangement. To narrate a series of events in a natural, simple, and clear order is no doubt a difficult task. It is certainly a task which Mr. Trevelyan has not yet proved himself capable of performing. It would be unfair to compare him with such a master in the art of narrative as his uncle. It is not unfair to compare him with Lord Stanhope, and we venture to say that any one who puts the 'Early History of Charles James Fox' side by side with Stanhope's 'Life of Pitt' will see that Lord Stanhope excels Mr. Trevelyan as much in the capacity for orderly narration as Mr. Trevelyan excels his lordship in vigor and effectiveness of style. It is, again, painfully apparent that Fox's last biographer has never appreciated the charm of simple and direct statement of plain facts. To speak of a simple thing in simple language seems almost beyond Mr. Trevelyan's powers. One may further add that of the spirit of research, such as animates the best of modern historical students, Mr. Trevelyan gives no proof whatever. He undoubtedly possesses a much more minute acquaintance with the memoirs and the lighter writings of the age with which he deals than any person can boast of who has not made the period his special study. But persons who, like the present writer, make no pretence to special knowledge, may yet venture to assert that Mr. Trevelyan has in the main drawn for his facts on authorities such as Burke, Walpole, and Boswell, whose books are the common property of educated gentlemen. To have unearthed the betting-book at Brooks's is to make a certain contribution to the stock of general information. It is the main fruit of Mr. Trevelyan's research.

A defect which lies deeper than the deficiencies we have mentioned is a want on Mr. Trevelyan's part of that sound judgment and insight into the bearings of facts which are at least as much needed in an historian as in a judge. A trifle exhibits this defect as well as, if not better than, a matter of serious import: "Mr. Parkes's memoir has," writes Mr. Trevelyan, "virtually set at rest the controversy that once promised to be eternal." The particular "controversy" referred to is the dispute as to the authorship of the letters of Junius. There are probably few of our readers who do not know that Mr. Trevelyan's assertion is opposed to the most notorious facts. Whether Francis was or was not the author of the celebrated letters is a point on which a prudent man may well hesitate to pronounce any opinion whatever. All that cautious persons will venture to say is that a somewhat better case has been made out for Sir Philip Francis than for any one of the hundred and odd claimants pitted against him. But every one except Mr. Trevelyan knows that the controversy is not closed. The publication of the very book to which he refers gave new life to a dispute which has caused more waste of time and of labor than the solution of an unimportant riddle could possibly repay. The plain truth is that Lord Macaulay attempted dogmatically to close the controversy, and, as every one except Mr. Trevelyan recognizes, the attempt ended in failure. One may add that, curiously enough, Mr.

* 'The Early History of Charles James Fox. By George Otto Trevelyan, M.P., author of 'Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay.'' London: Longmans; New York: Harper & Bros. 1880.

Trevelyan rather complicates the whole case for Francis by suggesting or asserting that George III. sent him to India without any knowledge that he was thereby putting an end to the celebrated letters. "Junius" could hardly have been silenced or bought off by the merely accidental bestowal of a good place on a meritorious clerk. The holding to the inherited dogma that Francis and Junius were without doubt one and the same man, is in itself a petty circumstance which would hardly be worth notice did it not throw considerable light on Mr. Trevelyan's mode of dealing with questions which need judgment and insight. A writer who, because he thinks that a raging controversy ought to be closed, off-hand denies its existence, is hardly competent to solve the problems presented by the character and position of George III.

Mr. Trevelyan, indeed, tries hard to be fair towards a ruler whom it is difficult for any honest man not to detest, and for any clever man not to despise, and we do not wonder that an author who is still young has failed to make intelligible a character which even Thackeray has not analyzed with success. What is to be regretted is that Mr. Trevelyan does not show any more insight into the strong points of the King's position than might have been expected from a sound Whig of 1774. Yet the lapse of more than a century ought to make many things visible to an historian which were hardly to be perceived by Fox or by Burke. George III. spent the greater part of his life in a contest with the Whig aristocracy. The struggle ended in a drawn battle. The King played, in short, a difficult game, and if he did not exactly win was certainly not the loser. The lower we rate his powers—and Mr. Trevelyan, we suspect, a good deal underrates them—the higher we must rate his advantages. If the player was a dullard and won the game, he must have held good cards. Mr. Trevelyan's book incidentally shows what some, at least, of George's advantages were. The very blunder which made him most unpopular in England must have gone far to ensure the support of Scotland. He was enabled from his position, as well as from his character, to put himself in harmony with the average sentiment of the nation. He was the natural leader of the "stupid party"; and stupidity, which naturally allies itself with respectability, is, after all, a gigantic power. The career of Chatham throws, though Mr. Trevelyan does not see this, light on that of George III. The great minister and the commonplace King had one point in common: they each appealed to what Chatham terms the "great public," and perceived that Brooks's was after all not the centre of English life. The statesman, it is true, appealed to the great side, the King appealed to the mean and commonplace side, of the national character, yet they each appreciated better than the Whig leaders the power and the sentiment of the nation. That the true course for the King was an alliance with Chatham is now clear, and it must in fairness be admitted that dimly, and sorely against his inclination, George seems to have perceived for a moment the path of sound policy. The Chatham Ministry ended in failure, and Mr. Trevelyan imputes this failure to the inherent vices of the royal policy, and states that on the accession of Chatham to power "the King's theory of what a ministry ought to be was to be tested under the most favorable possible circumstances as against the theory of Burke." If the statement were correct, the experiment might certainly be held decisive; but Chatham's illness deprives us of all opportunity of knowing whether George III. might not under the guidance of Chatham have achieved as striking a success as he later achieved by an alliance with Chatham's son. It is, at any rate, characteristic of Mr. Trevelyan not to perceive that the break-down of Chatham's health hardly proves the soundness of Burke's theories.

The instances we have given, and others which it were easy to collect, will convince candid readers that Mr. Trevelyan lacks something of those judicial qualities which are essential to historical greatness, and this want, combined with the other defects we have noted, prevent him from at present taking rank among that band of historical narrators of whom his uncle is nearly the most eminent. Yet even the necessary severity of fair criticism need not blind us to the fact that Mr. Trevelyan's deficiencies are made apparent only when he is tried, as he has a right to be tried, by a high standard. His work remains, after all necessary deductions, a brilliant sketch of an interesting society, and may be considered as a discursive introduction to that narrative of the later and more important years of Charles James Fox which English readers expect, and we hope will not expect in vain, from the pen of Mr. Trevelyan.

BEACONSFIELD'S 'ENDYMION.'*

A CONTEMPORARY of Thackeray, of Bulwer, of Trollope, of George Eliot, the Earl of Beaconsfield has always seemed to stand in a class apart by himself, and to be neither the rival nor imitator of any of them. So far as style goes, it must be admitted that he has in literature, as in politics, a distinct style of his own, although he has made use of it in a great variety of ways and for various purposes. In early life his novels were put forward with a certain appearance of seriousness, as, for instance, in the case of 'Contarini Fleming,' the statesmanship of which was evidently the result of considerable study and thought, however misapplied. In his later novels, as in 'Lothair' and now 'Endymion,' it is generally hard to say whether the observations on life and manners and government which he puts into the mouths of his characters (it is noticeable that he never advances a theory or opinion in his own person) are put forward seriously, or whether they are advanced for the author's amusement and the mystification of his audience. When, for instance, in his latest work, he makes some one say that eminent economists are generally bankrupt traders who, having failed in the management of their own affairs, devote themselves to those of others, it is impossible not to be amused at the idea, but at the same time it is difficult to see any rational basis of fact to make it more than an amusing mot. We may add, too, that it reminds us a little too forcibly of an older observation from the same source—that critics are generally persons who have failed as authors. The style is the man, and it is pretty well recognized now that the peculiarities of Lord Beaconsfield's style are mainly this tendency to caustic and amusing epigrammatic cynicism (the same thing has always been used much more effectively by him in his speeches in the House of Commons), and also his Semitic fondness for luxurious display, extravagant splendor, and brummagem elegance. These qualities are all to be found in profusion in 'Endymion,' but considered as making up a style they fall short. There is hardly enough material in them to fix Lord Beaconsfield's literary rank. As a novelist a man must stand or fall, in the long run, either by his plot or his characters. We leave out of view writers of pure romance, the success and lasting value of whose writing may be determined by other tests than these. Lord Beaconsfield has, of course, written both romances and novels, but it is safe to say that there is nothing in the romantic part of his writing, even in such a romance as 'Henrietta Temple' once seemed to be, which will long entitle it to consideration. He has in his old age wisely given up writing romances, and it is by his novels that he has finally succeeded in establishing himself, at least commercially, at the head of modern English fiction. In the invention of plots Lord Beaconsfield has never exhibited any strength. His present novel may be taken as a fair example of what he is willing to put forward as an entertaining story.

Endymion Ferrars, the son of a distinguished public man, begins life surrounded by luxury, and with every hope of a happy and prosperous career. His father is, however, really deeply involved in debt, and when a political crash comes is obliged to retire from London with his wife and children, Endymion and Myra, and remote from society and friends struggle along as best he may until a new turn in the wheel shall put him into power and place again. One stroke of bad luck follows another, and he dies, a ruined man, by his own hand. The life and death of the father show much more of the author's early cleverness than anything else in the book; but this is merely introductory to the adventures of Endymion and Myra. Myra becomes a governess. Here, of course, was an opportunity for strange adventures, for pathos, even for tragedy in the situations, and it is no ordinary family in which Myra obtains a situation. She goes among the Neuchatels (the Neuchatels evidently represent the aggregate virtues and wealth of all the Rothschilds), where she becomes the pet of the family and the intimate friend of the daughter Adriana, and where she leads a life of complete comfort and substantial independence. We are every now and then reminded by the author of the tragic background of Myra's earlier career, but the tragedy is kept so very much in the distance that we fail to be impressed by it. In such a household good marriages are much talked about and not seldom made, and Myra, whose sole idea in life is to advance the fortunes of her brother and rescue the family from the low position to which they have fallen since the death of her father, is very soon asked in marriage by no less a person than Lord Roehampton (Lord Palmerston). Myra immediately accepts Lord Roehampton, is shortly afterwards married to him, and for the remaining 275 pages of the book leads a life of great and increasing prosperity and happiness. She does, to be sure, in the course of it lose her husband; but as this only paves the way for her marriage with the king of France, this can hardly be regarded as a serious calamity. Her function is to assist Endymion in his rapid and certain upward path.

It is one of Lord Beaconsfield's ideas, which some people may call romantic, that men are always assisted in their rise in life by some woman, and if this ever happened to a man it certainly did to Endymion Ferrars. Not contented with making him sure of success through the help of his distinguished sister, the author also provides him with a charming friend in Lady Montfort, and a substantial benefactor in Adriana. There is, moreover, nothing about the career of Endymion which arouses our interest or sympathies. He is from the first fatally successful. The obstacles which arise in his path we know at the outset will not prove to be real obstacles, and vanish entirely at the touch of the author's magical wand. There is no real struggle, and Endymion, whether he wants money, office, or a wife, is as certain to get what he longs for as we are to turn over the pages which advance him in his happy career. He finally marries Lady Montfort, and becomes Prime Minister of England. The plot is undeniably flat. In fact, there is no plot that deserves the name.

The characters in Endymion are numerous, some of them being characters taken from contemporary politics, some the creations of the author's fancy. Myra and Endymion of course belong to the latter class, and Myra is really an extraordinary character. She is conceived in the author's wildest vein, a woman devoted to a single purpose in life, but without any other individuality of any kind. We first catch a glimpse of her at page 17, where the twins are thus described: "Though only eight years of age, a most unchildlike self-possession distinguished them. The expression of their countenances was haughty, disdainful, and supercilious. Their beautiful features seemed quite unimpassioned, and they moved as if they expected everything to yield to them." The scene is at the dinner-table of their parents, and these charming children were "soon engaged in negligently tasting delicacies," while Myra "seemed apparently unconscious of any one being present except when she replied to those who addressed her with a stare and a haughty monosyllable." When the Ferrars family lose everything and go down to Hurstley to live, Myra says little during the journey, "but an expression of ineffable contempt and disgust seemed permanent on her countenance. Sometimes she shrugged her shoulders, sometimes she raised her eyebrows, and sometimes she turned up her nose." When she accepts Lord Roehampton she thus explains the matter to a friend: "Lord Roehampton has every quality and every accident of life that I delight in; he has intellect, eloquence, courage, great station and power, and what I ought perhaps more to consider, though I do not, a sweet disposition and a tender heart. There is every reason why we should be happy—yes, very happy." From these little glimpses of Myra's character one would hardly suppose that Endymion's sister would display, whenever put to the test, all the most admirable qualities which can distinguish a woman. But this is precisely what she does. There is no real cohesion or consistency among the different exhibitions of her character that are placed before the reader. They are all accidental and meaningless. Endymion is the hero of romance as he was understood fifty years ago, with some slight modifications and improvements suggested by Lord Beaconsfield's experience of life. He is moved through the different stages of his career by unconcealed wires, a veritable puppet in the hands of the author. Instead of having startling adventures, as he would have had in an old-fashioned romance, he has, as we have said, nothing but a succession of brilliant strokes of good fortune, so that if he had any individuality there would be no opportunity for its display. It is hardly worth while to go through the other characters in detail. Most of them have been suggested by real people, but by means of anachronisms and the blending of the different characteristics of two people in one the author has managed to make identification in many cases difficult. Prince Florestan, with his charming manners, his fondness for amateur sorcery, his mother Agrippina and his position as pretender, is, of course, Louis Napoleon, but he is recognizable by these external accidents rather than by any development of his character. St. Barbe is the only approach to a real character in the book. This is apparently Lord Beaconsfield's revenge for "Codlingsby," and an amusing revenge it certainly is. Thackeray is dead and gone, and, though a great deal has been written about him, little is known or has been made public of his early life and private character. This fact certainly gives a splendid opportunity to an enemy. Thackeray once overwhelmed Lord Beaconsfield with ridicule in one of his Prize Novels, and now that he is in his grave and that there is no one who is likely to come forward to take up the cudgels for him, the author of 'Coningsby' comes forward to the footlights to tell us a few of the real facts about this once famous man. The facts are, it seems, that Thackeray was a hideous mass of envy, pretence, and snobbishness, and that he could not open his mouth without letting all these qualities be seen. Lord Beaconsfield has always had a great success in characterizing the weaknesses of his enemies, and he has never used his chance to a greater advantage than in the case of St. Barbe. He has of course greatly exaggerated them. In real life a man like St. Barbe would hardly succeed in associating very long with gentlemen; but as a piece of forcible exaggeration of possible traits of character the picture is well drawn.

A minute examination of the construction of this novel would show the most extraordinary inconsistency, haste, and recklessness. The events are strung along one after another, apparently in such a way as will make the narration easiest to the writer, much as they might be in nonsense verses, and the characters are introduced, without much relation to the events, for the mere purpose of exhibiting the author's stock-in-trade. The effect of such a career as Lord Beaconsfield's cannot but be to make him despise his public, and a good-humored contempt for mankind at large is transparent in all his later writing. He is, as we have endeavored to show, without any place in literature properly so called. The peculiarities of his style are chiefly defects, his characters generally libels or nonentities, his construction defective and his plots worthless, yet he has actually succeeded in making himself apparently the most popular novelist of the day. In intrinsic interest there is no sort of comparison between the novels of Lord Beaconsfield and those, we will not say of George Eliot but of Trollope. It is unsafe to predict, but in all probability Trollope's books will be taken as pictures of the English life of to-day when the very names of 'Endymion' and 'Lothair' are lost to the world. Yet the appearance of 'Endymion' is a great literary event. Keys are published of the characters, statements are made of the history of the composition of the work, and the enormous price paid by the publishers for the copyright is telegraphed all over the world as a matter of public interest only second in importance to dynastic changes and revolutionary movements of suffering populations. There must be some explanation of this, and the explanation, we fancy, lies on the surface. It is not simply that Lord Beaconsfield is the only prime minister of modern times who is also a novelist, but that he undertakes to describe in his books the interior life of an aristocracy which is still very exclusive, and whose doings and sayings, whose characters and lives present subjects of interest to a vast reading public. All the world, as it has long been known, is fundamentally snobbish, and it is to this universal trait that the late Prime Minister generously panders. The audience which has a slight acquaintance with and a deep interest in the lives and doings of aristocratic and political people in England has enormously increased within the last twenty-five years. In England a whole press has sprung up, the avowed object of which is to furnish detailed information with regard to it to the ordinary reader. It is precisely the same function which the leader of this aristocracy, if he can be called so, has taken upon himself in his later years. He has never been or pretended to be a very scrupulous person, and he has no real reason to like or admire the aristocracy which he has fought his way into with tongue and pen. They have helped him against their will to political power; there is no reason why they should not help him to other things, even at their own expense, and it is at their expense that this clever adventurer has been all his life living. People really read such novels as 'Lothair' and 'Endymion' for much the same reason that they read a "society journal." If we can imagine a "society journal" edited by Lord Beaconsfield, the parallel would be complete.

HILLEBRAND'S GERMAN THOUGHT.*

IN addressing an English audience, in its own language, the author of these lectures conciliates, at the outset, the good opinion of his hearers by pronouncing the English tongue to be the most precise and subtlest of instruments in the hands of those who inherit it as a birthright, and by conceding to Englishmen the proud position of holding, at the present time, the intellectual leadership of Europe. Those who heard him must have listened with satisfaction to the frank acknowledgment, from a learned German scholar, that the generation now on the stage is fast becoming absorbed by the current which sprang up in England twenty years ago, and that the mental atmosphere of England is the mental atmosphere of cultivated Europe. The six lectures contained in this volume make no pretension to original research, and in considerable part they have already been presented to the public in various contributions of the author to French and German and English periodicals. They do not even pretend to be a complete survey of German literature for the period which they cover. Confining himself to a discussion of the intellectual movement of Germany from the middle of the last to the middle of the present century, the author seeks simply to trace the general course of thought which the Germans have opened for themselves, and which they have combined with the whole movement of European culture. In a word, it is the intellectual standing-point of Germany, as compared with other nations, which is here brought before us. Of course, in the limits of half a dozen lectures only the outlines of the subject can be traced.

Starting with a recognition of the essential unity of mediæval civilization, the lectures give a brief but lucid sketch of the successive contributions made by different European states after national languages and national life had become discriminated. Italy first came of age in the Renaissance. Then followed the great Catholic reaction, in which Spanish influence, for a time, predominated. During the seventeenth century England led the way in the investigation of nature and her laws. As Spanish dogmatism was succeeded by English empiricism, so in turn the latter was followed by French rationalism, which, however, was less a protest against the English movement than a continuation of it. But while the French effected the intellectual emancipation of Europe, it was reserved for Germany to protest against the absolute rationalism of France, and begin the work of restoration on a sounder foundation than that laid by Spain. The great service of Germany was to introduce into European thought the idea of Organism. By this new contribution modern speculation, in every department, has been profoundly modified. It was first elaborated in Germany, and it is the principal aim of these lectures to show by whom this work was done.

The author places the beginning of the German movement at the time of the Seven Years' War, which first roused the nation to new life after the century of intellectual stagnation that followed the Peace of Westphalia. With this date as a point of departure, the great work of restoring and advancing German culture was achieved by three generations: the generation of Klopstock, Kant, and Lessing; the generation of Herder, Goethe, and Schiller; and the generation of the Schlegels, Schleiermacher, Niebuhr, and Schelling. Since 1825 the leading schools have simply repeated or contradicted the ideas of earlier thinkers.

With this conception of the distinctive service rendered by Germany to modern thought, it followed as a matter of course that a very large space should be assigned in these lectures to Herder. The lecturer by no means overrates Herder as a writer; on the contrary, he declares that the author of the 'Ideen' was neither classical nor finished, that he was pompous and diffuse, that his composition was loose and fragmentary, that his reasoning lacked firmness and his erudition solidity. Yet after making all these deductions he does not hesitate to ascribe to Herder an importance which he does not ascribe to Lessing, or to Kant, or to Goethe. At first glance this, no doubt, will surprise many of his readers, and be likely to provoke their dissent; yet the reasons which the author gives for his opinion must be accepted as conclusive. For Herder, more than any other, was the prophet of the new dispensation. He had the soul of a seer, and it was as a seer that he worked so powerfully upon his contemporaries. By opposing synthesis to analysis, spontaneous impulse to conscious action, organism to mechanism, development to creation, he applied a wholly new principle to theology, history, and poetry. Though he remained in a certain sense always a youth, and was never able to cast his speculation into any definite form, no man ever scattered abroad a greater number of fruitful seeds. His very defects only made his influence more immediate and decisive. His unmethodical imagination reunited what the cold, rational analysis of the preceding century had put asunder. His reign, though in the strict sense not a long one, marked a revolution in thought. It may be summed up in the maxim that all the products of humanity, laws, constitutions, religions, poetry, are a collective work, the result of a union of all faculties and all forces. Later writers who have established reputations by developing new sciences have simply followed out Herder's fundamental thought. The two principles on which he laid such emphasis, of organic evolution and of the entireness of the individual, lie behind them all. The author dwells at such length upon Herder, not only for the reason that till lately his influence has not been sufficiently acknowledged, but also because the way was opened by him which was followed by the third generation of the founders of German culture and by the great scholars who, early in this century, revived the historical sciences in Germany.

The pre-eminent position assigned to Herder among German thinkers is the striking feature of these lectures. While the great service of Lessing in founding the literary independence of Germany is fully recognized, little is said of his influence as a thinker, and even Goethe is represented as simply expanding Herder's maxim that, as man is the highest link in nature, he has for his task simply to understand what nature aims at. The speculative method of Kant does not come within the scope of this survey, but only his way of looking at life and history. Between the views of Kant and Herder there was an antagonism which is still felt in the intellectual life of Germany, and in the opinion of the author the moral and political ideas of the great philosopher were not German. Hegel is not reckoned among the original thinkers of Germany, but is relegated to the subordinate position of being a mere formulator of other men's ideas. The most severe treatment is reserved for the Romantic school, whose maxims the author denounces as a caricature of Herder's profound principle of unity, and whose practical ethics he severely condemns. But we can do no more than commend these admirable lectures to the attention of all students of German literature.

CABLE'S 'THE GRANDISSIMES.'*

THE author of 'The Grandissimes,' instead of following in the beaten track of character-analysis trod by the latest and youngest of our magazine writers even, makes a diversion in favor of the old romance. Nevertheless, in painting the Creole life of New Orleans at the beginning of the century he has in effect broken new ground, and, as the soil is rich, one's first impression is that he has contented himself with merely overturning it. But, rich as it is, it needs an artist to exploit it with the success shown in 'The Grandissimes,' and Mr. Cable is a literary artist of unusual powers. Indeed, considering his sensitive appreciation and executive skill, and considering too his nativity, his appearance just now is almost to be called sensational. The peculiarities of Southern men of letters are so well known that to advert to them pointedly is not only to wound an amour-propre singularly alive to criticism, but is to be guilty of platitude. Yet the appearance among them of a literary artist is surely not to be lightly passed over, Southern art having hitherto appeared nowhere but in oratory, and modern oratory, if art at all, being in any but the most highly humanized societies so debased as to be perilously near parody. Mr. Cable not only has the artist's aim of producing an effect rather than of giving vent to personal emotions, but he has the artist's sense of the importance to that end of good workmanship, and one is equally impressed by his absorption in his subject and his contained, concise, and unrhetorical manner of setting its attractions before the reader. The result is inevitably the happy one that the reader shares his enthusiasm before he suspects its existence, and—as we have admitted—is led into referring the merit of the book to its material. On the whole, one finally reflects, however, this is the homage a work of talent always exacts, and it is entirely probable that the actual Creole milieu in 1803 was as prosaic as actuality always appears till the chronicler arrives with his magic lenses. The poetic vein in Mr. Cable is well developed and defined, and the picture he conjures up from the old Louisiana levees and swamps is steeped in sentiment. It has an atmosphere and fragrance quite its own through which it communicates itself and its meaning palpably to the senses. Long ago, in the twilight of the Louisiana day, the ancestors of the Grandissimes and the De Grapions came from France and founded their families and the rivalry between them; the seed of the former became as the sands of the sea-shore, while the latter, after a brief period of prosperity in numbers, dwindled steadily till but two women were left. One of these, a widow, marries the head of the Grandissimes, her daughter a stranger who is not even a Creole, and thus the De Grapion name dies out completely. The two who unite at last the families so long hostile are the hero and heroine of the book. Aurora is pure Creole; Honoré, by force of intellect and character, rises out of the Creole stratum of sloth and lays firm hold on the things of the modern world. Intimacy with an ardent German-American just come to New Orleans, plain-spoken and inelastic as his parentage and having the intolerance of inexperience for Creole prejudices, assists him; he uses Frowenfeld as a flagellant his goad, and probably cares little if the other fancies himself a successful missionary. Frowenfeld is so regarded, at all events, by the rest of the dramatis personæ, though he manages to win their Creole hearts before the last chapter to an extraordinary extent. Over the action and characters of the story hangs the pall of slavery, and the picturesqueness at once and the impossibility of a society founded upon absurd but heroic devotion to an exaggerated notion of the wisdom and necessity of caste, form the theme of the novel.

What a clever writer to whom it is familiar ground can make of this may be easily imagined. Those who followed it as a serial we heartily advise to reread it consecutively lest they miss some of its excellences. If this discloses a suspicion of the vicious serial fault of ending chapters with suspense, on the other hand the singleness and totality of its impression are naturally greatly emphasized. For one thing, the genealogies, which may have seemed confused heretofore, not only clear up but add an important element to the general effect; you feel the ancient and honorable character of the Grandissime and De Grapion ancestry, appreciate the strength of the family feeling better, excuse its concomitant excesses more readily, and, perhaps more than all, through the appeal of this hazy past to the imagination get a quicker sense of the reality of the different persons who have emerged from it. The pedigree business is beautifully done, too. It recalls the similar portion of 'Henry Esmond'; though, since it does recall Thackeray, that is enough to suggest that it is a trifle too beautifully done, and to remind us that Mr. Cable at times displays a rhetorical over-refinement, consisting in a rather playful assumption of the reader's information on some point to be elucidated further on. Everything is cleared up in due time, and you don't mind being mystified, of course, but the uncertainty is annoying; the narrator comes to have the air of caressing what he has to tell, of fondling it and letting you get glimpses of it, but retaining it long and handing it over wholly to your inspection at last with wistful regret. This shows respect for what he is engaged upon, but it is a kind of espièglerie that is essentially not admirable and is plainly something to be outgrown. It is proof of the care which Mr. Cable has bestowed upon his work; but it is a needless one, since there is nowhere a negligent touch to be noted, and other faults of a similar kind testify to an excess of finish, grateful enough if one thinks of its rarity in Mr. Cable's literary entourage, but a blemish in itself like any other. On the other hand, it is obvious that in general its results must be good; Mr. Cable has in such measure the gift of language, is so felicitous in point of pure expression, moreover is so clearly a born story-teller and is so evidently in love with his subject here, that one rightly attributes to his scrupulousness in execution the happy impression the book leaves of more than justifying by its material the affectionate sympathy with which it is written. The Louisiana landscape, the warm New Orleans late afternoon when the Creole world is airing its courtliness and pride in the plazas, the Nancanou and Frowenfeld interiors, and the dozen situations which develop the "laughable, pathetic jumble" of Creole character, are suffered to make the reader's acquaintance quite of their own accord, apparently; and so nice is the author's art that we hardly notice his several introductions, which means, of course, that they have been in the best taste.

It would be doing 'The Grandissimes' an injustice, however, to imply that it is only a charming picture cleverly painted. It deals with graver elements of social existence than mere picturesqueness; and though the society it depicts no longer exists, and its problems have been solved by time, it is none the less a serious and important work for that. The effect upon a tropical society habituated to the substitution of impulse, good or bad, for reasoning, loose or exact, of an institution whose maintenance involved an inversion of the mental processes of the modern world, is a theme worthy the powers of any expositor. It, or the nearly identical situation presented for so many years by the Américain successors of the Louisiana Creoles, has been often enough depicted from a moral standpoint; that is to say, from 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' down, there have been many sermons preached from this text. As a situation which when adequately described suggests its own sermon it has nevertheless been left for Mr. Cable, who has, in the main, made the most of his extraordinary opportunity. Wherever the effect of slavery upon the Creole society or the individual Creole is concerned it is admirably painted; it is suggested or shown by the writer in true dramatic manner, illustrated in the action and betrayed by the characters themselves. The author does not asseverate in propria persona. On the contrary, when the effect upon the slave or the free Pariah is in question Mr. Cable is apt to appear upon the scene. He makes sententious comments, characterized by great good sense and right feeling, but nevertheless palpable intrusions. He says there are some Southerners who still believe the negro slaves were the "happiest people under the sun." But—except Mr. Carlyle—no one else does, and clearly preaching to Ephraim is breath wasted. The audience Mr. Cable really addresses needs neither instruction for itself nor a protest from him as to his own position in the matter. And if it did it would not be Mr. Cable's fault or alter his literary duty. Nearly the same thing may be said and nearly the same explanation hazarded concerning the Bras-Coupé story and the episode of the murder of Clémence. The reader's withers are wrung in behalf of a cause already won. Neither incident is improbable, nor is either probably exaggerated, considered even as a type. The fact of Clémence's fate is perhaps necessary in order to show vividly the extent to which the master shared the superstition of the slave; but, in treatment, both are distressing and appeal distinctly to the nerves. Clémence's piteous plea for her life is good enough to compensate in a measure, but not wholly, for the shock, and one's feeling is that only readers too impervious to suffer from it ought to be visited with the sequel. It is, we think, clear that Mr. Cable's nice instinct is here at fault, and that what used to be called "politics" by sensitive conservatives is responsible for it. It should not be understood that we object to the darkest shadows in a picture of this kind, or to melodrama à outrance, or that we incline to the Greek fashion of killing the victim off the stage; only, that when the intellect and even the emotions are passed over, and the nerves are sought for the purpose not of thrilling but of shocking them, a mistake is made in point of art. In point of art melodrama is never so effective as when it is managed by a cynic with an eye constantly on the peril from bathos, however subtly disguised in contained writing; and we are tempted, by way of illustration, to ask Mr. Cable to compare his narrative of Bras-Coupé with Mérimée's somewhat similar story of 'Tamango,' which is to the full as tragic and pathetic, and far superior in permanence of effect.

It is not, however, owing to any positive blemish—and the character of its melodrama is after all a slight one compared with the positive merits of the book—but rather to its omissions that 'The Grandissimes' is not a great novel as well as a charming one. We own to finding the fact agreeable, not because of cherished prejudices or of innate hostility to the way in which the world is going in fiction, but partly on account of the change, which is a little in the nature of relief, and partly because pure charm is none the less charming for being unadulterated with anything of greater strength. Nevertheless this is selfishness, and does not alter the fact that what prevents 'The Grandissimes' from taking the front rank in contemporary fiction is its weakness in portraiture of an intellectual interest. The best contemporary fiction is wholly given over to the study of subtleties of character, and the entertainment it provides is almost exclusively of an intellectual variety. The old romance amused in a totally different way; it had not the faintest notion of psychology. Each has its advantages, and, no doubt, the fiction of the future will combine them. Meantime, to succeed Mr. Cable needs, one may almost say, modernizing. His Aurora Nancanou is admirably characterized, and takes her place at once as a delightful addition to the prize portraits of fiction; Honoré is well-nigh as distinct and fully as admirable; Raoul is a creation of genius. The over-astute reader may ascribe this, perhaps, to their seductive dialect, which will be a mistake. But beyond these we have types. Even Palmyre and Agricola are not sharply enough characterized to seem individuals. Frowenfeld is a lay figure. The company in general are enshrouded in the poetic and many-tinted Louisiana haze, and one hardly makes out their features. It may be said of the story, as the author remarks of a narrative of one of his characters: "There shone a light of romance upon it that filled it with color and populated it with phantoms." There is, however, indefinite promise in such acute sentences as these: "There are understandings that expand, not imperceptibly hour by hour, but as certain flowers do, by little explosive ruptures, with periods of quiescence between" (p. 130), and: "The one as fond of the abstract as the other two were ignorant of the concrete" (p. 180); and it is possible to expect more incisive power in Mr. Cable's next work. One's last word, however, is that it would be vain to look forward to anything more captivating.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.—II.

THE generation for which the late W. H. G. Kingston wrote is one which has measurably—in this country rather suddenly and unaccountably—lost its interest in Marryat's works. But Mr. Kingston at his best, whether on sea or land, bears no comparison with the author of 'Jacob Faithful,' and at his worst falls a good deal below Mayne Reid in the literary and constructive qualities of his fiction. We have read nothing of his which reached the level attained in his 'Snow-Shoes and Canoes.' 'In the Wilds of Florida' (T. Nelson & Sons) is typical of the author's method of producing a story. It is evidently the result of pure cramming by one who had never seen the peninsula nor a red Indian; and the object in writing it was not to make a genuine historical novel, with the Seminole war as a basis, but to convey a certain amount of information about the country, its vegetation, game, curious insects, etc. There is no part of it which can be called successful, while much of it is absurd—all the talk of the Indians and the whites, and especially the fine instinct for savage warfare shown by Tim Flanagan, "an old follower of my father who had served in his regiment," and accompanies the hero from his Irish home to the St. John River. The fact that boys can regard this book with admiration, as we know by experiment they can, will admonish judicious parents to substitute for it something not more wholesome in intent, but more true to life, to history, and to human nature.

Mr. Kingston's 'Tale of the Shore and Ocean; or, The Heir of Kilfinnan' (A. C. Armstrong & Son) is accurately enough described by the preface, which calls attention to "the stirring incidents with which the tale abounds," and adds that it "contains materials for a full-sized novel." Both in boys' books of adventure and in full-sized novels, however, essentially the same story has been told so often that it is over-confidence to bespeak attention for this rendering, of which, moreover, the absurd improbability would be apt to dishearten the most trustful boy reader.

The practised author of 'Pansie's Flour-Bin' (Macmillan) should have avoided so palpable an imitation of 'Alice in Wonderland.' The first half of the story is very agreeably told, and in excellent English, but when the time comes for the dream to begin, the trap-door proves a poor substitute for the rabbit-hole and all that went on therein.

Of the English, too, of Mrs. Molesworth's 'A Christmas Child' (Macmillan) one can only speak in praise, but we do not consider this a story for children, in the proper sense, at least unless it be read out loud to them by some one who can make plain the subtle working of the boy-hero's mind and the perplexities into which it sometimes led him. The end is sad, but in harmony with the religious motive of the narrative, which seems to be a real account.

Clever and quite orthodox are Mrs. Alfred Gatty's 'Parables from Nature' (reprinted by G. P. Putnam's Sons). They are a sort of Christian Evidences for the young, but not merely that, and can be recommended as aids in moral discipline even to parents who are far from sharing the author's aversion to Darwinism, and who are ready to concede that man is not the central figure in the universe. Mrs. Gatty has a distinct gift for fabulizing.

The 'Story of a Dog,' by N. D'Anvers (Lippincott), is well calculated to entertain a small child, and is characterized by a fair amount of humor and ingenuity. The English of it (it was written on the other side of the Atlantic) is a little careless.

A refined and pretty phantasy, 'What the Blackbird Said,' by Mrs. Frederick Locker (Routledge), is almost a nursery introduction to British birds. As such it would be the better for a greater number of illustrations. Its occasional "hard words" suggest the advisability of having a very young child listen to the reading of it, for the first time at least. The Blackbird learns a lesson of contentment and faith from the Robin and from an old Rook, whose quotations from Scripture are perhaps the most novel feature of the book.

Mr. Caldecott's choice of a ballad for his peculiar illustrations is this year 'The Three Jovial Huntsmen' (Routledge), which in some degree imposes on his talent that limitation which, as the poet says, first reveals the master. Few artists certainly could have contrived a greater variety of action and incident for the imbecile trio who "hunted, an' they hallo'd, an' they blew their horns also." There are the usual full-page cartoons in color, with outline sketches in brown ink, among which last one still remarks this designer's nice sense of perspective, especially when broad stretches of country are to be represented. Mr. Caldecott's humor, too, shows no falling off.

Mr. Richard Markham makes his second contribution to the Bodleyite class of juvenile literature in 'Aboard the Mavis' (Dodd, Mead & Co.), a sequel to his 'Around the Yule Log' of last year. The scene is again laid in eastern Long Island, in the description of which region the author may be trusted implicitly; and the same merry set of boys and girls incur adventures by sea and land, listen to Revolutionary and other historical tales, and, what is the crowning merit of Mr. Markham, behave and talk with great naturalness and vivacity. It is symptomatic of the time in which we live that this September vacation is secured to the boys by reason of "a defect in the drainage-pipes" of their New York school-house (at "2,000 Madison Avenue"), which the conscience of the principal constrained him to repair in the most thorough manner. As for the chapters in American history, we should, had we been writing this book ourselves, have spoken a little less positively about the Norse settlements in New England, and a good deal less partially about the Pequot overthrow. While the cover of 'Aboard the Mavis' is sufficiently gorgeous, the printing and paper appear to us not so good as in the preceding volume.

'The Peterkin Papers,' by Lucretia P. Hale, now appear in a 12mo of 250 pages, illustrated appreciatively, though without much merit in execution, by F. G. Attwood, and published by Osgood. To those who have never made the acquaintance of the Peterkin family it may be explained that they are characterized by extreme dulness of perception, and exhibit that quality in ways and on occasions numerically limited only by the remorseless inventiveness of the author, so that in certain interiors, the children of which are initiated, it is only necessary to speak of a boy or girl as a Peterkin to convey an accurate notion. The design seems beaten out rather thin in the present volume; but if a durable form was dependent on this it was worth doing, and perhaps its audience is not likely to be over-critical as to the proportion of distension to nutriment in its literary provender.

'The Two Gray Girls and their Opposite Neighbors,' by Ellen Haile (Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co.), is for the younger young folk, for whom its variety of incident and the naturalness of its manner make it excellent reading, or rather excellent listening, as its proper audience will need to be read to, perhaps. It is illustrated by Kate Greenaway, M. E. Edwards, Lizzie Lawson, and others, though the drawings of the first are unhappily few in number, and those of the rest not particularly skilful.

'We and the World,' by Juliana Horatia Ewing (Roberts Brothers), is in some respects hardly the "book for boys" which the author calls it, and might be divided into halves for fathers and sons respectively. The first part, although it will interest boys by its number of boyish scrapes and other adventures simply and straightforwardly told, contains rather food for adult thought. The blind mistakes of an affectionate father, even when so well described as they are here (and the portraits of the boys' father and mother are very well done), are hardly matter for juvenile criticism, even if they are for juvenile interest, which we doubt. Particularly good is the description of an English school of the sort supposed to have been obliterated by 'Nicholas Nickleby,' and the difference between the two boys whom fatherly partiality and obstinacy send to different schools is happily hit off. Indeed, the author has a nice perception of character, within certain limits, and should develop it, one is fain to think, by graver work than it is the custom to consider juvenile literature. The last half of the book is full of adventure, and of rather less consequence than stories of its sort.

Samuel Pepys and the World He Lived In. By Henry B. Wheatley, F.S.A. (London: Bickers & Son; New York: Scribner & Welford. 1880.)—Pepys's Diary has a twofold value—to the student as an uncolored revelation of the manners of the time, and to the general reader as an extraordinarily entertaining illustration of human nature. To characterize this value most specifically would now be a superfluous labor; but in both aspects the Diary has stood in need of a commentary. The best editions, it is true, contain copious foot-notes, but these interrupt the attention and are usually forgotten when the leaf is turned; they are momentary flashes on the obscurities of the text, and do not afford that pervading light in which each incident would take its proper place and relative importance in the general life of the world described or in the personal life of Pepys, which, although it had its private demesne, was mainly a share in the larger interests of business, politics, or amusement. This lack Mr. Wheatley has excellently supplied. He draws the principal outlines of the character of the age, so far as it is shown by Pepys—the court, the city, the pleasures and habits of the men and women; and he takes the opportunity given by Pepys's business life to recount the history of the connection of Tangier with England, and to describe the growth of the Naval Office and its mode of administration, with a clearness and brevity not elsewhere to be found. Pepys himself, the man whose humorous exhibition of himself surpasses even English invention and wins a poor-devil sort of kindliness in spite of his meannesses, is very fairly dealt with; indeed, in his case there is very little temptation to the biographer's overcoloring, for in his own time he was only a respectable man, and the chief import of his Diary, so far as it regards himself, is in that very quality of respectability. He was an efficient man of business, with somewhat more than ordinary liveliness, and a few liberal tastes; eccentric even then he must have appeared, but he was successfully masked by his routine, his cunning, and the confidence of his Diary, until, when the key to his secret alphabet was found, his garrulity tore off the disguise and allowed men to complete the portrait. Mr. Wheatley delineates his character justly: "He was unfaithful to his wife and a coward, yet he knew his faults, and could try to amend them. He was vain, ignorant, credulous, and superstitious; yet he had scholarly tastes, and his orderly and business habits were so marked that they alone would point to him as a man out of the common run. He was mean, and yet he was also generous. Perhaps, on the whole, the most remarkable characteristic of the man was his total lack of the imaginative faculty." These are only generalizations; the image that lasts is stamped upon the mind by the specific anecdotes, and in this book the most noteworthy are culled from the Diary, so that, after reading it, one has a real conception of Pepys as he appears in the Diary, as well as a valuable fund of information in regard to his earlier and later life, his friends, his books, and his affairs. This study of Pepys is thus exhaustive; in the long appendix are accounts of his portraits, lists of correspondents and of plays he saw acted, and much other supplementary matter. To read the volume may diminish the pleasure of surprise in reading the Diary, but will pave the way to the clearest knowledge of the man and his times.

Life in a German Village. By the Hon. Mrs. H. W. Chetwynd. (Edinburgh and London: W. Blackwood & Sons. 1880.)—Books about Germany are becoming very numerous, and we know of none which has not its distinguishing good points; but this little volume by Mrs. Chetwynd—two hundred odd pages of large type—seems to us exceptionally commendable. In style it reminds one of the simple, colloquial narrative of home letters; letters, however, which, while entirely unpretentious, show not only a clever woman's faculty of describing little things in an interesting manner, but considerable acquaintance with men and manners, and a thorough appreciation of the picturesque and humorous. The authoress's village seems to have lain in the Prussian province of Saxony, whence she made excursions to the neighborhood of Hamburg, Berlin, Lübeck, Saxon Switzerland, and Dresden. Her pen suffers no temptation to wander into fanciful disquisitions on things in general, after the fashion of Mr. Julian Hawthorne; nor is she betrayed into drawing startling conclusions from meagre premises, in the manner so well illustrated by the clever writer of 'German Home Life.' She reports only what happens under her own eyes, and ventures opinions only upon those subjects with which previous training had made her competent to deal. Her remarks on schools, and officials, and food, and cattle are none the less valuable on this account, especially as, when she praises, it is with moderation, and, when she blames, with good temper. "The world went pleasantly with us in our German village," she says in the middle of the book; "dulness we knew not; the simple pleasures around us were still more appreciated as time went on." And she closes her narrative with the evidently heart-felt assertion that "it is seldom that a stay, from one end of it to the other, can be looked back upon with nothing but pleasant feelings; and, looking back, we often regret the ease of life, the music, our friends, and our German village."

Curiosities of History: Boston, Sept. 17, 1630–1880. By William W. Wheildon. (Boston: Lee & Shepard. 1880.)—The best mode of describing the plan of this little work is to cite the chapter-headings in the table of contents, viz.: Topography of Boston; Public Ferries; Boston Cornfields; Puritan Government; Narragansett Indians; Names of Places, Streets, etc.; Persecution of the Quakers; First Newspaper in America; Curious Boston Lectures; Remarkable Proclamations, 1774–5; Popular Puritan Literature; Revolutionary Proclamations; Curiosities of the Market. These topics, if thoroughly treated, and illustrated with the present resources of the antiquarian and the book-manufacturer, might fill a series of magnificent volumes. They are here somewhat lightly disposed of, though neither without learning nor research; the author's style is careless and the printer's performance somewhat slovenly; the fac-simile and other illustrations are too few to satisfy the appetite. Nevertheless, the book is worth its price, and will probably add something to any one's knowledge or imagination of old Boston. There is novelty in the sectional grouping, and an occasional rarity like Gov. Shirley's proclamation of Nov. 2, 1744, has almost the value of an "inedited" document. The author is not a blind admirer of the Puritans.

PERSONS AND PLACES.

Supplementing the Volume on

COMMON THINGS.

The N. Y. Tribune says of it:

"It tells briefly, in clear and picturesque language, the story of every prominent man of ancient and modern times, and in a compact and handy volume of 950 pages covers the entire ground. It is profusely illustrated, and will be as useful to adults for handy reference as profitable to youths for leisure reading and study. It is furnished with an index, and under the general head of 'Story' will be found references to articles explaining all the characters of mythology and folk-lore. The volume is uniform with the CYCLOPÆDIA OF COMMON THINGS, and forms with it a complete young folks' library."

The price will be $3 50.

AN IMPORTANT ART-WORK.

A History of Painting,

ANCIENT, EARLY, CHRISTIAN, AND MEDIÆVAL.

From the German of the late Dr. Alfred Woltmann and Dr. Karl Woermann. Edited by Sidney Colvin, M.A., Slade Professor of Fine Arts in the University of Cambridge. Large 8vo, with numerous illustrations, cloth, $7 50; half-morocco, $10 50; tree-calf, $15.

Popular in Style.

"The style in which the work is conceived is popular rather than technical, and yet the standard of treatment is not thereby lowered. The mechanical execution is unexceptionable; in typography, press-work, and all the minor details of a well-made book nothing is slighted. The illustrations are one hundred and thirty-six in number, and include fac-similes of many of the most valued productions of ancient and mediæval art."—Boston Traveller.

German in its Thoroughness.

"German it is in its thoroughness, but it is German without the drought which usually afflicts the historical works of the scholars of that nation. The authors do not belong to the Dryasdust family."—N. Y. Evangelist.

The Best Manual.

"All this combined makes Woltmann's work the best manual and the best reference-book on the history of painting in the English language."—Boston Advertiser.

A Great Treatise.

"The work as it stands is the first half of a great treatise broad as art itself in scope, scrupulously faithful in treatment, and founded upon scholarship the profoundest and most admirably balanced."—N. Y. Evening Post.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1880.

The Week.

THE Bank of England has at last taken formal notice of the heavy drain of gold to this country, and advanced its nominal discount rate to 3 per cent. from 2½ per cent. The response to this action here was an advance in the rates for sterling bills, but the advance was only temporary, and the week closes with rates for bills on London at figures which warrant gold imports. The steamers arriving bring large amounts of gold, not less than $5,000,000 having been landed here within the last six days. Notwithstanding this foreign specie, the New York money market has been stringent, and the banks only keep up a proper relation between their reserve and liabilities by a contraction of their credits. This contraction last week amounted to nearly $12,000,000, and had the effect of still more firmly putting the money market in the control of a few wealthy speculators who are also money-lenders. They charged borrowers all manner of "commissions" for money—from $\frac{1}{6}$ of 1 per cent. per day to $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent., in addition to 6 per cent. per annum. Until the Treasury begins its January disbursements there is little reason to expect rates for loans which are not made by these speculative capitalists. In spite of the high rates for money, investment securities of all kinds have been strong in price, under the influence, first, of the prospective refunding operations of the Treasury, which will lower the rate of interest on United States bonds; and, second, of the very profitable business of the railroads and their large dividends in cash and stock. General trade, where confined to legitimate business, continues good and very large in volume. There were during the week two important failures in the coffee-trade, the aggregate liabilities having been between $3,500,000 and $4,000,000; but these were the result of speculative operations having for their purpose a control of the price of coffee at a time when production had fairly overtaken the demand for the article. Silver closed at 52*d.* per ounce, and the bullion value here of the "buzzard dollar" at $0.8662. Congress shows no disposition as yet to touch the silver question; nor has that prompt attention been given to refunding legislation which was promised at the very beginning of Congress.

A sharp correspondence between Senators Bayard and Conkling has been published. It appears that more than a month ago—that is, during the canvass—Mr. Bayard made a speech in Delaware which the Philadelphia Press of October 29 said contained a charge that Messrs. Conkling, Davis, Arthur, Jayne, and Boutwell were present in the Custom-house when the famous $267,000 was extorted from Phelps, Dodge & Co., and that they then and there divided the money among themselves. Mr. Bayard wrote to the Press before November 20, pronouncing this report "false and malicious." But Mr. Conkling had on the 13th of November written to Mr. Bayard, calling his attention to the report, and asking if it was true "in form or in substance." Mr. Bayard answered that this was the first he had heard of it; that the report was so "grossly inaccurate" as "to cause the belief that it could not have been written by an honest person"; that he did denounce the moiety system and the share that accrued under it out of the Dodge case to the Collector, Surveyor, Naval Officer, and informer; and said that "Mr. Conkling, the senior Senator from New York, was understood to have received compensation as their counsel from Messrs. Arthur, Cornell, and Laflin for his services and assistance in the transaction." To this Mr. Conkling replied in a very angry tone, complaining that Mr. Bayard's explanation of what he did say was "a new, a quite different and erroneous statement," also "of a different nature, and, though less injurious, offensive and untrue," and professing ignorance of the authorities on which Mr. Bayard relied—namely, evidence taken before a committee of Congress and the letter of a Mr. Wood, an ex-Treasury official, in the New York Sun of October 27, 1880—and asking Mr. Bayard solemnly at the close whether he wished to "leave the matter here." To this Mr. Bayard rejoined that he had no further "wish" about "the matter." Indeed, it is hard to see what Mr. Conkling can have expected him to "wish" about it.

The facts about Mr. Conkling's connection with the Dodge case are, that Mr. Dodge testified before a Committee of the House that when the moiety men, headed by Jayne and General Butler, were squeezing $271,000 out of him, "Senator Conkling was in New York and in consultation with these gentlemen, at the time when for two days the question hung whether this thing should be settled or not, and hung simply on the fact that Mr. Laflin [the Naval Officer and one of the moiety men] said the crime was so enormous that, so far as he was concerned, he never would consent to settle it short of the payment of $500,000. I think Senator Conkling advised him to do better." Whether "do better" means to take less or more, we do not know. Judge Davis also testified before the same Committee that when called into a private room in the Custom-house, to be consulted as District-Attorney by the moiety men—that is, the Collector, the Surveyor, the Naval Officer, and Jayne—as to whether they could forfeit the whole invoice in which the alleged fraud occurred or only the items in which it occurred—a very important question for them—he found "a gentleman" there closeted with them whom he was reluctant to name, but did subsequently name. That gentleman was Mr. Roscoe Conkling. It was not a nice situation for a gentleman or a Senator, but it was a quite fitting one for a Boss, inasmuch as the business on hand was the seizure of a large sum of money in which a band of faithful "workers" had a heavy interest. Why the Senator should now be annoyed at having attention called to the matter, it is hard to see. He is surely not ashamed of his trade. Judge Davis testified that at the consultation in question "Mr. Conkling read the statute, and said there could not be any doubt that the true construction of the statute was, that the whole of the invoice was forfeited, and that under such a state of facts he thought it the duty of the Collector to bring a suit for the entire amount of the invoices instead of the articles affected by the fraud." In another place the Judge said that Jayne admitted to him at one interview that the total amount lost to the Government by the alleged frauds was "sixteen hundred odd dollars."

The testimony was commented on in the House by Mr. Beck on behalf of the Committee, and, after explaining how the plunder was divided, he said that "how much Senator Conkling got as adviser of the Custom-house officers did not appear," the reason being that the moiety men declined to come before the Committee and give information on this point. The sum really divided among the officials was $65,718 03 in all, out of $271,000—not a bad haul even for those good old times. There was a curious controversy afterwards between Judge Davis, the outgoing District-Attorney, and Mr. George Bliss, his successor, about the District-Attorney's fee, a matter in which Mr. Bliss said or intimated that the Judge had not acted handsomely, inasmuch as he had offered to go halves with Mr. Bliss, when Mr. Bliss thought himself entitled to the whole amount, the case not having been finally settled until Mr. Davis was out of office. This was a fitting finale to an odious business, which the decent part of the public would fain forget, but which no friend of good government ought to forget. Mr. Bayard has done the community a service in recalling it.

We have described elsewhere the process by which Boss Kelly has been expelled from office. The vote in the Board of Aldermen received from the press the honors of a revolution, as far as space and florid description could do it. Kelly immediately offered his place with grim politeness to his successor, who refused to take possession for twenty-four hours, showing more consideration for Kelly than Kelly himself showed to his predecessor, Mr. Green, inasmuch as he started for Mr. Green's office immediately after receiving his appointment on something like the double, followed by a large mob. This summary method filled Mr. Green's mind, and not unnaturally, with some melancholy reflections on the small amount of consideration with which retiring statesmen are treated in this community. Kelly made up for his politeness on this last occasion, however, by going to Tammany Hall in the evening and furnishing his followers with the most extraordinary entertainment probably ever offered in a great civilized city. He fiercely attacked the Mayor's personal appearance, treating his countenance as indicative of a low moral nature, and then addressed himself to the "Judases" in the Board of Aldermen. He gave a most deplorable description of their looks, and imitated their walk, which he described in one case as resembling the waddle of a duck, and also their way of speaking. One he ridiculed as a barber; another as a lager-beer dealer. One of his followers described another of them as an "unmitigated drunken loafer," who was made an alderman "to prevent his becoming a tramp." To appreciate this it must be remembered that the four "Judases" were selected and put into the Board of Aldermen by Kelly himself. They could not have been elected without his permission. This may give some idea of the pitch of contempt for the community to which the Bosses have attained. Kelly's outburst of rage and the gross personal abuse in which he indulged were, of course, much more violent and unbridled than Mr. Conkling's attack on Mr. Curtis in the Republican convention three years ago, but the latter was an equally good illustration of the Boss spirit and temper. No Boss can bear opposition or dissent from those of his own party, and, as a rule, never associates with persons whom he considers his equals. He has to be king of his company, and the company is almost always made up of dependants and hangers-on. Kelly's are probably of a lower grade than those of any other Boss, and when rebuked have to be rebuked in the vigorous and plain language of the jail-yard and the grog-shop in order to make them understand that he is displeased with them.

Congress has accomplished little during the week beyond the introduction of new bills, and in both branches the more pressing subjects of the session have been postponed by measures sure to invite prolonged debate and to excite lively antagonism. Senator Randolph's bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, authorizing the President to restore him to the army with rank not above colonel on the retired-list, and without back pay, and also reviving his right to vote and to hold office, was brought up on Monday, and led at once to a clash of constitutional views which made it seem prudent to accept a substitute proposed by Mr. Dawes. This was passed by a party vote. In the House, Senator Morgan's concurrent resolution to provide for the counting of the electoral vote was called up by Mr. Bicknell, who would have passed it under the previous question, but found the Republicans prepared to filibuster till the 4th of March if necessary, and was obliged to permit debate. Mr. Robeson bore the brunt of it on the Republican side with his usual ability and clearness of statement, and dextrously put himself on firm ground by confessing that during the abnormal period of reconstruction the party had made many unfortunate precedents which ought to be disregarded—the "twenty-second joint rule" among them. He fenced a good deal over the constitutional right of the Vice-President to mix judicial with his ministerial functions in counting the vote, but when pushed to the wall asserted with Chancellor Kent that that officer must "decide himself the questions which govern his ministerial actions," subject to revision by any competent tribunal which Congress in its legislative capacity, with the assent of the President, may appoint; and in the absence of any such provision his decision is irreversible. All sorts of hypothetical cases involving fraud and error were submitted to him for his discomfiture, but they were irrelevant except as witnessing the inconvenience and peril of the present unregulated procedure, which everybody acknowledges. The resolution was, in despair, temporarily withdrawn on Tuesday, giving way to Mr. Wood's Refunding Act.

To our mind the Republicans are perfectly right in demanding that that shall be effected by bill which it is now sought to enact by concurrent resolution, in evasion of the President's assent; and the resolution is so objectionable in itself that resistance to it cannot be justly stigmatized as obstructive. Moreover, there is no urgency in the matter, because it is inconceivable that the result of the late election should be reversed or in any way impaired, so that there is ample time to perfect a measure as substantial and lasting as the Constitution itself. We may be perfectly sure that when this is attained Congress will not have been made a returning-board, nor will one House have the power of rejecting the vote of a State. The party objections to Mr. Edmunds's plan while the issue of the Presidential election was still uncertain no longer exist, and it is surprising that the South particularly is not ready for a settlement which puts on each State the burden of deciding disputes which render more than one set of returns possible. Mr. Robeson acutely pointed out that the Morgan-Bicknell resolution embodies two conflicting theories of Constitutional authority for the proposed judicial functions of Congress. In the case of single returns the affirmative vote of one House outweighs the negative vote of the other; whereas in the case of plural returns, the negative vote of one House outweighs the affirmative of the other.

Civil-service reform has received passing attention in the Senate through a resolution of Mr. Pendleton's referring that portion of the President's Message which related to it to the "Select Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service," and instructing the committee "to report at an early day, by bill or otherwise." The fact that it was left to a Democrat to offer this resolution will not be overlooked. Significant, too, is the phraseology of the abstract of the President's recommendations, e.g., "the absolute freedom of official subordinates in refusing all demands upon their salary for political purposes, and in resisting all attempts to coerce their political action"—a form of statement which has all the weight of an argument. Equally forcible is the text of the resolution of the South Carolina House to which we alluded last week, and which unfortunately was killed in the Senate. The State's Senators and Representatives in Congress were requested and instructed, respectively, "to urge Congress to take such measures as may be expedient for the reformation of the civil service, so that tenure of office under the general Government may no longer be dependent upon party success, nor subject to levy by means of forced pecuniary contributions to any political party, and so that capacity and character shall be the one test of fitness for office, and the sole but certain guarantee of its tenure."

A Philadelphia copyright scheme has made its appearance at Washington in the shape of a petition for an international copyright law, which has been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. It is proposed to make it lawful for any citizen of the United States to buy from the foreign author the copyright of any literary, dramatic, or artistic production, provided the copyrighted article shall be wholly manufactured in the United States, published here, and be for sale here within two months after the date of the publication abroad; in the case of translations the limit is extended to four months; and in that of dramatic compositions to six months from the date of the first representation abroad. The bill also provides that these privileges shall not be extended to countries which do not concede similar privileges to the United States, and shall cover only publications issued after the passage of the bill. Another section declares that any assignment of copyright secured under this law to any one not a citizen of the United States shall work a forfeiture of it, and that it shall be thereafter lawful for any one to sell or print the article as if no copyright had been obtained. To judge by the provisions with regard to dramatic works, the bill must have been very hastily drafted, as it seems to confound dramatic compositions with representations of dramatic works; but a more serious objection is the extremely short space of time which must elapse between the publication of general works of literature abroad and the publication here. For authors of established reputation, whose books are sure of a market, it might be possible to make an arrangement in advance with publishers in the United States; but in all other cases the time is ridiculously short, and would force the author to sell his copyright on the publishers' terms. This, however, would perhaps be regarded by certain Philadelphia economists as a very good result. The petition has some very good signatures outside of Philadelphia, and its ostensible purpose seems to be akin to that of the treaty which is understood to be under discussion between the British Government and our own. The great advantage of settling the matter by treaty is that it will not be subject to constant modifications from the "pressure" of rival publishing houses upon Congress.

The grand jury of the United States Court at Richmond have indicted several judges of election for refusing to receive the votes of persons who presented tax-receipts alleged to have been illegally issued from the State Auditor's office. The law of Virginia makes these receipts a necessary qualification for voting, and Judge Hughes stated in reply to questions propounded by the grand jury that, although not signed by the Auditor in person, the receipts in question were legal, and that judges of election ought to be very careful how, on account of technical difficulties, they deprived citizens of the right to vote. He was further of opinion, according to the Times correspondent, that the grand jury should take into consideration and act upon the well-settled and salutary principle that the acts of public officers must be presumed to have been rightly and legally done until the contrary is made to appear; and also suggested that judges of election were bound to act upon this maxim at the polls. The defence of the indicted men seems to be that the receipts were signed by special tax-collectors appointed by State Auditor Massey (a Readjuster); that the law was not observed by Massey in commissioning these officers, and that before the election one Judge Clopton had issued an injunction restraining the collectors from issuing any new tax-receipts on this very ground. Upon this construction of the law most of the judges of election throughout the State ignored the disputed tax-receipts. The action of the grand jury has aroused some of that fierce passion of which the Richmond press has an abundant supply for every proper occasion. The Whig says that it has "no patience with these Thugs and demons, no matter whether they call themselves Southerners or Virginians." Thugs and demons are, it insists, "the enemies of mankind," and it calls for "the heavy hand of force" to be applied to them, on the further ground that they can apparently "neither be taught by human reason nor touched by human sympathy." "This is no time," it very justly observes, "this is no country, for free men to whine and fawn at the feet of the foes of freedom and political equality."

A singular spectacle has been witnessed during the week on the northern border of the Indian Territory. A colonizing expedition, headed by one Payne, and consisting of recruits gathered from many States under a sort of military discipline (being divided into eight companies, with a major in command, and not lacking a chaplain), endeavored to enter that part of the Territory to which the Indian title has been extinguished in favor of the Government, and which now goes by the name of Oklahoma, from Kansas. Unfortunately they were watched and accompanied in their movements by a cavalry force across the line, whose commander warned them not to enter in defiance of the President's proclamation. Although their answer was defiant, and they declared they would proceed at all hazards unless stopped by act of Congress, they wisely chose an east and west line of march in place of a southerly one. What made their situation all the more harrowing was the reports that at a little distance trains were going in by the fifties, while from Texas and Arkansas other squatters were entering unopposed, so that the fat of the land would be occupied before they could arrive on the scene. The fact that many of them had abandoned Western and Southern Kansas almost in a starving condition, on account of severe droughts, seemed in their eyes to establish their right to disregard the President's authority; but their incapacity to cope with the troops gradually told upon their spirits and their organization. Payne was deposed, and a cool head among them was despatched to Washington for relief. Not a few among them have been convicted of previous trespassing, and have been fined for it, but harsher treatment seems necessary for these lawbreakers. They held religious services on Sunday as Cromwell's soldiery in Ireland might have done, and doubtless with that confidence in a kind Providence which led a ruffian's mistress the other day in this city, after furnishing him with red pepper for the policeman's eyes, to bid him trust in God and he would probably pull through.

Lord Granville has written a letter to Mr. Lowell on the subject of the Fortune Bay outrage and the dispute that has grown out of it, which seems to show that there is no reason why the difficulty should not be amicably settled at an early day. Over a year ago the British Government conceded that "if a local law has been inadvertently passed which is in any degree or respect at variance with the rights conferred on a foreign Power by the Treaty, the correction of the mistake committed, at the earliest period that its existence shall have been ascertained and recognized, is a matter of international obligation." Lord Granville now says that England will be glad to pay the damages caused by the Fortune Bay mob, and at the same time suggests a joint establishment of regulations under which the subjects of both Governments shall have the full and equal enjoyment of any fishing which under the Treaty is to be used in common by them. He insists, however, that under the Treaty the right to fish "in common with British subjects" means the right to fish subject to any reasonable local regulations to which British fishermen are subject. He therefore takes exception to the opinion expressed in Mr. Evarts's letter to Mr. Welsh of September 28, 1878, "that the fishery rights of the United States conceded by the Treaty of Washington are to be exercised wholly free from the restraints and regulations of the statutes of Newfoundland." Whether a treaty right to fish "in common" means that there shall be no local regulations, or whether it means that any local regulations must be reasonable, seems an abstract point hardly worth further discussion, particularly as our fishermen are never likely to take the same view of the reasonableness of such regulations as that taken by the Canadian fishermen. As long as the matter is unregulated by treaty there will always be room for dispute on this head, while a commission could easily establish rules which should be binding indifferently on all parties.

From England there is little or no news but Irish news. The Government seems to be at last really alarmed by the progress of the Land League in making its authority felt and obeyed. It is reported to have established a sort of imperium in imperio by issuing licenses to traders and dealers as a certificate of good standing, by trying and sentencing persons to be "Boycotted," and by establishing courts for the trial of disputes between members, and by prohibiting the payment of any rent beyond the "Griffith valuation." We believe all this is much exaggerated, but the Irish mind is in a condition now when small incidents make very big stories, and, of course, every Land-Leaguer is much interested in spreading wonderful accounts of the power of the organization. Mr. Forster is said to be at last thoroughly alarmed, and to have insisted in the Cabinet on coercive measures, which it is now rumored will be resorted to by royal proclamation in advance of the meeting of Parliament. Of course the only coercive measure which can be resorted to in this way is arbitrary arrest or the suspension of the habeas corpus, which Parliament would subsequently cover by an act of indemnity. There can be little doubt that nothing would be so effective at so little cost of money and suffering. It would probably send all the minor Land-Leaguers flying in twenty-four hours, and relieve the peasantry from the pressure of an odious and demoralizing tyranny. It is still asserted, but with diminished confidence, that Messrs. Bright and Chamberlain will resign if anything like coercion is attempted. A thoroughgoing land-tenure bill will certainly be introduced when Parliament meets, providing for what is called the "three f's"—fair rents, fixity of tenure, and free sale.

Colonel Gordon, of Chinese fame, has been travelling in Ireland, and has published his observations. He gives an appalling account of the condition of the peasantry on the wild, windy, and wet western coast, and makes the proposal that the Government should buy out several counties, at a cost of $400,000,000, for reasons similar to those which caused the purchase of negro freedom in the West Indies, and convert the whole into a crown estate. This is, of course, extravagant and impracticable; but the eagerness with which even the most absurd plans for solving the Irish problem are listened to by the English public shows that it has at last taken hold of the English mind, and that the solution is near at hand.

KELLY'S DISMISSAL.

THE rejoicings with which the overthrow of Kelly have been received, not in this city only but all over the country, show that the system of government which he has represented during the last four years is by no means in favor with the public, and that it is ready to accept any mode of getting such persons as he is out of office. For it must be admitted that the means by which he has been got out of office are not all that a reformer fond of perfect methods could desire. Kelly has, in fact, been ousted by a liberal and effective use of his own arts, or, in other words, by what is known in the political world as a 'dicker." Theoretically, the financial officer or Comptroller of the city is appointed by the Mayor, by and with the consent of the Board of Aldermen, both being animated by a firm and constant desire to have the best attainable man in that place, as in all other places. As a matter of fact, however, the Board of Aldermen do not take this lofty view of their duties. The majority do not think of themselves as put in office in order to watch over the interests of the city, but in order to see that they and the party or section of the party from which they received their nomination get their proper share of the patronage. Consequently no nomination of the mayor's for any office secures confirmation unless the person nominated is the one whom the party managers have selected for the place, and this person, it is needless to say, is hardly ever the person best fitted for the place. Kelly was made Comptroller four years ago not because he was a person who in any enterprise requiring character, capacity, and experience would have been thought of for a high financial trust; in fact, his appointment, considering his history and antecedents, would, in any department of human activity except "politics," have had the air of a burlesque. He was made Comptroller because he was chief of the Tammany Society; and the business of the Tammany Society is not the maintenance or defence of any body of political doctrine, or the support of any particular line of policy, but the procurement of as many places as possible in the municipal service for the persons, known as "workers" or "the boys," who in the various wards are most skilful in managing primary meetings and drawing out votes on election day. Whoever is able to convince "the boys" that he is the man who will enable the greatest number of them to live out of the city treasury, is sure of their support, and their support makes him the leading man of the Tammany organization, and gives him the best chance of managing city affairs; or, in other words, makes him the city Boss. When Boss he distributes the nominations through the machinery of a county convention; receives and disburses the enormous sums levied by way of assessments, first, on persons nominated for city offices as a condition of their nomination, and, secondly, on the persons actually in office; but of these sums, we believe, he renders no account whatever. In addition to this he sees that the heads of departments whom he has put in their places, either by direct selection of his own or in virtue of a bargain with rival interests, discharge their obligations to him in the matter of employing his henchmen in subordinate places. It will thus be seen that, merely as Boss, Kelly was the head of a vast machine, and that his Comptrollership added little or nothing to the dignity or emoluments of his position. It was valuable to him mainly as a sign of his power which his followers would understand and appreciate, and as a means of directly controlling the patronage and seeing that it was distributed judiciously and according to contract.

The Board of Aldermen, as at present constituted, is simply an instrument for preventing the mayor from having the patronage all to himself. It has no real connection with the administration of city affairs in any sense in which the inhabitants of the city are interested in city affairs. It occupies itself in seeing that the mayor carries out the arrangements made by the Boss, and, therefore, to enable the mayor to overcome and repudiate and oust the Boss it was necessary to offer the Tammany aldermen something in the way of patronage which would be better for them than anything they were likely to get from the Boss. This is substantially what Mayor Cooper did. He promised the Tammany aldermen that if they confirmed the nomination of some one in Kelly's place they would not suffer, but would gain something by the result. Accordingly four of them, now known in political parlance as "Judases," joined the Republicans and anti-Tammany men in expelling their old chief from his office and putting a new man in his place. It is true the new man is an excellent appointment, but the public must bear in mind that his fitness or his superiority to Kelly had nothing to do with getting him into Kelly's place. The "Judases" were not influenced in the least by that consideration. What influenced them was the fact that they were to make something personally by the change. Kelly and his friends say that they got their reward in money, by the direct receipt of a portion of what is called in "politics" a "boodle," which appears to be a corruption fund of considerable amount; but this we do not believe. The probabilities are that they are simply to have something good in the way of offices either for themselves or some of their followers, who will either divide their salary with them or help them in some way in their political career. In searching for the motives of the class who govern the city the investigator is greatly assisted by the fact that the primum mobile is always known to be personal gain; the points to which analysis has to be directed are the amount and the channel through which it is to come. An ordinary New York alderman would be much amused if you were to try to influence his vote by showing that it would contribute to make the city a more comfortable and cheaper dwelling-place. The conception of duty from which an argument of this sort is drawn has long ago vanished from the mind of the class who make municipal politics their business.

There is another feature in the affair to which we wish to direct attention. Not only was Kelly's expulsion from office obtained by means which, however warrantable under the circumstances, do not either indicate or promise any permanent improvement in municipal administration, but by means which in some degree indicate or promise a certain deterioration in municipal administration. One of the conditions of good administration is that the chief executive officer shall have his responsibility firmly fixed upon him by being allowed to select his chief subordinates, such as the heads of departments. Under the charter the New York mayor has this power, but by a device the Tweed Ring resorted to—we forget now for what purpose—the terms of a certain number of the principal subordinates (the comptroller among the number) expire a fortnight before the new mayor comes into office. Kelly, when he procured the nomination and election of Mr. Grace for the mayoralty, knew that his term in the comptrollership would expire before his own mayor came into office, but he relied on the inability of Mayor Cooper to get anybody confirmed in his place by the Board of Aldermen, and his own consequent ability to hold over until his own mayor came in on the 1st of January and reappointed him. This expectation has been disappointed in the manner we have described by means of a successful "dicker," and Mayor Cooper has thus been enabled to fill the most important places in the city government one fortnight before the new mayor's term begins. Consequently the new mayor, Mr. Grace, will be enabled to escape all responsibility whatever, and will have an excellent precedent to justify him in playing, or attempting to play, a similar trick on his successor. We do not use the term trick as a term of reprobation. The means resorted to in order to get rid of Kelly have, in the present condition of the city, most of the justifications of the deceptions practised on the enemy in time of war. They consist in the tricking of a trickster, the deception of a knave, the laying of an ambuscade for a ruthless foe. But the tricks of war belong to an exceptional state of things. They are intended to prepare for and lead to the restoration of good faith and loyalty in the regulation of human relations. The devices by which Kelly has been ousted, on the other hand, and over the success of which the country is rejoicing, have been practised in the ordinary working of the machinery of government, and have no end to their use marked out in advance, and are more likely to be used next year and the year after in the service of villany than of righteousness. It is pleasant to know that Mr. Grace has been deprived of the power of carrying out the bargain with Kelly by which in all probability he obtained his nomination. But it is not pleasant to remember that four years hence some other Mr. Grace may bring to naught a "popular rising" in favor of reform by a similar piece of strategy at the end of his term. In fine, we do not find that Kelly's career, odious as it appears, has stimulated the popular desire for such radical treatment of the municipal problem as will take city government out of politics, and make the Boss régime, if not impossible, much more difficult than it is.

There is still another aspect of Kelly's case which seems hardly to receive the attention it merits. As Boss, it is estimated by the New York Herald, which has very thoroughly explored the Boss system, that by assessments on candidates for city offices—that is, the sums they are called on to pay towards "expenses" when they receive the nomination, and assessments on their salaries after their election—there passes into the Boss's hands an annual revenue, of which he has to render no account, of from $130,000 to $150,000 a year, exclusive of the subscriptions of the hangers-on called members of the "General Committee," who expect to get office. Kelly's enemies say that the outlay for the election expenses is not over half the receipts, and this, even if an exaggeration, indicates that in three or four good years a Boss may, without stealing a cent from the city treasury, as Tweed did, realize what is, for a man of the class from which Bosses usually come, a handsome fortune. Now, this levying of assessments on candidates and office-holders is simply a slightly-disguised sale of the offices, not exactly at auction to the highest bidder, but to selected purchasers at a fixed price. It tends, however, steadily to become a sale to the highest bidder. The drift of political practice in this city, as in other places, is towards giving nominations to candidates who are likely to make a large contribution to the campaign fund, without regard to other considerations; and in places like New York, where a nomination by one party is as good as election, of course there is a constant temptation to find out who among the aspirants to public office is willing to pay the best price for the realization of his desires, and let him have the place. The assessments on salaries after election are simply a mode of paying the price adapted to persons of small means, like the purchase of pianos and sewing-machines on the instalment system. Of course the effect of the transaction on the mind of the office-holder is to produce a sense of property in the office, and to present its tenure to him as dependent not on his manner of performing its duties, but on his punctual payments of his dues to the Boss, and then to make the attempt to apply the rules of private business to the transaction of public business seem odd, fantastic, "theoretical," and, finally, a little ridiculous. The lesson that we should like to see the public extracting from Kelly's career is, therefore, this: that the system on which he has battened and grown into "great proportions" in this city differs in degree only, and not in kind, from that which the Republican party has established in the State at large, and which some managers are trying to introduce into other States. Mr. Kelly differs from Mr. Conkling, or any other State Boss now existing, in having at command an unusually large body of voters who pay no direct taxes, but have a great mass of taxable property within their reach, and are more ignorant and manageable than the bulk of country voters. But a civil service, such as the Federal and State civil service now is, officered by "workers," and holding their places through party services and the payment of pecuniary contributions, is simply an earlier and less aggravated stage of municipal boss-ship. Such a system naturally produces Bosses. It can only be managed successfully by one man, and by a man of peculiar temper and capacity, and it involves necessarily the gradual disappearance from view of the interest of the community as the main object of government.

THE PROPOSED RELIEF OF THE SUPREME COURT.

THE recommendations of the Attorney-General on the subject of intermediate Federal courts are not by any means new; but it is so long since there has been any general discussion of the condition of business in the Supreme Court, or the means of relieving that tribunal of the pressure upon it, that they come with the force of novelty, and the President refers to them in his Message as if such suggestions had never been heard of before. The Attorney-General's plan is, substantially, that a Federal Court of Appeals, intermediate between the Circuit and District Courts and the Supreme Court, shall be formed, for the purpose of curtailing the number of appeals taken to the latter tribunal, and enabling it to clear off the alarming accumulation of arrears upon its calendar. This can be done, he says, by adding to the number of Circuit judges, who have under the present law the jurisdiction of a Supreme Court justice on circuit, though not themselves members of that court. An increase of Circuit judges (one in each Circuit, except the Second, where an increase of two is recommended) would provide means by which intermediate courts could be formed consisting of two Circuit judges and the justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the circuit; the District judges being authorized to sit in case of the absence or disability of one of these. "An appellate court of such a character could safely be invested with a very large jurisdiction; and it would seem to me that no appeal should be permitted therefrom unless the sum in dispute should exceed $10,000, or unless the judges themselves of such intermediate court should certify that the case was one of such difficulty that it might properly be argued in the Supreme Court."

This seems to differ very little in principle from a bill to "reorganize the Judiciary of the United States" brought forward at Washington some four years ago, with the approval, it was said at the time, of the judges of the Supreme Court. That bill merged the Circuit and District Courts in one, made this new court a court of review, restricted appeals to cases above ten thousand dollars, to cases involving a construction of the Constitution, of a treaty, or of a law of the United States, and to cases "where the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court." A comparison of these two proposals shows that the only change in principle is that in the Attorney-General's present recommendations the saving clause reserving the right of appeal in all cases involving questions of constitutional and treaty law and federal statutes is omitted, and the right of appeal, even, in such cases is placed at the discretion of the intermediate tribunal. It seems to us that such a scheme as this involves too abrupt and radical a departure from the established principles on which justice is administered in this country to admit of approval, much as we sympathize with the general objects in view. The effect of it would undoubtedly be to assist greatly in clearing the docket of the Supreme Court, but it would do so at the risk of clearing away at the same time much of the dignity and power of the court, and of introducing great confusion in the law itself.

In the first place, it is a very serious objection to making the right of appeal discretionary with the court which tries the case that it has never in the long history of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence been tried in practice, and this fact we may fairly infer is based upon some good reason. There is something, it must be confessed, rather startling in the bare notion of any court having a despotic power over the right of appeal, allowing it in some cases, refusing it in others, which to the ordinary mind may seem absolutely undistinguishable. For nearly a thousand years, in England and America, it has been the boast of the common law that the meanest suitor whose rights were invaded was entitled to the correction of errors committed in the trial of his case, by the court of last resort. To permit inferior judges to cut suitors off or admit them to this privilege at their arbitrary discretion is an innovation which ought to have strong practical considerations of convenience if it is to be adopted. But an examination of the probable effect in practice of such an innovation will show that while the only advantage secured would be the clearance of the docket of the Supreme Court, the practical disadvantages would be enormous. The great desideratum in any judicial system is that the decisions of the courts shall be uniform, and this is secured and guaranteed in England and the United States by the right of appeal. As long as suitors and lawyers understand that any question of law can be taken up to the highest court, this makes the rules of law laid down by the highest court binding on all inferior courts, and, so far as the law is settled by the highest court, puts an end to litigation. No one cares to contest a point of which he knows in advance what the decision must be. But with the right of ultimate appeal dependent upon the discretion of an intermediate court, this certainty (and no one will say that there is too much of it in our law) would no longer exist. The discretion, it must be remembered, is not the discretion of a single court, but of as many as there are circuits in the United States, and it may be confidently anticipated that this discretion will be differently administered in the different circuits. There will be a different discretion in Boston, in St. Louis, and New York. In one circuit the judges will think a case of "such difficulty" that it may be properly certified to the Supreme Court, because several eminent counsel are engaged in it; in another circuit because it involves a political question; in another because a large amount of money is at stake; in another because, although a small amount is involved, the principle of law on which the case turns is a novel or curious one. In this way the judges in Boston may allow an appeal on precisely the same facts on which an appeal is denied in New York; and as the Supreme Court may reach a conclusion in the first case opposed to that reached by the court of review in the second, we may have two diametrically opposed rules of law administered by different courts of the same Government. The Supreme Court would, of course, adhere to its view of the law, and the court of review which denied the appeal to the views expressed by its own judges; and as judges are human there would be the very strongest inducement in their minds to deny all future appeals in similar cases, for in this way they would be able to make their decision a finality, at least within the limits of their own jurisdiction.

Meanwhile in other circuits the same process would be going slowly forward. Under the present system the decision of the Supreme Court would prevent all further litigation of the question involved, but not so under the new system. The judges of the other circuits, knowing, for example, that there was one rule of law at Washington and another in the Circuit Court at New York, and having the choice between the two, would in a similar case grant the right of appeal or deny it, as they liked or disliked the respective rules. For, as we said just now, under the present system it is not mere respect and admiration of the wisdom of the Supreme Court which induce Circuit judges to follow their opinions and treat them as binding all over the United States. It is the absolute and final power which resides in the Supreme Court to enforce its decisions that compels them to do so. Under the new system this would disappear, except in that limited number of cases in which the right of appeal is reserved owing to the fact that the amount of money involved is $10,000. It is quite safe to assume that this large limit would of itself strike at the roots of nine-tenths of the appeals now taken; so that in nine-tenths of the cases in the federal courts the new Circuit Court would be the court of last resort. But the right of appeal, discretionary in all other cases, is an absolute right if $10,000 are involved. At the same time precisely the same questions are every day involved in cases where $50 are at stake and where the suit is brought to recover hundreds of thousands. Under the proposed system the $10,000 case must go up to the Supreme Court if the parties choose to take it there, while the $50 case need not go up if the judges do not wish it to go. Now, let us suppose that after a rule of law has been established in a circuit for a long time by the denial of the right to appeal, so that all suitors and lawyers regard it as final and unchangeable, a case arises which involves this same rule of law, and also the sum of $10,000. An appeal must be allowed, the Supreme Court takes its own view of the law and upsets the rule, and declares that it is not and never has been law. Under these circumstances the Supreme Court decides the matter so far as the particular case is concerned, but whether in future cases not involving $10,000, but involving the same rule of law, the court of review will follow the Supreme Court or its own previous decisions, will still be a matter of choice with the inferior court.

All this shows that the effect of the introduction of the discretionary right of appeals in these intermediate courts will probably be to create great confusion and uncertainty, and at the same time to make the Supreme Court a weaker court than it now is, a result which would be deplorable. It seems to us that a sine quâ non of any scheme of reform is that the right of appeal to the Supreme Court should not be cut off in any case in which it now exists. The real secret of diminishing the number of final appeals is to make the intermediate court a strong one, and this can be easily done by creating a bench of judges in each circuit, as this bill proposes. We say nothing here of the advisability of the $10,000 limit. This is, however, quite as objectionable as the discretionary right of appeal. It is undemocratic and grossly unfair that the right of appeal should be governed by such a test as to make the Supreme Court a tribunal of last resort only for wealthy litigants. But what we desire to insist upon chiefly here is the confusion and uncertainty which the scheme would introduce. There are already two systems of law in every State in the Union; to have three would be unbearable. Notwithstanding the theory that the Federal courts in the various circuits follow the rules of law laid down by the State courts, they are absolutely bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court, and the result is now that in this city, in a considerable number of cases, the verdict in a law-suit will be for the plaintiff or defendant according as the action is commenced in the City Hall or in the Post-Office building. This makes it necessary that lawyers should understand both systems of law, and the difference between them. To lawyers this is of little moment. To suitors it means uncertainty, expense, and, worst of all, dissatisfaction and disgust with the administration of justice.

RECENT GERMAN HISTORIES.

BERLIN, November 24.

GERMAN historical literature has lately been enriched with so many valuable publications which are of general international interest that I am sure a short review of them in your columns will find a hearty welcome. The most important contribution to modern historiography is Leopold von Ranke's 'History of the World,' the first two volumes of which will be published before Christmas, under the title 'The Oldest Historical Group of Nations and the Greeks' ('Die älteste historische Völkergruppe und die Griechen'). In this work the celebrated author offers us the final result of more than fifty years of study. In the first volume he gives a synopsis of the origin and fall of the Asiatic kingdoms, Babylon, Palestine, Assyria, and Persia, and of Egypt, and then makes Greece the centre of his deductions and conclusions. The collision of the Persian empire with little Hellas, and the subsequent struggle of the leaders of the Athenian democracy down to the decisive moments of the Peloponnesian war, conclude the first volume, while the second is devoted to a fascinating sketch of the development of the Greek genius and intellect down to Alexander the Great; to the formation of Greek kingdoms on the one hand and to Carthage and Sicily on the other. The whole work will consist of five or six series, each containing two or three volumes, and a full series will be published yearly. There is a wonderful vitality and freshness of mind in Ranke, who as a true scholar has left his mark on the literature of our age, not only in his own works but by founding a school which does great credit to his name and to historiography in general. His disciples—men like Mommsen and Sybel, Curtius and Waitz, Giesebrecht and Röpell, Wattenbach and Max Duncker—occupy or have occupied the chairs of history in the German universities. The influence of the master as president of the Historical Commission of Munich, which every year publishes half a dozen most important works on German history, makes itself felt among the educated classes at large, and, by the encouragement given to younger aspiring talents, increases the circle of those who devote themselves to the study of history.

Ranke's first work, the 'History of the Teutonic and Roman Nations from 1494 to 1535' ('Geschichte der Germanischen und Romanischen Völker'), was published as early as 1824. He was the first who appreciated the value of the Italian, especially the Venetian, archives, and ransacked them for the benefit of modern history. His 'Germany in the Time of the Reformation,' chiefly based on the above sources, gives quite new ideas of the state of affairs in Europe at that period. English and French historians have followed in his track. Ranke's works thus far collected already fill forty-eight volumes. I mention among the most prominent his 'History of the Popes,' his 'Life of Wallenstein,' his 'French and English History in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries,' and last, not least, his 'Twelve Books of Prussian History' ('Zwölf Bücher Preussischer Geschichte'). He selects his heroes among the mighty of earth, the prominent rulers of the world, and less readily dwells on the lower and toiling classes; he best analyzes diplomatic and high political problems. Ranke, as a master of the delineation of historical and political characters and situations, fascinates his readers by never exhausting his subject, but by exhibiting its most remarkable traits from all the different points of view. Better than any other German historian he knows how to group and develop events and persons. It is, however, one of his few faults that he supposes too much knowledge in his readers, and disdains to go into the details of historical chronology.

Ranke is a man of low stature, not more than about five feet four inches high, erect of carriage and with piercing eyes, which do not betray his age. On December 21 he will be eighty-five years old. I remember having met Ranke in the fall of 1870 in the Thiergarten on a misty day, shortly after the surrender of Metz. "Well, sir," said he in the course of our conversation, "a great time, a noble time, a glorious time is this of ours! Do you see yonder in the woods the shades of Frederic William I. and of old Fritz appear and disappear? There they walk, there they nod happily to each other, there they are delighted with the grandsons and greatgrandsons of the men of Rossbach and Leuthen." As if to increase the effect of his remarks, while speaking we heard the drum and fife and saw the glittering of the swords and helmets of a regiment of soldiers marching at a distance through the park. Of your statesmen Ranke is most familiar with Washington and Jefferson, while of Alexander Hamilton and the Federalist he knows very little. Of your historical works he particularly praised Mr. Bancroft's latest volumes. The first three, he once said, are full of important information, but are also very tiresome; the words read as if they walked on stilts—nothing but Sunday-afternoon sermons. But the history as contained in volumes four to six he declared the best. "You perceive at once from their perusal," he continued, "that Bancroft had learned a great deal in the long interval between the publication of the third and fourth volumes, that he had become a man of practical affairs, and that consequently he was more given to facts than to declamation." Some time ago I met Mr. Geibel, Ranke's publisher and head of the celebrated firm of Duncker & Humblot. "Is it really true," I asked him, "that the old gentleman is going to publish his History of the World?" "Certainly," he replied; "a few weeks ago I called on him, and he showed me nearly twenty large portfolios, each containing the material for one volume, for all of which I contracted with him. He must have noticed my surprise at the greatness of his plans. 'You know,' Ranke said, 'I have lost my wife [the lady, an excellent Englishwoman with whom he had lived in the happiest matrimony, had suffered for years and required much of his attention], and so have more leisure now and can work more than in former times.' Really, despite his eighty-five years, he seems to be more industrious than ever before."

Another large and important work, which is planned and carried out in Ranke's spirit, is the 'Universal History' in monographs ('Allgemeine Geschichte in Einzeldarstellungen'), under the editorship of Professor W. Oncken, of Giessen, the same scholar who by his 'Oesterreich und Preussen im Befreiungskriege' (Berlin: G. Grote. 1876 and 1878. Two vols.) threw new light on the hitherto obscure European politics from 1813 to 1815. Oncken's contributors belong to the best authorities on their respective subjects, and the publishing house of G. Grote is not only celebrated for the splendid outfit it gives its books, but even more for its high artistic taste and command of the best printers and engravers on behalf of its publications. The work in question surpasses all its predecessors, and adds a new feature to German book-making. As you have often noticed the progress of this great standard history I will confine myself to a few remarks. Of the one hundred numbers of which it is planned to consist twenty-six have already appeared, so that within about six years the complete work may be in the hands of its subscribers. Professor Hertzberg, of Halle, has finished the history of Hellas and Rome, and is now publishing the second number of his Roman Emperors; Kugler, of Tübingen, has completed the history of the Crusades; Brückner, of Dorpat, the life and times of Peter the Great; and Philippson, of Bonn, the age of Louis XIV. Other subjects have been commenced and will be fully published in the course of the next year; others, again, are still only in preparation. Too much praise cannot be bestowed on the illustrations of the work. They are not mere paraphernalia, but essential commentaries and interpretations of the text, especially in the histories of ancient Egypt, India, and Persia. They are taken from the best originals—for India, for instance, the India Office at London has contributed some of its richest treasures; and they are engraved with such exquisite delicacy and beauty that they deserve to be ranked among the masterpieces of the art. No. 25 (Dümichen's "Egypt") contains no less than fourteen large woodcuts representing the scenery of the tropical Nile, the remains of the most prominent old temples, maps and statues. I am surprised that this great and instructive enterprise has as yet not found an American publisher, the more so as I know that Mr. C. Müller, the proprietor of the firm of G. Grote, has sold clichés of the originals to Russian and Italian translators, giving them the text into the bargain. I am sure that if not the whole at once, at least single parts, like Dümichen's Egypt, Lefmann's India, Justi's Persia, or Brückner's Peter the Great, apart from their interesting and instructive text, would soon find their way to every parlor-table, if not to the household library, of most families.

As an excellent history for the general reader I would mention, in conclusion, the illustrated 'History of the World,' by Otto von Corvin, which the firm of Otto Spamer, in Leipzig, is now issuing in a new edition. The book was originally written by Messrs. Corvin and Held some thirty-five years ago. In spite of a large competition of works of a similar character, such as Becker, Schlosser, Weber, and others, it has found a sale of 5,000 copies in Germany and Austria alone. The new edition will consist of eight volumes, three of which are completed. The first two, devoted to ancient history, are written by Mr. Corvin; the third comprises the first part of the Middle Ages down to the Crusades, and is written by Messrs. Dieffenbach and Voigt. Mr. Corvin is an author who has had a very eventful life. He is now nearly seventy years old, but is still as fresh and vivacious as a man in the prime of life. Formerly a Prussian officer, then a revolutionary leader in Berlin, he was taken prisoner in Rastadt and sentenced to seven years' solitary confinement in the penitentiary. After having served his term he went to London, and from there, as war correspondent for the London Times, to the United States, where for a time he was colonel of a volunteer regiment and afterwards clerk in the Treasury Department. During the war of 1870 he went to France as war correspondent. His letters created a great sensation by their piquant tone, their vivid description, and their correct information. In his old age he has again taken up the work of his youth and rewritten the greater part of his history. It does not pretend to be original, but it is based upon the best sources and attains a very high standard of historical narration. Corvin has a wonderful faculty for dissolving real or apparent contradictions, and for drawing life-like pictures. The history of Egypt has been the study of his life; this chapter and that relating to the kingdoms of middle Asia are the best in the book, which is in all parts splendidly and attractively equipped, and is comparatively very cheap. ??

PENSIONING PRESIDENTS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The idea of pensioning ex-Presidents is pleasing to the imagination, but is it wise to make the office of President of the United States a greater prize than it now is? And if that office is provided with a retiring pension, should not all elective public servants, according to their grade, in conformity to the equality principle of our Government, be pensioned? Though the prize has not always been drawn by our most eminently gifted men, yet nearly all of them have been more than willing to be President; and for the future, without any change of system, we are sure to have a sufficient number of able candidates.

Ardent politicians may desire a retiring pension for their President, as he would not have to exercise prudence to provide for his future, and "pressure," if not inclination, would require him, beyond his immediate necessities, to contribute his salary to the election (perhaps corruption) funds.

These reasons probably had influence with the founders of our Government, as they did not intend that the party which chanced to control the offices should be helped to perpetuate its power; and the distinguished men of a former generation that have been Presidents would not have been pleased to know that pity for them would be sought by exhibiting their straitened circumstances. CAMPAIGN BRIBERY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your correspondent, "A. R.," in your issue of December 9, regards the statements of "M. C.," in No. 803, as incredible, and then claims to be better qualified to speak on the subject of "campaign bribery," giving as reasons what, to any one acquainted with the ways of "practical politicians," is convincing that he really knows very little of the true inwardness of politics. One who openly votes a split ticket never receives the confidence of bosses, and though they may allow him to do hack-work of the innocent sort, they would not let him into the inner circle or acquaint him with the secret-service fund. In their own cant phrase he is too much of a "statesman" to be trusted. If he would visit the Hudson River counties, commencing at Saratoga and going down through to New York, and put himself in confidential relations with the managers, or even question the well-informed, he would find "M. C.'s" statement not only confirmed, but even a faint sketch of the truth, and would go home a wiser and sadder man, rejoicing that political tendencies had not ripened in Western New York.

He would find that the largest amount of the money raised for campaign purposes was devoted to the direct purchase of votes at the polls on election day; that in each election-district in the country and in the cities each party had a share of this money proportionate to the "float," with a treasurer to disburse it and workers to capture "the eggmen," as they are called; that these "eggmen" go from one side to the other, and finally take the tickets from the side offering the largest price, deposit them, and receive their pay in cash from the treasurer (if prices are about equal the voter votes his preference, but insists on his pay); that votes range from $1, at a local election where there is no serious contest, to $25, when the fighting is forced; that in some towns and wards one-half the voters are in the market, many of them well-to-do farmers or mechanics. The money is raised by assessments on office-holders and candidates and by subscriptions of the moneyed men in each party, and aggregates several thousand dollars, and is distributed the Monday before election to the several election districts of the counties along with the tickets. He would find that church officials and church members, as well as other men otherwise reputable, engage freely in subscribing for or disbursing the corruption fund, with only concealment sufficient to keep the other side from a knowledge of their resources or some officious reformer from making a disturbance. He would find that district-attorneys, judges, sheriffs, and most grand-jurors are more or less implicated in the business, and so many others that it were as idle to seek to suppress it by law as to indict a whole community. He would find that it ordinarily costs a candidate for a county office to be elected one-third of what he expects to receive during his whole term, and as legislative positions seem to have a peculiar attraction for wealthy men, that election to them costs several times the amount received from the State or national treasury. A candidate who will not contribute handsomely in all ordinary circumstances might as well withdraw at once, if the candidate pitted against him will. No one but a rich man or a man with rich friends, or backed by a powerful pecuniary interest that will furnish from $5,000 to $25,000, can run for legislative office with much expectation of success if there is a serious contest; and this fact is recognized as axiomatic with nominating conventions governing both parties in this section of the State. In the community where I live the purchasable vote is put at 800 out of a total poll of 2,300, by the best informed men of both parties, and the amount expended at the last election as $8,000, by those who ought to know and whose figures are the lowest of any. Each party vies with the other in this business, and the only difference is said to be that the Republicans can buy the purchasable colored vote a little cheaper, and the Democrats the purchasable white vote. If "A. R." visits the eastern part of the State he will exclaim, with the Queen of Sheba, "Behold, the half was not told me."

That the western part of the State is slower in its political development is probably owing to the fact that the moneyed classes and the political majority have been on the same side, and that the majority has been so large as to prevent any real contest over the local offices. In the east the conditions are reversed, the counties being naturally Democratic, and that majority being composed of many to whom a pecuniary reward on election day is an overpowering temptation. It is an abuse that has been continuously and on a considerable scale practised by both parties at all elections for over fifty years in this county, so I am informed by older people. For the last fifteen or twenty years it has grown to an enormous extent, and debars the poor man and the honorable from active participation in politics. W. P.

THE COST OF A CHANGE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Had a Democratic President been elected the country was threatened with an entire change of the officials in the public service, both at home and abroad. From this, in all probability, we are saved by the election of General Garfield. Having a little curiosity to ascertain how much a change in our foreign service would cost the Government in money actually expended, taking no account of the great loss in other ways both to the Government and to individuals by such a number of inexperienced officials coming into office at one time, on referring to the Register of the State Department and to the Consular Manual I have made the following calculations. The number of salaried officials in the consular service of the United States is 169, and the total amount of their salaries is $366,500. In this I do not count the thirteen consular clerks, with an aggregate salary of $14,400; nor the numerous consuls, consular agents, and commercial agents who are paid out of the fees which they receive. By a wise provision of law consular and diplomatic officers appointed from the United States, as they receive no outfit, infit, or travelling expenses, are allowed salary during thirty days in America while receiving their instructions, and during the period occupied in going to their post as well as in returning from it in case of their recall. This period of transit, as it is called, varies, according to the distance, from three days, in the case of Canada, to fifty or sixty, and even more, as in the case of China, Siam, and other remote countries. This allowance, although generally fair, is by no means liberal. No man is expected to travel as fast as the letter-post, and allowances have to be made in certain cases for necessary detentions while waiting for steamers, etc. As the old consul usually remains at his post until the new one arrives, and as even in case he does not his salary is received by the vice-consul, it is evident that during the thirty days when the new consul is receiving instructions at Washington, during the transit to his post, and during the transit home of his predecessor, double salaries are being paid. On a careful estimate of these double salaries, according to the time allowed by the Government and the methods of calculation used in the Treasury Department, I find that if all the salaried consular officers were removed the extra salary thus paid would amount to $85,080 89, or more than 23 per cent. of the salaries for the year. There is no extra expense attending the change of consuls paid out of their fees, for they receive no salary until they take possession of their posts.

By making a similar calculation for the diplomatic service, I find that excluding interpreters at Pekin, Tokio, and Constantinople, who could not be changed from the difficulty of replacing them, there are forty-four salaried diplomatic officers in the service of the United States, whose total salaries amount to $315,500. The actual cost of the change of these officers would amount to $74,867 38, or more than 23 per cent. of their annual salaries. An entire change of the officials in the consular and diplomatic service would, therefore, entail upon the Government the actual expenditure of $159,948 27, the most of which would come within the present fiscal year, for which no preparation has been made in the appropriation bill. This sum would considerably exceed the revenue brought to the Government by the consular service after all expenses have been paid. In addition to this there would be a certain expense, amounting to several thousand dollars, for losses on exchange, which fall on the Government and not on the consuls.

If, however, the Government can afford to spend this sum of $160,000 every four years, the efficiency of the service would be much more promoted by spreading the expenditure over four years, devoting $40,000 annually to increasing the salaries of diplomatic officers and unpaid consuls. It is not generally remembered that the scale of consular salaries was fixed in 1856, and that little change has been made since that time, although the cost of living in nearly every foreign town has increased in the last twenty-five years from 25 to 100 per cent. Notes.

THE members of the family of the late Lucretia Mott are preparing her biography, and would be glad to have the originals or copies of any of her letters, which will be returned if desired. They should be sent to Mrs. Maria Mott Davis, Oak Lane, Station A, Philadelphia.——Hall & Whiting, Boston, will publish early next month 'The House of Ross,' a volume of tales by the author of 'Bart Ridgeley.'——A. S. Barnes & Co. publish immediately a work on inter-oceanic transit across the Isthmus of Tehauntepec since the time of Cortez, by A. D. Anderson, author of 'The Silver Country, or the Great Southwest.'——We can cordially recommend a little brochure 'On Giving Names to Towns and Streets,' by the Rev. James Freeman Clarke (Boston: Lockwood, Brooks & Co.)——'Is Consumption Contagious, and Can it be Transmitted by Means of Food?' is the startling title of a small volume of which Dr. Herbert C. Clapp is the author, and Otis Clapp & Son, Boston, the publishers. The subject is too little regarded either by the profession or the laity. It is well treated by Dr. Clapp, who brings it up to the present time, as viewed under the light of modern science. His object is to convince people of the infectious nature of consumption. We regret that he has not thought it well to suggest rules for the guidance of those exposed to this deleterious influence, or for avoiding it wholly. It is true that he refers favorably to brief rules given by another; but a final chapter, upon the means of warding-off or of treating the disease, would have been, we think, not inappropriate.——Nature for Nov. 18 announces the formation of a Sanitary Assurance Association, whose object is "to give persons who place their houses on the Assurance Register certificates that their houses are in a satisfactory sanitary condition, and to endorse such certificates from time to time," of course after renewed inspection. It will also report upon the plans of new houses. It starts under the best auspices.——Every amateur who has attained a certain proficiency on the instrument may hope to profit by 'Daily Studies on the Piano,' by Rafael Joseffy (New York: E. Schuberth & Co.)——The report of the Chesapeake Zoölogical Laboratory of the Johns Hopkins University shows that last season, the third, was spent at Beaufort, N. The development of the crustacea was the chief study of the Laboratory.——With Part 23 of Oncken's 'Allgemeine Geschichte' (New York: Westermann) begins Dr. Felix Dahn's monograph on the Primitive History of the Germanic and Romance Peoples. In short sections the subject is opened in a methodical and fascinating manner, and while the text is interspersed with woodcuts of prehistoric implements, weapons, ornaments, tombs, etc., full-page illustrations beautifully represent Ravenna mosaics, there is an imaginary restoration of the pile-village, and a colored map shows the border-line between Germans and Romans in the time of Trajan.——Lockwood, Brooks & Co. have issued a "Poet's Calendar" for the new year, in which each day is provided with a quotation from the four New England poets, Longfellow, Whittier, Bryant, and Lowell. ——To the admirers of Salvini Mr. F. —Scribner & Co. this year, as last, issue a portfolio of 'Proof Impressions from Scribner's Monthly and St. Nicholas.' There are fifty plates, and the criticism to be made upon them, as compared with their predecessor, is, perhaps, forestalled by the announcement that the main consideration of the present collection has not been an exposition of skill and delicacy of engraving and printing, but "the artistic value of the designs," which accounts for the less striking impression left by the drawings as triumphs of wood engraving. The compensation suggested, however, is, so far as our memory goes, ample, and it should also be added that in technical regards the difference to be atoned for is of the slightest. The pictures are on loose sheets and printed in brown, grey, and red tints as well as in black. As always, it is evident that Mr. Cole has been entrusted with the most important work, and his renderings of Millet's "The Sower," the portraits of Poe and Savonarola, Raphael's "Apollo and Marsyas," and a landscape by A. H. Thayer are, perhaps, the most interesting of the plates. There are but fifteen hundred copies in the edition and the retail price is five dollars each. The Messrs. Appleton's contribution to the fine-art holiday literature is a new edition of Mr. G. W. Sheldon's 'American Painters,' an elegantly-attired quarto, adorned with one hundred and four woodcuts from pictures by the artists treated in the text. The text is to be commended for the preference manifested to have the painter describe himself, his methods, and his general views. This adds piquancy in some instances, a human interest in all, and has the especially happy effect of necessarily curtailing the critical exposition of the author, which, under the peculiar circumstances, could not fail to be somewhat incomplete and unsatisfactory. We may also without impropriety, in connection with these works, notice the first volume of Woltmann and Woermann's 'History of Ancient, Early Christian, and Mediæval Painting,' just published by Dodd, Mead & Co., though it has, of course, less a holiday interest than a permanent value, and belongs in the holiday category chiefly by reason of its elaborate dress and the evident pains expended upon the publishers' share in its presentation. It is edited by Professor Sidney Colvin, of Cambridge, England, who has, however, only dared to "venture upon an occasional abridgment or transposition," as he announces in his preface, and upon certain not too important modifications in the way of details of arrangement, the headings which indicate them, and so on. Condensation here and there will undoubtedly occur to the reader who is not a special student as a part of editing unwisely neglected; but it is to be said in reply that it is for the special student that the work is designed. Elaboration, at all events, cannot go further, and certainly the art of painting is as worthy of elaborate historical treatment as most other subjects which receive it. What one wants in addition is a nice sense of critical discrimination as to what is primary and what is secondary, say, but that is very likely incompatible with the scheme, which is ultra-Teutonic, Dr. Woltmann having been professor at the Imperial University of Strassburg and Dr. Woermann being a Düsseldorf professor of fine arts. Professor Colvin, at any rate, says it would be presumption for him to tamper with their judgments as well as their facts. The illustrations are abundant, but in great measure not unfamiliar woodcuts. To the above we may add the publication by Lippincott of Buchanan Read's 'Drifting' ("My soul to-day is far away, sailing the Vesuvian Bay"), with designs, some of them clever and pretty, by Miss L. B. Humphrey, and an issue by Peterson of Watson's 'Beautiful Snow, and Other Poems'—for the latter of which especially the season must be held mainly responsible.

—Mr. W. Hamilton Gibson's 'Pastoral Days' (Harpers) deserves and will hold a distinct place in the literature of rural New England. His point of view is not that of the philosopher, nor even of the full-grown man humoring himself with reminiscence; it is that of the boy who has never ceased to be a boy, who does not call up old scenes but still lives in them, and whose portraiture of country life a generation ago is no more an effort than to tell the exact location of "Hometown" or the real name of "Amos Shoopegg." This happy continuity of feeling determines the style of the narrative, which is not academic, but on the other hand is by no means devoid of literary skill, and is an easy outpouring kept well on the hither side of gush, though in the best sense of the word it might occasionally be called rhapsodical. Its character-painting is excellent, and all the changes and circumstances of the New England year are truthfully described. So much is to be said of the text, already known to readers of Harper's Magazine. The illustrations, by the same hand, are not more genuine evidence of love of and familiarity with nature, but they are more remarkable as art than the letter-press as literature. Mr. Gibson's drawings are marked by a rare grace and delicacy as well as fidelity, and he has been seconded by the best engravers of this metropolis. Whether the subject be an apple orchard, or the white balls of the dandelion, or the maiden-hair or golden-rod or blue-flag, or a landscape for every season, the result is admirable and, considering the work of contemporary designers, perhaps unique. The tangle of wayside growths and of thickets is a favorite theme with this artist; feathery and furry game he delineates with somewhat less of mastery as well as frequency, and his specimen types of population are not to be compared with his flower sketches. The care bestowed by the publishers on the manufacture of this beautiful book has, we believe, never been surpassed in the Franklin Square establishment.

—"Faust" seems just now to be the order of the day in musical circles. Four performances of Boïto's "Mefistofele" and one of Gounod's "Faust" by the Italian Opera Company, three of Berlioz's "Damnation" by the Symphony Society, and two of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" by the Philharmonic Society were the principal features of the musical events of the last two weeks. The second concert of the Philharmonic Society, which took place on Saturday last, presented a very sober programme, which was scarcely relieved by the two bright movements of Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor. One must regret that this lovely work, conceived with so much art and begun with so much skill, was never completed. It belongs to the noblest relics of the great master of sweet melodies, and it would be difficult to surpass the beauties of some of the orchestral effects. The novelty of the evening was a scene from the first act of Wagner's "Siegfried," which naturally proved a disappointment. It would be very difficult to find in the Trilogy a scene less suited for a concert performance than the highly dramatic act which Mr. Thomas selected on Saturday. Siegfried, the hero, is welding the sword, Nothung, which had been broken in the combat between his father and Hunding. Mime, the treacherous dwarf, is watching him, plotting how to possess himself of the famous blade. The blowing of the bellows, the ring of the anvil as Siegfried's mighty arm brings down the heavy hammer, the hissing of the hot steel as he dips it into water, these and other incidents are admirably represented in Wagner's music, and Siegfried's bright song, "Nothung! Nothung, cutting sword!" is one of the most thrilling numbers in the opera; but the extreme beauty of the situation is lost without the stage apparatus, and to many the whole scene must have been perfectly bewildering. The most serious defect on Saturday was the highly unsatisfactory way in which the vocal solo parts were filled. The two gentlemen to whom the parts of Siegfried and Mime were entrusted were utterly unqualified for their task, and their efforts to make themselves heard above the swelling effects of Wagner's orchestra, with every wind instrument doubled, were positively painful. Liszt's "Faust Symphony," which has not been heard for some years, concluded the performance.

—Students of palæontology, and palæontologists generally, will learn with satisfaction that a further instalment of Zittel and Schimper's 'Handbuch der Palæontologie' has lately been furnished by its distinguished Munich editor. This work, with perhaps one exception the most important and comprehensive general treatise on the subject that has as yet been published in any language, was commenced in 1876, and, although it has already reached the fourth year of its publication, only five parts, or considerably less than one-half of the whole number, have thus far made their appearance. This slow progress—partly due to the general difficulties which attend such a laborious undertaking, and partly to the profusion of palæontological papers scattered indiscriminately throughout the transactions of learned societies, and which are barely touched by that class of authors whose "text-books" on zoölogy or geology appear to spring up spontaneously—of course impairs a good deal the value of the undertaking, even though each separate section be supplemented with material intended to bring the entire subject up to date. The want of a suitable treatise, intended as well for the beginner as for the more advanced student or practical worker, has long been felt, and it is therefore to be hoped that the present work will receive such encouragement and assistance as will ensure it an early and positive completion. It may be remarked, as a singular fact in connection with the literature of the science, that there are altogether in the English language but three general treatises of any merit (two of which are decidedly antiquated), those of Mantell, Owen, and Nicholson, that can claim a place beside the almost innumerable elementary and advanced text-books that have appeared on the kindred sciences. Part 1 (vol. i.) of the hand-book before us deals with the Protozoa, and is prefaced with an introduction bearing on the principles of palæontological science and a historical sketch. Part 2 embraces the sponges (the special study of which delayed the publication more than two years), corals, and polyps; Part 3, the urchins and worms; and Part 4, a portion of the molluscous animals (Bryozoa and Brachiopoda). The recent death of Prof. Schimper, upon whom devolved that portion of the work pertaining to palæophytology, or fossil botany, will doubtless to some extent interfere with the plan of vol. ii., but its successful completion is assured by the co-operation of Prof. Schenk, of Leipzig. The first and only part yet published treats of the Thallophyta, mosses, and ferns. It is needless to advert to the special merits of the work, as the names of the editor and assistant-editors are a sufficient guarantee for its excellence.

—A correspondent writes us as follows:

"In the Nation of December 2, referring to the distribution of the zoölogical collections of the Challenger to foreign naturalists, and speaking of the 'national rights of scientific men,' you say 'it may yet be doubtful whether it would not have been judicious to attach greater national importance to an enterprise upon which the British Government so lavishly bestowed its favors.' Setting aside the question whether national importance was not best consulted by placing the collections in the most competent hands, you omit to mention that those who so bitterly attacked Sir Wyville Thomson for the course he pursued, forgot to state that he was induced to adopt it in order to avoid the inevitable confusion which was sure to follow the simultaneous publication of the results of the American deep-sea dredging expeditions carried on before and after the Challenger, under the auspices of the United States Coast Survey. Sir Wyville Thomson and Mr. Agassiz agreed to select the most eminent specialists, independent of nationality, and to consign to them the materials of their respective expeditions, to be worked up pari passu. It was hardly to be expected that without some such understanding the Americans would deliberately place in the hands even of pre-eminent English naturalists the magnificent collections they brought together, and which complement in so remarkable a manner those of the Challenger. It was the only course possible, with reference not only to the best interests of biology but of those of the collections also. The confusion which must arise from the independent investigations of a few groups from both collections, rendered necessary by the attacks on Sir Wyville Thomson's course, will form a good basis by which to measure the value of the national rights of scientific men."

—The condemnation and dissolution of the Order of Templars in 1312 are events which have called out a great amount of controversy, and of sympathy among those who have not been convinced of the truth of the charges. On the whole, we believe the current of opinion has been against their truth, at least in their extreme form; neither Philip the Fair nor Clement V. ranks high enough in character to give weight to his position as accuser. Professor Prutz has recently published in Berlin an elaborate examination of the whole question, entitled 'Geheimlehre und Geheimstatuten des Tempelherren Ordens,' in which he apparently proves the worst of the charges. The conclusion to which Professor Prutz comes is essentially the same as Mr. Hallam's, stated clearly and forcibly in note xv. to the first chapter of his 'Middle Ages.' The heresy of the Templars, he says, was taken from that of "the most objectionable sect, the Luciferians," and grew up among them at the time of their stay in the Holy Land, between 1219 and 1250, at Athlit, their capital. They regarded Christ as an impostor and directed their worship towards the evil spirit, of whom they had an idol in the shape of a brazen head. The charges of impure practices appear also to be fully made out. The second part of Professor Prutz's book proves that the 'Geheimstatuten des Ordens der Tempelherren,' published by Dr. Merzdorf, in Halle, in 1877, are not genuine: a principal argument is that these are deistic in character, while the real dogmas of the Knights Templars were dualistic or Manichæan.

—The death of the Comte de Chambord will not, as is sometimes asserted, end the house of Bourbon, for the Orleans are as much Bourbons as himself; but another royal family, of almost equal fame, is really at the point of extinction. This is the house of Orange-Nassau, which, under one title or another, has reigned in the Netherlands since the death of the sovereign known in history as the Prince of Orange par excellence. The male members of the family are now but three in number—the king, aged 63, his uncle Frederic, aged 83, and the crown-prince, aged 39. The latter is unmarried and will continue so, being, it is said, of somewhat unsound mind. The King's recent marriage has been blessed with a daughter, but she would not inherit the crown if her great-uncle should succeed her father, as her claim would then yield to that of his own daughter, the Princess of Wied. In either case a new family would come to the throne. In the Grand-duchy of Luxemburg, united to the crown of Holland as Hanover was to that of England, women are entirely excluded from the succession, and the heir-at-law is the (in 1866) dispossessed Duke of Nassau. The succession to the Duchy of Brunswick is a frequent subject of discussion in the German papers, the heir of the aged duke being the de jure king of Hanover. Bismarck's respect for public law is hardly great enough to permit the enthronement of two irreconcilable princes; but the smaller states may yet be able to prevent the absorption of their territories by Prussia. The succession of the Duke of Edinburgh to the ducal crown of Coburg is not likely to be opposed.

—Dr. Fritz Embacher has had the happy idea of arranging the more important travels of the present century in a set of tables divided horizontally by countries and arranged perpendicularly by dates. Thus on two pages, facing one another, are given the travels in Africa, divided into N. W., Tripolitania, S. W., N. E., and S. E. with the Cape, from 1801 (with a few preliminary lines, noting five or six chief discoveries in previous centuries) to 1837; the next two pages go to 1854, and so on to 1860, 1866, 1873, 1876, 1879. Similarly six pairs of pages are devoted to "Australia, Oceania, and America," and ten to the "Polar Regions and Asia." The work will be very useful to geographical students, but one cannot help regretting that the table was not made to extend back to the beginning of modern geographical discovery, which would not have more than trebled its bulk and its moderate cost (four marks).

—Under the title of 'Trois Théâtres' (Paris: Calmann Lévy; New York: F. W. Christern) M. Léopold Lacour has gathered from one of the reviews his studies of the plays of Émile Augier, of Alexandre Dumas, fils, and of Victorien Sardou. In his preface he announces his intention hereafter to take up M. Labiche, MM. Meilhac and Halévy, and M. Gondinet—the last a very clever dramatist, almost wholly unknown in this country. In 'Trois Théâtres' ("théâtre" in the sense of the collected dramatic works of an author) M. Lacour considers the realistic drama of the past quarter of a century, the drama which followed close upon the success of the "Dame aux Camélias," and of which the best specimens are the "Fils de Giboyer" of M. Augier, the "Demi-Monde" of M. Dumas, and the "Famille Benoiton" of M. Sardou. Obviously this critic prefers M. Sardou to his two rivals, and even M. Dumas to M. Augier; but he is frank enough to show reasons for the order in which the best French criticism holds them, and which is the exact reverse of his own predilection. It is not a little amusing to see that he takes Dumas quite seriously, as if he were a consistent philosopher declaring a new truth.

II.

As readers lay down the 'Early History of Charles James Fox' they may well ask themselves, What is the estimate they are to form of the Whig leader? Mr. Trevelyan is ready with a reply. Fox was, according to his latest biographer, "our first great statesman of the modern school." The phrase is a good one as far as sound goes, but there is a difficulty in giving it any meaning consistent with the facts of Fox's life. By the modern school is intended, we presume, the class of statesmen who have held power since the first Reform Bill, such as Russell, Peel, Aberdeen, Palmerston, the present Lord Derby, and the like. How are we to find a place for Fox amongst this body of serious and respectable politicians? With Lord Melbourne, indeed, he might claim kindred, but his lordship, in spite of his too frequent oaths and his late rising, was a quiet, humdrum, business-like person compared with the youthful rhetorician who found some recreation from his serious anxieties at Brooks's in playing at politics in the House of Commons. The truth is that the most marked characteristics of modern statesmanship have no relation to Fox but that of contrast. The members of a modern ministry are, or invariably affect to be, men of sound weight and respectability. Fox's escapades shocked a society which was not straight-laced. From the time of Pitt downwards the profession of politics has become more and more of a serious and, to say the truth, a rather dull trade. To debate the minute details of uninteresting measures is the chief occupation of M.P.'s in the nineteenth century. Can any one bring himself to imagine that Fox, who even when in power seems to have sat up late of a night at Brooks's, and to have gone down late in the morning to his office, was the parent of the Parliamentary officials who work as hard to serve the public as a set of merchants' clerks to gain the favor of their employer?

A marked feature, again, of modern public life in England is the attention shown by leading politicians to social and economical questions. Of all the contemporaries of Fox, not one, except Lord Shelburne, would have found himself in sympathy with the sociological interest of the present day. Can any one fancy the Whig dandy presiding at a social-science congress or delivering a lecture, say on temperance, to a body of Sunday-school children hungering and thirsting for the buns and tea which are to make up for the dulness of the distinguished gentleman's address? Another note of modern English statecraft is almost instinctive deference to national as contrasted with Parliamentary opinion. This characteristic had already in Fox's time begun to distinguish all really influential politicians. Chatham, Pitt, and even George III. learnt sooner or later that public opinion was a force which counted for more than the votes of every M.P. who could be purchased for money or influenced by party spirit or by rhetoric. The favorite son of Lord Holland started in life with his father's cynical contempt for the public, and with a Whig's exaggerated veneration for the House of Commons. He bullied printers and printers' devils; he opposed the liberty of the press; he defended corruption, even when it was too rank to be sanctioned by Rigby or by Lord North; and he made himself, without any cause, the apologist for the most odious encroachment upon individual rights which even George III. ever attempted. Fox, no doubt, was young when he volunteered to assist the court in the attempt to plunder the Duke of Portland of his estates; but, after all, youth is compatible with common sense, and we cannot imagine that the youngest junior lord who has held office for the last fifty years would commit a folly like the folly of Fox in making himself an ally of Sir James Lowther. There is, we admit, a certain charm in boyish imprudence, even when dashed with a touch of equally boyish cynicism; but boyish recklessness, whatever its merits, is not a characteristic of any modern school. If we are to understand Fox at all, and to appreciate either his strength or his weakness, we must dismiss Mr. Trevelyan's fine phrase and find some description for Fox which a little better fits the facts than does that of "first great statesman of the modern school."

The true key to Fox's career, at any rate during his early years, is to be found in the then prevailing admiration for a kind of character as typical of the age in which he lived as it is foreign to the moral conceptions of the nineteenth century. He was "the man whose 'good heart' compensated for a thousand indiscretions"; he was the Charles Surface of fashionable society, as of English public life. He was genial, amusing, well-read in light literature, and still better versed in all the follies of high life. He hunted, he drank, he gambled, he lost, and when he lost soothed his creditors by his wit, and as long as he had any credit remaining kept even his "Jerusalem Chamber" in a roar. When the day came he "paid up," or rather (which is characteristic of the "man of a good heart") let his father pay up for him, like a man. Life was a game, and Charles James Fox played it like a gentleman—mainly at another person's expense. His father, it is fair to say, entered as fully into the spirit of the affair as did Uncle Oliver; and his generosity, his liberality, and his good humor would show a finer character than one can well believe Lord Holland to have possessed, were students not haunted with a suspicion that his lordship must have soothed his cares with the reflection that if Charles wasted the treasures his father had collected, there was plenty more money to be got from the source whence the family wealth was derived—viz., the public treasury—and that Lord Holland's son, who had already the ball at his feet, could easily, by using the arts which his father had practised, end his life at least as rich a man as his father. Moreover, it was not in social life only that Fox resembled Charles Surface. He carried into politics exactly the qualities of the good-hearted reprobate whose faults were, in the eyes of the audience whom Sheridan addressed, more than redeemed by freedom from hypocrisy and a somewhat maudlin affection for the uncle who had tipped him as a boy. It is at first sight, indeed, hard to believe that the young man who could abet the infamous attempt to plunder the Duke of Portland had even the dubious virtues attaching to the possession of a good heart; but consideration of Fox's subsequent career and a candid survey of the facts brought forward by Mr. Trevelyan pretty clearly prove that Fox's errors were the indiscretions of a clever lad drunk with vanity, spirits, and rhetoric, and given, as is the way with clever lads, to hold a paradox to be better than an argument, and unreal cynicism to be the true sign of genuine honesty. When he attacked the marriage law, when he defended corruption, when he invented quibbles in defence of injustice which would have raised the blush on the cheek of an Old Bailey lawyer, he was, it seems—and we believe that in the main this is the true explanation of his conduct—merely showing the high spirits of a school-boy, the conceit of a dandy, and the recklessness of a gambler. Brooks's was the ante-room to the House of Commons, and a young gentleman who came into the house after getting drunk at Brooks's naturally brought into the debate the spirit of the Club. There is, too, even at Fox's worst, a touch of the merits of Charles Surface. His attack on Lord Hardwick's Act was utterly silly and indefensible. His indignation at the Royal Marriage Act admits of more apology, but was, though Mr. Trevelyan hardly perceives this, utterly wrong-headed. But that a young man should neglect his interest even to pursue his hobbies gave to judicious observers some faint hope of reformation. When Charles Surface refuses to sell his uncle's picture, calm reflection tells one that he is a fool, and that a wise man or a self-denying man ought to have sold every stick he had to pay off his debts. But then a wise or a self-denying person would never have come to the pass in which Charles stood, and cynicism itself cannot deny that a man who has the vices, is the better for having the uncalculating sensibility, of a boy. Thus it was with Fox. We can hardly say that any one step in his early career was creditable to his sense, but every one feels pleased that the future Whig should at any cost have broken with the Court.

That Fox was during his early life nothing much better than a man whose follies were in part atoned for by a vein of generous feeling will probably be admitted, but admirers who see in him "our first great statesman of the modern school" will urge that the errors of a dissipated youth have no connection with the patriotic efforts of a glorious manhood. You cannot explain the character of the political saint by pointing to the faults committed before his conversion by the political reprobate. This is, no doubt, partly true, and the biographer who, like Mr. Trevelyan, breaks off the history of his hero just before his hero has begun to turn aside from the error of his ways, places his readers and critics in great difficulties; nevertheless we insist on Fox's character in youth just because we believe that it really does throw light on the achievements and failures of his later life. We yield to no one in admiration of the small band headed by Fox who, in the darkest days of reaction, held firm against fearful odds to their belief in the cause of freedom and justice; but the most ordinary knowledge of the general outlines of English history is sufficient to convince any one but a biographer or a eulogist that Fox, with all his astounding eloquence, with his high abilities, with his power of attaching friends with an attachment extinguished neither by defeat nor by death, with his generous sensibilities, and with the advantage of being (as Liberals must believe) on the side of humanity, of justice, and of truth, yet failed as a statesman to a degree in which hardly any other English politician of equal ability has failed either before or since the time when Fox was the adored chief of the Whigs. Now, if we ask what was the cause alike of his failure and of efforts more glorious than much success, we are almost driven to ascribe both the one and the other to the qualities which mark every act of his early years.

From the time when he entered Parliament to the day of his death, Fox's success was marred by three defects which are as patent during the years when he led the Whigs as during the years when, in mere boyish recklessness, he posed as the leader of the most reckless of the Tories. He lacked what many sympathetic and enthusiastic men lack—that kind of judgment which makes followers feel that their leader is always the representative of common sense. The statesman who could believe and say that the taking of the Bastille was the greatest and best event in the history of the world, must have displayed a fervor of temper very foreign to ordinary English statesmanship. Still, in this matter, he represented the sentiment of his generation. His detestation of Lord Hardwick's Marriage Act, his exaggerated denunciations of the Royal Marriage Act, betray a flaw in his judgment far more serious than the participation in the exaggerated hopes of a generation boiling over with belief in human perfectibility. The causes which throughout life prejudiced Fox against the very rational provisions of the English marriage law were, as Mr. Trevelyan explains, personal. The explanation is correct, but it is absolutely fatal to any claim for Fox to statesmanlike judgment. A more serious deficiency, amply accounted for by the details of Fox's early education, was something like incapacity to appreciate the political weight of character. Chatham, Pitt, George III. were all men who in different ways appealed to that confidence in character which is the strong point, as it is also sometimes the weak point, of the English public world. Fox was the son of a professed cynic. His own generosity of nature saved him from cynicism, but his father's teaching, combined with the course of his early life, left him without the power of understanding either the sentiment or the prejudice in favor of respectability which exerts such prodigious influence over the public conduct of ordinary Englishmen. It is vain to say that this was an error he outgrew. The connection between Fox and the Prince Regent damaged him quite as much at a later stage of his career as did his reputation as a gambler during the portion of his life narrated by Mr. Trevelyan. Moreover, as great an error as was ever committed by a celebrated statesman—the alliance between Fox and North—sprang directly from his failure to perceive that no number of votes could make up to him or his party for the discredit of the coalition with men whom he had for years denounced as scoundrels deserving the block. In this, the one crowning folly of his life (which, be it remarked, is long subsequent to the period at which Mr. Trevelyan would, we presume, place his hero's conversion), Fox showed not only his indifference to character but his third great failing (shared, it must be remarked, by Burke and all the regular Whigs of the day)—a want of power to appreciate the deference due to public opinion. As is often the case with converts, Fox held unconsciously to the remnants of a creed which he had in theory renounced. The invectives hurled against Pitt and the King for venturing on a "penal dissolution"—that is, for appealing from Parliament to the sense of the nation—are utterly out of keeping with the views entertained in modern days by even the most moderate of Whigs; but they are completely in keeping with the theories of the youthful Tory desperado who supported the right of Parliament to make Luttrell member for Middlesex in defiance of the votes of the electors. The plain truth is that the Whigs never recovered from the rout of 1783 until they had got rid of the two defects they inherited from Fox. Lord Althorp, who was probably the dullest speaker who ever commanded the confidence of Parliament, gave them for the first time a leader of unblemished character, who could show that Liberalism might be combined with respectability and piety; the serious agitation for Parliamentary reform was the formal and final renunciation of the dogma that Parliament and not the nation was the real sovereign of England.

The same analysis of Fox's useful character which supplies a key to the mistakes of his career also shows the real source and nature of his greatness. If he may fairly be described as the Charles Surface of politics, modern readers must be careful to remember that Sheridan's hero represented to the public who first witnessed the "School for Scandal" a very different character from that which he bears in the eyes of modern playgoers. He was to the generation whom he delighted the embodiment of youthful goodness of heart, which in its very errors protested against cant and hypocrisy. Fox had all and tenfold more than the virtues which the most enthusiastic admirers of "a good heart" could attribute to Charles Surface; he possessed and displayed a power and steadfastness of sympathy very rare in an Englishman. His sensibility to nobleness compensated for the defects of his judgment. Hatred of oppression made him zealous on behalf of the people of India, and, at a time when all Europe was driven wild with panic and indignation at the horrors of the Reign of Terror, kept him true to the cause of freedom. His statesmanship and his friendships were but two sides of the same generous, sympathetic nature. Generosity and geniality are not, it may be urged, statesmanship. This is so, and the fact that noble sentiment does not enable a statesman to dispense with political insight is at bottom the reason why Charles James Fox will never take a high rank in the list of English ministers. But there are seasons when the sentiments of a public man are of even more consequence to the nation than his policy. Such was the period when Fox was the hero and standard-bearer of the Whigs. To keep alive, in the face of a narrow-minded court and of a panic-stricken people, the belief in freedom and humanity at a time when liberty and philanthropy had become associated with the horrors of the Reign of Terror, was the duty of Fox. That he and his friends were true to freedom when she was deserted even by such a man as Burke, is their glory; and it is a curious but true reflection that even the contempt of public opinion which Lord Holland handed down to his son was transmuted in a generous mind into manly independence of popular clamor. That Fox's vices were the fruit in great degree of his education is patent. His virtues, also, were not the qualities which distinguish statesmen of the modern school; they were rather the natural outgrowth in a generous mind of the influences under which Fox passed his youth. A born orator—the child of an age of rhetoric and sentiment—he displayed to the last the real though sentimental and rhetorical virtues of the eighteenth century.

RECENT POETRY.*

MR. TENNYSON'S volume is dedicated "To Alfred Tennyson, my Grandson," and in terms which indicate the arrival of that epoch in a poetic career when, the poet's fame being won and his public the reading world, he indulges his whims unchecked by the curb of self-criticism or the need of deserving an attention already secure. This epoch arrives earlier with some poets than with others. With a few, doubtless, it coincides with the entire career: "I am in doubt whether he has lately become crazy or has always been so," said Mérimée of Victor Hugo. But though, in the case of Victor Hugo, Mérimée himself would have, perhaps, acknowledged this was chiefly a speculative matter, as unimportant as it was uncertain, in the case of such a singer as Mr. Tennyson it is of the last importance that he should maintain the admirable sanity which has characterized his most impetuous outpourings. Perhaps it is this, indeed, which will count most among his spiritual qualities in the final reckoning it is far too soon yet to cast up; it is clear, certainly, that his finest frenzy is least frenetic. At all events, his best work is safely to be included between the period when he permitted himself to write "The Skipping-Rope" and the present, wherein he sings, in a vein that certainly suggests Hugo:

> "Golden-hair'd Ally, whose name is one with mine,
> Crazy with laughter and babble and earth's new wine,
> Now that the flower of a year and a half is thine,
> O little blossom, O mine, and mine of mine,
> Glorious poet who never hast written a line,
> Laugh, for the name at the head of my verse is thine:
> May'st thou never be wronged by the name that is mine."

We quote the entire dedication, both because it is all of a piece and because it seems to us worth recording.

Critics of a full mental habit have long been accustomed to find Mr. Tennyson as lacking in good sense as others of a more sensitive organization have found him wanting in the delicacy which no rhetorical subtleties, however felicitous, can satisfy with the bourgeois truth of things, and no mechanical refinement be a sufficient substitute for in the poetic equipment. At bottom the two come to very much the same thing—an accusation, namely, of failing in the quality for which, according to Artemus Ward, George Washington was particularly eminent; and, indeed, it is not difficult to see how dilettanteism unassisted may fail in fastidiousness. Tennysonians, to be sure, have always made light of this, and maintained that being open to parody was very different from being deserving of ridicule, that questions of taste were difficult to discuss and impossible to settle, and that in disputed cases one would hardly be likely to find a better authority than Tennyson himself. But even a Tennysonian, one would say, must reflect pensively upon his master's original force when he sees it so simply and indeed starkly illustrated as it is here. The alternative is that such caprices are of an epileptic transitoriness, and are really alien to the poet's real genius; but this, hostile critics would hold, involves the corollary that we only get the latter in such close combination with elegant and subtle mental mechanism that it is idle to talk of setting it free. It is either, they would say, the contained and elegantly expressed passion of "Maud," or such inspiration as

We should not ourselves doubt which of the two was the true Tennyson, but the Tennysonians are always annoyed at any intimation that their favorite is the very genius of admirable workmanship, and resent the notion that his workmanship is not merely an attribute. Perhaps they are right; only one would either like something different from what Mr. Tennyson is apt to give us on occasions when he "lets himself go," or prefer the unbroken maintenance of his academic reserve. The latter sometimes secures little enough, one is tempted to add—all the more if the recent ventures of the laureate have seemed a crescendo of disappointment, and a cumulative warning that to hope for further refection from this fecund source is vain. One needs to pause a moment to realize fully the meaning of this, Tennyson has so long been regarded as an active worker whose race was by no means run, and whose message had been but incompletely delivered. The first three poems in the present volume read like versifications of themes by Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, it may be fancifully suggested, which means that they are popularly pathetic. The "Revenge" ballad is well known, as are also the "Defence of Lucknow," with its dedication to the Princess Alice, and the "De Profundis," and some of the shorter pieces. "In the Children's Hospital" is affecting in the same way with "The May Queen," though it is properly brief. "The Village Wife; or, The Entail" is in Northern dialect, and has all the humor of the character, though humor in Tennyson, however good it may be, always makes one stare. "The Voyage of Maeldune" is cleverly told, and "Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham," and "Columbus" are the best poems of the volume; in both there is true dramatic fire, both are carefully individualized, and the latter has a striking dignity of pathos—almost striking enough to be called Shaksperian if it were not so "ship-shape," as it were. The sonnets and shorter poems are of varying merit, and in the lines on Sir John Franklin we get down to the plain prose which, though it often seems imminent, the laureate's skill generally contrives to conceal.

Professor Blackie's 'Lays and Legends' recall with singular precision the lays in which Macaulay celebrated the legends of ancient Rome. They give the story with all the explicitness of prose, they have a metrical jingle that is easy to keep pace with, and, considered as poetry or even a sympathetic rendering in verse of ancient poetic stories, they have the same false ring, the same hard, metallic echo. They are several degrees superior in point of diction, and now and then one seems to be in the neighborhood of some felicity of expression justly to be called poetic; on the other hand, they lack the unblushing, conscious insistence upon the merits of jingle as poetic cadence, and the thrilling spiritedness, which earned their extreme popularity for the 'Lays of Ancient Rome.' Professor Blackie is not only a distinguished Greek scholar but an experienced translator, and one needs strong justification to speak thus strongly of his defects. But surely the beginning of his introduction is strong justification:

> "Muse of old Hellas, wake again!—
> Thou wert not born to die—
> And mingle sweet the Classic strain
> With Gothic minstrelsy!
> I feel a tingling in my veins,
> My heart is beating strong;
> Let novel-writers count their gains,
> I'll pipe my Doric song."

How close this is to doggerel it does not take too fine an ear to recognize. And though the note of doggerel, so to speak, is an indefinite one, and in regard to it doctors often enough disagree, the menace it bears to the ballad-form is well known. But Professor Blackie, it may be remembered, is an advocate of the ballad-form as a medium for rendering even the hexameter of Homer, and it is natural that when he comes to render in his own language not Homer but Greek themes only, he should select it. The ballad-form has its own value, no one will deny; but neither will any one deny, we should say, that if it ever fails to satisfy it is especially insufficient in narrative. Persons who are fond of it as a medium of narrative (and Professor Blackie's lays are of course all narrative) will here, we fancy, find their notion subjected to all the tension it will bear. Admiring Scott's use of it is one thing, and finding it adequate to the demands of the legends of ancient Greece is wholly another. It is, perhaps, unjust to charge upon it the failure of Professor Blackie's employment of it, and it is, of course, open to any one to doubt whether a poet who has felt "a tingling in his veins" at the thought of the "muse of old Hellas," in any but the loosest and most general manner, would be likely to address her so.

> "Muse of old Hellas, wake again!
> Thou wert not born to die"—

that is the way in which one might invoke the muse of old England or old Scotia, but hardly that of "old" Hellas. The "Classic strain" disappears entirely in the flood of "Gothic minstrelsy," and it would not be difficult to find novels fully as "Doric" as Professor Blackie's song. Let the reader think of the Cyclops in a passion and then read (p. 107):

> "He filled the seas with weeping;
> His big round eye was red;
> His hair he tore like forests
> From off his clumsy head."

One asks himself inevitably if it is not an attempt to apply the spirit and manner of Mother Goose to Greek mythology. Or this, from the "Chorus of Young Maidens" in the poem "Theseus":

> "The lot, the lot, the bloody lot!
> But why this dinsome cheering?
> 'Tis he! 'tis he! Greek mothers, see
> The kingly youth appearing!"

Further on, however, the "Chorus of all the People"—

> "Famous is Thebes, by thy birth made immortal,
> Son of Alcmena, whose bravery won
> A place with the gods when Olympus' wide portal > Flew open to welcome Jove's club-bearing son"— testifies to the inadequacy of the ballad movement again. Read as prose the words would be well enough, but metrically it is not exaggeration to say the form is much better adapted to celebrating the wonders of "The Pimlico Pavilion" than to a Greek chorus, and is handled by Thackeray with a much nicer sense of its capacities than by Prof. Blackie.

Neither is it exaggeration to say that the author of 'Under the Olive' shows quite as keen appreciation of the classic spirit as Professor Blackie. The faculty is notoriously quite independent of erudition, and is, à priori, as likely to be met with in a Boston literary lady as in an Edinburgh Grecian. We do not mean to intimate that the author of 'Under the Olive' is not learned too; the notes appended to her little volume testify to the contrary, and indeed are witness of wide information: quotations from Hegel, Stendhal, Mrs. Browning, Max Müller, Mahaffy, Dowden, Paul de Saint-Victor, Michelet, J. Addington Symonds, and many other authorities contributing to the explanatory lore of the poems, and furnishing a more or less complete compendium of what has been said in admiration and criticism of Greek literature—rather too strictly contemporary, perhaps, to be of permanent value, but more interesting to read than a classical dictionary after some one has been at the pains to collect them. The poems are in great part lyrical, with interspersed dramatic pieces, monologues, and narratives. "To the Lyric Muse," "To the Poetess (Sappho)," "Sophocles," "Euripides," "Helena," "Herakles," "Antinous," "Artemis," and so on, are a few of the titles; the Greek orthography is generally employed, even to Kypris, by the way. There are many notes, not unnaturally, of which the modern quality is in curious contrast to the theme and action. For example:

IOPHON.
"Ha! What sayest thou? Is it, then, come to this!
[They seize their weapons." is amusing, considering the title of the poem, "Sophocles." Mr. Swinburne's classicism sometimes receives the flattery of imitation in preference to classicism at first hand, though the resemblance is largely metrical and so far doubtless factitious. In the main there is a great deal of poetic feeling evinced, not a little poetic ardor even, and often a commensurate expression of the same. The Goethe translations are close, and yet smooth and not unpoetic.

Susan Coolidge's 'Verses' are as unpretending as their title. The author's muse is of a grave, tender, pensive cast of inspiration, and most of the lyrics that the book contains are penetrated with a mild seriousness that is perhaps their main attraction. Of other than their moral qualities it is difficult to speak positively, since in workmanship they are chiefly remarkable for the absence of blemish. A contained and quiet diction, and a kind of well-bred air denoting a decent rhetorical reserve and literary equipoise, may be said to characterize them; here and there, for example, this plainly holds in check any disposition towards what a less careful writer would consider the legitimate pathetic or otherwise emotional tendency of the theme. There is considerable metrical variety, but in general little effort or ambitiousness of any kind, and the distinction happily laid down in the Prelude is closely observed:

"Poems are heavenly things,
And only souls with wings
May reach them where they grow,
. . . . .
Verses are not of these;
They bloom on earthly trees," etc.

The Goodale sisters in 'All Round the Year' will, perhaps, disappoint those of their many admirers who have looked for a fuller and maturer note in their next volume of verse. This includes the thirty poems already published under the title 'In Berkshire with the Wild Flowers,' and the rest of its contents is of precisely the same quality as that of these. We, at any rate, are not among the disappointed, and had concluded that the progress shown in the last volume was all that could fairly be demanded of such charming freshness and simplicity until experience of life should add its inspiration to that of maturing powers. Many of these verses are delightful; indeed, they have a quality which relieves the narrow gamut of their themes and treatment of the displeasing effect of monotony in general; but they are as mature, we venture to say, as their successors written twenty years hence will be if the authors of them continue their placid existence "in Berkshire with the wild flowers," as their best friends must after all wish it may be their happy lot to do.

Mr. Gilder's 'The New Day: a Poem in Songs and Sonnets' is a second edition of a work published five years ago, but we mention it here because it will be new to many readers and deserves to have a wider audience than perhaps its exclusiveness of style and thought has hitherto won for it. It is, at all events, an unusual piece of workmanship by an artificer who takes the delight of a true artist in his work. It is undoubtedly more than this—a sustained effort of genuine inspiration, using terms in a popular sense and bearing in mind that genuine poetry, rare as it is, may be distinctly minor poetry. Whether the burden of the 'The New Day' is weighty enough to bear the strain of the mysticism Mr. Gilder has apparently imposed upon it, at some expense of simplicity and with deliberateness, is open to question. One is tempted to say it ought to have a key; the illustrations, pretty as they are, being insufficiently symbolical.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.—III.

IT is a pity that Viollet-le-Duc's 'Learning to Draw; or, The Story of a Young Designer' (Putnams) is not an out-and-out child's book, as from its title it might be supposed to be, and from its form it comes very near being. The first seven or eight pages, which are quite level with the childish comprehension, almost make the book worth buying for their sake alone; but there are many passages and pages, if not chapters, scattered through the volume which the youthful reader could profit by without an instructor. Fragments of M. Majorin's discourse with Jean about geometry, perspective, comparative anatomy, geology, contour levels, the Alps, Pompeii, will interest any boy or girl, while the varied and skilful illustrations will pique curiosity or teach direct lessons of truth and beauty. The topics we have just enumerated give some intimation of the author's scope of treatment, but as we are prepared to advise parents, and especially teachers of drawing, to read this work for themselves, we will also mention the abundance of useful talk about right methods of education, in which the claims of science and language are fairly handled, about moral culture, and about the disastrous influence of Louis XIV. on French art. We can indulge ourselves in but a single quotation, from the sixth chapter (pp. 62, 63). It is M. Majorin who speaks:

"Pardon: a simple comparison, in my opinion, will convince you that drawing, taught as it should be, no more leads a child to become an artist than instruction in the French language leads him to become a poet. It is not my fault if drawing is generally taught as seeking for its end a devotion to art. To me drawing is simply a mode of recording observations by the aid of a language which engraves them on the mind, and permits one to utilize them whatever the career he follows. Allow me to give you an example. One would hardly suppose that drawing would be useful to a magistrate; and yet how many judgments would be established on more logical premises if, in civil suits concerning joint property, the division of inheritances, or the responsibilities of an architect or contractor, the judges could comprehend a plan. You should have heard certain lawyers plead for hours, and the public minister discuss these questions from the testimony of experts, whom lawyers and judges understand very imperfectly, to know to what degree the educated classes are ignorant of the language of drawing."

The phrase "public minister" reminds us that the translator is not quite at ease in her task. For another instance (p. 76 and passim) we think she should have dispensed altogether with the French word table (generally associated in our minds with a horizontal plane) in favor of "perspective plane" or "transparent plane." On pp. 151, 152 there is a fatal confusion caused by calling the same distance in the one case four metres, in another two. And we do not understand what is meant on p. 24 by "the perpendicular lowered a degree on a straight line." These last are blemishes easily removable in a second edition.

Mr. Kingston's 'Dick Cheveley' (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.) reeks with adventure. The hero's career will be followed with breathless interest by juvenile readers, who, however, we feel confident will experience no desire to emulate his example, as elders often timorously conceive. There is, too, considerable concession to the bounds of probability, and perhaps only an adult taste would under the circumstances demand greater variety. Doubtless there is a boy in every properly equipped household who can begin with enthusiasm the recital of a third starvation on a Pacific island after having gone through the experience in the ruined mill where Dick was placed by smugglers, and, later, the tortures in the hold of the ship where he was an involuntary stowaway. Some imaginativeness is required to accept the floating paradise which acts as a scoop-net to rescue the good characters that a cruel captain eliminates from his ship's company from time to time, leaving him finally with only the wicked ones, who fully deserve the wreck that awaits them.

Capt. C. W. Hall's 'Drifting Round the World: a Boy's Adventures by Sea and Land' (Boston: Lee & Shepard) opens with a sentence consisting of seventy-one words, divided only by commas. Those which immediately follow have a similar ponderosity, and the reader's first impressions are naturally unfavorable to the author. Nevertheless these quickly wear away as the story progresses, and if Capt. Hall had cast anchor after chapter viii. we should have little except praise for his entertaining and knowing narrative of adventure along the Atlantic coast from Cape Ann to Greenland. Chapters ix. and x., relating to Iceland, might also be admitted, but that would be the extent of our good nature. The book would then be less than half its present size (372 pages). As Great Britain is not left behind till p. 287, the remainder of the tour round the world is crowded into less than a hundred pages, which is simply preposterous. First impressions are accordingly revived and confirmed at the close. As Capt. Hall is rather free in citing poetry, we call his attention to the perversion of Coleridge on p. 185. The illustrations are a medley of good and indifferent woodcuts and subjects; none seem to have been expressly prepared for the text.

Capt. Hall devotes an entire chapter to the fate of the privateer known in the War of 1812 as the Young Teaser, and it certainly furnishes a good opportunity for the display of his descriptive powers. This incident is recorded in fourteen lines in Mr. Benson J. Lossing's 'Story of the United States Navy' (Harpers), which, though intended for boys, is as painstaking, orderly, and minute as if an adult audience were in view. There is no attempt at picturesqueness or fine writing, which, indeed, our youngsters can well forego. There are plenty of pictures of the sort Mr. Lossing likes to employ—genuine portraits, medals, trophies, monuments, famous ships and batteries—and not too many apocryphal views of naval combats. The peaceful achievements of the navy are not overlooked, and happily there are few shameful deeds to cover up. One seeks for Greytown in vain in the index; and as evidence of how deliberately Mr. Lossing avoids picking out and emphasizing dramatic situations, we can point to the omission of any reference to that stirring transaction in 1853 in the harbor of Smyrna, which gave the protection of the flag to Martin Koszta in the hold of an Austrian frigate.

Our nautical budget terminates with 'Stories of the Sea, told by Sailors,' edited by the Rev. Edward E. Hale—a book of better quality than his previous 'Stories of the War, told by Soldiers' (Roberts Bros.) It gives extracts from Navarrete and Hakluyt and Prescott and Southey and Basil Hall and sundry naval reports, interesting enough, surely, to send enterprising youth back to the "sources," which is Mr. Hale's main object, he says, in compiling the present series. We do not know, however, why he considers himself excused from paying much attention to the dates of the several borrowed narratives, and from punctiliousness in his extracts; or why he passes a translation which speaks (p. 28) of "a winter so fertile to showers"; or why he intimates that the original title-page of 'Robinson Crusoe' is the only source of information as to the location of Defoe's desert island, or denies such a resemblance between Selkirk's adventures and Crusoe's as to warrant ascribing the paternity of the latter to the former. It is probably careless proof-reading that gives us "in that matter" for "for that matter" on p. 9, just as we have "découverte" on p. 5 and, by a fine compensation, "Naufagés" twice on p. 291; "Ancôna," p. 13; "Sainte-Marie" and "Saint Michel," p. 23. And since there is some self-gratulation on the index, let us point out that Crusoe does not occur in it, nor, still more oddly, Captain Knowles, whose experience on Pitcairn Island forms one of the most considerable as well as interesting portions of this collection.

'Prince Darling's Story Book' (Routledge) has at least the merit of furnishing an instructive contrast to English pabulum for the young. It consists of four translations from the French, the first and much the longest being Édouard Ourliac's "History of Prince Coqueluche," a satire which can only be appreciated by grown people, and will, we fear, seem a little tedious to children. Alexandre Dumas's "Honey-Stew of the Countess Bertha" is a story of ghosts and kobolds, not too blood-curdling to be read after dark, and partakes of the quality of the genuine fairy-tale of all countries. Preference, however, will be given, we believe, to Paul de Musset's "Gaffer Wind and Dame Rain," which has more poetry and originality than all the rest, and includes a little drama for a puppet-theatre. But it is, while perfectly pure, curiously unmoral, and one hesitates to declare whether the lesson of it is the evil of gossip, or the duty of imprisoning one's benefactors. As Wind and Rain are incorporeal and irresponsible existences, whose malevolence and love of mischief are as prominent as their beneficence, perhaps their treatment will appear less unnatural than if they had been human beings. Charles Nodier's "Woodcutter's Dog" is the merest trifle. The illustrations are numerous and Frenchy.

'Feet and Wings' (Lippincott) is one more compilation of animal stories new and old, with pictures new and old, but generally excellent.

There seems to be no end to the uses to which 'Mother Goose' can be put. The first part of 'Routledge's Singing Quadrille and Children's Singing Lancers' is a classification of the rhymes according as they relate to "wanderers" (Little Bo-peep and Goosey, Goosey Gander), "thieves" (Queen of Hearts; Tom, Tom, the Piper's Son; and Simple Simon), "wonders of nature," "dancers," and "bites," all set to dance music; the second part embraces some of the same rhymes and a few others, and likewise consists of five numbers. Mrs. Staples furnishes the æsthetic illustrations, charming views of juvenile "society"; Mr. Corbould the best of the comic ones. There is a plentiful lack of humor in Mr. Longmuir's. "Simple Simon" is accommodated to Yankee Doodle; "Three Blind Mice" is sung as in the old round; "Baa, baa, Black Sheep" has also a familiar setting. We suspend judgment on those less known to us.

'Allie's Mistake,' by Rebecca Gibbons Beach (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons), is the ordinary good-natured Christmas story, with the usual moral relative to the special duties of the season. Now that a child's "Tell me a story" means "Tell me a new one," this will do as well as another of similarly neutral tint and wholesome tone. The author intends the picture of the old colored woman to be the main merit of the book, as may be seen by the introduction.

The Lovers of Provence: Aucassin and Nicolette. A MS. Song-Story of the twelfth century, rendered into modern French by Alexandre Bida. Translated into English verse and prose by A. Rodney Macdonough. Illustrated with engravings after designs by A. Bida, Mary Hallock Foote, W. H. Gibson, and F. Dielman. (New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert.)—This charming story, part prose, part verse, has long been known to scholars as one of the brightest gems of mediæval French literature. The original version was published early in the present century, and had been preceded by a modern French translation by M. de Sainte-Palaye, which he entitled 'Amours du bon vieux temps.' The circle of readers remained a small one until two years ago, when the eminent artist Bida published a second modern French version illustrated with nine etchings. This version Mr. Macdonough has had the happy thought to turn into English, and the publishers have reproduced the etchings of Bida and added seven designs by American artists. We have compared Mr. Macdonough's translation with the original Old-French version, and have found it usually very faithful and poetical. The story itself is a delightful picture of mediæval romance, pure in tone, and painted with a delicacy of stroke and vividness of coloring attained in few modern compositions. The make-up of the book is in harmony with its charming contents.

A Text-book of the Physiological Chemistry of the Animal Body. By Arthur Gamgee, M.D., F.R.S. Vol i. (London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880.)—English-speaking students of physiology are to be congratulated upon the appearance of this work, which for them will take the place that in the German curriculum is so well filled by the text-books of Kühne and of Hoppe-Seyler. Though Dr. Gamgee's main object is to present to English readers a succinct account of the recent advances in physiological chemistry, he has by no means performed his work in the spirit of a mere compiler. On the contrary, his own investigations and his personal experience in the laboratory enable him to make valuable additions to our knowledge in this department of science, and to pronounce a critical judgment upon the experimental methods which he describes. Neither does he confine himself rigorously to the consideration of the purely chemical problems relating to the tissues under discussion, but, where the better elucidation of the subject seems to require it, he makes interesting digressions into the domains of the allied sciences, anatomy, physiology, histology, etc. Nearly one-half of the present volume is devoted to the description of the blood, and more than one-third of the remainder is occupied by a discussion of the contractile tissues, these being the two directions in which physiological chemistry has perhaps made its most important advances. For the chapter on the contractile tissues, which contains a very interesting historical account of the various theories which have been held in regard to the source of muscular power, Dr. Gamgee expresses his indebtedness to his friend, Mr. John Priestley.

The author promises us, during the coming year, a second volume, in which the chemistry of the chief animal functions will be treated of. The whole work will then form a complete treatise on physiology as far as chemical phenomena are concerned.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1880.

The Week.

THE Philadelphia Press has fortified its report of Mr. Bayard's speech at Dover, Delaware, of which we spoke last week, by publishing the affidavit of a stenographer named Andem and the letters of thirteen reputable citizens of Delaware, testifying to the correctness of the report, and particularly that portion of it which makes Mr. Bayard charge Messrs. Conkling, Noah Davis, Arthur, Jayne, and Boutwell with having been present when $267,000 was extorted from Mr. Dodge, and with "having divided it among themselves." Andem's affidavit would probably not produce much impression; but the letters do undoubtedly seem weighty, and we notice that the defence of Every Evening, Mr. Bayard's Wilmington organ, against it is very feeble. It amounts to saying that these witnesses, having seen the report of the stenographer since the meeting, fancy they heard what the report contains. It seems as if Mr. Bayard might very well have said in the heat of oratory what the report makes him say; for, after all, in spite of the solemn card it has drawn out from Messrs. Davis, Conkling, Boutwell, and Arthur, in which they pronounce it "a truthless calumny," the charge was at worst simply inaccurate, and not baseless, as their language would lead one to suppose.

There was such a consultation as the report makes Mr. Bayard describe in his speech, but Mr. Dodge was not present at it, nor was Mr. Boutwell. But the others were. Judge Davis was there, and so were Messrs. Conkling, Jayne, and Arthur, and also Cornell and Laflin, all henchmen of Mr. Conkling's; and the business before them was the amount they could by a strict construction of the law extort from Mr. Dodge. To all this Judge Davis testified before the Committee. He also added that he told this little party that if the case went into court "no jury would believe that a real fraud existed." They nevertheless went on with their game and did extort $271,000 from the Dodges. This sum was not divided in the precise manner Mr. Bayard is alleged to have described, but his statement on this point is not "a truthless calumny." The District-Attorney, Mr. Bliss (Judge Davis having gone out of office, although he had offered to go halves with Bliss, got nothing), got $5,400; Mr. Arthur, the Collector, got $21,906 01. The Surveyor, Cornell, and the Naval Officer, Laflin, got each a similar amount, or $65,718 03 in all. Jayne got as much as the whole of them, which we omitted to mention last week, but had to share with the informer, so that out of the $271,000 extorted from Mr. Dodge this little band actually took $131,436, half of this going to Mr. Conkling's henchmen. That Mr. Arthur should have signed the card of indignant denial after having pocketed $21,906 01, is an extraordinary piece of assurance. Whether Mr. Conkling got anything is still uncertain; he has not denied it in the correspondence with Mr. Bayard. It was freely asserted before the Committee of Congress that he as well as Butler received a heavy counsel fee, but the Custom-house officials declined an invitation to appear before the Committee to testify on this point, which of itself looks ominous. They have made a great mistake now in attacking Mr. Bayard, because, even if they convict him of exaggeration or carelessness, they all, except Mr. Boutwell, do so at the cost of directing public attention once more to one of the worst scandals of their own career.

Mr. Pendleton, following up his initiative in the promotion of civil-service reform, has introduced in the Senate two bills, on the one hand providing for a regular system of examinations and promotions, on the other prohibiting official contributions for political purposes. The first measure makes the proper exemptions from the general requirement, establishes a Civil-Service Examination Board of five, to hold office during good behavior, and to prescribe the necessary regulations and superintend examinations; admits women equally with men to examinations, and, with a few natural exceptions, to appointments; directs the division of the country into five examination districts, and empowers the Board to regulate suspension and dismissal for misconduct or inefficiency. This bill, except as regards fixity of tenure, seems to be well conceived, if the Board be liberally endowed with assistance and pecuniary support. The second bill invites more opposition, because it lays down rules at once contrary to our political practice for many years and not easily enforceable. It may be right to forbid "any officer, clerk, or employé of the Government" to contribute to any political fund, or to forbid him to pay any assessment or percentage of his salary for such a purpose, and to prohibit his solicitation; but these acts, for which a penalty is provided, are not equally controllable. The attempt, too, to punish Government contractors for giving "money, property, or other valuable thing" towards a political object, must be deemed of doubtful expediency; and too vague is the clause answering to the President's executive order against officeholders taking part in primaries and conventions—"intermeddling except by vote or individual speech," Mr. Pendleton calls it. However, the main thing is to get a definite proposition of reform before our legislators. Debate will reveal not only the imperfections of "this particular measure," but also the sincerity of those who take part in it.

In the House, Mr. Willis, of Kentucky, offered a civil-service bill corresponding to Mr. Pendleton's, but explicit as to fixity of tenure. The House has passed the Pensions, and Fortifications, and Military Academy Appropriation Bills. The main interest of the Congressional session has pertained to the discussion in the Senate and final passage of the so-called Burnside Educational Fund Bill. This measure inscribes the net annual proceeds of the public lands and of the Patent Office as a credit on the books of the Treasury, and allows four per cent. interest to be distributed to the States in the ratio of illiteracy, for application two-thirds to common-school instruction and one-third to the income of the agricultural colleges, which the States are authorized to open to women for special instruction. Singularly enough, the general Constitutional objections were urged almost exclusively by Northern men. Senators from the Gulf States saw no difficulty whatever; and in fact the Constitutional warrant for disposing of the public lands seems unequivocal. But, as Mr. Allison pointed out, it is only by a convenient fiction that the two sources of the fund are said to be lands and patents: the proceeds are paid into the Treasury, and merely furnish a basis for calculating the interest at four per cent. This gave occasion to Mr. Blaine to twit the strict constructionists on the surrender of their old stiffness. A special objection of this sort was, however, pressed more forcibly, and with the support of many Southern as well as Northern men. The States, in order to get their share, must make detailed reports, showing their school systems and school terms and attendance, and other necessary statistics proving their good faith in the employment of the money received. These reports are to be made to the Commissioner of Education, and if he finds them imperfect he can refuse his endorsement of the warrant, and the quota be withheld till the next Congress passes upon the case. This seemed like an attack on State dignity, instead of a reasonable condition of a gift, and was all the more resented because the Commissioner is a "subordinate officer." But nobody remarked on the stability which this act will give to the Bureau of Education, hitherto as much of an accident and having as precarious an existence as the Department of Agriculture.

The most dangerous attack on the bill came, oddly enough, from the Republican Northwest—from Colorado, Nebraska, and Iowa; and, finding a large Southern adherence, nearly swamped it, a tie vote alone saving it as it came from the Committee. It was shown that $40,000 (the estimated income from the fund during the first year) would go but a very little way towards helping the struggling States, and it was proposed that the principal should be bestowed outright as an annual appropriation. Of course it was easy to show, on the other hand, that this too would be paltry in its effect, and Mr. Morrill, Mr. Hoar, and others made no secret of their desire that the act should mark an epoch in the national policy, and should be the beginning of a national oversight of the intelligence of the voters of the republic. And here a new use was found for the hitherto superserviceable clause of the Constitution guaranteeing a republican form of government. It was refreshing to hear a Southern Senator, and he ex-Gov. Brown of Georgia, cite this clause as bearing on the case in hand, and declare that as "this Government cannot be perpetuated as a republic without the education of the whole mass of the people," to appropriate money for this purpose "would be a better mode of guaranteeing a republican form of government than to undertake to make a guarantee by the use of the Army and the sword." Mr. Blair, of New Hampshire, took up the parable, saying, "It seems to be conceded all over the Chamber that a republican form of government cannot exist excepting as it is based upon the intelligence and virtue of its citizens"—in the nation no more than in the several States. But neither perceived that the logical outcome of this argument is that we ought to begin at once to restrict our suffrage to the intelligent and virtuous.

The annual addition to the educational fund depends for its amount on one notoriously diminishing factor—the public territory, and on the prosperity of the Patent Office considered as a money-making branch of the Government. Much feeling was manifested in favor of not allowing the Office to have a surplus, by putting down fees. That the surplus might well be used not in stimulating the taking out of patents, but in raising the salaries of the administration, so that useless, invalid, and blackmailing patents should be discouraged and excluded, and the best expert talent be retained within the Office, was overlooked by all save perhaps one speaker.

The foreign specie arrivals were again very large during the week, having exceeded in value five millions of dollars, and the foreign exchange market, although strong in the latter part of the week, closed at rates which warrant further imports. The money market was very tight during the early part of the week, but in the latter part was easier, and the full rate was then only 6 per cent. per annum. Suspicions of "locking up" were current when the market was so close, and these were well founded to the extent that about $6,000,000 were gathered into one of the banks by Jay Gould, who used the money before the week closed to pay for the controlling interest which he had bought in two of the Southwestern railroads, the St. Louis & Iron Mountain and the International & Great Northern, necessary to complete his control of the railroad system of the Southwest. The Treasury has adhered to its policy of holding surplus revenues for the redemption of the sixes of 1880, which fall due at the close of the year, except where holders of these bonds were willing to accept less than the full price at maturity for them (103). Neither has the January interest been prepaid without rebate, as in former years. The inference from this course of the Treasury is, that the Secretary had no objection to the New York money market being stringent, for the influence which it might have on legislation respecting refunding; he favors a refunding bond which shall bear a higher rate of interest than 3 per cent., the rate that the House of Representatives adheres to. The banks and private bankers here who expect to be concerned in the refunding operations of the Treasury have also had an interest in showing to Congress that a 3 per cent. refunding bond would be impracticable, and this could be done in no way so well as by keeping up the rates for money at this time. But aside from these considerations there have been excellent reasons for an active money market, the chief of which are the enormous volume of mercantile exchanges, the employment of money in remote places in railroad building, and the rampant speculation at the Stock Exchange, where the prices of dividend-paying stocks have been run up to unheard-of figures, on the theory that all investments will, as the result of lowering the interest rate on United States bonds, rule at prices which will yield the buyer a possible 5 per cent., but no more than a sure 4 per cent. annual income. In this speculative movement the enormous and unprecedentedly profitable traffic of the leading railroads has been a great aid. It is now very doubtful whether Congress will perfect any refunding legislation before the middle or latter part of January.

A correspondent and two or three esteemed contemporaries have called our attention to a blunder of which we were apparently guilty in saying a fortnight ago that if we made the silver dollar more valuable than the gold dollar, our gold "would take flight to countries in which gold only is a legal tender, and all the spare silver of the earth would be sent here." This, they say, is in direct conflict with the well-known law that the cheaper currency stays at home and the dearer goes abroad. It does, if there is any place for it to go to. The peculiarity of the present situation is, however, that there is practically no market for silver as money in any leading European country. You cannot get it coined in any country of the Latin Union, nor in Germany, and in England you cannot make it a legal tender for over eight dollars. The present price of the metal in London is based mainly on the demand for it for use in the arts and the settlement of Indian and Chinese balances. If we offered to coin it without limit, and use more of it in making a dollar than we now do, we should open up the best and, in fact, the only good market for it now existing. It would be the interest of every one in Europe having remittances to make to America to make them in silver, and, in fact, the stored-up and useless silver hoards of Europe would be let loose upon us. "Gresham's law" supposes perfect freedom of trade and coinage. The existing legislation of most European countries with regard to silver was in fact intended to prevent this law from operating, and it does prevent it. A striking illustration of this is furnished in the fate of the trade dollar. It is worth considerably more than the home dollar, and yet nobody likes to receive it.

M. de Lesseps is satisfied that he has got the money for his canal. He says that subscriptions have flowed in to him from every country in Europe, and that "the founders'" $1,000 shares have gone up to $8,000, as we understand it, in England. Of the Isthmus of Panama he has a still higher opinion than he had of the Isthmus of Suez, and considers it one of the healthiest countries in the world, and words failed him when he came to talk of its productiveness after it has been drained and irrigated by the canal. He expects to open the canal to trade in 1887, and is altogether so cheerful and buoyant that it is a thousand pities that he is not twenty years younger.

The sudden withdrawal of Mr. Foster from competition for the Ohio senatorship, just as his success was beginning to seem certain, is ascribed, both in Washington and Ohio, openly and with confidence, to Mr. Garfield's influence at the last moment. If so, it seems probable that it has been due to a desire on his part to avoid conflict with the Conklingites, to whom Mr. Sherman is especially obnoxious and who wish to get their Custom-house back again, which would not have been possible if Mr. Sherman had remained at the head of the Treasury. We foreshadowed something of this kind a fortnight ago, and if our conjecture be correct, it is rather an unfortunate beginning. Of course Mr. Foster's retirement makes Mr. Sherman's election certain, and places the Treasury at Mr. Garfield's disposal. The chances are that he will give it to a Western man, and for a reason which has a good deal of force—viz., that in the present state of the Western mind about finance any Eastern man would be accused of being an agent or tool of the "money kings" and "gold bugs" of New York and Europe.

The Supreme Court of Missouri has rendered a decision with regard to the production of telegraph messages in court which will commend itself not only to telegraph companies but to the community at large. A St. Louis Grand Jury ordered the local manager of the Western Union Company to produce any despatches that there might be in his office between certain persons (naming them) within the past fifteen months. The manager admitted that there were such messages in his custody, but declined to produce them, under the rules of the company. These facts were reported to the judge of the Criminal Court by the Grand Jury, and the manager was committed for contempt. He brought the matter before the Supreme Court by habeas corpus. That court has now decided, following the general course of judicial decision in this country, that telegraph messages are not privileged communications, and that the company cannot refuse to produce them; but that their production is governed by the same rules that apply to all written documents—they must be described, not in general terms, but with such accuracy as to identify them precisely. That is, neither the State nor any private individual can say to a company: We have a lawsuit or a criminal prosecution going on here, and in order to find out whether there is any evidence on the subject which would be of use to us we will now proceed to overhaul all the messages in your custody which passed between such and such persons within such and such years. What must be done is first to ascertain what messages are needed, and then call for just those messages and no others. This may in some cases be difficult to do, but it is a difficulty attended with far less danger to public and private interests than the right of such a body as a grand jury to overhaul everybody's private correspondence for the purpose of finding out whether he has done something contrary to law.

A New Orleans correspondent of the Times has furnished that paper with an account of an interview with General Grant in that city last spring on Fitz-John Porter's case. He had no personal knowledge of the operations on which the charge against Fitz-John Porter was based, and is therefore no more an authority on them than on any other operations of which he has heard or read. It was, therefore, more than unjust to say or insinuate that Porter had offered no new evidence to the Court of Enquiry except that of rebel officers. He offered what was much more important, accurate surveys of the battle-field. Moreover, Porter's defence, that he did not attack because he thought he would be whipped, is not absurd or worthless, as General Grant suggests, because Porter, as a corps commander, had, in the absence of his superior officer, discretion as to carrying out his orders, a fact which General McDowell was compelled reluctantly to admit in his evidence before the Board. When an officer has discretion as to whether he shall attack, and refuses to attack because he thinks he will be beaten, and all subsequent investigation shows that he was right, he ought surely not on this account to be killed, robbed, or abused. General Grant has expressed public admiration of so many worthless characters that his attack on Porter would under ordinary circumstances be of little consequence; but just now, when Porter is dependent on Congress for the reparation to which the Advisory Board has declared him entitled, it is decidedly an abuse of General Grant's influence to publish it. The Times lends its weight to it, but then the Times calls Mr. Martin I. Townsend "a trustworthy observer," and says he saw "nearly everything" in the Whittaker case at West Point "from an impartial standpoint." Probably no one will enjoy this more than Mr. Townsend himself, for though not strictly speaking a humorous man, he must hold his sides when he hears himself described as a judicial-minded man.

Dr. Talmage will probably be brought before the Presbytery once more, this time on a charge of perjury. At his last trial he swore that when he suddenly left the editorship of the Christian at Work, after surreptitiously publishing in its columns in the night, without the knowledge and in the absence of the proprietors, a valedictory address to the subscribers announcing his transfer to the Advance, it was an unpremeditated step, taken on discovering that the paper had been sold without consulting him. A written contract with the proprietors of the Advance has, however, now been produced, which he had executed days previously. The existence of this he denied in his examination on the trial, but it appears to have been known to at least one leading member of his congregation, who, nevertheless, continued to "sit under him" and support him. Dr. Field, of the Evangelist, owes it to his readers now, it seems to us, to confess that he was mistaken in holding that "the brooding influences of the Spirit" would have been "driven away" by prosecuting Talmage to conviction in the former investigation. Enough, and more than enough, was then produced to show that he was a highly unsafe person for any religious denomination to continue to be responsible for. The support he continued to receive from his congregation counted for nothing. Preachers of his class appear to draw congregations about them, by some mysterious law of sympathy, who can bear any strain on their moral sense the minister's conduct may impose, as long as he furnishes the usual Sunday's entertainment.

The Cape colonists of South Africa have brought on themselves another war with the natives, and the victims are the Kaffre tribe of Basutos. Impartial officers in the colony say it was wholly unprovoked and in England we are assured that very few people could be found to justify it. The Colony legislature has passed a vagrant law—in Africa of all places—the sole object of which is said to be to force the colored population to work for the colonists at low wages. To secure laborers for the diamond fields every man on returning home was allowed to take a gun with him as a reward, and hundreds of thousands of guns have been sold to the natives of late years. It is now proposed to take these guns away from them, beginning with the Basutos. The colonists also undertake to throw open the land of the Basutos to settlers. Sir Garnet Wolseley last March remonstrated earnestly, in opposition to Sir Bartle Frere and Mr. Spriggs, the colonial minister, against the demand that the Basutos and "other quiet and orderly" native tribes, "the finest race in South Africa, now loyal and contented," who had so "cheerfully assisted us in the Zulu war," should be compelled to deliver up their fire-arms. He denounced the policy pursued towards them as "fraught with danger to the peace of the colonists," and calculated to "array against us the native sentiment of every South African tribe from the Zambesi to Cape Agulhas." Lord Kimberley, the Colonial Secretary of State, also deprecated the measures, and agrees as to the character of the tribe, and says they have already made considerable progress in the arts of peace. Notwithstanding these remonstrances the attempted disarmament goes on, several fights have already occurred, and although the colonial forces only have so far been engaged—9,000 to 11,000 have been called out—there is a great prospect of the war extending, and taxing the resources of the Imperial Government to suppress it. The Basutos occupy a tract about one hundred and fifty miles long by eighty broad, watered by the upper streams of the Orange and Calderon rivers. The north part of the country is very mountainous, and on the east they have the impassable range of the Drakensberg mountains. The population of the Basutos alone in 1875 was 127,701. So far the war has been wholly defensive.

Earl Grey, in the Nineteenth Century for December, argues for withdrawing the form of government forced upon the Colony some years ago, of legislative autonomy and ministerial responsibility, in favor of the former mode of government, so that the direct power of the Crown may be restored. He compares the effect of the present mode of administering the Colony to the condition of New Zealand, when similar measures were first taken there and the government was handed over to the settlers. A war broke out which required the forces of the home Government, with 10,000 men and the resources of the navy, to subdue, and two-thirds of the Maori, or 80,000 men, were slaughtered or perished in the war. The settlers were able to govern the colony alone only when the number of the Maori had been reduced by these barbarities to 40,000. It should be added, however, that there had been a serious war with the natives in former years before a "responsible government" had been established in the Colony.

The Basuto war has assumed such proportions that the Boers of the Transvaal, who were so summarily annexed just before the Zulu outbreak, have taken upon themselves to revolt and declare their independence, and five thousand of the eight thousand white men in the province are in arms in support of the declaration. The Colonial Government finds the Basutos alone more than it can well manage, and is now at its wits' end, and is telegraphing frantically to London for the aid of British troops. This seems the climax of the troubles created by Sir Bartle Frere. He provoked the Zulus by taking the side of the Boers against them in the assertion of a morally indefensible claim, which he justified by quotations from the Old Testament. He then proceeded to swallow up the Boers with their booty and abolished their republic, and they were prevented from resisting by the large military force which the Zulu war had brought to the Cape. Now they seem to have the game in their own hands, and the home Government will probably be forced to send out heavy reinforcements and to incur expenses which will play sad havoc with Mr. Gladstone's budget. That the Cape troubles will encourage the Land-Leaguers there is no doubt, but it must also be said that they will probably do much to make the Whig wing of the Liberals more tractable in dealing with the Irish land question.

SOMETHING MORE ABOUT THE "ARISTOCRACY OF OFFICE-HOLDERS."

WE have waited a fortnight to see whether there would be any response to our enquiry whether the experience of the American people during the period between the adoption of the Constitution and General Jackson's first administration—over forty years in all—furnished any good reason for fearing that a recurrence to tenure during good behavior in the civil service would result in the creation of a haughty "aristocracy of office-holders." We offered to publish any evidence on this point which any of our readers would be good enough to forward, and we pointed out that if any such evidence existed, it must be within easy reach, as the period at which tenure during good behavior ceased was not very remote. We have received no answer to this enquiry by letter, and we have not found any in any of our exchanges. We therefore feel warranted in concluding that no such evidence exists, and in repeating that during the first half-century of the republic the tenure during good behavior in the subordinate offices was tried without raising or suggesting the "aristocratic" objection; that nobody complained or thought of complaining of it on that score; that the introduction of the present system of appointment and tenure had nothing to do with the manners of the office-holders, or with their mode of regarding their office or of carrying themselves towards the public. We asked, too, when we last touched on this subject, whether the present system had been resorted to with the view of making office-holders polite and impressing them with a sense of their dependence on the people, and of the necessity of ingratiating themselves with the public by a proper discharge of their duties. Nobody has ventured to answer this question affirmatively. Even if the old system of permanence failed to keep the office-holder in his proper place, nobody ventures to assert that the present system has cured this defect, or was resorted to for any such purpose. We drew attention at the same time to several features of the present system which were well calculated to make, and did in practice make, the office-holder indifferent to public opinion, and prevent his considering efficiency and fidelity the chief condition of his tenure. In brief, either the old system, when in force, did not possess the defects which we are now told it would possess if tried again; or, if it did possess them, the present system not only does nothing whatever to remedy them, but was not intended to remedy them.

We shall not, however, consider the discussion closed. We still offer space in our columns to any one who can produce illustrations from American history of the effect of tenure during good behavior in producing an official aristocracy. For instance, there are in all the great departments of the Government a certain number of officials, some of whom, like the late Mr. Clinch of this Custom-house, have come down to us from the old régime, who are practically sure of their places under every Administration because their experience is absolutely necessary to keep the administrative machine from going to pieces. They know that no head of a department will venture to turn them out. Occasionally, in discussions with civil-service reformers, politicians so far forget themselves as to point to these men as proofs that the present civil service is not so bad as the reformers paint it, whereas on their own theory of proper civil-service organization in a democratic country the presence of these men in the service is a gross abuse. However, there they are, and they may help to throw some light on the point under debate. What is the effect of prolonged tenure of office, and of the knowledge that they are in no danger of removal as long as they discharge their duties properly, on this class of officers? Are they haughty and overbearing? Do they show, either by their demeanor towards their fellow-citizens or by their manner of discharging the duties of their office, that they look on the office as their property? Are they distinguishable in any way, either by their behavior or mode of life, from other persons in the community of similar means and pursuits? These questions must be easy to answer. Negative answers, we admit, would not close the case, but they would furnish very useful suggestions about it. The late Mr. Clinch, for instance, was the indispensable man of the New York Custom-house for forty years. For more than half that period he was the real collector who kept the machine in working order, while the sham or political collector was running about "reorganizing the party," "controlling the primaries," and managing the conventions. When "Tom" Murphy, the friend and companion whom General Grant put into the office in 1870, was examined on one occasion by a committee of Congress touching the duties of his place, and was asked what he would do under such and such circumstances, or how he would decide this or that point of Custom-house procedure, he answered promptly that he "would go to Clinch" or "ask Clinch." Now, the knowledge of his own indispensableness, and the sense of permanence which it gave him, must, if there be any truth in the objection to permanence which we are discussing, have sensibly affected Mr. Clinch's manners, and made him a very disagreeable person to do business with. But, as a matter of fact, did they do so? Thousands of merchants and brokers must have come in contact with him during his long career and have had some reason to complain of him. Did any one ever complain of him as "haughty" through a sense of property in his office? Were his bearing and manners in any way different from those of a painstaking, conscientious business man in any calling? Was it not on the whole much pleasanter to do business with him than with the outer crowd of officers whose tenure was precarious, and dependent either on their political activity or on their Senator's not wanting their places for more serviceable men?

We are not, however, going to rely on American experience alone for our answer to the objection we are now discussing, and we do not deny that foreign experience seems to give some color to it. Government service, we may admit, has in most old countries and in all modern times had the effect in a greater or less degree of giving the members of it a certain sense of social elevation and of authority which showed itself in their demeanor towards their fellow-citizens. But it is safe to assert that wherever this has existed it has been the result of something which has no sort of connection either with the mode of appointment to office or with the tenure—viz., the existence of classes in the social organization. The government official in Germany or in England gives himself airs and thinks himself an aristocrat because, as a matter of fact, his superiors are aristocrats, and the government is administered in all its higher branches by an aristocracy. It is impossible for a "servant of the Crown" to avoid arrogating to himself more or less of the Crown's dignity and authority. In any country in which politics is largely managed by an aristocracy the civil as well as the military service, whether the terms be long or short, will be permeated by the aristocratic spirit. In all aristocratic countries a great deal of the comfort of life is derived from the reflection that one has "inferiors"; the nobleman rejoices in his superiority to the commoner, the gentleman to the man in trade, the barrister to the attorney, the merchant to the shopkeeper. It would be impossible for any system of appointment or tenure of office to cut off government officers, any more than any other class of the community, from this source of happiness. The social position the place gives them is, in fact, one of the rewards of their services, and they would be more than human if they did not show that they appreciated it. But the official shows his sense of his own importance no more than, and, indeed, not so much as, any other man who has an assured income and considers his position "gentlemanly." In other words, the manners of the public servants are moulded by precisely the same influences as the manners of persons in all other callings. The manners of the government clerk very much resemble those of the successful barrister's clerk or the clerk in the great banking-house; they are neither better nor worse. If the English and German officials were all appointed and held under the spoils system, and had their "heads cut off" every time there was a change in the ministry or a new man got the king's ear, there is every reason to believe that they would be vastly more insolent than they are now, as they would share in the excitement of the political strife, and in the pride of victory and contempt for the vanquished which are so marked a feature in official life here, and would rapidly fall into the habit, which is so strong among our officeholders, of treating all criticism simply as a weapon in the hands of some one who wants to get their places for somebody else, and not as a help to the discovery and cure of defects or abuses.

In this country the traditions of the Government are thoroughly democratic; the social organization is democratic; the popular view of the social value of all occupations is democratic. There is little or no conventional dignity or value attached to any employment or occupation—not enough, indeed, to some, such as the judicial function. The origin of authority, instead of being veiled by antiquity and tradition and immemorial custom from the popular gaze, is so well known that nearly every man looks on himself as the source of legal power. Nowhere else does the sovereignty present itself in such naked and unadorned simplicity to those who have to live under it. Nowhere is so little importance attached to permanence either in office or anything else, and the Jack-of-All-Trades and the Rolling-Stone treated with so much indulgence or consideration. Nowhere, too, is the taking on of airs, or the wearing of "too many frills," as it is popularly called, or the assumption of any outward appearance of dignity or superiority, so closely watched for and sternly repressed both by ridicule and revolt. The result is that plainness and even humility of demeanor and language have actually become a fashion of the country, not among politicians only but among men of all classes. If there be one thing more than another which distinguishes an American of any calling or position from men of other countries, it is the pains he takes to show that he does not consider himself any better than anybody else. In fact, all the forces of American society, moral, mental, and material, seem to work not only against the creation of any outward sign of inequality but against the growth of any feeling of superiority among men of any class or condition; and the further west we go the more distinctly does this appear. That the hundred thousand office-holders of the Federal Government, most of them living on salaries so small as to make the acceptance of them as a permanent provision almost an admission of failure in life, would, if secured in their places on condition that they gave their whole mind to their duties, rise up against the influences which dominate the rest of the community, lay aside the kindly and unpretending and unassuming manners which now may be said to run in the American blood, and put on the hard, haughty, and overbearing demeanor of Prussian bureaucrats, is surely a strange supposition. It is so strange that its existence may be cited as a very striking illustration of the small degree to which the public has as yet bestowed any thought on the most serious question of American politics to-day—viz., the best mode of keeping the Government under the control of popular opinion without deranging or obstructing the administrative machinery by which the national business is transacted.

THE GENESIS OF "BOYCOTTING."

THE "boycotting" of another Irish landlord, Mr. Bence Jones, an Englishman resident near Cork, shows that the success of the process in the case of Mr. Boycott has really put a powerful weapon into the hands of the Land League, and one with which the Government will find it very difficult, if not impossible, to deal. The process is a very simple one. Under secret orders or warnings, issued, we presume, by the local committee, the obnoxious person is put under a ban. His servants and laborers refuse to work for him; the shopkeepers to sell to him or to buy from him; the livery-stable keepers to transport him; the blacksmiths to shoe his horses; and he is lucky if his cattle are not maimed or driven off his land in the night. In order still further to shake his nerves, threatening and abusive letters are written to him, and if these fail to produce any effect on him, they are sure to do so on his family. Of course, under these circumstances life in a country house becomes intolerable. The police can protect against armed violence, but they cannot enable a man to farm his own land, dispose of his produce, and perform the thousand necessary offices of a great house; nor can they enable even the strongest spirit to disregard the manifest hatred of all his neighbors. Mr. Boycott was enabled to gather in his crops by the aid of a band of Protestant volunteers, but they had to be escorted by so large a force of troops that the saving of $2,500 worth of corn and potatoes cost the Government about $50,000. Of course, the relation of the value of the crops to the cost of gathering them is of no consequence, inasmuch as what the Government spent the money for was the enforcement of the law, and not the saving of so much farm produce. Mr. Boycott's case excited deep sympathy in England, and a refusal on the part of Mr. Gladstone to compensate him for his losses has brought some odium on the Government; but that Mr. Gladstone was wise in refusing to establish a precedent of this kind the extension of the practice of "boycotting" shows. Mr. Bence Jones is now in Mr. Boycott's position, but is apparently disposed to fight it out, and writes to the London Times that he has hired armed retainers to come from a distance and garrison his house. This may save his property, but it cannot make life tolerable for an elderly man with a family, and, in spite of his brave resistance, we shall probably hear before long of his abandoning the field, and of other landlords being subjected to the persecutions against which he is contending.

Such occurrences, even in a land of troubles like Ireland, in our day would be enough to warrant a very dark view of western civilization, if one did not call in the aid of a little history, and not very remote history either. The confiscations and settlements in Ireland which followed the revolutions of 1640 and 1688 left the Irish landlords of the dominant creed and race not simply lords of the soil, with titles not acknowledged by the natives, but absolute masters of the tillers of the soil. That is to say, there being no mode of livelihood but agriculture open to the peasant, he was glad to get a farm at any rent, and he undertook to pay any rent demanded, without exacting any of the covenants on the side of the landlord which are customary in England. Holding as a tenant at will, he was really, in spite of the existence of the courts, governed by the landlord or his agent, and has been so down to our day, and the landlord or his agent either hated or despised him. He is and has been subjected to "rules" of all kinds controlling his mode of life, his family relations, his way of tilling and fencing his land, and so on—many of them salutary, no doubt, but all arbitrary, and often, owing to the manner of enforcement, galling, and even exasperating. A well-known story has been going the round of the English papers lately—and it is authenticated by judicial enquiry—of a boy's perishing in the cold because his grandfather was prevented by the "rules of the office" from sheltering him under his own roof. Mr. Tuke, in his pamphlet, tells of the late Lord Leitrim's having ordered a good house, built by a tenant at his own cost, to be pulled down because his permission had not been obtained, and the poor man was sent back to the wretched cabin he had previously occupied. There is another story of the same landlord, and equally well authenticated, which describes him as having ordered the destruction of additions which a tenant had, in building a house, made to a plan which the landlord had seen and approved of, although there was no objection to them except that permission for them had not been given. Power of this sort is good for no man or body of men, and giving it a fine name, such as "the exercise of the rights of property," does not make it so. No one can long keep bodies of his fellow-men under the sic volo, sic jubeo rule without abusing his authority in a thousand ways. The Irish landlords will, everything considered, compare well with any body of landed gentry in all the manlier arts. They have furnished British politics and the British military and civil service, ever since the Union, with more than their share of both able and illustrious men. But their power over their tenantry has been a curse to them as regards both character and fortune. Its continuance down to our day has been made possible simply by the fact that, for various reasons too numerous to mention here, there has been outside of one or two cities no such thing as a public opinion in Ireland to check or punish acts of oppression. In a country district nobody stands between the peasant and the landlord but the priest, who is little better than the peasant in education or manners. Accordingly for two hundred years the sole restraint on excesses has been assassination and "outrages." It seems horrible and sounds almost incredible, but it is strictly true, that no improvement in the condition of the Irish Catholic had taken place since 1700 until he had made his discontent manifest by "Whiteboyism," "Molly Maguireism," assassination of landlords and bailiffs, house-burning and cattle-houghing. He kept up this pleasing form of agitation seventy years before he obtained ordinary civil rights. He again tried it successfully in order to get rid of the tithes in 1832, and once more, in 1867, it brought him the disestablishment of the Church, and in 1870 the Land Act. The chances are that it is now going to bring him "the three f's."

"Boycotting" is but the latest and by far the mildest form of Irish agitation. It is a wild and barbarous mode of expressing the reprobation which, in more civilized communities, would find vent in the press and through the social influence of a well-to-do industrial middle class. Mr. Bence Jones, for instance, is really the victim of a display of contempt for his neighbors and dependents which he certainly would not have ventured upon either in England or in this country, and which in both would be punished by some sort of social ostracism. He is an Englishman, and apparently an energetic landlord, and, according to the contract view of land tenure, probably a very good one. He has striven to make the tenantry comfortable and prosperous in his way—that is, by well-meaning, arbitrary rule—and in India or in Ceylon would probably have been a highly successful administrator. Being dissatisfied with the result, however, he took to writing articles in the London magazines, holding not his own tenantry only but the whole Irish peasantry up to odium as barbarous, dirty, lazy, and knavish; a view which Englishmen abroad, let us say, are only too apt to take of a population whose ways they do not like. Fifty years ago these articles would never have been heard of by his humble neighbors, or, if they did hear of them, they would not have minded them, or have treated the publication of them as a gentleman's prerogative. But the times have changed. The magazines go everywhere. The classes who sit down under abuse and insult have vanished from Europe and America. Mr. Bence Jones finds that, however much he may be dissatisfied with the outcome of his venture in Irish land, however unpleasant and unworthy his poor neighbors may be, they will not, as Lord Thurlow's servant said, submit to "be damned by him." Accordingly, in one short week, civilization seems to vanish from around him, and he finds himself besieged in a fortified house, like a New England settler in the seventeenth century. We may well ask, however, whether he would have fared much better anywhere? If Mr. Wadsworth were to contribute politico-economical articles to an English magazine describing the farmers in the Genesee Valley as a pack of knaves and tricksters who would not listen to his advice, how long would he be able to live among them? Captain Boycott does not appear to have rushed into print, but his government of the tenants of Lord Erne, whose agent he was, and of the laborers seems to have been full of hard, unrelenting, minute, meddlesome interference and penality, which, whatever its merits, is exposed to the fatal objection that not even semi-civilized people will now submit to it. In short, the fundamental defect of the Irish land tenure is that it places the great bulk of the population, owing to their absolute dependence on the land, under the arbitrary government of a small class of their fellow-citizens who are held by neither law nor custom to any responsibility. This state of things once existed all over Europe, but in a milder form; for the feudal system, which lasted in Germany, Russia, and Hungary down to our own day, although it exposed the serf to terrible oppression, did not permit his total expulsion from the land like a wild animal, which is what takes place in an Irish eviction. In all these countries, however, arbitrary government by country gentlemen was found fatal to social progress or order, and has been abolished.

THE ANTI-JEWISH MANIA IN GERMANY.

BERLIN, December 5, 1880.

IN former centuries the brutality and barbarism consequent upon wars manifested themselves in all kinds of crimes against property and the person, in rowdyism and theft, in highway robbery and murder. It seemed as if long bloodshed and idleness, of which they were daily witnesses, rendered the soldiers demi-savages, and as if whole classes of society suddenly thrown out of their ordinary course of life were unable to regain their centre of gravity. After the conclusion of peace thousands of soldiers returning home had lost their taste for civil pursuits and drew others into their reckless path, so that it was no mere accident that the criminal courts were never so busy as after a great war and that the prisons were never more crowded.

In our times, boasting of their higher civilization, the outward appearance of things has somewhat changed for the better, but in reality the effects of our late wars are nearly the same. The poorer classes have forgotten their duty towards society and boisterously claim their rights. The greater part of the well-to-do classes want to make money without exerting themselves, by speculating at the exchange or in public stocks, and our so-called best class is the worst of all in attacking the working and self-reliant independence of the citizen which forms the basis of modern society. We in Germany have at present even fallen back into that spirit of intolerance and persecution which attacks the rights and position of the Jews. This movement is instigated and upheld by Protestant clergymen and ultra-Conservatives, and, spreading like wild-fire all over the country, threatens to make all Germany a by-word for narrow-mindedness and bigotry. The leaders and supporters of this shameful movement are the literary small-fry, headed by a professor of the Berlin University, Heinrich von Treitschke, an able pamphleteer and a gentleman of otherwise irreproachable character, and by a Protestant clergyman, a Mr. Stöcker, a vulgar fellow, court-preacher at the Berlin cathedral, and a man of great influence on the lowest classes of society. He has much impudence and brass, and the talent of a street demagogue like Denis Kearney. While Treitschke has confined himself to the literary propaganda, to students and so-called educated people, Stöcker holds meetings in low pot-houses, and incites the mob of the city. The reverend gentleman and his friends are at present peddling all over Germany a petition to Prince Bismarck asking him—

1. To cut off, if not entirely to prevent, the immigration of foreign Jews from eastern Europe (especially Poland and Russia).

2. To exclude the Jews from, or at least limit their number in, the offices pertaining to the judiciary.

3. Strictly to preserve the character of the Christian public school.

4. To order the taking again of statistics on the Jewish population.

An address accompanying this petition depicts in the gloomiest colors the thraldom of the German Christians under the Jewish rule; the whole German people is represented as suffering under the dominion of the most overbearing intruder, while in fact out of forty-five millions of Germans not more than half a million form the Jewish population. It would be disgusting to enter into the refutation of this modern attack directed against a race which always has been and is well deserving of this country, which has fought its battles, has placed its talents at the disposal of Germany, and has contributed more than its due share to the prosperity of the nation. Let me only state that the official authorities of the smallest towns and cities, the boys in college and the students in the universities, are called on for their co-operation, and that Christian clergymen, the ministers of brotherly love and good-will among the people, abuse the pulpit to make propaganda for their nefarious schemes. To stop the current of false accusation, about eighty prominent gentlemen of this city, the mayor and president of the Board of Aldermen (a highly respectable body, not to be confounded with its New York namesake), ministers of state, bankers, scholars, and members of the Prussian Diet and of the Reichstag, have signed and circulated a noble and dignified protest against the so-called anti-Semites, which has had a very good effect, and which has been imitated in the provinces. Deputy Hänel, in an interpellation made in the Diet, has asked the Government what position it held toward the anti-Jewish demands, which look to the abolition of the full and equal rights of Jewish citizens. Bismarck's substitute, Count Stollberg, answered that the petition in question had not yet been sent in to the Chancellor, and that the Government had accordingly not yet been able to take it into consideration, but he added at the same time that the Government did not intend to change in the least the existing laws which give equal political rights to all confessions.

The debates which followed this interpellation were of a rather humiliating and depressing character. They were, in fact, a heavy moral defeat—a "testimonium paupertatis" of our much-vaunted mental cultivation. None of the speakers fully appreciated the importance and responsibility of their task. Instead of treating it from a point of view which laid stress on the Jewish question as a common interest of humanity and civilization, as having been decided generations ago by the noblest men of our people, and as having been regulated by statutory law, they incriminated and recriminated each other. It was, in fact, less a political discussion than a theological dispute interpreting the old saying, "Haust du meinen Juden, hau' ich deinen Juden" (If you kick my Jew, I will kick yours). The Protestant ultra-Conservatives and the Roman Catholics joined hands, and thanked heaven that they were not as bad as those unmitigated sinners whose ancestors killed the Saviour and whose descendants make as much money as they can. The Liberals, in the heat of the combat, lost their dignity, and were, if not unconsciously, at all events involuntarily, reduced to the lower level of their adversaries.

An impartial observer must be amused at this more artificial than real animosity of our Conservatives. The same gentleman who has just cleared his mind by a vehement speech against the Jews may an hour later dress for a dinner at Bleichröder's, if not Landau's, or some other upstart Jewish banker's, for our aristocracy does not at all disdain social intercourse with rich Jews if they can derive substantial profit from it. It would be difficult to count the names of the barons and counts who have married the pretty or even ugly Jewish girls, if by so doing they could do away, as Heine says, with the pale melancholy of their financial distress. It is a matter of notoriety that, in the palmy days of Strousberg, princes, dukes, and counts filled his parlors and dining-rooms, and that they did not feel too proud to reap large sums of money from lending him their names for his financial speculations. To show up this furor teutonicus in its utter shallowness, I may mention that of late ministers of state Friedenthal was a Jew; that Friedberg, the present Minister of Justice, is a Jew; that Lucius, the Minister of Agriculture, is a descendant of a Jew, and that Bitter, the Secretary of the Treasury, belongs to a Jewish family. A large number of the best families of Berlin have intermarried with Jews, and when a demagogue à la Stöcker addresses his Berlin public as people of pure German blood, it is about the same as if an Irish-American stump-speaker of the "Bloody Sixth" flattered his political friends with their direct descent from the Pilgrim Fathers.

It thus becomes evident that it is not the pretended prejudice of race or religion which has caused this bitter warfare of our reactionary Hotspurs against the Jews. The real motives and aims lie deeper. Feudalism, Ultramontanism, and High-Churchism, in attacking the Jews, declare war on the modern development of Germany and on its chief maker, Bismarck, as well as on the liberal middle classes. Their plan is first to subdue the Jews, and by separating them from the other liberal elements of the people they hope to be able also to defeat the latter. The whole aspect of the present time proves this tendency. If any other evidence had been required, Bismarck himself would have furnished it by the publication of his views on the present excitement against the Jews. He traces its origin to the agitation of the same men who, as early as 1874, attacked him and his then trusted collaborators, Delbrück and Camphausen, the same men who openly declared their hatred of Bismarck's person and policy, and who now want to secure to themselves the benefits of the reactionary current which has been initiated by the Chancellor himself. The answer of the ultra-Conservatives in their organ, the Kreuzzeitung, is very characteristic: "There is no reason as yet," it says, "for the right wing of the Conservatives to oppose Bismarck's policy." But in spite of this assertion we are at present at the beginning of a struggle which will be a question of life or death for the ultra-Conservatives. They may win many advantages, but in the long run they will and must succumb, for any movement instituted by the orthodox clergy is doomed to sterility and downfall, and the Prussian Junkers are as much suspected by the people as the hierarchical leaders. It is to be expected that the people will soon recover their old common sense, the more so as it is chiefly envy and jealousy which, under the present unfavorable condition of business, prevent them from doing justice to their Jewish fellow-citizens. But, nevertheless, the whole episode will leave a stain on the good name of Germany. It is even no consolation that other nations are as foolish as we are. If the Americans try to place the Chinese beyond the pale of the law, if the Hungarians and Russians, as semi-civilized nations, persecute the Germans, there is no reason for us to behave in the same narrow-minded spirit towards our countrymen of the Jewish persuasion.

Let me conclude with a notice which is at least one redeeming feature in our present unhealthy state of society. I refer to the donation which on November 30, his sixty-fourth birthday, was made to Theodor Mommsen, the historian. In July last he lost his library by fire, and politely but peremptorily refused the several offers of help made to him from foreign countries as well as by his countrymen. His Berlin friends, however, fully appreciating the feelings which had prompted his refusal, considered it their duty to prove their high estimate of his labors and of his character by a private subscription. In less than a fortnight more than 100,000 marks (between $25,000 and $28,000) were collected to cheer the great scholar and make him feel easy for the future of his large family. As far as I know, it is the first instance of a liberal private subscription in Germany. The donors and the donee have equally honored themselves by the unostentatious way in which the above sum was offered and accepted. ? ?

THE FRENCHWOMEN OF CATHOLICISM AND DEMAGOGISM.

PARIS, December 13.

RECENT events have drawn public attention to the part women take in our society. Curious discussions on this subject have arisen on the political platform, in clubs and newspapers. As it forms one of the topics of the day, and, in consequence of the laws on public education, has been introduced into parliamentary debate, I shall make it the theme of my letter. It is interesting and curious to know the different ideas current as to what woman's mission is and the best means of preparing her for it. At the Workingmen's Congress at Havre it was also discussed, and recent notorious trials have given it an almost domestic interest. There is no matter greater or more worthy of interest, for whether they have or have not political rights, women will always exercise considerable influence on the destiny of their country. It is related of an old judge that whenever a criminal case was brought before him he asked: "Where is the woman?" This saying may be quoted with reference to manifestations of good as well as of evil, not only because woman is the centre of home life, but still more so because she is in civilized society the queen of social life. For the last two centuries in France her influence has been on the increase. In the eighteenth century she was the life of those French salons whose brilliant conversations attacked all prejudices and abuses, often even the immortal beliefs of the human soul. It may be said that the French Revolution sprang from these salons. Ponsard's tragedy, "Charlotte Corday," now being played at the Odéon and drawing large crowds, brings on the scenes some of the heroines or originators of the great intellectual movement at the end of the last century. During the Romantic period of the nineteenth century woman appeared as the personification of passion, sacred in itself, which was to sweep away all barriers, domestic and social. This is the predominating type in George Sand's novels, otherwise redundant with poetry and eloquence. Here was an effort to make women participate in the revolutionary movement, though still assigning to them all the graces of their sex. Now demagogism aspires to give them the same rights as men, and cast them into the midst of social and political struggles. This is the origin of that disagreeable type, the female orator, who is likely to become a frightful evil.

There are, however, degrees of this class. A certain number of these women claim equality, not only of civil rights, in which they are perfectly justified, but also of political rights, including that of sitting in our political assemblies. It was suggested to them that there was one function in the state they could not fill, namely, military service. Their answer was that they also incurred great peril for the benefit of the state whenever they brought a child into the world, and such a risk was quite equivalent to a military campaign. One young woman, Mlle. Aubertine Auclerc, has especially distinguished herself by advancing this claim. She is young and pretty—no drawback to a heroine. Passing from theory to practice, she refused to pay taxes so long as political rights were withheld from her; the more strongly to assert her claim she has allowed her furniture to be seized. This has caused much sensation, and Mlle. Aubertine Auclerc has found an unexpected champion in the celebrated dramatist, M. Alexandre Dumas, fils, who advocates the cause of women in a much-read pamphlet, entitled 'Les femmes qui tuent et les femmes qui votent.' He mentions the different criminal trials in which women were accused of having endeavored to take the lives of their unfaithful lovers, who had basely deserted them, leaving them all the cares of maternity—trials for the most part terminated in favor of the accused. He argues that if women had a voice in making laws for the protection of their rights against base seducers, they would desist from seeking redress for their wrongs by means of pistols and vitriol.

Without denying the gravity of the question here involved, and that the legislature should take it into serious consideration, so that these unfortunate victims of vile deceit may not be left without legal defence, we cannot refrain from thinking the witty writer's conclusions paradoxical. He does not take into account the violence of a sudden, irresistible passion which arms the hand of the outraged woman, when he imagines that the fury roused by cowardly desertion could be appeased by the prospect of being able to elect a deputy who would vote for the prosecution of the father who thus abandons his offspring—such redress being only obtainable after much delay. These are, however, claims of an essentially private order, and affect but little the furies of demagogism, who at Havre, through their spokeswoman, Madame Paul Minsk, demanded the total overthrow of existing society, and whose leader in Paris, Mlle. Louise Michel, recently returned from New Caledonia, preaches the doctrine of assassination. Undoubtedly some allowance must be made for her excitement, the result of sufferings courageously endured in New Caledonia, where she justly deserved to be sent for the prominent part she played during the Commune. At the present time Mlle. Louise Michel is a repulsively ugly virago, who has taken Hannibal's oath against society; she declared at a meeting at the Élysée Montmartre that she would be the first to strike at the tyrants when the time came. Whom she designates as the tyrants is not precisely known. All this is more ridiculous than alarming, especially as this terrible woman affirms, while brandishing a dagger, that she has returned from New Caledonia in a calmer frame of mind. I don't think this woman demagogue will make many proselytes. She is a curiosity rather than a dangerous agitator, and the clubs that exhibit her will make money.

Diametrically opposed to this revolutionary folly, we have a very different type presented to us by the conservative Catholic party. A few days ago this party took an opportunity of expressing their ideas on the education and calling of women, in the debates in the Senate about a bill for the foundation of colleges for young girls. This important bill has since passed the Chamber of Deputies. We should do well to consider the system of education for women adopted by you in America. The object of the present bill, without losing sight of the difference of sex for the mental culture needed, is to raise this culture sufficiently to remove the existing disparity which is frequently a cause of want of sympathy in the relations of husband and wife, and which in time becomes a moral estrangement. This is what encountered the greatest opposition from the Catholic party during the debates in the Senate. The new colleges would seriously compete with the convents, which are now the great seminaries for young Catholic girls, even for those who are not to remain there. The education given there is very superficial; great care is bestowed on the acquirement of good manners and accomplishments, and the principal object is to subject the mind to priestly control. The Catholic orators in the Senate displayed superb programmes of study, in which the different sciences figured; but it is well known that the education pursued in convents consists chiefly in forging chains for the mind, more or less glittering, and delivers our young women over to the guidance of priests. The Conservative party were unwilling to make trial of a serious and loyal competition in the Government establishments, where the instruction would be solid and the terms moderate, although there was a certain risk of increasing the distance between man and woman from an intellectual point of view. Happily the bill passed the Senate at the same time that the Chamber of Deputies voted free elementary instruction. These are far more important legislative acts than all the decrees against the religious orders. It is a loyal and efficacious war against Ultramontanism, which, like a night-bird, fears enlightened progress. É.

SPECIE PAYMENTS IN ITALY.

ROME, November 24, 1880.

THE presentation of the Ministerial bill for the resumption of specie payments has, as might have been foreseen, led to a factitious monetary crisis, which will be increased and prolonged or terminated according to the proportion of common sense and honesty throughout the country. Had the decision of the Supreme Court in America—that "the issue of paper money is a war power, only to be used for war purposes"—been pronounced at the close of 1866 in Italy, a resumption act then and there would have put an end to the dishonest speculations of gamblers and shareholders; and, in a commercial, industrial, and agricultural aspect, Italy would have been in a ten times more prosperous condition than she finds herself to-day. The war of 1866 was the pretext for introducing the forced paper currency, for which there was no necessity, as the fervor for the war with Prussia against Austria for the redemption of Venice would have enabled the Government to secure a loan in the country itself on the most advantageous terms. But the shareholders and the would-be shareholders of the ex-Sardo (then National Italian) Bank thought that it would be an excellent opportunity for increasing dividends to an unlimited extent, and a royal decree, undiscussed by the Chambers, made the notes of the National Italian Bank legal tender, and this without limitation of issue as heretofore. Vainly men of honesty and common sense exclaimed against the proceeding, reminding its partisans that only in the previous year Italy had joined the International Convention by which France, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, and Greece founded a common monetary system on the 15½ to 1 theory of bi-metallism, which arrangement, as we shall presently see, interferes very materially with the return to specie payment. At the time that this was permitted the circulation of the national bank notes amounted to only 117,000,000 francs; the Government borrowed at once 250,000,000, and by 1874 the loan had reached 850,000,000. Moreover, the bank, by the end of 1868, had issued on its own account 490,000,000.

The large fortunes made by many hitherto poor men at that time is explained by the number of shares they possessed, and as soon as Venice was free, and the Mentana business left people time to think and examine, a great outcry was raised that unless the country returned speedily to specie payments, and unless the enormous privileges granted to the National were extended to other banks, the sources of production would be sterilized, and exchange with other countries complicated. The truth of these assertions could not be disputed, but those interested in the National Bank could not be brought to relinquish their prey so readily. Hence a middle course was taken. The other banks of issue, the Neapolitan Bank, the Sicilian Bank, the Roman Bank, the Tuscan National Bank, the Tuscan Bank of Credit, complained especially that the fact of the Italian National Bank notes issued on its own account and those issued on account of the state were identical caused them to circulate with equal readiness through the kingdom, whereas their notes were never by any chance accepted once the frontier of the province where they were issued was crossed. To obviate this, instead of returning to specie payments, it was agreed that all the notes issued by the National Bank for the Government should be destroyed. The six banks united in a confederation authorized to issue notes for the sum of 100,000,000 francs for the Government, and these to be inconvertible;* and notes of their own in the proportion of 2 to 3 of their metallic reserve, these to be legal tender—no other banks in Italy to enjoy the privilege of issuing legal-tender notes. Year by year the state increased its demand for notes until, by 1875, they had reached 940,000,000, public rente being given to that amount as security, and an annual sum of 3,750,000 francs paid for interest. Besides this, the state had borrowed in gold 50,000,000 francs from the confederated banks, 40,000,000 also in gold from the National, at the rate of 6½ per cent. In 1876 the Government changed hands, and the party now in power having taken as their platform resumption and the abolition of legal-tender issues by certain privileged banks, no more notes have been demanded from the confederated banks. The sum stands now, as then, at 940,000,000. The Resumption Act presented by Signor Magliani, Minister of Finance, though defective in parts, is bona fide, as the present Ministry stakes its character on a return to specie payments. It has, however, several glaring defects, the inevitable result of the unfortunate necessity of receiving back from the states of the monetary union its small silver coin, its superfluous dollars (five-franc pieces).

In short, in June, 1881, the Banking Confederation is to be dissolved; the Government resumes all the notes issued on its own account, with the printing-press, etc.; ceases to pay the annual 3,750,000; retakes the public rente issued as security. Of these 940,000,000 it proposes to destroy 600,000,000—that is to say, all those of less than 5 francs in circulation, and as many above that sum as shall reach the fixed amount, and to circulate instead the gold and silver money, decimal and fractional, now in the treasury. In order to repay the 90,000,000 in gold to the banks, and to redeem in coin on demand the 340,000,000 of notes remaining as its own legal tender in circulation, it proposes to make a loan of 600,000,000, of which four hundred millions at least shall be in gold, the interest not to exceed 5 per cent., the working expenses 1 per cent. net of income-tax. The notes of the six banks are to be legal tender until the end of 1883, when it is to cease entirely and all the banks in the kingdom are to be thoroughly organized. The clause for reintroducing the 1 franc, 2 francs, and 50 and 20 centimes pieces signifies that the 100,000,000 of these coins which, by the Convention of 1879, Italy is obliged to receive back from France,* is to be put into circulation in exchange for the abolished small paper notes. Many people think that it would be far better to melt down the coin, and at least to keep silver at the decimal standard, as these coins, instead of having one-tenth alloy, have 1:11½. Moreover, silver, which at the time of the discovery of the gold-mines of California and Australia was at a premium of 2 per cent., has, owing to the discovery of fresh silver-mines, and especially to the demonetization of silver by Germany (1873), gone down 20 and even 25 per cent.

During the last fifteen years, as we see by the report of Signor Depretis on the last monetary convention, gold and silver have fled the country, and the Italian silver circulates almost exclusively in the countries of the Latin Union. To secure a sufficient quantity of gold over and above the 4,000,000 to be borrowed, the Government proposes to have all the custom-house duties paid in gold, and these amount to some 130,000,000 annually. This, say the honest opponents, is a gross error; the Government depreciates its own inconvertible notes by thus refusing to take them in payment of its own debt. People will naturally say, "They are not worth gold, then," and after receiving them perforce as legal tender will present them immediately for exchange in coin at all the Government treasuries where coin will be given. These are the two technical objections made to Magliani's scheme. I do not occupy your space with any others, as they are but a repetition of those used by the advocates in the United States of unlimited paper inflation. Politics, of course, enter largely into the discussion, the adversaries of the present Government uniting with stock-jobbers to oust them, not ostensibly on this question of resumption but in order that no bill for resumption shall become law. Even as I write the Ministry has challenged the House to a vote of confidence or the reverse, feeling that it is utterly impossible to carry through such a vital measure unless it can count on a considerable and staunch majority. M.

* For example, the confederate fractional currency for half a franc reads: "Biglietto consorziale a corso forzoso inconvertibile, cinquanta centesimi, Legge 30 Aprile, 1874."

PULLAN'S 'PRINCIPAL RUINS OF ASIA MINOR.'

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I beg you to permit the public acknowledgment of a misstatement in my "Notes on Greek Shores," printed in the First Annual Report of the Archæological Institute of America: this being an unjust detraction from the merits of a living scholar. The work of Mr. R. Popplewell Pullan, 'The Principal Ruins of Asia Minor Illustrated and Described' (London, 1865), is only in so far "a partial translation of Texier's text without the slightest additions" as it relates to the ruins of Assos. Although this passage occurs in a special bibliography of that site, the unintentional omission of the restrictive clause makes the sentence literally refer to a publication which, in other respects, has added much and valuable material to archæological science.—Most truly yours, JOSEPH THACHER CLARKE.

BOSTON, December, 1880.

THE REORGANIZATION OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial in the last number of the Nation, in which you criticise the scheme proposed by the Attorney-General for the relief of the overburdened condition of the Supreme Court by the establishment of intermediate courts of appeal between the Circuit and District courts and the Supreme Court, and in which you condemn the proposal to leave the right of appeal discretionary with such newly constituted tribunals, except in cases where the amount shall be $10,000 or over, must meet the hearty approval of every lawyer who has his country's good at heart. Such additional tribunals could only increase the uncertainty which is the great bane of the law as now administered in this country, because one of the new appellate courts might decide a case in one way and another appellate court in another way, and there would be no fixed or absolute rule until a like case, involving $10,000, was carried to the Supreme Court, or a like case in which, in their discretion, the judges of the inferior tribunal would grant an appeal. Thus the jangling of discordant decisions might be continued for an indefinite length of time, to the great embarrassment and disgust of suitors, who in their rage might desire the destruction of the whole Federal judiciary.

* First instalment January, 1880, second, December, 1880, without interest. The remainder in three instalments during the years 1881, 1882, 1883, paying interest at 2½ per cent.

The fact that our law exists in separate and distinct branches seems to afford an adequate and complete remedy for the evil from which we are suffering. The Supreme Court could be divided (without, possibly, any constitutional objections) into two or more divisions, in either or any of which the subject-matter of the controversy would give the jurisdiction: namely, one division of the court, composed of seven, nine, or more judges, might hear appeals in cases where questions of constitutional, statutory (criminal or otherwise), or common law arose; another division might hear appeals in chancery suits, admiralty causes, cases arising under the patent or copyright laws or under a bankrupt act (if such should be passed by Congress), and customs and internal-revenue cases. There would thus be one Supreme Court, composed of one or more tribunals of co-ordinate powers, each of which would hear and determine appeals in different classes of cases, according to the subject-matter involved, and the arbitrary and absurd limit by the amount of money in dispute would be avoided, and the meanest suitor could have his rights fixed and finally determined for ever, and the rule laid down in his case would be the law of the land until it was changed by Constitutional amendment or legislative enactment.

Two or three divisions of the Court in the manner suggested would at once relieve the Supreme Court without impairing its dignity, and lawyers eminently qualified by long practice in particular branches of the law would be found suitable to particular divisions of the Court, and these divisions united might form a distinguished tribunal, able to determine great political questions, such as that settled by the Electoral Commission, for which there was no provision in the Constitution.—Truly yours,

TALBOT J. ALBERT.

BALTIMORE, December 18, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your observations upon certain features of a plan to relieve suitors in the Supreme Court of the United States must commend themselves to intelligent men conversant with judicial proceedings. It seems to be clear that no court should have the power to decide when a party should have an appeal, any more than to decide when a suit should be commenced or defended. A scheme that did not practically provide for an appeal as a matter of right, would argue a want of invention on the part of the legislator. The philosophy of this matter is to regard all the steps necessary to conduct a case to the highest tribunal for judgment as mere process and pleading. Those, whatever they are, should be so provided that suitors can reasonably determine the whole course in advance, no part of which should be left to the uncertainty of judicial caprice. If this feature were to be incorporated into the system, it might be better to refer the question of leave to appeal, with all the other questions, as now, to the appellate court, instead of to the court whose decision is to be reviewed. Obviously, the right to initiate and defend suits is to be left unrestricted, as now. It is found that the number of cases which now reach the highest court is vastly in excess of its working power, and it is proposed to erect a set of intermediate courts which shall winnow out and dispose of all that would be in excess of its capacity, and conduct to it such a number only as it can deal with, and which shall be of the character and quality which, under all circumstances, and in reference to every consideration, are best entitled to be decided in that court. It is not going far to say that such a device will be found practically impossible. Restrictions and clogs can easily be devised; among them the most illogical—and yet which must in some sort be regarded—is that which depends on the value involved. This is the more apparent when it is remembered that this depends upon the nominal sum or estimate claimed by the parties in their pleadings.

Is it worthy of consideration, a scheme of duplicating or triplicating the Supreme Court itself? Increase the justices to fifteen or twenty-one, with a chief-justice and two president judges, and require them to work in three bodies, permitting each to reserve for the consideration of the whole court all such cases as a majority or even a minority may require to be so submitted. It will be easy to suggest difficulties in the working of this scheme, but certainly it will go as far to secure that necessary oneness in the body of our adjudged law as that referred to. Not one case in twenty in the Supreme Court involves any question of abstract right, and when uniformity is secured in adjudged cases, it is practically quite as important that they be decided speedily as that they be adjudged justly after a delay that renders the decision of no importance to the parties.

One matter may be mentioned of some practical importance which has attracted little attention. The Supreme Court is now practically the court of the last resort of the District of Columbia, and all its cases, when the amount claimed exceeds $2,500, may go there, as a matter of course, without any reference to the questions involved. It is safe to say that the District occupies quite as much of the time of the court, I think much more, than does the State of New York. There is no apparent reason why the District should not be placed in the same relation to this court as are the States. R.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 18, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your article on "The Proposed Relief of the Supreme Court" will be read with great interest by the bar of the whole country, and, I think, with general concurrence. But it seems to me that, in some respects, your statements stand in need of correction and completion.

1. The plan of making the right of appeal discretionary with the court which tries the case is doubtless wrong in principle, as you suggest. But do you not overrate its dangers? The right is now limited to cases involving over $5,000. There is no serious complaint that in cases under that amount, in which no appeal lies, the inferior courts act upon their own opinion in opposition to that of the Supreme Court, though the latter court has no jurisdiction to enforce any rule of law laid down by it, unless the amount in controversy in the particular case exceeds $5,000.

2. While $5,000 is quite a high enough sum for a jurisdictional limit, it must be remembered that that limit applies only to cases coming up from the Circuit Courts of the United States. There are other courts over whose judgments the Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction, in which the jurisdictional amount is much less. I give a list of them, with the amount required in each case to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction on appeal:

Court of Claims, on the claimant's appeal, $3,000; the United States have the right of appeal irrespective of amount.

Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, $2,500.

Supreme Court of Washington Territory, $2,000.

Supreme Courts of all other Territories, $1,000.

I think there is no good reason why suitors in these courts should have a greater right of appeal than suitors in the Circuit Courts. The Circuit Courts are courts of original jurisdiction, and suitors in them have generally no opportunity for a review of the judge's rulings at nisi prius, short of the Supreme Court; while the courts just named (except the Court of Claims) are themselves appellate courts, in which the parties have already had the benefit of one appeal. Cases from these courts, notably from the Supreme Court of this District, involving often points of mere local interest, crowd the docket of the Supreme Court, delaying cases of great amount and importance from the Circuit Courts.

3. The Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction in patent cases, irrespective of amount. The record in these cases is generally very lengthy, and the points involved are mainly questions of mechanical art and science, and not of law. Neither the judges of the Supreme nor of the Circuit Courts are generally appointed on considerations of scientific or mechanical knowledge. The jurisdiction should be taken away in both cases, and vested in a single court consisting of judges specially learned in patent laws, and holding its sessions at the seat of government, where easy and convenient access could be had to the models and other records of the Patent Office. For judges having no special familiarity with patent law to sit in review on the acts of officials whose minds have all their lives been occupied in that one department is, as was well said by the Supreme Court in a case in which it was asked to rule a point of ecclesiastical law in opposition to the opinion of a church court (I quote from memory), for the tribunal of less knowledge to review the decisions of the tribunal of greater knowledge. The effect of such a measure as this, in relieving the docket of the Supreme Court, would be very great.

4. In one respect, however, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court requires extension rather than limitation. This is in criminal cases. Two men were hung in this city a few weeks ago under a sentence of the special term of the Supreme Court of the District, which was affirmed by that court in general term, only three judges sitting out of the five who might have sat, and only two of those three concurring in the affirmance. It must be a shocking thought to every humane mind that had these men been disputing about houses or lands or stock they could have had a review of the judgment against them by the highest court of the nation, if only the value of the property exceeded $2,500; but that their lives could be, and were, taken from them without any chance for such review. No sentence of death pronounced by any Federal or Territorial court ought to be carried into effect without an opportunity for its sufficiency to be passed upon by the court of last resort. Such a provision exists in most, and I think in all, of the States, and that the Federal system should be an exception is most discreditable. The attention of Congress was called by Senator Carpenter some time since to this blot on our jurisprudence, and it must doubtless be soon removed. A law allowing writs of error in capital cases would not only be a measure of justice to persons convicted of capital offences, but would give us a valuable and much-needed line of decisions by the Supreme Court on important questions in the law of homicide.

It is evident that some measure of reform in regard to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court must soon be adopted, for the present delay of three years is often as ruinous to suitors as an adverse decision in the first place. No measure of reform will be complete which will not reduce the docket so as to allow a decision to be had at the very next term beginning after the appeal is taken.—Respectfully yours, GEORGE A. KING.

WASHINGTON, December 18, 1880.

[The only plans brought forward for relieving the Supreme Court which have attracted the serious attention either of the court or of the legal profession are, first, that of increasing the number of judges, and, second, that of creating intermediate appellate courts. The plan of dividing the court into a number of departments has also been considered as a branch of the scheme of increasing the number of judges. At the first blush this latter suggestion seems to be feasible and useful, but there are many objections to be overcome. Although there is no necessary connection between bankruptcy cases, or patent cases, or cases involving on the one hand the statutes with regard to customs, on the other hand constitutional law, there is no certainty that in practice questions coming under all these heads will not arise in the same case, and a permanent division into departments or branches becomes difficult for this reason. That is, the same question of constitutional law might be differently decided in the revenue branch and the constitutional-law branch. Every end that could be attained by a division into branches would, in fact, be reached by an increase in the number of the judges, for the judges would, in the natural course of business, divide their work among themselves as far as possible. This is done in all courts, and a voluntary division of business is preferable to a statutory division, because it is more elastic, and because, although each case practically falls to the share of only a portion of the judges, the decision is always the decision of the court and not of a part of it.

The most serious difficulty with the Supreme Court, however, at present is not the mere crowding of its docket, but the smallness of the salaries and the controlling influence of politics in the appointment of judges. So long as the scale of living at Washington was simple, the salary, combined with the dignity of the position and the fixity of the tenure, presented attractions to the best lawyers all over the country; and whether the selection was made from one party or the other, it was always made from the lawyers at the head of their profession. This has ceased to be the case. It is now an underpaid position which entails great labor, and lawyers who are in receipt of the best professional incomes do not care for it as they once did. The lawyers who now come prominently forward for vacancies in the Supreme Court are lawyers of the second class, who look upon the bench as a step in the road to some other preferment. A bill has been brought forward at the present session of Congress to increase the absurdly small salaries of the District and Circuit judges; but if the Supreme Court is ever to regain the position it held in the time of Marshall and Story, the salaries of its judges ought to be at least considerably more than half what is paid in this city to judges of our Supreme Court. With regard to the dangers of the discretionary right of appeal, the present pecuniary limit does not affect the case at all, for a pecuniary limit does not affect the class of questions which go up. Besides this, there is an enormous difference between $5,000 and $10,000. The simplest way of clearing the docket of the Supreme Court is to create a strong intermediate court; with such a court three-quarters of the cases now appealed would never go to the Supreme Court at all, no matter whether there was a pecuniary limit or not.—ED. NATION.]

AN UNOFFICIAL REPUBLICAN CAMPAIGN FRAUD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My attention has just been called to a communication of Mr. David A. Wells, published in your issue of December 2, in which he states that the following card was issued from the National Republican Headquarters in New York, namely:

"From a Pamphlet issued by

"THE FREE-TRADE CLUB OF LONDON.

"'Let it be understood once for all that the salvation of England depends upon the destruction of American manufactures, and that the only possible way in which American manufactures can be destroyed is by free-trade. This can only come through Democracy, and Democracy can only secure control of this Republic by the votes of Irishmen. How England must laugh in her sleeve as she sees the men who left their homes vowing vengeance serve her interests by working for a party which, if it gets control of the country, will inevitably carry out the policy she most desires.'"

It is scarcely necessary to follow Mr. Wells in his criticisms of the "wrong and immorality" of such a forgery as he declares the foregoing to be. The only answer necessary to make is, that no such card was ever written, issued, or circulated by the Republican National Committee, or by the State or any local committee, in great or small numbers. I should be glad to have Mr. Wells, who so swiftly denounces this card as a forgery, and holds the Republican National Committee responsible for its issuance and circulation, tell us who is responsible for the inexcusable blunder he is guilty of, in making so serious a charge without the slightest foundation in fact.

S. W. DORSEY.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the Nation of to-day there is a notice of what is sneeringly called "a Philadelphia copyright scheme," by which apparently is meant a bill creating international copyright recently introduced in the House of Representatives. The principal objection which you entertain to it appears to be the limit of two months within which English books would have to be republished here to enjoy the benefit of the measure; and it is assumed that, except in cases of authors of established reputation, this limit "is ridiculously short, and would force the author to sell his copyright on the publishers' terms." A similar view is taken in a letter to Mr. Lowell published by Mr. Charles Reade in the N. Y. Tribune of yesterday, criticising the projected "Suggestions for a Treaty," for which a large number of American authors have memorialized the State Department, wherein a similar limit of three months is provided. Mr. Reade characteristically calls this "a subtle suggestion of piracy" which would go far to render the whole treaty illusory, and neither you nor he seem to understand the purpose of the clause. Whether the limit be two or three months is, perhaps, a matter of comparatively small importance, but some limit, and that a short one, is an absolute necessity, unless the act of Congress, or treaty, is to be "illusory," except as regards English publishers and a few authors sufficiently eminent to command their own terms and control their publishers.

If there be no fixed limit, no unauthorized republication of an English book is possible, because no one could feel sure that an assignment of copyright might not at any time be made and entered, if only to secure the penalty. The provisions requiring such assignment to an American citizen, with manufacture in the United States, thus are rendered "illusory"; for the English publisher, so long as no assignment is entered, will practically have control of the American market, and can ship his edition here in quantities to forestall the demand and render nugatory any subsequent effort of the author to sell his American copyright. Remove the limit, and the whole framework of the bill and also of the treaty—a framework representing the harmonizing of all interests on both sides of the Atlantic—falls to the ground, and the attempt to obtain an international copyright may as well be abandoned, for I take it that this country will never consent to any arrangement which practically surrenders our market to foreign publishers, and grants them what would virtually amount to a monopoly of both countries.

As just intimated, early action on the part of English authors not so eminent as to be able to control their publishers must, under any circumstances, be the only method by which they can secure the benefit of the American copyright, as delay would enable their publishers to leave them no marketable copyright to sell. That the limitation expressed in the bill would work any hardship by compelling the author to sacrifice his work through reason of a forced sale is, therefore, a simple figment of the brain; and Mr. Reade's war-whoop that "it would turn all the publishers on both sides of the water into Lot's wives, hankering after dear old piracy, and longing to put the clock on three months" (whatever the latter operation may be), can only excite a smile in any one familiar with the business. Heretofore hundreds of thousands of dollars have been paid for "early sheets," which conferred no legal rights whatever—these "early sheets," for the most part, being of books unseen and unread by the purchasing house; and under the proposed bill, with its two months' limit, millions would eventually be paid for such sheets, when they should carry with them copyright and assured monopoly. It is not often nowadays that the republication of an English book is delayed for so long a space as two months from the date of its appearance at home; and if there should be any difficulty in reproducing special books within the specified time, it seems to me that both you and Mr. Reade might have thought of the simple expedient which in many cases could be resorted to, of delaying the publication at home, the cable enabling the publishers in the two countries to act in harmony. Or, if the author could not secure the co-operation of his publisher in this, he would always have the resource of duplicating his MS. and negotiating with an American house exactly as he would with an English one.

It is to be observed that the question as to the interval to be allowed between publication in the two countries, so as to prevent the surreptitious supply of both markets by the holder of the copyright for one, is one of the difficulties inherent in the settlement of international copyright which has perhaps delayed, by the doubts to which it gives rise, the adoption of such a measure as much as any other feature of the subject. Many experienced publishers have held that simultaneous publication should be required; but the question is surrounded by practical difficulties, and the limits of two months and three months have been suggested respectively in the bill and the treaty as a sort of tentative compromise.

Your further criticism on the clause regarding dramatic compositions is a simple verbal question not worth much discussion. No one can dissociate dramatic works from other literary compositions, quâ printing and publication, for who could draw a line legally separating dramas from poems—Tennyson's "Queen Mary" from Bailey's "Festus"? The purport of the clause objected to would seem to be sufficiently indicated by the use of the words "representation."

So far from regarding, with you, the possibility of modification by Congress as an objection to the proposed bill, it seems to me a very positive advantage. What will be the influence of any form of international copyright on the many interests, public and private, to be affected by it, is, in the absence of experience, a matter of almost pure à priori speculation. As a single instance, take the question discussed above of the limitation of the interval to be allowed between publication in the two countries, which practice may show to require alteration, either by extending the limit or requiring simultaneous publication. Whatever measure, moreover, may be adopted will undoubtedly give rise to litigation, and its precise signification will have to be settled by the courts, whose eccentric interpretation of laws so often astonishes the legislator by converting his child into a changeling. It therefore would seem unwise to bind the country to the rigid observance of all the details of a treaty, unalterable except by mutual consent, rather than to seek the desired end by legislation, which may be modified to suit enlarged experience or unforeseen exigencies; especially as a treaty might be interpreted differently by the courts of the two countries, giving rise to gross injustice for which reparation would be tedious and costly, even if procurable at all.

At least these are the views of one who has had abundant experience in the practical working of business, and who has long sought to view the question of copyright from an author's as well as from a publisher's standpoint.

Allow me to add that when honorable men are seeking honestly to adjust complicated and delicate relations in an untried field, their efforts are not likely to be aided by either vituperative criticism or by assumptions of deliberate and predetermined bad faith.

Very respectfully,

HENRY C. LEA.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 16, 1880.

[We called Mr. Lea's bill a "Philadelphia copyright scheme" not "sneeringly," but for the purpose of distinguishing it from others. It is, as we understand it, mainly supported by Philadelphia publishers. The Book Trade Association of that city, indeed, went so far last October as to take action in favor of this bill and against the treaty scheme. We may add that we made no "assumptions of deliberate and predetermined bad faith" on the part of these publishers, but simply that a copyright scheme brought forward by publishers is naturally mainly desired in the interest of publishers and not of authors. It is a notorious fact that the present movement, whether for a treaty or a bill, is mainly supported by large publishing firms in this country, whose object is primarily to secure protection to themselves through protection to authors. That is to say, the object is to prevent piracy by small American publishers of books which the large American houses have been in the habit of securing by "arrangements" with the authors. In other words, it is essentially a movement to obtain protection for the domestic manufacturer. For this reason we think the scheme or any modification of it ought to be examined by the producing interest (the authors) with a jealous and even suspicious scrutiny, particularly so in the case of a modification brought forward with the approval of a community which has always hitherto denied the rights of authors, and insisted upon protection for American manufacturers as against all the world. It is not "bad faith," but legislation in their own interest, which may be expected of publishers.

Mr. Lea's own letter contains a curious illustration of all this in his statement that if there is no fixed limit of time, "no unauthorized republication of an English book is possible," as if the very object of the bill were to secure the privilege of unauthorized (pirated) republication. In the author's interest, and the author's interest coincides here with the interests of justice and fair dealing, the primary object of any copyright scheme should be to prevent "unauthorized republication." In the publisher's interest, as Mr. Lea very frankly says, the thing most to be dreaded is the possibility of absolutely preventing "unauthorized publication." We cannot see why the limit should not be longer than that provided either by the bill or treaty. No doubt, as Mr. Lea suggests, the author can arrange in advance for simultaneous publication in both countries, delaying his book until he has made an arrangement for both countries; and this will, of course, be done by all authors who have a name known on both sides of the Atlantic. But the great majority of books which appear in both countries every year are by unknown authors, and it is too much to ask of an unknown author that he should wait till he gets two publishers in two different countries who are willing to take the risks of bringing out his book. To take a single instance, Herbert Spencer was thirty years ago almost unknown to American readers; his books have now, we believe, a considerable sale. Does any one suppose that he could have made an arrangement to bring out his 'Social Statics' simultaneously in England and the United States?

As to the question of dramatic copyright, either we misunderstood Mr. Lea or Mr. Lea misunderstood us. There are two kinds of dramatic copyright—stage-right and book copyright. Stage-right is, by a long course of judicial decisions, the most thoroughly protected form of literary property in the world. Our courts have placed it in precisely the same position with property in houses and lands or railroad bonds. We cannot see why this should be interfered with either by treaty or by bill. Book copyright in plays, of course, cannot be made to depend on "representation."

We have before now expressed our approval of the general scheme of copyright covered by the "Harper treaty." That of the bill is essentially the same. The danger of conflicting interpretations of the treaty is not so great as the danger of Congressional alterations, for the simple reason that the courts are not influenced, as Congress is, by the continual pressure of private and sinister interests. At the same time it is only fair that it should be remembered that this is not an authors' so much as a publishers' copyright scheme, and that it ought to be closely watched. Finally, we may suggest to Mr. Lea that inasmuch as authors are simply endeavoring to protect their private property from piracy, and publishers are merely endeavoring to save the country from the danger which it might suffer from authors having the absolute right to prevent "unauthorized publication," his description of the present negotiations, as being simply the attempt of "honorable men . . . seeking honestly to adjust complicated and delicate relations in an untried field" is, to any one who knows the "bottom facts," a little amusing.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

GEO. A. BATES, Salem, Mass., will publish early in the spring a 'Botanical Collector's Hand-book,' edited, with distinguished co-operation, by Mr. W. W. Bailey, Instructor in Botany and Curator of the Herbarium in Brown University. Besides practical instructions it will embrace some account of public herbaria and museums of vegetable products.——Miss Rosina Emmet's 'Pretty Peggy and other Ballads,' certainly the best illustrated work of its kind yet produced in this country, has been converted to a second use by an edition in outlines (Dodd, Mead & Co.) This has been printed on water-color paper, and is intended to be painted according to the child's fancy in flat tints. The idea must commend itself.——Cassell, Petter & Galpin still further improve and enlarge their Magazine of Art with the November number. There is a new cover, of agreeable conventionality in design, a larger page, a more comprehensive table of contents, and a frontispiece etching by Lalauze after Nicol. The magazine is, nevertheless, kept well within its own sphere, which is strictly popular.——The ladies' "Society to Encourage Studies at Home," whose centre of operations has been Boston, and whose sphere has embraced every portion of the country, has suggested a "Young Men's Society for Home Study," of which Messrs. Samuel Eliot, Arthur Gilman, Samuel S. Green, John Hay, O. W. Holmes, W. D. Howells, H. W. Longfellow, W. B. Rogers, Lloyd P. Smith, Chas. Dudley Warner, and Justin Winsor are the Advisory Committee, and Mr. Frederic Gardner, jr., Cambridge, Mass., the Secretary. We cannot this week go into the details of the system, but would note that it embraces a lending library of the more expensive and inaccessible books. A public appeal is made for funds to form the nucleus of such a library. A programme of studies in the four courses of American and English History, English Literature, German Literature, Natural Science (Botany, Zoölogy, Geology), and Mathematics, with the Society's rules, etc., can be had on application to the Secretary.——The Massachusetts State Library has issued its fourth catalogue (the dates of the other three are 1831, 1846, 1858). It is of the "dictionary" type, with imprints and lists of the contents of collected works. It is very carefully and thoroughly made, and worthy to rank with our best American catalogues. It is worthy of note, in the present state of the discussion on female employees in libraries, that this catalogue is entirely the work, both in plan and execution, of a lady, assisted by another lady, but not by any male supervision. It is not peculiar in this respect, however, as the catalogues of the public libraries of Brookline and of Concord, in the same State, were women's work, and were both well made. The present catalogue goes farther in one respect than is customary, giving the number of pages of volumes when it exceeds six hundred or is less than one hundred. The book is fairly well printed, except that heavy-faced type has a cheap look. A work of this magnitude ought to have a really handsome type for the author's names. But this is a reproach to be addressed to the printer, not to the compiler.——The divergence of the two great English-speaking nations in selecting technical terms for the same things is always an interesting study. A recent article in the October Quarterly Review treats of the growth in England of "partly-printed" newspapers—the system designated among us not more accurately but more frankly as "patent outsides."——A complete German edition of Mr. Darwin's writings, in fifty weekly parts, copiously illustrated, is announced by E. Schweizerbart, of Stuttgart.

—Nothing will be lost, doubtless, to American readers if the international Harper is edited with more of an eye to themes of English interest than has heretofore been the case. With the editor's delicate responsibility in thus catering for our British cousins we need not concern ourselves. In the January number Mr. Conway's "English Lakes and their Genii," Mr. Whitman's "Down the Thames in a Birch Bark Canoe," and the first book of Mr. Thomas Hardy's new story, "A Laodicean," have, of course, a transatlantic aspect. Looking both ways is Mr. F. H. Underwood's "James Russell Lowell," the chief article in the number. Never before, we believe, has so much personal detail concerning this poet been given to the public, for the author of the 'Biglow Papers' is, after all, not a familiar character to his own countrymen. Mr. Underwood does not attempt to explain why, even as a humorist and a dialect poet, Mr. Lowell is the favorite not of the masses but of the cultivated; nor, among other causes of a defective popularity, does he fairly notice the break in continuity of productiveness between the first and second series of the 'Biglow Papers'—a period in which is to be sought the origin of that change of mental habit which Mr. Underwood describes as a "growing more conservative." Two Spanish sonnets of Mr. Lowell's—on Mercedes and Cervantes—precede this biographical rather than critical sketch. Mr. Conway's tour among the English lakes continues to be entertaining, and perhaps in the degree in which he treats of man rather than of nature. But for the singularity of his boat Mr. Whitman's voyage on the Thames seems to us to have stood in no need of chronicling. The bright side of an undeveloped feature of our municipal system—what the progressive Berliner calls a superseded standpoint—the old New York volunteer fire department, is well exhibited in a paper which is also much indebted to its illustrations. That we can make as good instruments in America as were ever made, is the theme of Mr. Barnet Phillips's "Some Great Violins."

—Lippincott's begins the new year with a new cover which is certainly not an improvement, new type, and a reduced price. For reasons doubtless satisfactory to the publishers the illustrations are retained, though we should think a new departure would have furnished an excuse for abandoning a field in which competition seems hopeless. "Gigi's: A Cosmopolitan Art-School" is situated in Rome and described by Margaret B. Wright with sufficient vivacity. "An Old New England Seaport," by Charles Burr Todd, is an account of New London. "Lilith" is a continued story to be finished in three numbers, and, in spite of a melodramatic tincture, emphasized by its illustrations, may be said to promise well. The shorter stories are of slight interest, though "The Oscultation of a Honeymoon," by Louise Stockton, is a simple and sprightly sketch. "Out-Door Life on the Rhine," by Marriot Pyne, and "Race in Brazil," by Frank D. Y. Carpenter, are casual studies of life and manners. "My Mining Investments" insinuates wisdom with a laugh. The worth of the number consists in an excellent study by John Foster Kirk of Madame de Staël. To withdraw a noted name from the hackneyed misconceptions of half-knowledge and endue it with fresh interest is always a work worth doing; and within the limits of a magazine article it is here well done. It is good enough to induce the reflection, however, that Madame de Staël is one of the figures which no one can afford to take at second-hand.

—Mr. James conducts his readers through four more chapters of "The Portrait of a Lady" in the January Atlantic, and though he makes far more progress, it is at some expense to the qualities we found captivating in the last instalment; we felt at the time a half-consciousness of temerity in entertaining so implicitly trustful an enthusiasm, and Miss Stackpole's inexplicability and the positive tedium of the march of events in the present number are a kind of deserved punishment. For the rest the Atlantic begins the year with an unusually attractive and a not more than ordinarily deceptive title-page. Professor Shaler is interesting in an account of "A Winter Journey in Colorado," and we could easily have enjoyed more of it. Miss Preston gives an expository commentary on Joseph de Maistre and his writings in "A Symposium of Sixty Years Ago." In the course of it, by the way, she takes occasion to coin the word "Poncaphiles," and as another illustration of the discursiveness a self-indulgent writer sometimes permits himself Mr. Aldrich, in several pages of facetiousness entitled "Smith" (an English "Jeems"), furnishes the following, which is both characteristic and typical enough to be quoted: "An old acquaintance of mine . . . once described an English servant as 'the valet of the Shadow of Death.' The mot was said not to be original with my friend, but I have heard so many brilliant things from those same lips that I do not care to go further in search of an owner for what is sufficiently characteristic of him to be his. Whoever first," etc. It is clear that there need be no limit to this sort of thing. Discursiveness is a still less valuable element of criticism, and though that of Mr. Richard Grant White's study of the effect upon his mind of Sarah Bernhardt's acting has appositeness, it will be felt as a drawback by the reader desirous of getting at the pith of the matter speedily. Mr. Whittier's "Within the Gate" is addressed to the late Lydia Maria Child, and Mr. Stedman has some happily conceived verses entitled "'Ye Tombe of ye Poet Chaucer,' Westminster Abbey." The reviews are unusually numerous. Mr. Wm. M. Rossetti begins a series on "The Wives of Poets" with Euripides, getting as far as Corneille this time. "A Look Ahead" is the anonymous political article, and prospects the Garfield administration, under which everything is to wear rose-color; the civil service receives this minimum of attention in the forecast: "Mr. Hayes leaves no rubbish for him to clear away. The public offices are filled with trained, competent, and honorable men. The machinery is clean, well oiled, and in good working order."

—In the October Atlantic Dr. William James had a criticism upon a certain weakness of the Spencerian philosophy, or of its current exposition, the causticity of which was alone a guarantee of a reply, and in the present number Mr. John Fiske furnishes one. Dr. James's paper was entitled "Great Men, Great Thoughts, and the Environment," and was characterized by the emphasis of apparently long pent-up emotion at the unscientific procedure of many evolutionists who account for great men by a convergence of social pressures. He quoted both Mr. Spencer and Mr. Spencer's able expositor, Mr. Grant Allen, to this effect—an extraordinary passage from the latter, especially, wherein it was maintained that the inhabitants of Timbuctoo and the Dutch would have exchanged characters by originally exchanging environments. Mr. Fiske does not find it difficult to acquit Mr. Spencer of sharing Mr. Grant Allen's belief on this point, and he offers himself as a more trustworthy disciple, who holds the latter wholly extravagant. Mr. Spencer, he says, is combating Carlyle's notion that history is merely the biography of great men, and Dr. James has failed to notice that he does not go to the lengths he imagines. The reply is a model of controversy, and the discussion is worth remark because it illustrates certain characteristics of strictly scientific controversy exceedingly comfortable to plain people. It would be difficult to find two disputants better fitted to settle an abstruse question of sociological science than Mr. Fiske and Dr. James; yet here the question is very simple, and the display of dialectics is nevertheless considerable, and only the uninitiated will imagine there is no room still for a rejoinder by Dr. James. We hope it may go on, for not only is this the only way to elucidate the most trifling problems of the kind, but when well conducted it always furnishes a high order of intellectual entertainment to neutrals and learners. Nevertheless, we suspect that in order to make satisfactory progress in such matters it is a good expedient to try and discover what your opponent really has in mind, as well as to confute what he says. The pith of Dr. James's article, for example, we are inclined to think is to be found in his contemptuous remark that certain writers "have no imagination of alternatives . . . Aut Spencerism, aut catechism!" To address himself to the answering of this reproach would not be "scientific" in Mr. Fiske; perhaps it would be difficult, but if successful it would be complete. Once prove to

Dr. James that Spencerians have great "imagination of alternatives," and his mouth would undoubtedly be closed.

—The Hamilton statue in Central Park, presented to the city by Hamilton's son, and some weeks ago unveiled with much ceremony and apparently amid a revival of Federalism, so far as oratory could compass it, is an agreeable surprise. To say this is not to praise it very highly. Nowhere in the world, probably—pace Mr. Wendell Phillips, who claims pre-eminence for Boston, we believe—is there such a display of unhappy designs ill executed as are presented by the enduring bronzes of the Central Park. An unfriendly critic of American institutions might, with the aid of a little imaginativeness, find his account in a tour of the Park, noting the ideas apparently entertained by Americans of the great men there imaged forth—Webster, Morse, Humboldt, Scott, Halleck, Schiller, Burns, and Moore. The statues of the last two are recent additions, and the Burns, surely the most singular mass of metal ever modelled into the caricature of an organic form, being what it is despite the lessons of warning often enough drawn from its unhappy predecessors, it was reasonable to infer the probable demerit of the statue of Hamilton. Nevertheless its mediocrity makes it almost unique amid its surroundings. It stands on the knoll to the northwest of the Metropolitan Museum, and can be fairly seen only from the drive; a path to and around it is an evident necessity. The material being granite, of course the subtlety of sharp shadows, which is in great measure the life of such a statue's effect, is destroyed, and granite has in general an inappropriate look for anything under the colossal proportions it suggests. So little have the disadvantages of the stone been felt, however, that the pedestal is granite as well, and the whole thus all of a piece. The sculptor is C. Conrads, and is apparently to be congratulated upon the satisfactory execution of a task more or less perfunctorily undertaken. The work is evidently schooled and has the school excellences; the figure is round, and "counts" from every point of view with the same respectable impressiveness; the face appears individualized into a good likeness of some one, and the attitude is easy and devoid of neither grace nor dignity. There are doubtless a score of sculptors in Munich who would have made not only as good a thing, given the commission, but a thing different from this merely in unimportant details, just as they would successfully and similarly embody the well-understood traits of Helen or Ariadne or Bacchus in fulfilment of an order to that effect. To this end a great deal of study (of which more sculptors than is generally supposed, perhaps, are rather shy) and a good deal of the facility that talent alone can give are needed. But how different it is from the execution of an original and genuine conception, one has only to look twice at this Hamilton to remind one's self. The work easily succeeds in being the best portrait statue in the Park, unless we award the Shakspere merits as portraiture; but measured by the absolute requirements of a portrait statue of Alexander Hamilton it is grotesquely inadequate. A commonplace portrait of a remarkable man is of course a contradiction in terms.

—It was three years ago, we believe, that the Salmagundi Sketch Club first invited public attention to its performances, and after showing 240 drawings last year, it now invades the Academy of Design with some 650 numbers in its catalogue, and in the extent, if not in the interest, of its display contests the Water-Color Society's title to the third place in the list of the art exhibitions of the year. Its efflorescence is certainly a sign of the art times. The work exhibited is of almost every variety of black and white work—oil, sepia, charcoal, and crayon drawings, etchings, wood-engravings, and sculpture. The rooms wear a bleak look, to be sure, of necessity, but it is, to our mind, quite as agreeable as the general effect of the water-color exhibition, and at least its paleness is honest. In detail, too, the vigor always possible to colorless drawing which does not seek an effect beyond the capacity of its materials is frequent, and the works which are least pleasing are naturally certain ambitious attempts in oil, painted with a stippling scrupulousness with which, however, the painters of them would ruin similar efforts in color. The limits of black and white, of course, prescribe more or less strictly the kind of excellence one may hope to attain by the use of them, and the most successful things here are those the authors of which have, consciously or not, most closely observed them. The literary function which resides here if anywhere in plastic art, is exercised by Mr. Abbey and Mr. Howard Pyle with great success, and they give a very picturesque and sympathetic presentation of colonial times; Mr. Abbey's range is widest, and he sometimes seems as distinctly poetic as he is always direct and genuine. Memoranda of transitory and striking effects are set down with freedom which might be less vivacious, but which is evidently not strained, by Mr. Robert Blum in his "Stage-Coach Arrival," and, in a more serious way, in a head of the actor Irving. The excellence of pure drawing—that is to say, the rendering of the form of objects—is always rare, but it is possible to find it here, and occasionally conjoined with much delicacy and grace, as in Mr. Dewing's "Young Dancing Girls," or with the distinction conveyed by conspicuous cleverness, as in "The Model," by Charles Bargue. The latter, which is foreign, we are forced to the unpatriotic expression of a preference for over almost any of the rest of the lighter work exhibited, and the lighter work is the most interesting. Undoubtedly the circumstance that most of the more elaborate drawings have already been reproduced by the magazines takes the edge off their attractions, and if one is disinclined to tarry long before such character delineation as Mr. Frost's "Honk, Honk," or such picturesqueness as Mr. Shirlaw's "Ye Goose" (of which, however, the handling is particularly interesting), and Mr. Chase's "Nubian Ganymede," it is altogether because they have been so adequately rendered by the burin. In Mr. La Farge's working drawing in charcoal for a window in the Harvard Memorial Hall there is a larger purpose evident; the design commemorates the members of the class of '60 who fell in the late war, and is a nice compromise between the logical fitness of the single figure to represent the modern tragedy concerned and the undoubted requirements of conventional classicism, the face being wholly modern and the action and drapery supplying the decorativeness. Any analysis, however, should apply to the window rather than the drawing; we presume the position to be filled must account for certain singularities in the latter, by the way. At the opposite extremity of seriousness we may mention Mr. Maynard's graceful "Titania" and Mr. Frank Fowler's "Bacchus," among many other trifles. The display of wood-engravings is excellent, and the art being the sole one in which America contests supremacy, we hope it may receive as much attention as it deserves. On the other hand, the etchers, though in a sense they seem to need encouragement, receive all they are strictly entitled to, we believe; Unger's plate after Chase's portrait of Duveneck is conspicuously unique in the West Room, and there is no original etching that suggests Whistler or Appian, of course. It is certainly not to be expected that there should be, but it is well to bear in mind that as a matter of fact there is not.

—The reason for the Exhibitions of the Brooklyn Art Association consists in the opportunity they afford to many people, doubtless, of beholding pictures which, less fortunate than other gallery visitors, they otherwise might miss. This, and possibly the opportunity of exhibiting afforded to ambitious painters of the vicinage, are entirely consistent with absurd qualiteis considered from the standpoint of exhibitions as such, and hence any pointed criticism of the latter is beside the mark. It is nevertheless pertinent to mention the unfortunate but notorious truth, that a few good pictures amid a host of bad ones are inevitably themselves vulgarized, and their educational influence, of which so much is heard within the circle of exhibition supporters and promoters, in great measure nullified; and that a hanging committee which eschews discrimination does nothing by way of compensation. The present exhibition is the best that the association has held for many years, not only because it contains several excellent canvases, but also because ripples of the general improvement in painting here, during the past three or four years, have evidently reached it. There are, moreover, fewer illustrations of vacuity, perhaps, though this will very likely seem optimistic to unfamiliar visitors. Mr. Bridgman, himself a Brooklynite, is always successfully relied upon for something to lend interest and indeed, by contrast, lustre to the display, and is this time represented by two characteristic pieces. There is an air, too, about the "Jewish Mother and Child" which gives the epithet characteristic more force than it usually would have, applied to Mr. Bridgman's work; usually it is characteristic of him to subordinate his individuality to a greater degree than is betrayed by any other of Gérôme's many American pupils. Here there is not only good painting—of the obviously meritorious kind—but some sort of a personal impression sought to be conveyed, apparently, and its presence is agreeable though it is not itself of great value. The Orchardson in near proximity to the other Bridgman mercilessly takes the color out of it, but, like the other piece of color in the gallery, Mr. Winslow Homer's "Cotton-pickers," is too well known to need further allusion. Perhaps we ought to except Mr. Tilton's "Acropolis," recently purchased for a large sum by a Brooklyn connoisseur, and his "On the Nile," both of which, it is evident, stake their pictorial existence on their claims to color; but to pursue the question they, and pictures like them, always suggest as to color, would require a good deal of space. Much more definitely a staccato landscape by Mr. Bruce Crane may be said to be lacking in color, though it has a play of light and dark that is interestingly bold, and to have "play" is after all the main thing. It is a reflection, a little blurred after the nature of reflections, of the Spanish-Roman manner, but this is plainly due to the sympathy of admiration rather than to conscious imitation, which makes all the difference in the world. The same may be said of some of Mr. Murphy's landscapes and Corot. Mr. Chase and Mr. Wyant raise the general average of the exhibition considerably.

—Musical affairs during the past week have been very quiet. The only noticeable event was a series of concerts by Mr. Joseffy in conjunction with Mr. Thomas's orchestra. The distinguished virtuoso was not heard in any new work. Besides a number of solo pieces by different composers, he played Beethoven's Concerto in E flat twice, Chopin's Concertos in F and E minor, and also repeated Henselt's brilliant Concerto in F minor, which, as regards execution, is certainly one of the most wonderful pianoforte performances ever listened to in this country. Another interesting feature of Mr. Joseffy's programmes was Liszt's Fantasia on Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens"—a brilliant and most effective composition, which on account of its great technical difficulties is seldom attempted. Mr. Thomas performed a series of orchestral numbers in his usual admirable manner. The most interesting of these was a posthumous work by Bizet, "Roma," a suite in four movements, which has only been heard once or twice before at the Metropolitan Concert Hall, where Mr. Thomas introduced it for the first time in this country. The composition is remarkably melodious and clear in conception, while the instrumentation is brilliant, and, if not very original, always artistic and pleasing. It differs in all respects from the author's opera "Carmen," and reminds one more of Mendelssohn's simple style, with strong reminiscences of Schubert.

—No tragedian who respects himself ever fails, at some stage or other of his career, to add to his répertoire the rôle of Ingomar, but it is not so incumbent upon a tragic actress to play Parthenia; and we are surprised that Miss Mary Anderson should have thought it necessary to do so. The part is far inferior to that of the male character; indeed, the play was written for the sake of the latter, and Parthenia is introduced merely because it was impossible to represent a barbarian in love without representing him in love with some particular woman. The play belongs to the sentimental drama, and both Parthenia and Ingomar are sentimental parts. It is not probable that in real life love would produce in a barbarian the results which it effects in Ingomar; though we cannot say what surprising changes it might not bring about in such a barbarian as Mr. Milnes Levick's Ingomar. Mr. Levick is a competent actor of the militant school of tragedy, as his manner of handling his sword shows, and the cool way in which he uncovers his guard when he advances upon an enemy; he lacks, however, complete dignity, and the part is one in which dignity is absolutely essential to save the character from absurdity. Salvini's Ingomar is an interesting study in this respect, but Mr. Levick was not educated in the same school with the Italian tragedian. Barbarous acting of a certain kind, however, is his forte; he has a voice well adapted to scenes of the utmost barbarity. Miss Anderson's Parthenia is a creditable piece of amateur acting, for we can hardly bring ourselves to call it more. She has a good many of the natural requirements of a "star," and if she would be content to train herself in the only way that training is possible in this country, by acting with a good stock company for a few years, she might at the end of that time do very well in such parts as she now assumes. She has a pleasing face and figure, a good voice, and some variety of expression; in her love-scenes she displays a rather unusual refinement and grace. But she has no great strength or range of emotion; she does not "hold the stage" even when she plays to Mr. Levick; she has some bad tricks, and altogether, if she was not brought forward as a "star," there would be no particular reason for thinking her one. But the business of being a "star" has been brought lately to such perfection that there appears to be no reason any longer why every actress should not begin in that way, or, in fact, why there should be any regular dramatic companies at all. The characters in "Ingomar" are very few; barbarians, a father, a mother, an aged and miserly lover, a timarch and certain nondescript citizens of Marseilles serving the purpose of dramatic background for Ingomar and Parthenia. In this respect, though in no other, the drama is a classical production. At the Fifth Avenue Theatre Polydor is well played by Mr. John McDonald, who brings out the disgusting traits of the old man's character in a masterly way. The parts of the barbarians are made the most of by a group of virile and even fierce actors, from whom it would be unfair to single out any one as pre-eminently good or barbarous. Every savage tribe has some peculiar trait or habit which identifies it, and in the case of that over which Ingomar was chief the characteristic peculiarity was undoubtedly the method of expressing dissatisfaction by means of a noise suggesting at once the untamed lion and the domestic pig. This is reproduced with great historical accuracy at the Fifth Avenue by the barbarians of the company.

—The principal difference in the dramatic seasons of this winter and last has thus far been the prominence given this year to tragedy. For a number of years the tendency has been in exactly the opposite direction. The theatres seemed to be given over to farce, disguised generally as comedy, but thinly disguised. This winter, however, what with Clara Morris, Bernhardt, Salvini, McCullough, and now Mary Anderson, we have had a surfeit of tragedy, and such a play as "The Guv'nor" at Wallack's was probably all the more successful for affording a cheerful contrast to the generally sombre theatrical tone. "The Guv'nor" appears under the name of Mr. Lankester, but if he did not derive some of his ideas from the French stage we are much mistaken. The central figure of the play, the husband who suspects his wife and imagines the visits of the young man who is attached to his daughter to be those of his wife's lover, is certainly French. The Highlander is also dragged in by the neck and shoulders, as if he was not an essential part of the play, and the dialogue has a brightness, vivacity, and malice which is very French. The two parts which really made the play a success were Mr. Gilbert's Butterscotch and Mr. Elton's Macclesfield. Mr. Gilbert is always a comedian, and there was perhaps too wide a gulf between his acting and that of Mr. Elton, just as there was between the social positions of the two. Mr. Elton made his part purely farcical, but it was a capital illustration of the best kind of farce-acting. All the exaggerations were exaggerations in character, and there was running through all the absurdity the fundamental idea of representing the effect of deafness on the mind, character, voice, and manner thoroughly well carried out. The play has now been withdrawn, but not absolutely, to make way for "Forget-me-not." We trust that it will still be brought out frequently during the remainder of the winter.

—Some time ago a Vienna paper gave a list of some of the "reforms" demanded by several of the Czech newspapers in Bohemia, among which we may cite as specimens, that Germans should be excluded from all public offices; that conversation in German be forbidden in families, in taverns, and on the street; that all German signs be removed from the stores; and that German newspapers, political, illustrated, and literary, be confiscated. In a state like Austria, where parties are chiefly divided by national lines instead of the usual political divisions, constant friction of this sort is inevitable and excites no particular attention; but this friction recently kindled a blaze of indignation all over Germany when it was announced that the city authorities at Pesth had forbidden any further performances in the German theatre in that city, or, more strictly, had refused to renew the concession necessary for their continuance. The Germans were just as indignant as if they themselves had not been in the midst of an equally disgraceful agitation against the Jews. Some of the means they took to show their vengeance were not less amusing than original. Some wine firms in North Germany sent notice to dealers in Pesth that they need not count on any more orders for Hungarian wines from them. From Leipzig it was announced that the stipends would be taken away from those Hungarian students who received them from the University. A choleric writer proposed in a literary journal that German critics should forthwith abandon the habit of encouraging the literature of these nations by well-meant praise and translations, and expose its hollowness and want of originality instead. From Munich and Düsseldorf a notice was sent to the secretary for the coming art exhibition at Pesth next summer that the artists of those cities must take back their promise to forward pictures, since, in view of recent events, it seemed unlikely that German art would meet with a favorable reception there. Collections were also started by the newspapers, and special performances given by theatres, for the benefit of the unemployed company of the theatre at Pesth, the proceeds of which filled their pockets much better than their continued performances would have done. The Deutsche Revue, which contends that it was the Germans who gave the Hungarians Christianity and western culture, built their cities for them, and delivered them from the Turkish yoke, laments that legal measures are being taken in Hungary which will make it practically impossible for students from that country to study at German universities, and among other things calls attention to the following sentiment from the Egyetértés: "The Germans in Buda-Pesth must be converted into Magyars at any price. Everything that opposes Magyar interests must be exterminated, if necessary with insect powder." Even Bismarck and the German Emperor had their attention called to the matter, and, according to Vienna papers, it was due to a hint from the latter to the Hungarian ambassador at Berlin, that the Deutschenhetze was not compatible with the continuance of the present friendly relations between Germany and Hungary, that the municipal authorities at Pesth reversed their decision and granted Director Müller permission to reopen his theatre for a period of three years.

PREBLE'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES FLAG.*

WITH the succession of moving and strongly contrasting events that compose the history of a nation's life the national flag is so closely associated as to become to men's minds the emblem and visible presence of the nation personified. It floats tranquilly over the turning points of battles which determine the nation's existence, crowning its triumphs, gracing its festivities, draping its halls of legislation and justice, drooping in its defeats, and shrouding the dead bodies of its heroes. If, like a mirror, the flag could reflect the scenes it has beheld—if it could repeat the voices it has heard, it would reproduce the history of the past, and even the prowess of individuals, in endless detail. But evidently the history of the flag is only possible with a strict discrimination. Admiral Preble digresses rather wildly in agreeable but diffuse narratives of Arctic and Antarctic exploration, of the siege of Fort Sumter, of President Lincoln's inauguration, of the outbreak of the rebellion, and similar summaries of popular history. The flag no doubt was flying during these events, but a good deal of the time it was not a prominent object of interest. An amusing plea is made in the preface to reconcile Southern readers to the names traitor and rebel applied to them not out of offensiveness but in accordance with the meaning of the words as defined in the standard dictionaries.

* 'History of the Flag of the United States of America. With a Chronicle of the Symbols, Banners, and Flags of Ancient and Modern Nations. By Geo. Henry Preble, U.S.N.' Second Revised Edition. Boston: A. Williams & Co. 1880.

The book contains many metrical extracts more remarkable for patriotic sentiment than for poetical excellence. It gives interesting fac-similes of the original manuscript draft of the most popular national songs, and also of the author's own signature. It is handsomely published; the type and paper are good, and the colored plates brilliant and instructive; but the numerous woodcuts though accurate are unusually poor, and quite unworthy of the rest of the book. There are occasional slips in the Latin mottoes. The volume contains a large amount of interesting and curious information collected with great diligence and research, ranging from the myths of the dark ages and the uncertainties of modern times to the arms of each of the United States and the varying language of flags in different positions on men-of-war and under different circumstances.

The earliest voyages to this continent have left few traces, and if any previous flags ever waved over portions of the New World, the first of which we have any authentic account is undoubtedly that which Columbus bore in his hand when, dressed in scarlet, he stepped on shore in the island he called San Salvador. This was the Castilian flag—the castles and the lions, quartering Castile and Leon—which the ships of Spain had worn from the first of her greatness. The Burgundian flag—the red raguled saltire on a white ground—was adopted after the accession of Charles V. to the kingdom of Spain. In the Armada this was the flag that was opposed to England's square flag of St. George—white with a red cross. The flag of Pizarro in 1535 was in existence in the first half of this century, and probably till 1865. The standard which Cortes bore in procession when he returned thanks to God at Cuyoacan for the capture of the City of Mexico, in 1519, is now in the national museum of that city. The author pronounces this to be probably the oldest flag in existence; but he also mentions a banner of the Douglas that was in the battle of Otterburn in 1388, which is still preserved at Cavers, in Roxburghshire, by his descendants.

There is abundant information about the banners of England, but the banners themselves are very numerous; for to the time of Elizabeth the sovereigns of England bore their family devices. Known to this day, and with their memory now established in history for ever, are Harold's winged dragon captured at Hastings, the fighting man richly wrought in gold and precious stones of William the Conqueror, the colors worn by Blake in 1653 and those opposed to him by Van Tromp in addition to his historic broom of the previous year, the banners of the great Protector and the Commonwealth, of William of Orange landing at Torbay, of the Covenanters of Scotland, of the East India Company, and of the many famous epochs of English history. The present "meteor flag of Old England," which, according to Campbell, "has braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze," in fact dates from the Union in 1801, twenty-four years after the first establishment of the Stars and Stripes. This ensign was never worn by any of the American colonies. The red cross of St. George, if anything, floated over the Pilgrims as they went on shore at Plymouth in 1620. It was in use in the Massachusetts colony as early as 1634. In this year began the singular dispute as to the godliness of employing the sign of the cross on the military banner. The result was that the king's colors were retained at his castle in the harbor, but excluded from use elsewhere in the colony. Soon after, in 1643, the union of the united colonies of New England was formed. It is not known that any common flag was adopted till Governor Andros received one from the king in 1686. This was a very brilliant and beautiful flag, consisting of the red "cross of St. George—the king's colors of the time—borne on a white field occupying the whole flag, the centre of the cross emblazoned with a yellow or gilt crown over the cipher of the sovereign James I." The cross of St. George with occasional variations continued in general use in the colonies till the union flag of James I. was appointed by act of Parliament, in 1707, for general use throughout the British dominions. A special flag to distinguish merchant ships of the colonies from the King's ships was prescribed in 1701 and undoubtedly worn, but no official mention of this use, or engraving representing it, has been preserved. "All the pictures of New England flags from 1700 to 1750 show a red or blue ensign cantoned white, with a red St. George's cross, and having a tree or globe in the upper corner of the canton." The union flags of the colonies up to the Revolution were most probably the English and Scotch union flag prescribed in 1707. At Lexington and Concord there is little probability that any colors were displayed by the Americans: it is not positively ascertained that any were even at Bunker Hill. Certainly none were captured by the British. An account given by Mr. Lossing in the 'Field Book of the American Revolution' asserts that a standard was hoisted in this battle agreeing with the New England flag as just described.

At the first mustering of the forces of the Revolution many different colors were adopted by different troops and different colonies. Among the favorite devices were the pine-tree of Massachusetts and the rattlesnake. As early as October, 1775, the subject of a common flag engaged Washington's attention, but the device he then suggested never attained much currency. Dr. Franklin and two others met at Cambridge late in 1775 and settled on a flag which was in fact the king's red union ensign with the field striped with white, so as to give thirteen alternate red and white stripes. The official establishment of this flag is involved in obscurity. Its use, however, is beyond question. It was hoisted for the first time over the camp at Cambridge Jan. 2, 1776. About the same time it was first hoisted on a man-of-war: Lieutenant John Paul Jones with his own hands hoisted it on the Alfred. His active and presuming temper suited his opportunity, and he was equally ready to publish the fact and secure the credit for it. The Alfred was one of the first men-of-war authorized by Congress as a beginning of our navy. She carried twenty nine-pounders on a single deck, having no spar-deck battery. The weight of shot thrown from both her broadsides was not equal to a single shot from a modern gun. The first success of the Continental flag was the capture of the British brig Edward by the Lexington in April, 1776. The Lexington's career was short but glorious: she was captured through want of ammunition after she had been in service one year and eight months. "She was the first vessel that bore the Continental flag to victory on the ocean, and in her short career had fought two severe actions under it, was twice taken and once recaptured, was otherwise engaged with armed vessels, and captured several prizes."

By act of Congress of June 14, 1777, the flag was established as thirteen red and white stripes, with a union of thirteen white stars in a blue field. There is no record of the discussion that preceded its adoption. Its origin and suggestion are completely forgotten. Nothing more on the subject will probably ever be known than is set down in this history. Paul Jones was foremost with this flag also, hoisting it on board the Ranger at Portsmouth. He also was the first to hoist the flag on a native-built ship-of-the-line, the America. No doubt this flag was borne at the battle of Brandywine, which took place eight days after the act creating it was first officially published in Philadelphia. From that time it was inseparable from the army of the Revolution in all its sufferings, successes, and final triumph. On the 13th of January, 1794, the number of both stars and stripes was changed by Congress from thirteen to fifteen. This was the flag of the War of 1812, and the "Star-spangled Banner" of Fort McHenry. Under it the brilliant victories of the navy were won and the battles of Fort McHenry and New Orleans were gained. An act of April 4, 1818, taking effect July 4 of the same year, provided that the union should contain as many stars as there were States in the Union. The present number of thirty-eight was reached when Colorado was admitted into the Union in 1876.

Disregarding the alterations in the number of stars, our flag is older than that of Germany, Italy, Sweden and Norway, Portugal, Great Britain, France, Spain, and the South American States. Congress omitted to prescribe the form of the stars or their arrangement. Custom has made the stars five-pointed, following the European heraldry; the stars on our coins, however, have six points, like the English. In the Navy flags the stars have always been arranged in parallel lines. In the Army, on the other hand, they are generally set to form a large star. In our other flags they are arranged in every possible variety. It is to be regretted, perhaps, that the flag as originally established was ever changed. There is great satisfaction in having a national flag fixed and permanent. Such frequent changes are confusing. A small proportion of people in the community could now say what the present number of stars is, and many old flags continue in use after a change has occurred. The stars are already becoming excessive in number, and the ingenuity of the future will be taxed to place them in the union when the destiny of the republic is fulfilled and they become as numerous as political orators predict.

THE INFLUENCE OF SCHOPENHAUER.*

WHEN in 1818 Schopenhauer offered his principal philosophical work to the publisher Brockhaus, in Leipzig, he described it in the following words:

"My work is a new philosophical system—new in every sense of the word; not merely a new presentation of old truths, but a closely-connected series of ideas which have hitherto never yet entered into any one's head. I am firmly convinced that the book in which I have accomplished the difficult task of presenting these ideas in a clear light to others is one of those which subsequently become the source and occasion of a hundred others."

Schopenhauer, as is well known, was not overburdened with modesty. Like all men of genius, he knew the value of his ideas, and objected on principle to the virtue just named when it could only be exercised by playing the hypocrite. His chapter on genius and modesty is one of the best he has written. For several decades it seemed as if his remarks to the publisher were to remain an idle boast. The author of 'Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung' remained unknown despite his piquant style, his clever sarcasm, bitter insinuations, and repeated attacks on the professors of philosophy, who, he maintained, had conspired to "ignore him to death" (todschweigen) for fear of the consequences to their lazy and dishonest habits of teaching if once people should discover the difference between his philosophy, which alone boldly faced the truth regardless of consequences, and their Afterphilosophie, which was entirely based on the demands of current theology and the principles of the government that paid them for their services. "From a philosopher down to a professor of philosophy . . ." Heine once remarked, and the illustration of this malicious joke is one of Schopenhauer's favorite themes. At last he was destined to triumph over his enemies. To show how completely his prophecy about the hundred books has already been realized, an admirer of his, F. Laban, has taken the pains to catalogue the books, pamphlets, magazine and newspaper articles that treat of Schopenhauer or any of his doctrines. The list is chronological, beginning with 1818 and continued up to the middle of the current year. The idea of such a catalogue was probably suggested by a similar list of the Wagner literature published a year or two ago by Schott & Sons, of Mainz. Herr Laban's catalogue, as he is fully aware, is very far indeed from being complete, especially in foreign languages. He agrees with Vaihinger that the whole present generation is impregnated with Schopenhauer's ideas. A complete record of the Schopenhauer literature would consequently include all those innumerable treatises in which Schopenhauer's ideas are reproduced with or without mention of his name, and this would be as impossible a task as it would be superfluous. But writers of magazine articles or philosophical histories will derive much assistance from Laban's catalogue. It is prefaced by an introduction of thirty-three pages, in which the editor explains his attitude towards his author. But this is not a very important contribution to Schopenhauer literature, and might as well have been omitted.

The German Zeitgeist, or spirit of the times, is nowhere better betrayed than in the feuilletons, or literary departments, of the principal newspapers, for which the leading authors write among others; and here one does not need to know Schopenhauer by heart to see how deeply his influence has penetrated all classes. No philosophical author of ancient or modern times is so frequently alluded to, none so frequently plagiarized; for in regard to literary property the German conscience is as elastic as that of other nations, if not more so. Ideas are so abundant, especially in Schopenhauer, that it seems no great crime to steal a few of them. The cleverest of these literary ruminants, to use a mild phrase, is Ed. Hartmann. He played his first trump by appearing on the field as a partial disciple and critic of Schopenhauer, just at the time when the latter was rising into popularity. As people have a morbid desire always to read the latest thing out on any subject, Hartmann's diluted essence of Schopenhauer's views, his 'Philosophie des Unbewussten,' had a run of eight editions in almost as many years. Hartmann was aided on his path to popularity by his feuilleton style, which adapted itself to the comprehension of the multitude, while Schopenhauer's writings, although never obscure, yet require for their full comprehension some knowledge of previous philosophers, especially of Kant and Plato. Hartmann, accordingly, played the part of the nurse who puts sugar and water into fresh milk because it is too rich and substantial for an infant's stomach. To see how the cream of Schopenhauer, his genius, wit, brevity, and literary art, are lost in this dilution of Hartmann's, one need but compare, among others, the chapters on the metaphysics of love in their principal works, or their respective treatment of pessimism. Schopenhauer's arguments and illustrations to prove that this is the worst of all possible worlds affect the reader like a grand and awful tragedy. Amid the skill with which he modulates from one discord to another, softened by the beauty of his instrumentation, it hardly occurs to the reader that the many available concords are arbitrarily neglected and left out. In other words, his argumentation affects one less as a one-sided plea than as a work of art, an exciting metaphysical romance with a tragic background. One may, therefore, be a confirmed optimist and yet keenly enjoy and admire Schopenhauer's tirades against this world. This, coupled with the abundance of valuable incidental psychological remarks, may perhaps account for the fact that an orthodox professor at an American college who thoroughly detests the doctrines of the great pessimist should yet for years have used his work as a text-book, and never tired of praising it. With Hartmann the case is quite different. He adds his drop of sugar-water and changes Schopenhauer's formula about the worst possible world into the following: This is the best of all possible worlds, but it is nevertheless so bad that its non-existence would be preferable to its existence. He then goes to work, with a show of the scientific method of induction, to prove the excess of pain over pleasure in every sphere of life. This being done, however, in the manner of an advocate and with the style of a statistician, the one-sided and prejudiced selection of facts favorable to his argument, to the exclusion of all others, is so apparent that the reader closes the book with an expression of indignation or amusement that a conceited Berliner should imagine any such system of metaphysical bull-dozing would "go down" with the present generation. What adds to the comic side of the affair is that Hartmann, convinced that his patent method of annihilating this wretched universe (by a universal consensus of all men to "cease to will to live") can only be carried into execution after all men have become pessimists, thinks it not worth while to sacrifice himself alone to ascetic self-torture, but continues to enjoy the pleasures of life like any modern heathen, meanwhile employing his pen for the purpose of making converts to pessimism. Hartmann, however, has already had his day. He was one of the transient philosophical comets Schopenhauer speaks of, while he himself showed by the length of time his light required to reach the inhabitants of this planet that he is one of the stars that for ever remain fixed in the skies.

The fact that Schopenhauer has not had a single prominent pupil who swore in verba magistri—for Hartmann and even Frauenstädt only followed him in part—does not in the least argue against his influence, an influence which in its own sphere can only be compared with that of Darwin and Wagner in their spheres. To a great many educated Germans of the day Schopenhauer is, indeed, no less than an infallible authority on any and every subject. But of leading thinkers none has adopted his system, chiefly for two reasons. The best philosophical minds are now, and for some time have been, engaged in experimental work on the senses, brain, and nervous system, while the speculative minds have either endeavored to set up a new metaphysical principle or have been prevented from adopting Schopenhauer's by an inner contradiction which it involves, and which is similar to that which in Kant's case led to the division of his followers into two camps. Kant taught that causality, like time and space, is a mere form of the mind, which does not belong to things in themselves—the Ding an sich. On the other hand, he endowed things in themselves with causality by asserting that they affect our senses. This cannot be reconciled with the other assertion. Similarly, Schopenhauer assumed that Kant had absolutely proved—which he never did, by the way—that space, time, and causality are merely forms of the mind. Instead of agreeing with Kant, however, that the Ding an sich is an unknown quantity, Schopenhauer thinks that we do know of it as "Will," under which name he includes not only human and animal will, but all the forces of nature, from gravitation to chemical affinity. Although in general the clearest of all metaphysical thinkers, Schopenhauer yet had a blind spot in his mental retina which led him to regard this doctrine as his greatest achievement. In reality it was the greatest of all his errors. If, as he himself admits, we can only know the Will, after all, under the form of time and the form of being-an-object-of-cognition-to-a-subject-of-cognition, then we certainly do not know it as Ding an sich, any more than other phenomena (external objects) which we only know under the forms of space and causality, besides the other two forms just named. He makes an arbitrary distinction between the forms of cognition which cannot be approved. Instead of Will being the essence of all things, it might even be argued that there is no such thing as Will at all; that all psychic phenomena are included under intellect and feeling; that the word "will" has led to much confusion in psychology, and had better be discarded. Will can only be intelligently defined as action guided by feeling. Now, feeling is a distinct psychic phenomenon, and action is not psychic at all, but physical. Hence the word "will" becomes eliminated. To make Schopenhauer's psychological discussions intelligible one is, indeed, constantly compelled to substitute the word "feeling" for "will," just as to make Spinoza more intelligible one should, according to Kirchhoff, always read "nature" where the word "God" occurs. However this may be, the inner inconsequence of Schopenhauer's system prevented it from being accepted and forming a "school." In Kant's case the contradiction alluded to led to the formation of two schools, an idealistic and a realistic branch. This was in a metaphysical age, when such speculations were popular. But at the time when Schopenhauer became known people had become disgusted with abstruse speculations in the air, and longed for a bit of solid ground under their feet. Hence, and also because Schopenhauer's clear style more easily led to the exposure of his inconsistency than in Kant's case, where a most obscure style added to the confusion, Schopenhauer failed in founding a metaphysical school.

All this, however, as already stated, does not argue against Schopenhauer's influence. Although, as a whole, he doubtless belongs to the class of metaphysicians of the speculative type, he is by far the most attractive of them all; and in justice to him it must be stated that he marked, and even accelerated, the transition to the present period of empirical investigation of mental phenomena. With his later period coincides the time when physiology began to exercise an influence on psychology; and here we find him constantly quoting such authors as Marshall Hall, Burdach, etc. He insisted as strenuously as any Darwinist ever could that the human intellect is merely a higher development of the animal intellect, and entirely a function of the brain, from which it is as inseparable as is digestion from the stomach. His chapters are full of brilliant aperçus, in some of which he anticipated important discoveries of modern physiologists. In general, in spite of its idealistic background, the details of his system are worked out in a realistic, not to say materialistic, spirit, which has not a little contributed to his present popularity. There are several marked tendencies at the present day, and not in Germany alone, which may be said to have received their first powerful impulse from Schopenhauer. The most conspicuous is the universal horror of all metaphysical speculation on the synthetic or deductive method, which, e.g., has prevented Herbert Spencer from having as much influence as he would have otherwise had. Schopenhauer's method is the analytic, although he is by no means free from the sin he assailed. When he began his philosophical career the "post-Kantian Sophists," Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel, were held in universal esteem as the wisest men of all ages, who had solved all the problems of the universe. Schopenhauer's clear intellect, sharpened by jealousy, at once saw that this overestimate was chiefly based on the deep meaning which was supposed to lie hidden beneath the incomprehensible and meaningless formulæ of these philosophers. He boldly assailed them in the most violent fashion, and Hegel in particular became the recipient of a volley of invectives such as had perhaps never been fired at any man before, and which completely overshadow the more recent efforts of Haeckel, Zöllner, and Dühring in the same direction. It was less the coarseness of some of these attacks than the wit and cleverness of the others which led to their success. Nowadays, whatever may be fabulated about certain revivals, the volumes of the post-Kantian metaphysicians rest undisturbed on the library shelves, covered with half an inch of dust, and the mention of these names excites in many minds emotions similar to those evoked by the mention of the mastodon and other monsters of an extinct geological epoch.

This may be called the destructive side of Schopenhauer's influence. On the constructive side he was no less successful. His own favorite philosopher was Kant. Although he freely confesses and criticises his errors, he never tires of praising him as highly as he denounces his successors, through whose influence for a time Kant had been more or less neglected. And what is the result at present? A most remarkable Kant-worship in scientific as well as philosophical quarters, which fully equals that of Schopenhauer. It would be too much to say that Schopenhauer alone is responsible for this change; but he gets the lion's share of it. He not only helped Kant to renewed popularity, by attacking his would-be critics and successors, but also by restating and explaining Kant's principal views in his own clear language, so that they became intelligible even to minds not systematically trained to philosophical reasoning. He deserves especial credit for explaining and improving Kant's epoch-making views on æsthetics, which for the first time tangibly and thoroughly explained the problems of the Beautiful and the Sublime. To pass from Schopenhauer's delightfully clear and suggestive chapters on subjects of art to the ordinary text-books on æsthetics, such as Vischer's, Carriere's, Lotze's, and even Fechner's, is like leaving a clear, limpid mountain stream to bathe in a pool of stagnant water. Of hardly inferior value, at least for the sake of comparison and a higher induction, are the various moral and religious notions which Schopenhauer borrowed and adapted from the teachings of the Buddhists and Brahmins. One-sided as many of these notions are, and incompatible with the spirit of our time, they yet serve as a useful antidote to the excessive, and in some respects unwholesome, Semitic influence on Aryan civilization. Working in the mines of ancient Indian wisdom is a favorite exercise of living scholars and poets; and Schopenhauer's share in promoting, if not in initiating, this movement is considerable.

We might cite various other "leading-motives" from Schopenhauer's works which a great part of our generation has learned by heart, but have only space to refer in this last paragraph to his literary skill and his influence in reforming and fixing philosophical terminology. Previous to Schopenhauer a dry, obscure, and involved style was considered in Germany a necessary characteristic of metaphysical treatises. Schopenhauer showed the error of this notion, and proved that beauty of literary form and metaphysical reasoning are not contradictory terms. His definitions of the various philosophical terms, such as Empfindung, Wahrnehmung, Anschauung, Begriff, etc., are so clear and consistent that, while previously a great confusion prevailed in this matter, there is now a general agreement in the use of these terms. And this is a matter of inestimable importance, for the chief difficulty in philosophy has always consisted in this, that no two thinkers used the same term in the same sense. Although he repeatedly insists that his aim is not to reproduce the thoughts of others, but only to furnish new ideas, his works are yet a repository of the most striking psychological sayings of all the great thinkers from Plato to Kant; and it cannot be denied that in most cases, where he does not simply quote, he has reproduced these ideas in a clearer and more elegant form than they had originally appeared in. Goethe is the only one of his countrymen who can be compared with him as a literary artist. If any one doubts this he will be convinced by reading the wonderful chapter on Genius in the second volume of his principal work. A great part of this chapter is simply a portrait of its author, but it nevertheless covers its ground completely because he could not have found a better model; and Schopenhauer, although (excepting a few insignificant pieces) he never wrote any verse, must yet, like Hawthorne, be ranked as a great poet. Poetry has been defined as thinking in images. Now, Schopenhauer says that all original thinking is done in images—"Alles Urdenken geschicht in Bildern"—and he himself not only thinks in images but he always communicates his ideas to the reader in images. In one word, we may say that since Plato Schopenhauer is the first author who has succeeded in converting a philosophical treatise into a work of art. It is a burning shame that such a work, whose influence consciously or unconsciously is everywhere felt, should have to wait more than half a century before being translated into English. Some years ago, we believe, an English publisher announced the preparation of an English edition, but nothing has been heard of it since. We hope the delay is merely due to the difficulty caused by the poetic style. A translation there must and will be before long, for if any works ever deserved to be translated into all languages of civilized countries they are those of Arthur Schopenhauer.

NEWTON'S ESSAYS ON ART AND ARCHÆOLOGY.*

THIS volume contains eleven essays, ranging in date from 1850 to 1879, which, thus collected, form an excellent manual of information concerning the recent remarkable progress of knowledge in the field of classical archæology. A more competent or trustworthy guide in this field could not be found than Mr. Newton, whose own interesting and important investigations and discoveries in the Levant, especially at Halicarnassus, between 1852 and 1859, gave him a high reputation as an archæologist, which has since been confirmed and extended by his various publications, and by his eminent services as Keeper of Greek and Roman Antiquities in the British Museum. To wide and accurate acquaintance with the sources of information, derived from the study of ancient authors and the existing monuments of ancient art, he unites a sound judgment and unusual practical experience as an original investigator. His papers on Mr. Wood's discoveries at Ephesus, on Dr. Schliemann's discoveries at Mycenæ, on those of General Cesnola's in Cyprus, and of the Germans at Olympia form probably the best summary account in English of the results of this series of extraordinary discoveries and researches. Interesting when printed separately, these essays gain in worth by being brought together, through their mutual relations and through the illustration which each affords to the rest.

The most elaborate and valuable, however, of the papers in this volume is that which occupies a quarter of it, the essay upon Greek Inscriptions. The additions made to the knowledge of antiquity during the last forty years have in no department been greater than in that of inscriptions. The number of inscriptions contained in Böckh's invaluable "Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum," published from 1839 to 1850, is somewhat more than nine thousand; the number now known, published and unpublished, "cannot be stated with certainty, but may be reckoned at from twenty thousand to thirty thousand," and this number is yearly increasing. Much has been done by various scholars, especially in Germany and France, to render accessible to the general student portions of this vast mass of historical and philological material, but there is still need of a comprehensive work that shall classify the whole store of inscriptions according to their age, country, and subject, that shall indicate their comparative importance, and shall serve as an introduction to their study. In the absence of such a work Mr. Newton has attempted in this excellent essay to sketch out a rough classification, to define the limits of the subject-matter, and to illustrate by special examples the varied interest and importance of these instructive records of antiquity. He has succeeded in presenting a clear view of this wide department of learning, and in giving, in the brief compass of little more than a hundred pages, an instructive, serviceable, and entertaining compend of information concerning many of the chief points of ancient history, customs, and language of which the inscriptions afford knowledge, or on which they throw vivid illustration.

Among the most precious of the whole series of inscriptions is one the discovery of which is due, in considerable measure, to Mr. Newton himself.† Herodotus, after describing the victory of the Greeks at Platæa, B.C. 479 (viii. 81), says that a tenth of the booty was set apart for the Delphian god, and of it was made the golden tripod which stands on the bronze serpent with the three heads, close to the altar at Delphi. On this tripod Thucydides (i. 133) tells us that Pausanias, the ambitious and arrogant general of the Lacedæmonians, had a distich inscribed in which he took to himself the credit of the victory; but at the time of his subsequent disgrace the Lacedæmonians erased this distich, and substituted in its place the names of all the cities that had united in overthrowing the barbarian, and in dedicating the offering. The golden tripod was part of the plunder abstracted from Delphi by the Phocians in the Sacred War, B.C. 354, but the bronze stand remained and was seen in the temple at Delphi by Pausanias, the traveller, in the second century of our era. In the fourth century it was transferred to Constantinople by order of the Emperor Constantine, and placed in the Hippodrome, where it has stood till the present day. Gradually a mass of earth and rubbish had accumulated around it, and in 1855, when the Western Powers occupied Constantinople, a firman was obtained for Mr. Newton authorizing excavations in the Hippodrome. After digging to the depth of rather more than six feet he came to the base of the serpent. The entire height of the monument from the plinth on which it stands is nearly eighteen feet. The portion that had been buried was thickly encrusted with an earthy coating. Mr. Newton was obliged to leave Constantinople without making a thorough examination of the portion of the serpent which had been uncovered. But "in January, 1856," says Mr. Newton (in his 'Travels and Discoveries in the Levant,' ii. 29), "Dr. Otto Frick, a German archæologist, hearing that letters had been discovered on the bronze, examined its whole surface minutely. After the incrustation had been removed by acid a long inscription appeared, following the spirals of the serpent from the base upwards to a little higher than the surface of the soil removed by me. . . . After a labor which lasted some weeks, the inscription was finally deciphered." It was found to correspond precisely with what the statements of Herodotus and Thucydides gave reason to expect, save that it was not upon the tripod itself but upon its support. It contained the names of the Greek states which had taken an active part in the defeat of the Persians, and one of the coils exhibits traces of that erasure which Thucydides records of the distich originally inscribed by order of Pausanias. There is hardly a monument of Greek antiquity with a more extraordinary history or a more curious interest than this.

At the close of his paper on Mr. Wood's discoveries at Ephesus Mr. Newton says: "When we think how much history has gained by the exploration, partial and inadequate as it has been, of the ruins of Ephesus, when we review the marvellous discoveries which have recently taken place in Cyprus and the Troad, and which are actually now going on at Olympia and Mycenæ, we feel bound to ask the question, Why, in a generation distinguished beyond all previous generations for historical research, for wealth, leisure, and facilities for travelling, so little has been done for the investigation of the sites of ancient cities?" And in concluding his essay on the Discoveries at Olympia he asks, "Is it too much to hope that some other nation may come forward to emulate the enlightened spirit which has undertaken this arduous and costly enterprise, not for the advantage of the German nation alone, but for the common benefit of all to whom classical archæology is matter of interest? Many sites could be named, both in Greece and Turkey, which promise a rich field for archæological research; it seems strange that in this nineteenth century, which claims to be the 'heir of all the ages,' there should be so few laborers to gather in so ripe and abundant a harvest." The justice of this complaint and the force of this appeal are obvious. There is great work yet to be done in classical regions in recovering from the earth the precious records of the history of the most brilliant race that ever occupied any portion of her surface. The knowledge of ancient Greece still remains half buried. Melos is not the only island where a goddess has lain concealed for many centuries; nor Olympia the only site of a temple whose fragments are precious and instructive remains of the noblest art. England does not seem to have answered as yet to Mr. Newton's appeal, but in our own country the first steps have been taken by the Archæological Institute of America in the organization of an expedition for the thorough investigation of one of the sites of Greek culture, which promises to yield an abundant harvest. The expense of such an expedition is large, and the Institute deserves the support and contributions not only of professed scholars, but of men of wealth who have the interest of learning at heart, and who wish to see our country take creditable part in the honorable work of enlarging the bounds of one of the most interesting and important domains of knowledge.

Cooking and Castle-Building. By Emma P. Ewing. (Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1880.)—The relations of cookery to rhetoric furnished a text for one of the dialogues of Plato; the relations of rhetoric to cookery constitute the ground-work of Mrs. Ewing's book. How to describe the preparation of an omelet so that another person may make it by following the printed directions, and so that the resulting compound shall be a real omelet and not scrambled eggs, is by no means an easy task, as the authoress shows by her own early attempts to produce the article in question. "Stir it gently with a fork," says a standard authority. What is stirring? Shall it be stirred at the top, or the bottom, or passim? Shall the fork be held vertically or horizontally? Stirring gently means inserting the tines of the fork horizontally underneath the omelet while it is cooking and lifting it here and there, so that the uncooked portions may reach the pan and thus the whole attain uniform consistency instead of being a mass of baked egg enclosed in leather. This is all simple enough when you are told what is really meant by stirring gently with a fork. In short, the trouble with most cook-books is that their definitions are open to the same objection which Socrates raised to Gorgias' definition of rhetoric: they admit of a great variety of interpretations. Mrs. Ewing has endeavored to furnish one which shall leave the inexperienced housekeeper no chance to go wrong in the ordinary processes of preparing palatable and wholesome food. She does not enter the domain of "made dishes," and that department of the art known as French cookery, but confines herself to bread, beefsteak, coffee, eggs, potatoes, and other things of most common use (about one hundred in number), which are most frequently spoiled before they are brought to the table—the whole thrown into the form of narrative and conversation, so as to possess a literary as well as culinary interest. The aim of the writer has been in every case to give the reasons for doing thus and so, so that the cook may become an artist and not a mere mechanic. She has succeeded so well that we must regret that she did not go one step farther and give her readers an insight into the chemistry of cooking, showing what changes are wrought in the substances by the action of heat applied in the various methods of roasting, boiling, and baking, and why it is that a mistaken use of heat as applied to a given substance renders it injurious to health. The clearness and tact which Mrs. Ewing exhibits in the particular work which she has attempted, seem well fitted for popularizing the subject in its scientific aspects.

Old Paris: its Court and Literary Salons. By Lady Jackson. (New York: Henry Holt & Co.)—There is no better period for a monograph than the century from the assassination of Henry IV. to the last years of Louis XIV. France left Austria and Spain in the rear and became the great nation. Society, manners, thought, even costume to a certain extent, assumed their modern form. Admirable dramas, essays, memoirs, novels, sermons, in uninterrupted succession, vast wars, great captains—a new world, in short, arose, over which for many years ruled Louis le Grand, Deodatus, Sol nec pluribus impar, giving law to a brilliant aristocracy and to Europe. Bayle tells a story of a Turkish ambassador who was taken to see a tournament. When asked how he liked it, he answered: "If it is for sport it is too much; if for earnest it is not enough." Lady Jackson's book as a history of the period is of little value, and for amusement there is too much unnecessary padding and diffuseness of description. We have had to submit to the invasion of literature by the newspaper reporter, but there does seem a sort of sacrilege when his method is applied to a period in which wit, neatness of expression, and polish were carried to perfection. Lady Jackson treats the famous shades of the seventeenth century with the easy and patronizing familiarity of "our own correspondent." Nevertheless, to choose a good subject is in itself half a success, and this book will probably have a run in the circulating libraries. It will please people who like to think they are improving their minds; they will imagine they are reading history. And so they are; but it is history which, as Coleridge expressed it, has not only been popularized but plebificated.

Coleridge, Shelley, Goethe. Biographic æsthetic studies. By George H. Calvert. (Boston: Lee & Shepard.)—Mr. Calvert's three essays have a certain value. Collections of the main facts in the life of a literary man and of anecdotes about him are convenient, and they have an advantage over encyclopædia notices in that they are fuller and have a greater chance of being read by those not directly interested in the men they deal with. But if these essays were put forward with a different view, as contributions to the critical estimate of these men's works or as lifelike portraits of them in their personality, they must receive scant praise. Mr. Calvert's criticism is unadulterated eulogy of a profuse and fanciful order; it throws a false color upon the facts rehearsed; its method is valueless in treating any one of these three men. Of Coleridge much remains to be said; there is no adequate account of him as a man, as a representative of that class of intellects which are mostly active in generating disconnected ideas, and especially as a thinker whose intellectual life was really lived in his disciples' work. Of Shelley much has been said, but not much well said; Mr. Calvert, however, does not contribute anything of consequence, either in the way of fact, truth, or opinion to our knowledge of these two. The essay on Goethe need not be counted. We have before had occasion to notice Mr. Calvert's style; as good an example of its affectedness (to note only one quality) as could be given is where he terms Shelley's subscription of £500 to save an embankment an "angelic extravagance."

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1880.

The Week.

UP to the adjournment last week the incidental rather than the main business of Congress proved most interesting. In the course of the debate on Mr. Wood's Funding Bill, in Committee of the Whole, Gen. Weaver got the floor to express his undying opposition to any scheme of funding which took from Government the power to liquidate the national debt at its pleasure and convenience. Speaker Randall became engaged with him in the most deferential manner, but had the ill-luck to recall the Democratic opposition to the "act to strengthen the public credit"—namely, by declaring the bonds payable in coin and not in paper. Gen. Weaver improved the opportunity to read to the House a number of edifying extracts from Democratic platforms, State and national, showing the party's steady fall from grace from the time (only twelve years ago) when it wanted the United States bonds paid in greenbacks. While he himself had reached that doctrine by deserting the Republican ranks, the Democrats had gone on camping "every four years exactly where the Republican party camped four years before." Gen. Weaver's opponents had some difficulty in meeting his points, and in order to make their counter citations from Republican greenback platforms pertinent they had to charge him with treacherously playing into the hands of the Republicans during the late campaign. This led finally to his saying to Mr. Sparks, of Illinois, "The gentleman is crazy," and to Mr. Sparks's replying, "The gentleman states a falsehood"; and this again to threats of personal chastisement and exchange of "fighting weights" on both sides, and finally to—

"Mr. WEAVER:—I denounce the gentleman personally as a liar on the floor of this House.

"Mr. SPARKS:—You are a scoundrel and a villain and a liar, and if you get within my reach I will hit you."

The House, which had more or less enjoyed the fun of the debate, was in the mood for assisting in the encounter which these words provoked and nearly caused. The Speaker, indeed, had to resume his chair and call upon the Sergeant-at-Arms to appear with his mace.

Next day a fruitless effort was made to expel the offending members, but they were allowed to apologize, and the whole matter was laid on the table. In the Senate Mr. Morgan called up his resolution, offered at the last session, denying the Vice-President's right to count the electoral votes, and accompanied it with a dry rehearsal of the arguments going to prove not only the Vice-President's constitutional disability, but the absolute control of the whole matter by the two Houses, irrespective of any law passed or to be passed for the regulation of the count. Mr. Edmunds agreed with Mr. Morgan as to the Vice-President and differed from him totally as to the power of Congress, and disposed of the alleged urgency of the resolution by saying that the country would, in the present instance, see that the elected candidate was counted in.

Mr. Conkling took occasion on Wednesday week, in discussing the right of a Government employee to profit by an improved linchpin invented by him in part outside of his office hours, to make some remarks on the general right of the Government to control an employee's movements when his day's work is at an end. What he had in mind was, of course, the famous Executive order which forbade the participation of Government employees in the management of caucuses and conventions. He declared that when the Government attempts to follow the employee beyond the limits of his office hours, and tell him "whether, in hours which are his own, he shall devote his time to the efforts of inventive genius, or whether he shall attend religious or spiritual meetings, or political meetings, or shall do anything else, the Government, in his (my) opinion, is a tyrant—not a petty tyrant, as an individual might be, but a bald, insolent usurper," etc., etc. Now, these observations show that Mr. Conkling's estimable father made a mistake "in teaching him to reason and correcting his errors," for the parent's object in training his son to detect fallacies was undoubtedly to enable him to avoid them. Had he foreseen that it would have been used by the son to construct fallacies for use in his business, in order to confuse and deceive his fellowmen, undoubtedly he would have withheld the instruction which has made so deep an impression on General Grant. In the case before us the son tries, in a way that would undoubtedly have pained his logical father, to make it appear that an office-holder attends "religious and spiritual meetings" in the same character in which he attends political meetings and with the same aims, and that, if you see no harm in his attending the former, you are estopped from objecting to his attending the latter. He suggests too, but does not say, that he himself would freely permit a custom-house officer under a Republican administration to attend political meetings of any sort—such as Democratic conventions—which he knows is untrue. If any custom-house officer did so, Mr. Conkling would himself be the first to appear "as a bald, insolent usurper" and demand his removal. In fact, if we accept as true General Grant's account of the Senator's logical education, his speech about this linchpin ought to warn all parents of the danger of teaching a boy to reason before they are sure that he has an honest mind. It is only to honest minds that logic is useful. To all others it is hurtful. It is to these what a good stroke is to the fraudulent professional oarsman, or a "pleasing address" to the confidence man.

The rejoicing over what is called the downfall of Kelly has been general and cordial, but in the light of recent municipal history and of Kelly's career it seems, we regret to say, somewhat premature. He has to be sure, in losing the comptrollership, lost the distribution of much patronage, but it is by no means upon the direct control of patronage that his influence in Tammany has exclusively depended. To Tammany he is still a great leader, and his recent reverse is accepted as a stroke of bad luck in a game to the rules of which his followers faithfully subscribe. The only really efficient means of dislodging a Tammany Boss has been demonstrated to be an indictment, although that is not to be implicitly relied upon under all circumstances. Moreover, Kelly has been in precisely his present position heretofore without serious loss to his prestige. He ceased to be sheriff as he has ceased to be comptroller, and at least twice before his management has brought defeat upon his party, and in spite of everything he has not only retained but strengthened his autocratic rule. After the "Hackett campaign" there was the same talk in the Tammany ranks of procuring some other Boss, but Kelly called his "Committee on Organization" together and proceeded to "discipline" refractory clansmen to such good effect that what threatened to become a revolution ended in an insignificant revolt. He has been doing the same thing the past week, and "serious defections" are reported in various districts, but the inference from this drawn by some of the papers, to the effect that his "power" is "crumbling," is no sounder now than hitherto. It will probably be true for some years to come that the best way to deal with Tammany as an organization is to defeat it as often as possible without being too much concerned as to who is at the head of it.

Although a broken week at the Stock Exchange, it was an exceptionally active one. The speculation was given an investment character by taking up dividend shares and applying to them all the arts used in handling "fancy" stocks; several of them were run up to prices never before reached and hardly dreamed of. The reasoning used is that the interest on more than $600,000,000 United States bonds is to be reduced to 3 or 3½ per cent.; that investors will seek railroad bonds and shares; that they will buy the former up to prices which will yield 4 per cent., and the latter up to figures which will yield 5 per cent. annual income. As the leading railroads are now dividing 8 per cent. per annum, their business being profitable beyond precedent, it will be seen that the application of this reasoning to the stock market makes prices seem plausible which would otherwise be regarded as preposterous. There is no sign yet of the present speculative craze ending, and very likely the early part of the new year will witness a continuance of it. The banks are getting into stronger position; foreign exchange still rules in favor of gold imports, but the arrivals during the week were comparatively small. The Treasury began paying out January interest on Tuesday, and the amount of its January disbursements will reach nearly $25,000,000. The January dividends of various corporations will be larger this year than ever before.

We were undoubtedly mistaken in our estimate of the immediate consequences which would follow the coinage of a silver dollar worth more than the gold dollar, and persons who are preparing letters to us on the subject may therefore save themselves the trouble. The matter has little practical importance, however, as Secretary Sherman's proposal was simply to make the silver dollar equal to the gold dollar. Apropos of this, the London Economist points out that the price of silver in the London market has ranged from 51 to 54 pence per ounce since 1877, so that there would have apparently to be a readjustment every year in order to keep the two coins at par.

The English Court of Appeal has just rendered a decision which is likely to cause a good deal of surprise among lawyers and unprofessional men, both in England and the United States. The appeal affirms the decision of the judges below, to the effect that a wife has no right to pledge her husband's credit unless she is duly authorized by him to do so, as in the case of any other kind of agent. The impression has long prevailed that married women were at liberty to supply themselves with all kinds of articles suitable to their position in life on their husband's credit, but it seems that the English law now is that this right is derived solely from an authority conferred and revokable by the husband. If he has been in the habit of paying bills contracted by his wife with particular tradesmen, the authority may be implied from the course of dealing, but even in such a case it may be withdrawn at pleasure. Theoretically this decision is calculated to cause a joyful excitement among husbands all over the world, and a corresponding depression and melancholy among wives, but practically we doubt very much whether its results will be serious. Among well-to-do people it is a necessity of the case that there should be an authority from the husband to make purchases and incur expenses of all kinds, and it is unlikely that this authority would be revoked or qualified except where matters between husband and wife had become seriously complicated, and in fact reached the point of an open quarrel. Among the poorer classes the right of pledging a husband's credit has at no time been a valuable privilege, the husband in most cases having no credit to be pledged; at the same time in some instances the right may be of use for the purpose of marital discipline, and may therefore be recognized as among the few remaining legal privileges of married men as such.

It is difficult to make out from the cable despatches the precise scope of the telephone decision rendered in England. The practical effect of the decision is to make the purchase by the Government of the telegraphs cover all future inventions for the transmission of messages by electricity; and since the decision the Post-office has made a public announcement that it is prepared to furnish the means of communication by telephone throughout Great Britain. The case will be appealed, but the decision of the lower court is unanimous. There would seem to be great room for a difference of opinion as to the meaning of the words "electric signals" in the act of Parliament. Electric signals are undoubtedly made use of in the telephone, but only for the subsidiary purpose of bringing the persons who desire to use the instrument into communication with each other. This having been done, the subsequent communication is not by means of signals, but is entirely oral, precisely resembling ordinary conversation, with the exception that the transmitting medium is different and the interval of space is greater. As a matter of law the decision must, unless reversed, be regarded as right, but it would be a very high handed act for the Government under it to appropriate the private telephones throughout the country, for the very plain reason that at the time of the Government purchase of the telegraphs the telephone was not an existent invention, and no purchase of it was contemplated or dreamed of by either party to the transaction. This has nothing to do, of course, with the construction of the words in the act of Parliament. It cannot be said that the result furnishes to the opponents of Government monopolies a new argument against them; it rather furnishes a new argument against the loose manner in which statutes affecting private rights are drawn up.

The South Carolina Legislature has been doing some excellent work. One of its acts provides very stringent penalties for duelling, which will be effective if juries can be got to enforce them. Another exempts immigrants from taxation for three years after their arrival. We would recommend, however, in addition to this, and as a supplement to it, the provision of a good pension for all persons maimed in "personal difficulties," and aid for their wives or children or aged and infirm parents, in case of their death. If a community enjoys or tolerates savage fights on its streets and highways, it ought in common decency to pay something for the fun. If it expects men on pain of disgrace to cut and shoot those who offend them, it ought to provide for the disabled and for the families of the fallen, just as it provides for the wounded and the families of the slain whom it forces into the army in time of war. In shooting and stabbing, South Carolina and Mississippi now stand in the same scale as Albania and Corsica. Montenegro and Sicily have, we believe, risen above them in self-restraint and respect for law. The Albanian, however, has the advantage in manliness, as he carries his weapons in a large belt on his stomach, in full view of everybody, so that any one who does not care for discussion with him can keep out of his way. In South Carolina and Mississippi, on the other hand, one may any day get into a dispute with a gentleman who in dress and other externals has the air of a minister of the Gospel, but has concealed in his pockets behind his back the full outfit of a brigand and assassin of the worst type.

The contract between Dr. Talmage and the publisher of the Advance, the nature of which he is accused of having misrepresented in his testimony on his trial before the Presbytery, has been printed and published. It is formal and imperative in its language. It is dated October 4, 1876, and its second clause binds Talmage to "cease his editorial connection with the Christian at Work in one month from October 12, if not before," and "in the next issue—i.e., October 12—of the said Christian at Work to announce and state that he is now become editor of the Advance." Another agreement, made on the 9th of December following, refers to this first contract as "a contract mutually signed and agreed to" by the same parties. On the trial Dr. Talmage swore on his direct examination that when he went down to his office on the morning of the 9th of October, five days after the execution of the first contract, he "had no idea" of writing and printing the valedictory in the Christian at Work announcing his transfer to the Advance, which he did write and print on the evening of that day, and he added that not only had he "no idea" of it when he left home in the morning, but had none "at any other period." The first contract he described as "a memorandum," which was "not finally concluded until the afternoon in October 9." In his cross-examination he repeated "that the finality of our arrangement [that is, with the Advance] had not been reached on the 9th," but protected himself against questions as to whether he had any idea of writing the valedictory when he left home in the morning of the 9th by declaring that he "did not remember." He testified on the direct examination, however, that on leaving home in the morning "he was much impressed with the fact that something decisive might happen that day," so much so that after leaving his house he went back, ascended to the fourth story, "locked the door, and knelt down and asked God that whatever he might be called to do that day he might do with reference to the judgment, and that he might be directed in every thing." As a consequence of this he felt sure "that he made no mistake in that," for "he had the theory that if our religion is not practical enough to get direction when we do not know what to do, there is not much in religion." That is, we suppose, if it does not help a man in making a bargain it is of no great value. It seems a little hard under these circumstances to prosecute him for perjury, but perhaps his enemies have been "getting direction" also in the same manner, and feel sure they are right in following him up. It is reported that he declines to answer the charge under advice of his "counsel," another minister, Dr. Spear, which, if true, is a very droll introduction into the spiritual forum of the methods of accused officials at the City Hall. We may hear before long of a well-to-do Catholic going to the confessional attended by his lawyer to see that he does not criminate himself too deeply.

By the way, the prosecutors must not overlook Major B. R. Corwin, the prominent member—perhaps elder—of Dr. Talmage's church through whose instrumentality the contracts are said to have come to light. This gentleman witnessed the first contract, and probably knew its contents. If so, and he now thinks Dr. Talmage committed perjury in the account he gave of it, he ought to be disciplined vigorously for sitting silent in the Tabernacle ever since April of last year, and giving the world to understand that he thought the pastor a spotless man. We also beg to direct the attention of the ecclesiastical authorities to C. H. Howard & Co., the proprietors of the Advance, who have laid themselves open to a similar charge on stronger evidence. The vigorous pursuit of the whole party will, pace Dr. Field, be a good thing for the Church and the world, and especially for the young men in the theological seminaries, whom the success of the "sensational" preachers has now for some years been debauching.

Mr. Trescott has come back from China bringing the new treaty with him, but refuses to give any sign as to its contents until it has been submitted to the Senate, or to say whether the reports about it which have appeared in the American papers are correct or not. There is, however, no doubt about one thing, and that is that the obligation to admit Chinamen to this country without let or hindrance has been abrogated, and that restrictions on their coming may now be imposed by this Government; so that if the treaty shall be ratified by the Senate, and acted on in legislation, Republicans as well as Democrats will have given their sanction to the doctrine that race does make a difference in men, and that all races are by no means equally well qualified to live under the Stars and Stripes. What is odd about this is, that the same men recognize the reasonableness on the part of the Californians of a view of color which when taken by the South Carolinians and Mississippians rouses them to fury.

The exhibit made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the condition and prospects of the finances of the United States, and the immense refunding scheme foreshadowed in it, has naturally made a deep impression in Europe. No such pecuniary ease has ever been witnessed on the part of a really great state in modern times. Prussia had savings in the treasury from the time of the great Frederic down to the French war, and the Canton of Berne had a considerable hoard, which, if we remember rightly, was gobbled up by the first Napoleon. Venice, too, used to be what the farmers call "forehanded"; but none of these were great states, or handled the enormous sums which flow in and out of the American Treasury. The credit of the United States now all but reaches that of Great Britain, and if it continues below it, it will be due to the creditors' fear of being paid off too soon. Probably the oddest effect of this extraordinary financial spectacle on the European mind appears in the case of the London Spectator, from which it elicits the reproach that so rich and prosperous a Government should do something to help struggling and oppressed peoples, but does nothing, which is shameful. This is a very extraordinary charge—leaving out of sight what the United States does do for the unfortunate of other climes—considering that it is only one year since Great Britain was working both by arms and diplomacy to put Christians back under the Porte, or prevent their escape, and was slaughtering Afghans and burning their villages because they refused to receive a British envoy. The whole business of succoring "oppressed nationalities" is an immense snare and delusion. To do so with effect an enormous military or naval force has to be kept on foot, which, when there are no oppressed ready for deliverance, is very apt to be used to do a little oppression just to keep the men in practice.

The trial of the Land-Leaguers opened on Tuesday in Dublin, but at this writing the proceedings have not gone beyond the impanelling of the jury. We beg to call Judge Davis's attention to the fact that Chief-Justice May has been so impressed by the public indignation over his unseemly attack on the defendants when deciding a preliminary motion for the postponement of the trial, that he has announced that he will not sit in the case. Opinions still seem to vary as much as ever about the probable result of the trial, but the chances are undoubtedly in favor of a disagreement of the jury. Jurors, even in the cities, are becoming afraid of being "boycotted"—that is, of having their business ruined by refusals to deal with or employ them. Captain Boycott himself, however, has made a good thing by his sufferings, inasmuch as $70,000 have been raised for his benefit by voluntary subscription, while he claimed only $30,000 from the Government. Mr. Bence Jones is gallantly holding his own, with the assistance of armed retainers, and will have materials before long for a very entertaining magazine article. To Mr. Forster's circular calling on the magistrates to enforce the existing law against the perpetrators of outrages and rioters and "boycotters," 700 magistrates have replied that it is out of their power to do so. They can get no evidence on which they can act. A new and very ugly symptom of the crisis is the beginning of attempts to assassinate the police, who have hitherto been allowed to pass harmless, and who, as they patrol in twos and in the night, are very much exposed. There are already thirty thousand troops in Ireland, but they are, of course, useless except against an armed outbreak, of which there is no sign. The Leaguers have hit on a more effective process than open rebellion. The question whether those defendants in the pending trial who are members of Parliament—five, we believe, in all—will be able to appear in their places in the House on the 6th of January is growing in interest as the day draws nearer, owing to the determination of the Leaguers to resist any attempt to pass a coercion bill by every means in their power, fair or foul, and the absence of Parnell, who is a master in the art of obstruction, would be a serious blow to them. He talks, it is said, of defying the court and going over to England.

But it is now positively announced that a coercion bill will be introduced as soon as Parliament meets, its leading feature and the most effective one being the suspension of the habeas corpus. The English and Scotch members of all parties and the majority of the Irish members will support it, and there can be no reasonable doubt that as soon as the Government has the power of arbitrary arrest the intimidation of the Land League will cease, because its directors will have to fly or go to jail, and the minor ones will fly. The Cabinet will introduce a Land Tenure Bill, it is announced, simultaneously with the Coercion Bill, and it will contain in some shape the "three f's," and probably provide for emigration on a large scale from the western coast, where the soil is so wet and the climate so bad that "fixity of tenure" would be a curse. This is all very well, but the pity of it is that it should not have been done before Parnell had plunged the country into anarchy. It teaches once more the old and bad lesson of Irish politics, that the British Parliament never takes up Irish grievances seriously until the reign of violence has begun. The land movement, apart from the violence, has spread to Ulster, and it is conceded on all hands that a radical change in the system of tenure is unavoidable.

The Powers are reported to have all agreed to settle the Turco-Greek dispute by arbitration. The Turks are apparently ready for this or for anything which causes delay, but the Greeks are not. The present Premier declares that Greece will take nothing less than the award of the Berlin Treaty as confirmed by the Supplemental Conference, and will fight for it if necessary as soon as the spring opens. Turkey offers as a compromise a considerable increase of territory, but proposes to retain Janina and Metsovo. Janina, however, is to the Greeks of prime importance, and in this she will not yield. As arbitration involves the voluntary submission of the matter in dispute by the disputants, its success in the present case does not seem probable. The only form of coercion the Powers can bring to bear on the Greeks is refusal to assist them in case they go to war, but this will probably be neutralized by the fact that the Greeks believe they can drive out the Turks themselves, and that in any case they will be aided by risings in Macedonia and Rumelia. Sir Charles Dilke asserts positively that Austria is acting in cordial union with England; but the Greeks are undoubtedly suffering from the British troubles in Ireland and South Africa. In the latter the Boers have had some slight successes, but reinforcements are hurrying out rapidly, and their independence, as they are not a warlike race, will be short lived.

THE DUTY OF THE DEMOCRATS TOWARDS THE TARIFF.

NOW that the Democrats seem disposed to provide themselves with a set of principles, and to meet the Republicans on some other ground than the desirableness of "a change," it is rather surprising that they are not giving more attention to the issue made up for them in the last canvass by the open committal of the Republican party to protection as a fixed and permanent policy. Tariff reform is not very far removed from civil-service reform, and in the latter the Democrats have begun to profess a very lively interest. Some revival of attention to the former, too, is rendered the more necessary on their part by the extraordinary abandonment of the "tariff-for-revenue-only" plank in their platform, by which they made the late campaign so memorable, and by the fact that a hostility to high tariff is now the one tradition by which the Democrats of to-day can maintain their historic relation to the Democrats of the period before the war. Everything else is gone. If the Democrats of our time can stand the present tariff with complacency, there is no more connection between them and the men from whom they have taken their name than between them and the Whigs. The crudities and absurdities of our present tariff are admitted on all sides, and every report emanating from the Treasury Department adds fresh proof of the difficulties in collecting the revenue under it. In spite of this there is no denying the fact that the universal interest which the people of this country formerly took in tariff legislation has ceased to exist.

With the great increase in the inland Western population the proportion of the people which comes into contact with the revenue service has greatly diminished and is steadily diminishing. It is now only an insignificant minority which has any personal knowledge of the inconveniences and burdens under which importers carry on their business. In the last generation, when the tariff controversy greatly occupied the public mind, nearly everybody lived within easy reach of the seaboard, and had some acquaintance with the conditions and uses of foreign trade. Now the great bulk of the population knows and cares little about it, or thinks of it simply as a process by which mischievous luxuries are imported for the rich. This growth of what may be called a powerful inland opinion has also constituted, and still constitutes, one of the difficulties of the currency question. The Eastern man, being largely engaged in the business of exchange with foreign countries, and being still strongly influenced by the traditions and experience of a time when foreign trade was a principal part of American activity, is naturally greatly impressed by the international function of money. The Western man, on the other hand, who, though he finds a market for a large portion of his commodities abroad, has little direct share in the work of exporting or importing, thinks it preposterous that foreign opinion or practice should have any influence on our monetary legislation, and, in fact, tends distinctly towards that condition of exclusiveness which Mr. Stanley Matthews expressed so naïvely when he asked, in one of the silver debates, "What have we to do with abroad?" The difficulty there has been, and still is, in procuring any legislative assistance in recovering our share of the carrying trade, is another illustration of the same preponderating influence of inland opinion and interests. The Western man cares little about the carrying trade. He feels none of the shame which fills the dwellers in the sea-ports at seeing it all done under a foreign flag, and he turns a deaf ear to the appeal for free ships or free ship-building materials. It is thus easily seen that, even putting aside the consideration of the extent to which the inland population has engaged in manufactures that owe their existence or prosperity to the present tariff, it would be no easy matter to revive the old interest which once made the tariff the battle-ground of the two great parties. It will be twenty or thirty years before the West comes again into close commercial relations with foreign countries which the mass of the people will see and appreciate.

The consequence of all this is that if the Democratic party should now take up the tariff reform as an issue—and the events of the late canvass seem to make it impossible for them to avoid it—they will have to take it up as a matter of principle as well as a matter of expediency; that is, they will have to show that tariff legislation for indiscriminate and perpetual protection is unjust as well as unprofitable and self-destructive. They will have to infuse a good deal of pure free trade into their demands for a tariff for revenue only, and they will not under the most favorable circumstances find it a subject that their orators will take to kindly at first. We are still so much dominated by "war issues," and have had so much experience of what may be called dramatic politics, that it will take some time for the public to get back to the state of mind in which the champion of a high tariff was a popular hero. The curious way in which the tariff question has now to have a sugar-coating of sentiment in order to make it useful for campaign purposes, was well shown in Mr. Blaine's appeal to the Irish last summer to stand by the high tariff, because if it were lowered they would get the goods of their English enemies and oppressors cheap. In Indiana and Ohio, too, there was little or no discussion by the Republicans, any more than by the Democrats, of the tariff theory. What the orators said was, that if the Democrats got into power they would suddenly lower the duties and American artisans would be thrown out of employment, which might be all true and yet the high tariff be a very bad thing.

In whatever way the discussion may be managed, however, nothing but a clear and decided advocacy of a "tariff for revenue only" by the Democrats seems likely to force the Republicans to admit the necessity even of tariff reform—that is, to set about the excision of the absurdities and crudities of the present tariff and to consent to a moderate reduction of duties. In a discussion between free trade and diminished protection there would be a good deal to be said on both sides, since a sudden and total abandonment of the protectionist policy is, of course, not to be thought of. No party would think of facing the financial convulsion which any such step would cause. But the indefinite maintenance of the present tariff is equally out of the question. Many leading protectionists admit this, and are prepared to submit to extensive modifications of it. The real reason why these modifications have not been made before now is, besides the lack of popular interest in the subject in the interior, which we have above described, that no political party has asked for them. The Democrats have now for so many years neglected the real work of an Opposition that the Republicans have really been left to correct their own extravagances and errors at their own time and in their own way, and self-correction by a political party is, as every reader of history knows, a very slow and uncertain and imperfect process. Considering how the Democrats have behaved, the wonder is that the Republicans have done so much, and what they have done has had somewhat the air of a sovereign grace. That worst feature of the war tariff, the moiety system, and the monstrous machinery of coercion by which it was supported and executed, went on for years in this city without being taken up by the Democrats, until the Republican officials went too far and publicly pillaged a leading Republican merchant. It was then reformed. The revision of the tariff, too, will have to be brought about by its being made the Democratic "main question." There will very little if anything come of keeping tariff reform on hand as part of a "miscellaneous assortment" of issues, to be displayed now and then in platforms, like the silks and shawls in the window of a dry-goods store, and it will have to be advocated by men who are really interested in it and understand it. It is a question which cannot be successfully handled by men-of-all-work. There are, unfortunately, but few of the Democratic orators of later years who have given much attention to it, but younger men are coming forward and can be had whose advocacy will have the ring of conviction.

MUNICIPAL AND FEDERAL REFORM.

MR. EDWARD COOPER, after having, by the aid of a combination in the Board of Aldermen, succeeded in making certain appointments of city officials which two years ago it was expected he would make immediately upon his election, will go out of office at the end of this week. It cannot be disputed that in many respects the new men are better than the old, nor that Mr. Cooper has by means of this "deal" given the city a chance of better government than it has had of late; but neither Mr. Cooper nor those who united in securing his election can feel overjoyed at the way the thing has been accomplished. It is rather instructive to compare the publicly-announced expectations of the supporters of Mr. Cooper two years ago with the results. He was nominated by a union between anti-Tammany and Republican politicians, but he was supported by that large body of voters which has for some years fluctuated between the contending factions, as the cause of municipal good government seemed to make it for their interest to do. One of their chief organs has always been the New York Times, and in the fall of 1878 the Times had a great deal, naturally, to say about Mr. Cooper and the probable results of his election. Notwithstanding the many disappointments it had had to endure at the hands of former mayors, its hopefulness had never been greater, as a few extracts from its columns will show. Two weeks before the day of election it pointed out that Mr. Cooper's "thorough acquaintance with the details of municipal affairs" would "render him incapable of being used by men who are ready to turn to questionable account their knowledge of the intricacies of local administration." A few days later it returned to the subject in these words:

"Apart altogether from the very rigid scrutiny which a reform mayor would be expected to make into the way in which the work of heads of departments has been done during the last two years, and the removals he might possibly find it necessary to recommend, the new appointments falling within his term involve an all but complete reorganization of the city government."

This was followed by one or two predictions and friendly warnings:

"If we can elect Mr. Cooper and a majority of anti-Tammany aldermen we put an end to the corrupt and extravagant policy which the dictator of the local Democracy has imposed upon the city. . . . It is but seldom that such an opportunity presents itself for ridding New York of the incubus of incapacity and corruption which is working its ruin. Those who fail to turn the opportunity to good account will demonstrate their unfitness to exercise the rights of American citizenship."

On November 5 the Times addressed a few "Last Words to Republicans," reminding them that "the Republican who hesitates about voting for Edward Cooper, the candidate of the people," as against Schell, "the candidate of John Kelly," on account of the connection between Cooper and Tilden, "debases partisanship to the level where it winks at corruption and apologizes for fraud." It took occasion at the same time, rather comically, to warn the reform candidates against "selling out" their associates.

On the 6th, Mr. Cooper having been elected, together with a majority of four in the Board of Aldermen, the Times announced the result as a complete triumph for reform, and expressed its gratification as follows:

"There is hope for free institutions even among the uneducated and half-Americanized mass of New York voters when the arrogant dictation of a would-be political despot has been met by a protest so unmistakably emphatic."

It also proceeded to draw a glowing picture of the blessings in store for the city:

"No mayor since Mr. Havemeyer has had such an opportunity to confer the blessings of good government on New York as will be enjoyed by Mr. Cooper. That he will prove as conspicuously equal to the opportunity as his predecessors have been unequal, we do not entertain the slightest doubt. He has been chosen mayor unhampered by a single pledge, untrammelled by either personal or partisan obligation. He was the people's candidate and he is the people's choice. To them alone belongs his responsibility, and their interests, we feel assured, will be his sole standard of duty."

During the same period the Tribune was more lukewarm in its support of the Reform ticket; but it devoted itself with considerable success to one of the topics always supposed to be intimately connected with municipal reform, and succeeded in getting not only Mr. Cooper but John Kelly and Augustus Schell also to pledge themselves in favor of an absolutely non-partisan Police Board, so that on the 2d of November it was able to announce as the result of its efforts that "we are thus secure from any successful effort to handle the police as a partisan machine."

We think we are speaking within bounds when we say that not only have the predictions not been verified, but they have been reversed. Mr. Cooper's thorough acquaintance with "the details of municipal affairs" has not, in fact, rendered him incapable of being used by politicians. He has never been able to institute any rigid scrutiny into the work of the heads of departments, and so far from being "unhampered by a single pledge" or being "untrammelled by either personal or partisan obligation," his whole official career has been a fulfilment of pledges and obligations. As for security from the use of the police as a "partisan machine," his term of office has been mainly marked by the fiercest partisan efforts on both sides to get control of the Police Board—efforts which no sensible man believes will come to an end even through the recent bargains. That he has had the interests of the public and the city at heart we have no doubt, but the means employed by him to advance them have been solely a series of intrigues by which he has attempted to get, and after two years has finally succeeded in getting, a majority of the Board of Aldermen to confirm his appointments. Most of his nominees have been obscure politicians who have been selected by him, not on account of their fitness for the positions offered them, but for the sake of getting the support of their friends for other nominees of the same class.

In this respect there is a curious resemblance between the careers of Mr. Cooper in New York and Mr. Hayes at Washington. There are, of course, many points at which the parallel would not hold good. Mr. Hayes is President of a nation of fifty millions of people; Mr. Cooper is merely mayor of its largest city. Mr. Hayes, in his efforts at reform, has had to deal with the Senate, a very powerful legislative body, the members of which hold their offices for a longer term than his own, and divide among themselves the patronage which in theory belongs to him. Mr. Cooper has found opposed to him a mock legislative body composed of small city politicians, whose power consists in the opportunity they enjoy of refusing to confirm his appointments. Allowing for these differences, however, what was expected of these two reformers was very much the same. They were both expected to promote efficiency of administration; to see to it that fitness should be the sole test recognized in appointments; and that Boss government, or government by senatorial "groups" (which are essentially the same thing), should be brought to an end. Both were supported and elected by a body of voters who were comparatively independent of party, and mainly interested in reform. In Mr. Hayes's case, exactly as in Mr. Cooper's, the most liberal promises were made by his friends of what he was going to do, and most extravagant hopes were expressed of the benefits likely to flow from the administration of so good a man. It must be confessed, even by those who take the most cheerful views of what Mr. Hayes has done, that he has effected no more towards eradicating the evils of the system at Washington than Mr. Cooper has effected in New York, and for precisely the same reasons in the two cases. Instead of recognizing the fact that good government, like any other good thing, must be fought for, and that what they should have done at the outset was to declare open war not only upon the abuses which they meant to break up, but upon the men who were the living embodiment of the abuses, they apparently made up their minds that the true way was to secure reform through precisely the same kind of intrigue and bargain which have made the abuses so strong. No man in any position can in our time effect any reform without public confidence and support, and this is only won by appeals to public opinion.

Now, reform through intrigue and "dicker" does not appeal to public opinion, or touch the popular imagination, or rouse the popular conscience, or stimulate popular hopefulness. It is essentially a secret process, and essentially a process which involves much base, or seemingly base, compliance, and much seemingly close association with the men who are themselves "part of the thing to be reformed." The way to reform is to reform. The way to purify the civil service, whether municipal or Federal, is to begin by trying to purify it, and to keep trying, and by making every attempt so plain and conspicuous that the dullest man in the country can see what you are aiming at. It may be that the system of reforming by the aid of a little corruption, to which the Mayor and the President have resorted, has merits and sometimes attains its ends. But, even if this be true, the system is open to the fatal objection that the public cannot understand it and is discouraged by it, and that it therefore cannot lead to any radical or permanent improvement. Mr. Hayes, by his concessions to the Boss system, not only has not conciliated the Bosses or destroyed their power (he might have failed to do this under any circumstances), but he has weakened public confidence not simply in his own sincerity but in the practicability of the reform, and strengthened the confidence of all the enemies of reform in the permanence of the abuses by which they live and prosper. In like manner, when Mayor Cooper disregarded the appeals made to him to nominate a fit and proper person for the Commissionership of Charities and Correction, and nominated a German butcher who knew and cared nothing about either charity or correction, he did not increase his own influence for good over the corrupt classes; on the contrary, he satisfied them that he was weak and that they could use him, and he did dishearten those who elected him in the hope that he would prove the broom of reform which the Times described him to be. When a man in President Hayes's or Mr. Cooper's position makes even one conspicuously bad nomination, he destroys all interest in the subsequent good ones he may make. The public, feeling that it has been deceived once, feels that it may be so again, washes its hands once more of "politics," and turns to money-making and barren grumbling. The Senate and the Board of Aldermen find a ready escape from all responsibility or odium in the undeniable assertion that the chief executive officer is just as ready for a "bargain" as they are, and that it by no means follows that they are guilty of obstruction because they do not act readily on his nominations.

The only way in which the system of administration, whether in a city like New York or in the country at large, can be permanently improved is by men in the positions occupied by Mr. Hayes or Mr. Cooper making up their minds that they will rely for support in their efforts for reform solely upon the merits of these efforts; that they will secure the confirmation of their nominees not by means of bargains but by the excellence of the nominations themselves, relying on public opinion to force the politicians to come round to their side in the long run. No one who watches the signs of the times with any care can doubt that the public was never so ready as it is at the present moment to come to the support of any intelligent, independent, and fair attempt to break up the system which throughout the country has brought politics to a dead-lock and made intrigue and favoritism the road to power. There has been no time since the war when party ties have been so loose, party passions so feeble, and the general desire for good government as good government so widespread. But the resolute opposition of the politicians themselves must always be counted upon, and any one who attempts to improve matters by resorting to their tricks may see in the results of such well-intentioned efforts as Mr. Hayes's and Mr. Cooper's exactly how much and how little they are likely to effect.

GEORGE ELIOT.

MANY qualities doubtless contribute to render George Eliot a unique figure in English literature, but among them the most conspicuous is the absolute absorption of her personality in her work, so far as the interest of her public is concerned. To have made so marked an impression upon the literary history of her epoch, and yet to have made so little stir in the world in which she passed a life of sixty years, at a time when nothing that happens goes unchronicled, implies a curious contradiction. It is partly due, of course, to the fact that her life was comparatively uneventful. Probably there was little in it upon which the curiosity felt by the romantic concerning the private life of authors of distinction could feed had it been permitted. Unlike other famous writers of her sex, she did not move in society at all; she neglected it too completely as Marian Evans to be charged with compulsory seclusion as Mrs. Lewes. And though correspondents who, it afterwards appeared, were confident of their ability to divulge inoffensively all they had learnt, were made welcome at Combe Priory, they learnt, as a rule, little to divulge. The lady was small, plain-featured, intelligent-looking, observant rather than animated—in short, a well-bred Englishwoman. Everything else was hearsay. Such a "portrait" of her as Sainte-Beuve used to paint of eminent women, or such a book as Mr. Trollope recently made upon Thackeray, would be impossible in the case of George Eliot. But what is still more singular is that not one in twenty of her readers would probably care for a "portrait" or biography of her, or be interested in sifting the chaff and wheat of the meagre hearsay concerning her. Marian Evans is to readers whose interest in George Eliot is intense a vague and, by comparison, wholly unattractive personality, which it is possible, of course, for a reader to fancy this or that, but only by a kind of speculation proverbially (and here peculiarly) liable to error. Our own notion of George Eliot, for example, which is that of an exceptional but pure mentality, is obviously inapplicable to Marian Evans. In fine, not only was the life of the latter placid to a degree unsuspected, perhaps, before her marriage testified to what could excusably be called an unconquerable serenity of character, but the former is characterized by an objectivity almost unexampled. This is a quality well known long before systematic critics insisted on it as a necessary element in all art, and is doubtless older than Homer, but surely it was never before illustrated to a degree which not only disguises but eliminates interest from the corresponding subjectivity to which it owes its origin.

It is obvious that this is overdoing the matter, and the fact not too unreasonably stimulates speculation. Obviously Shakspere's impersonality is less uncompromising and saner. Is it not possible, one is inclined to ask himself, that Miss Evans was affected by that part of her environment connected with her sex to a degree and in a way not generally set down in sociological textbooks, but recognizable enough to George Eliot, had she met with it in any one; that she more or less consciously proposed to herself to obliterate the sex distinction not by the vulgar method of aping masculinity in specific performances, but by aiming to make of herself an intelligent force rather than a person with idiosyncrasies? What is certain is that George Eliot strikes an attentive sense as being not so much masculine as sexless. One speaks of her masculine strength, her masculine this or that, correctly enough if "unfeminine" is meant, for no writings betray less the feminine point of view in dealing with questions in discussing which other literary women of genius inevitably do betray it. Explanations after the fact are easy, but we doubt if a candid reader would discover anything vital in George Eliot to indicate the author's sex. The femininities are, to be sure, unmistakable; but they are all detail—phases of a pedantic elaborateness which no man of equal gifts would risk writing, for example, but wholly superficial beside the general treatment of character and emotion, which is often far beyond the reach of feminine intuitiveness. Her treatment of sex itself, whenever it is in point, is, speaking with precision, masterly. Any one can illustrate this to himself very vividly by thinking of the contrast presented by George Sand. Take the Tessa episode in 'Romola' as an example of many easily found, and reflect how George Sand would have treated it, how much more we should have been moved by it in that event, but how certainly we should have felt the necessity of supplementing the picture by various unideal but important touches inspired by reflecting on the constitution of society as it exists outside of George Sand's world of passion. In 'Romola' these have all been thought of with masculine prevision and sobriety.

This is unquestionably a great merit. The more enthusiastic of the admirers of George Eliot have this in mind doubtless when they speak, as they never tire of doing, of her masculinity. But evidently this has corresponding disadvantages. Whether or no it has the disadvantage of being unnatural, it is perhaps idle to discuss, the feminine disposition being a subject upon which there is great difference of opinion just at the present day; but axiomatically it may be said to have a tendency hostile to strictly feminine excellences. As a matter of fact, in George Eliot's writings many qualities generally associated with the softer sex, but by no means incompatible with the other, are exhibited up to precisely the point at which a masculine mind would take them, but there dropped with almost automatic definiteness. The result is that in certain directions there is an evident limitation of effect. One has never quite the sense that the matter in hand has been carried to the utmost limit, and that every consideration in the world unconnected with its development has been thrown aside for the moment. There is plenty of reserve, and reserve with suggestiveness is always in some sense more effective than explicitness, but nowhere an absolute abandonment guided solely but securely by the original force of artistic rectitude, which after all is the finest thing. The result is less charm and less power. We are not, of course, content with being profoundly moved by a novelist, but require to be moved rightly as well, before the effect upon us is in any degree the measure of an artist's merit. But to be moved is the first thing, and, as a rule, George Eliot is content with interesting us. The entertainment she provides is in general of a high order. Sometimes, as in the chapter introductions of 'Romola,' drenched in the commonplace, it is tolerably dull; sometimes it is alternately wearisome and exasperating, as in the elaborate inanities of 'Daniel Deronda.' But when she eschews didacticism and teaches philosophy by examples it is of the first class. To the alert-minded and curious reader few pleasures can be greater than that of being taken by the hand, as it were, and conducted through the gallery of George Eliot's character-portraiture by the artist herself. She is then far more attractive than when she is elaborating those sententious epigrams which modern compilers of "elegant extracts" collect with equal ardor and awe. There is too much exactness in this figure, however; admirable as is the portraiture, one seems to be listening to a lecture upon it, which is enjoyable but should be needless, after the fashion in English fiction "ever since"—to use the words of a writer once mistaken for George Eliot—"fiction has taken a turn, for better or worse, for analyzing rather than depicting character and emotion." 'Daniel Deronda' is the jejune exaggeration of this; it tinctures all the predecessors of that book, and the germ of it is plain in the first sketch the author ever made. To carry such a load requires a genius as robust as Thackeray's, and Thackeray is at his best when he fails to encumber himself with it. But whereas with him it is incidental, it becomes with George Eliot, owing to the predominance of a turn for philosophical subtlety over a turn for art, the warp and woof of her weaving, the thing she most insists on, and finally, with a fine irony of retribution, the thing her fanatical admirers most admire her for. How fatal it is to the depiction of passion, to dramatic movement, to the picturesque play of the natural emotions of man engaged in active warfare with the restraints of a highly developed artificial civilization—which is the modern novelist's topic, as it is the theme of the modern poet—one needs only, as we say, to think of the other extraordinary woman of the century to appreciate.

In the case of a writer felt to be so indisputably important as George Eliot, we may be sure that she is at her best somewhere else than where she has successful rivals. Her truest note—indeed her only true note, one may almost say, so conspicuously is it her own—is struck in a sentence of her first story, in which she says: "Depend upon it, my dear lady, you would gain unspeakably if you would learn with me to see some of the poetry and the pathos, the tragedy and the comedy, lying in the experience of the human soul that looks out through dull grey eyes and that speaks in a voice of quite ordinary tones." To call 'The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton' George Eliot's best and most truly characteristic work would be to provoke the derision of the eulogists of 'Daniel Deronda,' but slight as it is we believe it could be so called more truthfully than the more celebrated story. Its personages are drawn with a firm hand, and the "pathos in their very insignificance," of which the author speaks, is affecting enough. The 'Scenes of Clerical Life' were published when George Eliot was nearly forty, and they are as mature—fully as mature—as 'The Impressions of Theophrastus Such.' The low-toned picture, with its grey lights and deep shadows alternating across a wholly unremarkable scene, was followed by others of the same sort in 'Adam Bede,' 'The Mill on the Floss,' and 'Silas Marner' successively. 'Romola,' with all its Florentine mellowness, 'Felix Holt, the Radical,' and 'Middlemarch' are not essentially different. The element of fate pervades them all as distinctly as it does the Greek drama, and it is a force conceived in the spirit characteristic of a century at the birth of whose literary movement the influence of Byron outweighed that of Shakspere. The drear and gloomy strain in George Eliot's novels, which some critics notice with regret and ascribe to the unfortunate influence of Auguste Comte, we believe is nothing but the melancholy which for some reason or other in the more serious work of the Victorian age has wholly excluded the blitheness of the Elizabethan. The finely conceived though somewhat laboriously elaborated character and career of Tito Melema, in 'Romola,' is an admirable embodiment of a phase of it. The fortunes of the brother and sister in 'The Mill on the Floss,' where, on her native heath, the narrator is unencumbered with the impedimenta of erudition, are another. One writes glibly of George Eliot's manner of dealing with the character she can conceive but cannot vivify, of her deficiency in dramatic movement, of her appeal to the mind exclusively, but 'The Mill on the Floss' asserts itself a triumphant exception to very nearly all that one can say of deficiencies. It is unquestionably its author's highest reach, and its power is unmistakable in plot, situations, and characters. The spirit of the sociologist gives place to that of the true romancer in the portrait of Maggie Tulliver; the subtlety often awkwardly evident elsewhere finds a fitting subject for its exercise in that of her brother; the subsidiary portraits, too, are gems, notably Mrs. Glegg; and the elopement and the climax are not only tragic, but tragic with a poetic truth in comparison with which the tragedy of 'The Spanish Gipsy' is purely rhetorical, and that of 'Daniel Deronda' false and hollow. Yet, if we were to select from its various excellences the masterpiece of the book, measured not by the keenness of emotion excited but by a real standard, we confess we should fix upon the character of Tom Tulliver. And as her grey-toned picture is her best, so her colorless characters exhibit her finest art. Tom may stand for the archètype of colorless character. None of Trollope's personages are to be compared with him, which is almost reckless praise. Rosamond Vincy is nearly his equal, and a dozen rivals readily recur to the mind in the various novels. In depicting them—one may begin with the Rev. Amos Barton and verify the statement—the truth that moral character is composite is accepted as elemental, and starting with this goal of an inferior artist the author's skill is expended in exhibiting the multifarious mosaic as it exists in obedience to its own law, rather than as arbitrarily conceived by herself.

The difference between the perfection of such art as George Eliot's, however, and that of which Shakspere is the highest example is one of kind, and to ignore it is to darken critical counsel. It has been said that Maggie Tulliver and Dorothea Brooke are the product of keen introspection, and whether or no the character they share is that of their author, it is clear that here, as elsewhere, their author's faculty is observation rather than divination. Perhaps observation was never before carried so far; it is small wonder that George Eliot has been called the romantic interpreter of the Spencerian philosophy, as this is commonly understood. In keenness it has certainly been equalled by such writers as Mr. Thomas Hardy and Mr. Henry James, jr., but in range it has never been approached. What is surprising is that so admirable a faculty so remarkably developed should have been so widely misconceived, and that her critics should claim for George Eliot imaginativeness and high poetic power. There never was a work less marked by these qualities than 'Romola,' unless it be 'The Spanish Gipsy,' and in each the theme protests vigorously against the lack of them. Everywhere one notices the curious mind, the examining, critical, discriminating, scientific spirit, with the extremity of analysis for result. The style itself betrays this, at its best as at its worst, and owes to this the fact that it is so often at its worst. Its viciousness in 'Daniel Deronda' is evident, both because it is exaggerated and because it clothes meagreness, but any one who takes the pains to refer to 'The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton' will see that it is inherent. And at its best it frames sententious "saws" rather than gospel truths. Further confirmation might be drawn from the deliberateness of her composition, and despite the perfection to which she brought the method, we suspect it will never be found a wholly satisfactory substitute for the ideal synthesis of the imagination, and that this is why George Eliot will, after the dust of controversy is laid, be assigned not to the second rank of novelists, but to a position in the first after Fielding, Thackeray, Balzac, George Sand, and Turgeneff, whom alone one thinks of associating with her, and who share with Shakspere the inner method, one may say. Whether or no, with all her remarkable success, she would have done better to have relied less upon a woman's empirical observation of life and the world, and more upon the natural force of an uncommon genius, it is, of course, idle to guess. 'The Mill on the Floss' occurs to one's mind, and provokes profitless surmises.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF VICTOR HUGO'S GENIUS.

PARIS, November 25, 1880.

THE bibliography of Victor Hugo's works, to which I alluded some time ago, is not as easy a task as might be supposed. The débuts of our great poet are now well forgotten; they took place in a magazine called the Conservateur Littéraire, of which Asselineau, who published the first bibliographic details on the "romantiques," gives the following description: "Le Conservateur Littéraire, Paris, Le Normand, Pichard, Pélicier, Porthieu, 1819–1820, 8vo, in thirty livraisons, forming three volumes." This review, which has become excessively rare, was founded by Eugène and Victor Hugo, and chiefly written by Victor; their brother Abel, the eldest of the family, also wrote some articles in the third volume. The other collaborators are now well forgotten, with the exception of Alfred de Vigny, of Émile Deschamps, of Alexandre Soumet (these last two are stars of the smallest magnitude). Victor Hugo was only seventeen years old when he began to write. There are in the Conservateur twenty-one articles signed V. These articles are critical essays on the 'Sicilian Vespers' of Casimir Delavigne, on Lamartine's 'Méditations,' on Walter Scott's 'Ivanhoe,' on Moore's 'Lalla Rookh,' on Madame Desbordes-Valmore's 'Poésies,'—on many other works, poetical and historical, which have lost their importance. Each number of the Conservateur opened with a few pages of poetry, and these the founders regarded as the most important of their work. Victor Hugo had this department to himself, but the poet of 1819 was very unlike the poet of the following years. Victor Hugo has, nevertheless, introduced seven of the poetical fragments of the Conservateur in the successive editions of his 'Odes'; he has left ten other poems buried in the Conservateur, thinking them probably unworthy of himself. These ten "péchés de jeunesse" are political satires, translations from the Latin, and various poems. The political satires have for their titles "L'Enrôleur politique" (signed V. M. Hugo), "Épître à Brutus," "Les Vous et les Tu" (signed Aristide). The various poems are entitled "L'Avarice et l'Envie: Conte" (signed D'Auverney*); "Les derniers Bardes" (signed V. M. Hugo); "Ce que j'aime, vers faits à un dessert" (signed D'Auverney); "Le jeune Banni, Raymond à Emma," an elegy (signed D'Auverney); "Les Deux Âges," idyl (signed V. M. Hugo). The translations from the Latin, chiefly of the 'Æneid,' are all signed D'Auverney.

The novel of 'Bug-Jargal' appeared without a signature in the second volume of the Conservateur. It was composed in 1818, and was Victor Hugo's first work. He made many changes in it in the edition of it which came out in 1826 ('Bug-Jargal, par l'auteur de Han d'Islande.' Paris: Urbain Canel. 1826. 1 vol. 18mo), with a drawing by Deveria representing "Hadibrah cherchant à entraîner Léopold d'Auverney avec lui dans l'abîme." Victor Hugo afterwards collected many of his first prose articles in the Conservateur, under the title of 'Journal des idées, des opinions et des lectures d'un jeune Jacobite.' This 'Journal' formed the first part of a work, 'Littérature et philosophie mêlées' (1834), in two volumes, published by Renduel, in what is called the first "collective" edition of his writings. Is it worth while to mention 'Le Télégraphe,' a satire of a few pages published in 1819 by Delaunay; 'Le Génie, ode à M. de Châteaubriand, par Victor-Marie Hugo' (1821)? 'Buonaparte, ode' (1822) is better known, as well as the 'Ode sur la naissance de S. A. R. Monseigneur le Duc de Bordeaux, suivie d'une ode sur la mort de S. A. R. Charles Ferdinand d'Artois, duc de Berry, fils de France, par Victor-Marie Hugo, de l'Académie des Jeux Floraux' (1822). This ode was read on the 3d of May at a sitting of the "Société des Bonnes Lettres," presided over by Viscount Chateaubriand. Victor Hugo was then a Jacobite, as he had called himself in the Conservateur. It was his first manner.

In this same year, 1822, appeared a small 18mo volume, now very rare, entitled 'Odes et poésies diverses, par Victor M. Hugo' (Paris: Pélicier, place du Palais Royal). It was offered to King Louis XVIII., who opened it and said: "C'est mal fagoté." The paper was grey and bad, the types were thin and worn out. Louis XVIII. was very hard on the modest little volume, which had in its preface these lines: "There are two intentions in the publication of this book—one political, one literary; but in the author's conception the former is the consequence of the latter, as the history of men offers nothing poetical if it is not judged from the height of monarchical ideas and of religious belief." Quantum mutatus ab illo!

The novel 'Han d'Islande' appeared in 1823. It was published by Persan, a ruined marquis turned bookseller. It was not signed by Victor Hugo, and the publisher could not pay the author; the paper of the four 12mo volumes is miserable, and the types are what we call "têtes de clous." Victor Hugo had a quarrel with Persan, and they exchanged letters in the papers called L'Éclair and Le Miroir. Persan pretended that he had still five hundred copies unsold of 'Han d'Islande,' the half of the original edition, when Hugo, who had not been paid, announced a second edition. Persan had published the second edition of the 'Odes,' which is now very rare—'Odes, par Victor M. Hugo; seconde édition, augmentée de deux odes nouvelles.' Two years afterward appeared the 'Nouvelles Odes, par Victor M. Hugo,' having Ladvocat's imprint, and a frontispiece by Deveria, "the Sylph." Ladvocat published the third edition of the 'Odes' in 1829, with a frontispiece by Deveria, "the Bat." One day, says the author of 'Victor Hugo raconté par un témoin de sa vie,' Victor brought to his betrothed a paper well pinned and tied. She thought there was in it a precious flower, and opened it cautiously: a bat came out of it. She was much frightened, and only forgave the poet when she read on the paper the ode on the bat. This ode is one of the first in which the true Romantic spirit is shown, a spirit which cannot be well defined, but which became so singularly apparent in the following 'Odes et Ballades.'

Victor Hugo was still a Jacobite, and in 1825 he published at the "Imprimerie royale" an ode on the coronation of Charles X., full of royalist enthusiasm. The epigraph of this poem is:

"Os superbum conticescat;
Simplex fides acquiescat
Dei magisterio."

This ode is now one of the rarest of his productions. In 1826 appeared the 'Odes et Ballades' (Ladvocat). The frontispiece by Deveria is very characteristic of the times. It represents a sailor in a boat tossed by a tempestuous sea. This sailor contemplates Napoleon standing on the rock of St. Helena, dressed in the legendary redingote, with the "petit chapeau." The Bonapartist vein, which was now showing itself under the Jacobite surface, is even more apparent in 'La Colonne de la Place Vendôme,' published in 1827. The poet was approaching what may be called his poetical zenith, and he became very sensitive. Napoleon struck a chord, the Greeks struck another; and in 1829 he published, through Gosselin & Bossange, 'Les Orientales,' first edition, 8vo. The frontispiece presents a "clair de lune," with a young woman in oriental dress looking at the moon, and on the front page there is a coarse wood engraving representing "the Djinns." The 'Orientales' are perhaps the most extraordinary poetical effort in all our modern literature; all the old traditions are lost; the Victor Hugo who was in a modified form still an imitator in his first poems, is now himself. The 'Orientales' are a divination; they not only speak of the East, they are the East, full of fanaticism, of heroism, of cruelty, of passion, of sun. Even now I cannot read them without having a sort of physical sensation; they are warm, they make my blood run quicker. The poetical form, the rhythm, the wild play of passion, are all admirable. The language is marvellous in its richness; the novelty of the images is almost amazing. It seems as if the poet had drawn a veil from our eyes, or shown us nature in a new and more splendid form. This new literature was called Romantic, in contradistinction to the Classic; but nothing can be more classic than some of the 'Orientales,' if you understand by the term a form which is in such perfect harmony with the thought that you feel in it something definitive. In the old poets, in Corneille, in Racine especially, you meet occasionally with expressions and images which seem borrowed from the Romantics. Can anything be more Romantic than "Cette obscure clarté qui tombe des étoiles" ('Le Cid')? Can there anything be more classic than the complaints of the "captive"?

"Si je n'étais captive
J'aimerais ce pays,
Et cette mer plaintive
Et ces champs de maïs;
Et ces astres sans nombre,
Si le long du mur sombre
N'étincelait dans l'ombre
Le sabre des spahis."

Has the music of poetry ever found anything more melodious than the end of the same piece?

"Mais surtout, quand la brise
Me touche en voltigeant,
La nuit, j'aime être assise,
Être assise en songeant;
L'œil sur la mer profonde,
Tandis que, pâle et blonde,
La lune ouvre dans l'onde
Son éventail d'argent."

Can we wonder if such verses were received with the warmest enthusiasm, if the poetry of the 'Odes et Ballades' and of the 'Orientales' seemed like a new spring, like the flowering of a divine mind?

Strangely enough, what I may be allowed to call the monstrous side of the genius of Victor Hugo was developing at the same time as the charming and the beautiful side. In this same year, 1829, when the 'Orientales' were published, appeared 'Le Dernier Jour d'un Condamné.' This gloomy, awful, monstrous analysis of a convict appeared first anonymously. It seems as if the author of the 'Orientales,' living in the rays of Olympus, was ashamed to enter into the dark cell of the convict. In the 'Orientales' and in 'Le Dernier Jour d'un Condamné' we have already all Victor Hugo—the painter, who cares only for surface and for light, and the minister of the soul, who delights in the dark abysses of conscience; the light-hearted poet and the dismal humanitarian; the lover of beauty for the sake of beauty, and the conscious admirer, or rather advocate, of ugliness, of crime, of monsters. The two sides of his nature will from this year 1829 go on developing themselves simultaneously and almost independently; and in the poetical drama this double nature will find a single expression. "Hernani" and "Ruy Blas" represent, in the highest form, the double character of Hugo's genius; the two deities of good and evil of the Persian mythology. Ormuzd and Ahriman are united in this new dramatic school in a manner unknown to the ancient dramatists.

THE ARISTOCRACY OF OFFICE-HOLDERS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The most interesting feature of your suggestion respecting the aristocracy of office-holders is the introduction of an appeal to experience instead of à priori theory in discussing a political question. The best way to determine whether permanence in office will make an office-holder indifferent to public opinion, and discourteous in his treatment of those with whom he comes into contact, is to investigate whether this is really the case where persons do actually hold their offices in permanence. You allude to several instances of this sort, but not to one which is well known to all who have occasion to transact public business—namely, that of officers of the Army and Navy. All the bureaus and many of the subordinate offices in the War and Navy Departments are presided over by men whose tenure is more permanent than any yet proposed for the civil service. On the theory of those opposed to civil-service reform these men ought to be the least attentive to the requirements of the public and the least courteous in their demeanor to those who have occasion to meet them. It is hardly necessary to state that such is not the case. N.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In my communication of last week upon International Copyright I ought, perhaps, to have rendered it clearer than I did that my remonstrances against the "assumptions of deliberate and predetermined bad faith" were intended for Mr. Reade and not for the Nation. The quotations made from the two sources would, I thought, have sufficiently enabled you to apportion my remarks between them.

At the same time allow me to express my regret that you should, in your comments upon my communication, continue to ridicule the efforts and impugn the motives of those whom I described as "honorable men . . . seeking honestly to adjust complicated and delicate relations in an untried field." As you repeat a former expression of "approval of the general scheme of copyright covered by the Harper treaty"; as that scheme differs in no essential principle of morals from the "Philadelphia copyright scheme"; as the principles involved in both have received the approbation of the leading authors of England and America, and of all the publishing houses here who favor international copyright, it is, to say the least, a little inconsistent, as well as unfortunate, that you should declare my calling all these gentlemen "honorable men," etc., "a little amusing." The settlement of the question heretofore has not been advanced by the similar exhibitions of lack of tact and lack of courtesy—or rather of justice—to which all those who have advocated a practical measure of international copyright have been exposed, and I am sorry to find the Nation inclined to continue the same objectless warfare.

I must protest, moreover, as utterly unfair, against your perverted use of my phrase concerning "unauthorized republication," and your assertion that "in the publishers' interest, as Mr. Lea very frankly says, the thing most to be dreaded is the possibility of absolutely preventing 'unauthorized republication.'" Now, Mr. Lea said nothing of the kind, whether frankly or otherwise. He pointed out that, in the interest of authors other than those of pre-eminent reputation, it was desirable to prevent the publisher in the home country from surreptitiously securing both markets, and that this could only be accomplished by fixing a limit after which "unauthorized republication" would be legal if the foreign copyright had not meanwhile been perfected by an authorized reprint. To wholly prohibit "unauthorized republication" without providing that authorized republication shall take place within a specified time, is simply to surrender both markets to the home publisher in the case of little-known authors. All this was clearly enough set forth in my previous communication, and to represent me as urging it "as if the very object of the bill were to secure the privilege of unauthorized (pirated) republication," is simply a specimen of perfectly immoral dialectics.

The theory of the "Harper treaty," of which you approve, and of the "Philadelphia bill," of which you seem to disapprove, is that each country shall manufacture its own books, and this theory is accepted on all hands except by the London publishers, who appear to desire no international copyright that shall not confer upon them a monopoly of both markets. This theory can only be reduced to practice by imposing a limit of time within which the authorized republication must appear. What that limit ought to be is a question about which people may honestly differ without having their motives impugned after the fashion of the Nation and of Mr. Charles Reade. No limit can be so adjusted as accurately to suit each and every case. You assert that sixty or ninety days would be a hardship to the "unknown author." I consider that I have already proved that it would be a benefit to the "unknown author," but if in this I be mistaken, I add that the "unknown author" is not the chief factor in the problem, to which all the rest should be subordinated; that but a small percentage of the voluminous works of the "unknown author" receive, in the absence of copyright, the compliment of even "unauthorized republication," and that the "unknown author" is usually content if his early efforts can reach the public without expense to himself, counting upon the reputation which he expects from them, and the profits to be derived hereafter from that reputation. It is so rare for the "unknown author" to develop into a Herbert Spencer that the use of that gentleman's name by you as an illustration is hardly justifiable, but it leads me to suggest that if Herbert Spencer's early works had been protected by international copyright without limit of time, it is not likely that they would have been reprinted at all, and that the growth of his reputation, which I believe was considerably stimulated by the American circulation of his books, would have been correspondingly retarded.

As regards the comparative merits of the "bill" and the "treaty" methods of reaching the objects sought for, I may add to my previous remarks that I am a sufficiently strict constructionist to believe that what is specifically assigned to Congress by the Constitution should be strictly confined to Congressional action. I am opposed, as a general principle, to legislation by the Executive, and as the subject of copyright is among those specially enumerated in the Constitution as delegated to Congress, it seems to me one in which settlement by treaty is peculiarly improper. Besides this, the secrecy under which, by law or usage, all diplomatic negotiations are carried on, is a very serious drawback to the arrangement by diplomacy of questions such as this, with which the diplomats have no practical familiarity—nor, for the matter of that, the Senators appealed to for ratification—while those who could advise or guide them are, by law or usage, kept sedulously aloof, and even the ubiquitous newspaper reporter is not allowed to keep the public informed of what is going on. The "Harper treaty" may be laid in a very satisfactory shape before Sir Edward Thornton and Mr. Evarts, but who knows what its shape may be when it shall come before the Senate? Who, in fact, will have a right to know until it is proclaimed as the law of two hemispheres, to be obeyed by English subject and American citizen? This is not a mode of legislation which befits a free country, and I, for one, protest against it.

Before this communication can appear I expect to be at sea, beyond the reach of the Nation for some months, so that you will have the privilege of the last word. Use that advantage, I pray you, without abusing it; and believe, at least for once, that I speak truth when I say that I regard the interest of authors and publishers as identical in all general questions of legislation, however antagonistic and competitive they may be in specific and individual transactions. Whatever legislation benefits one class will, in the long run, benefit the other; and while I would, with you, invite the closest scrutiny of authors into all measures proposed by publishers affecting their common interests, I would not, with you, do so in a spirit of unworthy suspicion on either side.—Very respectfully,

HENRY C. LEA.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 25, 1880.

[Mr. Lea has by this time sailed on a yachting voyage for the restoration of his health, which has been impaired by labors the value of which to literature as well as to the country can hardly be rated too highly. We therefore offer him the highest mark of editorial esteem and good wishes by letting him have the last word.—ED. NATION.]

THE GERMAN PRESS ON AMERICA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your Berlin correspondent makes but too true a remark when, in his November correspondence (in No. 804 of the Nation), he says that "the editors [of the German papers] are quite ignorant of American constitutional and political history, that they do not even look into the written Constitution, and consequently have no idea how the election takes place, how and when the result is ascertained or the President officially declared elected." To this pungent remark permit me to give you some curious illustrations, taken from the foremost German newspaper, the Koelnische Zeitung, a weekly issue of which, dated Nov. 5, is before me at this writing. In this number an editorial treats of the Presidential election in the United States, and tells its readers that the electoral ballots are opened by the Congress and that the President-elect enters upon the duties of his office on the first of March! If poor Tilden had had this editor for an expounder of our Constitution he would surely have been the happy or unhappy inmate of the White House during the last four years. Further, the article in question suggests that the Democrats do not expect to carry the election this year, but they do "build their hopes upon the extraordinarily large German-Irish immigration of this year, which will, of course, be able to turn the scale in the Presidential election of 1884." The editor of the Koelnische must certainly have a strong belief in the coffee-pot naturalization power of Mr. Senator Wallace. He is also of the opinion that the campaign this time was exclusively a party, not a personal question, as in 1876! But he thinks there is something else, "that sounds a little curious for America and, according to current views, would be far more in place in a military republic, like France. Hancock and Garfield"—I translate verbally—"are both generals, but as if this show of military glory were not enough, there stands behind each of them, as the first star of the party, a still higher military authority—behind Garfield Grant, behind Hancock McClellan. This military side is the most prominent peculiarity of the present Presidential election"!

Sapienti sat. If the leading newspaper of Germany, which has a regular correspondent in New York, displays such ridiculous ignorance of American politics, what can be expected of the smaller fry of German papers, which look upon Americans as nothing better than Indianized barbarians?

Your correspondent, however, ascribes this ignorance to an alleged lack of able correspondents on this side of the ocean, because the immigrants of '48 are dying out or returning to the old Fatherland. It is a mistaken idea (though largely entertained in Germany, and with a certain kind of infallibility) that all the wisdom of German-Americans is confined to the exiled revolutionists of '48. But the truth is that there has never before been such a large influx of educated Germans as during the last decade. They have also tried to serve the German press. In fact, it is almost their first business here to correspond for one or other German paper. But they invariably drop such correspondence after a short time, for two reasons: first, it does not give them steady enough employment, as on an average only a monthly letter is required. Consequently they turn to other pursuits, which, in most cases, take them entirely out of the field of journalism. And, secondly, they become in the course of time too good Americans to be further available as correspondents for the German "reptile-press." It is not nor can it be the policy of a servile press to make its readers too well acquainted with the advantages of a republican form of government, which guarantees every individual the utmost freedom and equality. To blackguard our institutions is what they expect of their correspondents. It has therefore become a general experience that whenever a German savant has crossed the ocean to milk his countrymen here, the first thing he does when he returns home is to libel America in general and the German-Americans in particular. The latest exhibition of this kind has been that made by Mr. Bodenstedt, whose observations on this country, after having been feasted here to the full extent of his poetical merits, are almost entirely concentrated in ridicule of our large—spittoons!

REORGANIZATION OF THE SUPREME COURT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I trust that in the discussion now flagrant in your columns concerning the proposed relief of the Supreme Court one anomaly in our judicial system which has not yet been alluded to will not be wholly lost sight of. This anomaly is the co-existence throughout the Union of two courts of first instance, held for the most part by the same judge, and yet in some matters subordinated the one to the other, so that the same magistrate, sitting to-day in the same room where he sat last week, is called upon to review the alleged errors of his judicial action on the former occasion. The State of New York, for example, is divided into three districts. In each district there is a District and a Circuit Court, each having wholly distinct original jurisdiction. Every suit for the infringement of a patent must be brought in the Circuit Court; every libel in admiralty must be filed in the District Court; and so eighteen paragraphs of the Revised Statutes define the classes of cases of which the latter courts take jurisdiction, and twenty paragraphs declare the jurisdiction of the former.

Now, how are these courts constituted? Every State is at least one judicial district; and as several States are divided (and divided with much less regard to the requirements of litigants than to the successful urgency of some Senator or Representative at the time of the division), there are fifty-eight districts in the thirty-eight States. Each district has its district judge who alone (except when another district judge is called in upon some exigency) can hold its District Court. Each district has also its Circuit Court. But the Circuit Court is held either by any two, or any one, of these three judges—the district judge for the district, the circuit judge for the circuit, and the justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the circuit; the whole country being divided into nine circuits, each having a circuit judge, and the nine justices of the Supreme Court being distributed among them by assignment of the Chief-Justice. As matters of actual practice, I think it is but seldom that the justice of the Supreme Court descends from his Olympian heights to hold a Circuit Court, and then too often as a Deus ex machinâ for some fancied exigency, as when Mr. Justice Hunt came to Canandaigua to order a verdict of conviction of Susan B. Anthony for illegal voting. It is hardly more often that two of the three are seen together on the bench, for the judicial economy cannot afford such an expenditure of material. And in most districts, I venture to affirm, the Circuit Court is held more days by the district judge alone than in any other way.

Now, I submit that when the congestion of the Supreme Court docket is the subject of a clinical consultation, the doctors should not overlook the abnormal condition of the extremities in their anxiety for the brain and heart, lest they "heal the hurt" but "slightly." No one can pretend that the system which I have described is anything better than an absurd anomaly, utterly unfitted for the needs of our existing communities; and it would be unfortunate if the present opportunity for substituting for it a reasonably convenient and adequate system should be wholly lost.

In such a system, too, it is thought by many lawyers who have had experience of intermediate appellate courts that they might well have a place. No New York lawyer would think for an instant of dispensing with that primary review of the courts of first instance which in that State is always interposed before the Court of Appeals is invoked. Not only does it operate to satisfy litigants, in innumerable instances, that further litigation is hopeless, but it greatly lightens and shortens the labors of the ultimate court, in many of the cases which actually go there, by narrowing the contention to the really vital questions. Nor does any one in that State doubt that, if that barrier were removed, the Court of Appeals, which is now coping successfully with a greater annual number of appeals than have utterly overslaughed the Supreme Court of the United States, would instantly and hopelessly succumb.

This comparison indicates, too, another radical reform which the federal judicial system demands, and that is that the justices of the Supreme Court shall be relieved of all other than appellate work. They are two more in number than the judges of the New York court; they are not less competent for their proper functions; the questions submitted for their action are not more various or difficult than those passed upon by the other court, yet they are unable to dispose of a smaller number of appeals than the State court decides, upon the whole, with eminent honor to itself and satisfaction to litigants. The last docket of the Supreme Court shows, of cases brought up in 1878, 282; in 1879, 326. The Court of Appeals calendar shows, of cases brought up in 1879, 386; of remanets from former years, 41; it received during the year very numerous appeals from orders as well as from judgments in cases having a preference, all of which were entitled to early hearing; and the court has adjourned before the day fixed, having heard every cause upon its calendar that was in readiness. It is very certain that this could not have been done if the members of that court had been compelled to spend part of the year in holding circuits in different parts of the State, from Essex to Chautauqua, nor, it may added, if they had been in the habit of devoting their Monday sessions to the reading out of their own opinions (which the bar could perfectly well get in printing from the reporter), instead of hearing the argument of two or three more causes.

Without taking more of your space (I am already asking for more than I intended) to support the suggestions offered, I submit them as a crude but earnest contribution to the discussion.

1. Abolish all original jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts; give the District Courts universal jurisdiction in the first instance, whether of actions originally brought in federal courts or removed from State courts; increase the number of districts, or of judges in each district, until they shall be indisputably adequate to the business; or establish additional courts for special subjects, as admiralty courts in the great maritime and lake ports, and patent courts in the principal cities.

2. Let there be a Circuit Court in each circuit, of two or three judges, sitting by turns in the several districts, having only revisory power. But give the right of review in this court to every litigant, civil or criminal, and without regard to the amount in controversy, subject only to such moderate penalties by way of costs as shall discourage frivolous appeals.

3. Relieve the Supreme Court justices of all service except in that court. Allow the right of review of the Circuit Courts down to the limit of $2,500, as well as in every case where there has been a dissent in that court, and in such constitutional or certified cases as might be provided for.

4. Establish such temporary tribunal as could dispose of the existing docket of the Supreme Court, and give the new organization a chance to "start fair."

5. Pay the judges as much as the bailiffs of their courts get; it would be extravagant to pay them the income of their clerks! But give the Supreme Court justices $12,000; the Circuit, $8,000; the District, $6,000. And don't shirk the first duty a government owes to its citizens—that of establishing private rights and determining private controversies in the surest and swiftest manner—on the ground that it will cost too much. THE LIBRARY QUESTION IN CONGRESS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: During the last seventeen years the United States has been accumulating material for a National Library, the bulk of which, under a well-matured policy, is increasing in an annually advancing ratio. Should this policy be sustained for another equal period—and no disposition to abandon it is yet apparent—the nation will possess a larger mass of literary material than is now held by any library in the world.

The collection is yet, theoretically, but a development of the reference library provided in the Capitol for the two Houses of Congress and the Supreme Court. Mr. Spofford, the librarian, is recognized to be so signally fitted for his position as to be independent of the fluctuations of parties, and his judgment in all matters of the Library is generally accepted as decisive. Yet it is nine years since he reported the space now as then given to the collection to be inadequate for it. Since then the number of books on his hands has considerably more than doubled. The mass of pamphlets, maps, engravings, and other materials is increasing more rapidly than that of books, and space for anything like an orderly, safe, and convenient disposition of the collection in the Capitol has long since been exhausted. The larger part of the rooms assigned to the Library are used simply for storage, books being stacked in them like bricks from floor to ceiling, or packed in bins. Much of the unbound material is thus stowed away in the cellars of the Capitol. Not half the present stock in hand is available for reference. The condition of things was last year spoken of by Senator Voorhees as "a shame and reproach to the Government." It is certain that, after orders shall have been given for the purpose, it will be years before it can be substantially remedied. But though Mr. Spofford has every succeeding year implored Congress to act, the first step toward relief has yet to be taken.

But, after all, so much will be dependent upon the first step, and it is so important that it shall not be a false step, that this delay, so far as it means deliberation and not neglect, is a matter for congratulation rather than regret. The debates on the subject in Congress have been direct and sincere; no unworthy purpose has been apparent in them, and they have had the legitimate result of honest debate in the gradual submergence of hasty, crude, and short-sighted notions and the spread of sound convictions. The most formidable stumbling-block has been the impression, naturally fixed by the circumstances under which members of Congress have chiefly acquired their knowledge of the Library, that the entire collection is an adjunct of the halls of legislation, from which has followed the conviction that if the Capitol is inadequate to contain it, the Capitol must be enlarged. Several schemes for this purpose have consequently been proposed and much time has been given to a discussion of their several merits. The opinion of experts, both bibliothecal and architectural, has constantly tended strongly to the conclusion that anything that could be done in this respect, not of a simply temporizing and futile character, would be obtained only at unjustifiable cost and by unwarranted sacrifices.

The conclusion seems to have been reached by the present Congress, at its last session, that a distinct National Library building is a necessity; that it must be so planned and placed as to stand well clear of all other buildings, must be in some degree protected by distance from street noises, and must admit of enlargement by the addition of successive sections as the accumulation of material increases.

At the close of the session a joint committee was appointed, with directions to consider and report upon the questions of site and of plan. Three plans have been prepared by architects selected by the committee and studying the problem under its instructions, and it is understood that one of these will be recommended for adoption by Congress soon after the holiday recess. The question of site has been narrowed to a choice between two positions, one being the nearest private property to the Capitol on the east, with a face toward the present grounds on the carriage front of the Capitol, the other a public square, owned by the Government, lying about midway between the Capitol and that part of the city where at present most members of Congress and visitors have their lodgings. Each has advantages sufficient to secure strong partisanship, but neither such certain, permanent superiority on the whole over the other that a difference of opinion as to which is the better should be allowed to prevent a conclusion from being reached this winter. Failing this result, the matter will go over to a new House, with a large proportion of members fresh to the subject. This will be an indefinite postponement of it, and an indefinite postponement at this stage is equivalent to an order abolishing the Library of Congress for most practical purposes, and substituting for it at an early day a sumptuous warehouse for the storage in bulk of a great, idle, heterogeneous mass of printed paper. WASHINGTON, Dec. 22, 1880.

THAT "UNOFFICIAL" REPUBLICAN CAMPAIGN FRAUD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the Nation of December 2, I called attention to a card headed,

"From a Pamphlet issued by
"THE FREE-TRADE CLUB OF LONDON,"

as having been issued from Republican headquarters in New York City and Brooklyn, and characterized the same as a forgery, which it was. In the Nation of December 23 Mr. S. W. Dorsey denies that any such card "was ever written, issued, or circulated by the Republican National Committee, or by the State or any local committee, in great or small numbers." And he adds further:

"I should be glad to have Mr. Wells, who so swiftly denounces this card as a forgery, and holds the Republican National Committee responsible for its issuance and circulation, tell us who is responsible for the inexcusable blunder he is guilty of, in making so serious a charge without the slightest foundation in fact."

I am most happy to give Mr. Dorsey at once the information on which I based what he is pleased to term my "inexcusable blunder." The card in question was sent to me, in the first instance, by a young gentleman of Brooklyn the day after election without comment. Seeing at once that the publication was untrue and a forgery, I immediately wrote for information concerning its origin, and received in reply the statement that my correspondent obtained the card himself at the rooms of the Republican headquarters in Brooklyn, and also a package containing numerous duplicates of the same card, and of various other cards of similar character, printed in colors, and all obtained at the same place. These other cards, entitled "Hullo, there! What's that you say?" "Here we are again," "Keep this in your mind," and the like, although not open to the charge of being forgeries, are to that of ridiculous untruth, as is shown by the following quotations from one of them:

"The Democratic party will by their free-trade policy empty your workshop and your pocket, break up your happy home, and fill your poorhouse."

"The Republican party will protect your employer, so that he can sell his goods and keep you at steady work, with good wages."

And this from another, addressed to "Workingman":

"KEEP THIS IN YOUR MIND, AND DON'T YOU FORGET IT.

"Republican protection means plenty of work, with good wages, and empty poorhouses.

"Democratic free trade means closed workshops, starvation wages, and crowded poorhouses."

Another card contained in parallel columns comparisons of the wages received by bakers, blacksmiths, bricklayers, carpenters, joiners, laborers, porters, plasterers, painters, shoemakers, and plumbers in Europe and the United States, and attributed the wage difference in favor of these occupations in the latter country to the agency of our protective tariff, when the merest tyro in economic studies knows that these occupations are not and cannot be protected except by imposing restrictions on the importation of individual laborers, porters, bricklayers, etc. I refer to these other cards, since they were circulated with the card of which Mr. Dorsey knows nothing, and embody internal evidence almost amounting to demonstration that all were the work of one and the same agency, and emanated from a common source.

My Brooklyn correspondent further informed me that on the day after election all of these cards were strewn in abundance, with other campaign documents, on the floor of the Republican Committee-room in that city, and could be picked up in quantity. A day or two afterwards I showed the card in controversy to a leading publisher (and a Republican) in New York, when he remarked: "Oh! yes; I know about it. I sent one of my clerks to the Republican headquarters for documents relating to the tariff proper for distribution among workmen, and received in return a package of these same cards," at the same time taking from a shelf in his counting-room all the cards I have referred to, including several duplicates of "The Free-Trade Club of London" card. Before the publication of my communication of December 2, I was also assured by a gentleman holding a well-known public position in New York City that he was cognizant of the circulation of these cards by Republicans, and had contemplated writing to the press on the subject.

The names of the several persons I have referred to as the sources of my information I have communicated to the editor of the Nation, and if Mr. Dorsey desires to have an investigation I am ready to co-operate with him. I also send duplicates of the cards mentioned with this communication to the office of the Nation, where they can doubtless be inspected by those who desire to do so.

When counterfeit money in considerable quantities is traced in two separate instances, by separate witnesses, to the private apartments of one and the same person and into the custody of his agents, it may not be wholly justifiable to charge knowledge of and participation in felony on such person; but, at the same time, the individual who makes public the facts in question is not usually regarded as having laid himself open to the charge of being "guilty of an inexcusable blunder" in so doing, and as having "not the slightest foundation in fact" for his statements.

DAVID A. WELLS.

NORWICH, December 27, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Dorsey goes too far in his criticism of Mr. Wells's letter, published in your issue of December 2. The card which furnished Mr. Wells with his text, and of which I enclose a specimen, was freely distributed in Brooklyn from the rooms of the campaign committee on Pierrepont Street. When I visited the rooms I found a number of them side by side with other standard campaign documents, such as "The Tariff Question," "A Talk with Business Men," "Why the Mechanic and Laboring Man Should Vote the Republican Ticket," and others of like character. There is not the slightest doubt that this card was as freely circulated as the above-named documents, and was intended to play an important part in intimidating laboring men into voting the Republican ticket by placing the tariff question in a false light. Mr. Wells is perfectly justified in speaking of it as he did.

Respectfully, WORTHINGTON C. FORD.

BROOKLYN, 97 Clark Street, Dec. 22, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Senator Dorsey writes to the Nation of December 23 to say that no such cards as those denounced by Mr. Wells were issued by the Republican National Committee or from its headquarters, and there was, therefore, no foundation for Mr. Wells's statement concerning such distribution. The Senator is in error on this point, for copies of the card in question certainly were issued from the Republican headquarters. I was myself heartily interested in the success of the Republican ticket, and hearing from Democratic friends that these bogus cards were being distributed by the Republicans, I maintained that this distribution was doubtless carried on by certain manufacturers on their own responsibility, and that it was not likely the party committees had anything to do with so petty a piece of business. To convince my friends that such was the case, I sent a messenger a few days before the election to the headquarters of the Republican National Committee, requesting to have sent to me supplies of any cards they were distributing for campaign purposes. I received, among others, a batch of the card quoted by Mr. Wells, a copy of which I enclose herewith. My Democratic friends had the satisfaction in this instance of being in the right, and as this happened to them so seldom during the campaign I was obliged to forgive them. Requesting, as a matter of justice to Mr. Wells, the publication of this confirmation of his statement, I am, yours very truly,

GEO. HAVEN PUTNAM.

NEW YORK, December 28, 1880.

Notes.

ESTES & LAURIAT, Boston, have published an authorized edition of Madame De Witt's 'Monsieur Guizot in Private Life—1787–1874,' translated by M. C. M. Simpson. Our readers are already informed, through our Paris correspondence at the date of the original publication, of the character of this interesting work.——Ginn & Heath, Boston, have brought out ten of the twenty volumes of their "Harvard edition" of Shakspere, edited by the Rev. H. N. Hudson, and most tastefully printed and bound. A less glossy paper is the only desideratum which we can indicate, and this can yet be supplied. By lamp-light the page will be somewhat trying to the eyes. The introductions and notes are commendably brief and unpedantic. The series will be completed within three months.——G. P. Putnam's Sons have added to their "Advanced Science Series" the "Practical Plane Geometry and Projection" of Mr. Henry Angel, of London, a work intended to conduct the student through the higher departments of mathematical drawing. It presupposes some acquaintance with the elements of geometry and a knowledge of the proper use of drawing instruments. An octavo volume of 351 pages contains the text, admirably illustrated with a great number of figures. A second volume, 4to, contains 81 plates too large for an 8vo page. The range of the work is very extensive, covering the courses of the Royal Military Academy, the Royal School of Mines, and, speaking generally, of the schools of engineering and art, and the number of examples for practice is unusually large.——A. C. Armstrong & Son have issued another edition of Dr. Doran's comprehensive historic-biographical 'Monarchs Retired from Business,' in two volumes. A similar work on 'Presidents Retired from Business' would be apt to find a ready sale at this time.——The Messrs. Appleton publish, as a companion volume to 'American Painters,' a work of the same size, printed from English plates and copiously illustrated by English wood-engravers, called 'British Painters.' The text is anonymous, and apparently by different hands, and, like the illustrations, of ordinary quality but satisfactory as exposition. The work begins with Turner and Constable, and ends with Frederick Walker and Frank Holl.——Lee & Shepard issue in holiday dress 'Home, Sweet Home', by John Howard Payne, illustrated with designs by Miss Humphreys, engraved by Andrew. They are in general prettily conceived, but occasionally executed with what, in the case of a less experienced designer, we should call ingenuousness.——The main attraction in the American Art Review for December is perhaps Mr. Cole's rendering of Wiertz's rather uninteresting "On se retrouve au ciel." The second paper on the Wiertz Museum at Brussels considers its fantastic contents temperately, with a wisdom which a print of "The Genius of War" plainly enough confirms. Mr. McLaughlin concludes his notes on artists of a Cincinnati origin, and a striking head engraved by Juengling after Strobridge deserves mention among its accompanying cuts. A reproduction of a portrait by Mr. Vinton may also be singled out from the remaining illustrations of the number as of special interest.——The Peabody Academy of Science, at Salem, announces that its Memoirs will be resumed at an early date, after a forced suspension for six years.——A memorial volume relating to the late Professor Benjamin Peirce will be published next month from the office of the Harvard Register. The Register, by the way, has an assured existence for another year. In the December number will be found biographical sketches, with portraits, of James Russell Lowell and Alexander Agassiz.——The current issue of the Magazine of American History contains miniature aquatint portraits of Governor George and Lady Clinton, from the original coppers of St. Mémin, a French artist who in the last century made a surprising number of crayon likenesses in this country, and was in the habit of "throwing in" with each one a reduced engraving. The Magazine now proposes to print from as many of these plates as are still preserved, and asks that they may be sent to the editorial rooms at No. 69 Bible House, New York.——A society for the encouragement and promotion of the study of Dante's works is in contemplation, and, if formed, Mr. Longfellow will accept the presidency. An annual assessment of five dollars will be the condition of membership. Some of the objects of the Society are "the obtaining a copy of Benvenuto da Imola's comment; the publication of a good collated comment on the 'Divina Commedia'; the translation into English of Dante's prose works," etc., etc. The secretary is Mr. John Woodbury, 2 Gray's, Cambridge.——Lectures on 'The Duties of Woman,' by Miss Frances Power Cobbe, will make a book to be published by George H. Ellis, Boston.——Drs. Fothergill and Wood's 'Food for the Invalid, the Convalescent, the Dyspeptic, and the Gouty' (Macmillan) meets a standing want. A concise introduction is followed by a goodly number of recipes which even the well may profit by.——The advance sheets of the forthcoming third volume of Von Holst's 'Constitutional History of the United States' have reached the American translator.——'Books and Reading for the Young,' a pamphlet reprint from a report of Mr. James H. Smart, Superintendent of Public Instruction of the State of Indiana, contains a number of lists of books fit for children by different hands, and otherwise will repay reading (Indianapolis).——Part XII. of Dr. Grove's 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians' (Macmillan) opens with Palestrina and ends with Plain Song. Passion Music and Piano-forte are the principal topics; Palestrina, Parepa-Rosa, Pasta, Patti, and Pergolesi the principal biographies.——Dr. Koolman's slow-moving 'Wörterbuch der Ostfriesischen Sprache' (Norden: Hermann Braams) is still, in its eleventh number, in the letter K.

—We called attention some months since to the incorporation of the New York Free Circulating Library, expressing the belief that notwithstanding its small beginnings it was destined to render important aid in the enlightenment of the poorer classes of this city. The first annual report of the Society has now been published and it shows that the work done by it is steadily increasing. The number of books given out has risen from 1,653 in April to 4,212 in October and 5,335 in November. The number of applicants for books has also increased from 712 in March to 3,117 on the first of this month. This growth is natural and spontaneous; no efforts of any kind have been made to force the library upon the attention of the class upon which it relies for support, the managers preferring to have the demand for books itself determine the supply. The most remarkable discovery connected with the enterprise thus far has been the fact that the class inclined to make use of a circulating library of this kind in New York is entirely honest; only two volumes were lost between March 1 and November 1 out of 22,558 given out. The expenses have been kept down to the lowest possible limit; but it is found that about $5,000 annually are needed for the purpose of maintaining it, and the managers are desirous that it should be placed upon a permanent basis. For this purpose the managers ask that contributions be sent to the Treasurer, Hon. L. P. Morton, at 25 Nassau Street. There ought to be no difficulty in raising a fund of $100,000, or even a larger one, for this purpose. There are several reasons why an appeal from the managers of the Free Circulating Library should be received with more than ordinary consideration from persons able to contribute to the support of public objects of this sort. It is the only free circulating library in the city, all the others being restricted to certain limited classes, or not being free; it is in the hands of a very excellent board of managers, and from the very fact that it extends its sphere of operations only as the demand for books presses upon it, there can be no doubt that its continually increasing circulation amply proves the wisdom and necessity of its foundation. It is entirely non-sectarian and has no connection with or dependence upon city politics. Besides all this it has not been set on foot, as so many libraries and other institutions are, partly for a public object, and partly for the honor and glory of the founder; but its existence is solely due to the unselfish benevolence of managers who have nothing but the interest of the experiment to promote.

—A final clearance of the children's books on our table will be made when we have noticed Mrs. Laura E. Richards's 'Five Little Mice in a Mouse-Trap,' and Mr. Hezekiah Butterworth's 'Zig-Zag Journeys in Classic Lands,' both published by Estes & Lauriat, Boston; and Mr. John D. Champlin's 'Young Folks' Cyclopædia of Persons and Places,' published by Henry Holt & Co. The first is a voluble and slightly bewildering performance, utterly formless, and apparently made to fit the illustrations. We cannot congratulate the child who is set to read it. Equally defective in form is the 'Zig-Zag Journeys,' of which the intent is at least serious, and which contains a good deal of information and entertainment not remotely suggested by the full title. Who, for example, would expect to find "in classic lands" a negro story about a possum, or a homily on smuggling in Boston harbor, or instruction in legerdemain, or a comic translation of the Dido episode in the 'Æneid'? Mr. Butterworth threatens to go on, but there are still some corners of the earth which ought to be spared this treatment. Mr. Champlin's Cyclopædia is supplementary to the same compiler's useful 'Cyclopædia of Common Things,' which it considerably exceeds in bulk. In spite of its limitation to persons and places, it admits two historical titles—Seven Years' War and Thirty Years' War—and perhaps by way of compensation omits Westphalia. Like the companion volume, it is deficient in cross-references. The greatest number are from the tribal names to the general article on American Indians, but Mr. Champlin is not consistent. From Seven Pines we are referred to Chickahominy, but there is no Pittsburgh Landing with a reference to Shiloh. "George Sand, see Dudevant" calls for "George Eliot, see Evans," but in the latter case the pseudonym takes precedence. Cognizance is purposely taken of a certain number of writers of books for children, though so prolific a story-teller as the late W. H. G. Kingston is overlooked. The selection is almost equivalent to a literary judgment, and cannot be very highly approved. Some attention to educators might have been looked for under the circumstances, but no place was reserved for Horace Mann, S. G. Howe, Froebel, Pestalozzi, or even Locke, while Rousseau (whose career is wretchedly summed up) is dismissed without a word as to his epoch-making 'Émile.' There is an obvious endeavor to lay stress on the boyhood of celebrated persons, with, of course, not seldom a very disproportionate effect. Perhaps the worst instance is in the case of Dickens. On the other hand, Farragut's characteristic exploit on board the Phœbe in the harbor of Valparaiso, in 1814, is suffered to go to waste.

—The weakness of the American portion is hardest to excuse. The biographies of the Presidents are commonly very bald, without so much as the significant events of their administrations; for instance, Mr. Champlin is silent about Jackson's suppression of nullification. But again, to say, however truly, of Jackson that he was "one of the most popular of all our Presidents" is nearly equivalent to holding him up as an example. It is, of course, a nice question how far the professional neutrality of cyclopædists should be departed from here, but it is remarkable how completely the reformers of the present century are ignored. Take the abolition agitation, for instance—not one of its prominent leaders is mentioned; nor is John Brown described for the benefit of the rising generation, anxious to learn why "his soul's marching on." Sumner is recognized, but not Josiah Quincy; and Caleb Cushing is likewise left out in the cold. Among orators Edward Everett and Wendell Phillips are both missing. Mrs. Stowe is favored above her father or any of her brothers. Mrs. Lydia Maria Child is passed over, perhaps to make room for Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford. Heredity is properly illustrated by admitting four generations of Adamses, but Alexander Agassiz is not alluded to in connection with his distinguished father, though much inferior naturalists are remembered. Dr. F. V. Hayden is not offset by Clarence King or J. D. Whitney—to mention no others. Graham Bell is excluded, while Edison is credited with improvements of the telephone. Charlotte Cushman has the stage pretty much to herself, neither Forrest nor the Booths nor Joseph Jefferson being "called." A singular liberality is shown towards artists, especially the living, but neither the sculptor Crawford nor the painter-engraver Durand has been retained in Mr. Champlin's drag-net.

—The authorship of the article on "London Theatres" in the January Scribner is anonymous, and for that reason we withhold a conjecture in regard to it on which we should be willing to stake our reputation for discernment. The style is much above that in which theatrical gossip and criticism are generally clothed, and it would require a long residence in the British metropolis to acquire for one's self half the information conveyed by this article. Mr. Mayhew's "In Albania with the Ghegs" is unsubstantial in comparison with his previous paper on Montenegro, and does not proceed from a rich or profound experience. The second of the series called "Glimpses of Parisian Art," on the contrary, maintains its interest, and is still abundantly illustrated autographically. The Life of Millet is concluded, being carried on from the point at which the late Alfred Sensier dropped it by Paul Mantz. As striking as anything in it is the sentence from a letter of 1863, in which the painter says: "The reading of Theocritus proves to me that one is never so Greek as in painting naïvely one's own impressions, no matter where they were received; and Burns proves it also." Millet had just begun to make the acquaintance of these two poets, the former of whom he undertook to translate. Dr. Charles Robinson's "The Bible Society and the New Revision" opens up some interesting questions. For example: If the revised version of the New Testament is to be a monopoly of British manufacture, would it not be "nobly jealous" in our publishers and Bible and Tract Societies to deny the claim of "moral copyright" in this case; and would it not be "exceedingly foolish" in our cheap "libraries" not to "catch up the New Version the moment it is put in type"? To pave the way for the acceptance of the new version, "it has been deemed necessary to parade somewhat conspicuously the exigencies of the case" by making "a detailed exhibition of the blemishes in the King James Bible." In the market contest between new and old, will these criticisms go on indefinitely, and provoke in retort a search for faults in the new version? The charter of the American Bible Society confines its distribution of Bibles to "the Version in common use." Does this debar it ("moral copyright" apart) from manufacturing and circulating the revised version; and if so, can the charter be amended, or must there be a new Bible Society? Dr. Robinson rehearses with a good deal of feeling the causes of the withdrawal of the superficially amended Scriptures put forth by the Society in December, 1856, and the part which the Rev. A. C. Coxe and the late Dr. Hodge more especially had in bringing about a return to the time-honored "twenty-four thousand discrepancies," a small portion of which had been rectified.

—As bearing on the review of Redfield's 'Homicide,' which we print on another page, we subjoin the following extract from a private letter which accidentally reaches us at this time. The writer is a resident of Missouri:

"We generally agree with your conclusions, but not always. For instance, on page 386 you quote Mr. Lanier's statement about his personal difficulties (which, by the way, we have seldom seen equalled for force and at the same time modesty of statement). Mr. Lanier may be a bad man—we are prepared to believe that he is, since the Nation says so; but the fact that a man has personal encounters by no means proves that he is either 'turbulent' or 'quarrelsome,' but in the South only proves that some one thinks he can get glory by an assault. Civilization is a different word in the South from what it is in the North. The writer, a little over ten years ago, in this very place, while 'enjoying' that scourge of the West, a felon, and almost sick as well as crippled, was set on by a bully in the presence of several men, some of them church members, and it was only by using the remaining fist to the best of his ability that he escaped a mauling, for not one of the bystanders said a word. This could scarcely have happened among reputable men in the North; but even piety in the South means something else than the Northern signification. It was my duty and pleasure to assist the bully latterly to bread as he slowly worked downwards, and finally brought up in the State prison."

—The success of "Forget-Me-Not" at Wallack's is mainly attributable to the interest of the plot and the acting of Miss Rose Coghlan. There is no change of scene in the three acts, and there are only four principal characters, for Barrato, the Corsican, has very little to say, while Prince Malleotti and Mrs. Foley are comic characters whose parts are very loosely connected with the main plot. This in itself is simple enough: Stephanie, Marquise de Mohrivart, is an adventuress who, with her husband, at one time kept a gambling hell in Paris, in which she acted the usual part of decoy. Her son, the Vicomte de Brissac, married Rose Verney, an English girl. By Article 148 of the French code this marriage was unlawful and its issue illegitimate, unless the consent of both parents was obtained within the year. At the time the action of the play begins but six weeks of this year remain. In the meantime the viscount has died, leaving his wife with a child but just born. Stephanie has never given her consent to the marriage of her son, and having formed the desire to make herself a respectable woman determines to do so by means of the hold this fact gives her upon the sister of Rose Verney. To this sister Alice she reveals the fact that she is the mother of the late viscount, and that without her consent his marriage is still null and void. She promises, however, to give her consent at the end of six weeks, if meantime she is received as a relative and given a proper position in society by the Verneys. Her character, it should be said, is so notorious that Alice Verney shrinks in horror at the mere thought of being in the same house with her. Sir Horace Welby, who is in love with Alice and at the same time an old acquaintance of Stephanie's, is staying with the Verneys at Rome. He, of course, knows her history thoroughly and determines to get her out of the house. The main action of the play consists in the struggle between Sir Horace and Stephanie. Barrato, a Corsican, who had formerly been one of the many victims of the Mohrivart household, appears on the scene. He had, in revenge for his wrongs, murdered the marquis and very nearly succeeded in killing his wife, and had then been sentenced to the galleys; Stephanie well knows that her life is not worth a moment's purchase if she is in the same city with him, and she is finally driven from the Verneys' palace (having first signed her consent to the marriage of her dead son) under the influence of physical fear of this Corsican enemy. There is nothing very interesting about the character of Stephanie except her audacious wickedness. The career of a gambler's female decoy can hardly, except in very exceptional circumstances, furnish any materials for genuine tragic interest, but Miss Coghlan gets all out of the part that there is to be got. Since her first appearance at Wallack's she has never made so distinct a hit. The part is well written, and there is more opportunity for the display of her talents than the bare outline of the plot we have given may suggest, as in the scenes with Sir Horace and the prince she has a very wide range of either real or feigned emotions to represent. Her alternate pathetic appeals to and brazen defiance of Alice's lover, her coquettish encouragement of the prince, struck us as showing more real variety of talent than Miss Coghlan has ever before given proof of possessing. Miss Boniface is hardly equal to the part of Alice Verney, who occupies the really tragic position in the play, and Mr. Tearle does not make his Sir Horace as good a part as the authors of the play gave him a chance to do. The dialogue has the brightness which always characterizes the plays in which Mr. Merivale has a hand. There is perhaps a little too much of the melodrama in the Carmelite chorus, the sudden appearance of Barrato, and the escape of Stephanie in the last act; but in the great feat of sustaining the interest to the end the authors have succeeded admirably.

—It is gratifying to learn from high authority that, despite the contrary assurances of those who are disposed to look upon Franklin's experiments as mere "scientific diversions," the lightning-rod may still be considered as of essential service in protecting life and property from electric destruction; and no less comforting is it to know that the space protected by a given rod may be accurately determined through direct mathematical computation. In a paper communicated to the London and Edinburgh Philosophical Magazine (Dec., 1880), Mr. W. H. Preece, Electrician to the General Post-Office, London, than whom there is probably no higher authority living in the field of electric and telegraphic engineering, demonstrates this protected space to be in the form of a cone, whose height is equal to the length of the rod, and whose base is a circle, the radius of which is also equal to the length of the rod in question. The side of this conic space "is the quadrant of a circle whose radius is equal to the height of the rod." These results, obtained from mathematical and physical data, appear to find striking confirmation in the known facts elicited through direct investigation, for, as Mr. Preece informs us, in all the test cases that came under his own immediate observation the accident invariably took place in a region exterior to the conic space:

"I have carefully examined every record of accident that I could examine, and I have not yet found one case where damage was inflicted inside this cone when the building was properly protected. There are many cases where the pinnacles of the same turret of a church have been struck where one has had a rod attached to it; but it is clear that the other pinnacles were outside the cone; and, therefore, for protection each pinnacle should have had its own rod. It is evident also that every prominent point of a building should have its rod, and that the higher the rod the greater is the space protected."

—It is not widely known, perhaps, that the first impersonator of Mephistopheles at Weimar is still among the living, and, at the age of eighty-six, one of the brightest ornaments of the famous Burgtheater of Vienna. Karl La Roche came to Weimar in 1822, and remained there until the death of Goethe, under whose influence and guidance he established his fame as an actor. The story of the first performance of "Faust" at Weimar and La Roche's share in it is now graphically and authentically told by K. I. Schröer in his 'Faust von Goethe, mit Einleitung und fortlaufender Erklärung' (Heilbronn: Gebrüder Henninger), La Roche having thrown doubts on many of the statements contained in an older publication on the same subject—Enslin's 'Die erste Theater-Vorstellung des Goethe'schen Faust.' Goethe's aversion to the representation of his "Faust" on the stage was well known and for many years respected. In the winter of 1828-29, however, Von Müller, Riemer, Eckermann, and La Roche—probably on learning that Brunswick contemplated a performance of "Faust"—resolved on its representation at Weimar. When they called on Goethe to acquaint him with their project, and Herr von Müller unguardedly used the expression "we have determined," Goethe flew into a passion and indignantly exclaimed: "Do you think that if I had been willing to see 'Faust' on the stage I could not have had it performed myself? Is it right to dispose of my works without knowing my intentions?" etc., etc. However, he gradually relented, chiefly through the interposition of his daughter-in-law, to whom he said, "Well, let it at least be performed as I want to have it, and not as they think proper." Accordingly he invited the members of the theatre and some friends to his house, and read to them the entire first part of the tragedy. La Roche still speaks of the overpowering effect produced by the incomparable voice of the reader. He read the part of Faust in a bass voice, changing into the most sonorous tenor after the rejuvenating draught. La Roche studied subsequently the part of Mephistopheles under Goethe's direction, who instructed him in every detail and weighed every word. The performance finally took place on the 29th of August, 1829. Goethe, however, did not attend it. Not the least interesting feature of the connection between Goethe and La Roche is the latter's personal resemblance to the poet in his old age.

—The Brahmo Somaj, the theistic church in India, has excited considerable interest by its emancipation from the polytheistic beliefs prevalent in India, and also, though in a less degree, by its opposition to some native customs—caste, for instance, and the subjection of women. Though theistic at its foundation in 1830, by Rammohun Roy, on the basis of the assumed infallibility of the Vedas, under Keshub Chunder Sen the exclusive use of the Vedas was given up and a liturgical service from the books of various religions adopted. But Roy's successor, Debendra Nath Tagore, objected to any attempt to abolish caste, and when Sen, though a Brahmin, after celebrating a marriage between a Brahmin and one of another caste, joined the feast at which the married parties ate, and women were also present, there arose a breach in the society, and in 1865 a new organization was formed—the Brahmo Somaj of India, of which Sen became the leader. The old society was called the Adi Somaj. The new movement, unfortunately, took a turn towards mysticism instead of practical work, and though, like the old, it rejected all mediators between man and the Supreme Being, it has lately begun to use such devotional and ecstatic expressions towards the Deity as members of some Christian sects apply to Christ as the second person of the Trinity. So far, under Sen's leadership, did this proceed that the philosophical and literary studies of the sect, as well as the institutions for social reform, began to be neglected in behalf of the contemplative life, after the manner, on a small scale, of the mystics and the hermits. In 1877 the Brahmo Niketan, a sort of boarding-school for young Brahmins, was closed, and a few months later the normal-school for girls had the Government subsidy withdrawn on account of lack of attendance.

—In 1878 an event occurred which caused a new division in the society. Sen had been one of the principal workers for the Indian Marriage Act of 1872, which was passed expressly for this organization in order to legalize marriage by their rites, Anglo-Indian law having previously recognized only marriages according to the ritual of the older religious bodies of the country. By this act the legal age of men was fixed at eighteen and of women at fourteen. It was now (in 1878) announced that Sen's daughter was to be married to the Rajah of Couch Behar; the rajah was fifteen years old, Sen's daughter thirteen. The marriage was, in fact, performed, Sen's conclusive reason for his assent, though overriding principles and rules which he had advocated, being the rajah's assurance that, if the marriage did not take place at once, it must be postponed till after his return from England. The details of this episode in the Brahmo Somaj, and also the general history of the sect, may be found in an article in the Revue des Deux Mondes for September 15, by the Count Goblet d'Alviella. Remonstrances against Sen's conduct in the affair came up from all India. Resolutions were adopted at a meeting in Calcutta of three thousand Brahmoists declaring that he had forfeited the confidence of the Church, and demanding that he resign his secretaryship. A new organization resulted from this revolt against his authority, the Sadharan Somaj, or Universal Union or Society. The three divisions of the sect are all in existence. The creed of the new organization denounces inspired prophets and mediators between the believer and the Deity, and is aimed at Sen's pretension, which he has put forward of late years, to be adesh (inspired). He defended his conduct in regard to his daughter's marriage on the ground of a special inspiration. Sen appears to have removed somewhat from his position at the time of his visit to England in 1870, when he declared that, "If purity, truth, chastity, renunciation, self-denial are Christian virtues, then wherever they are found Christianity is present, whether they appear in Christian, Hindoo, or Mohammedan." Although this relapse of the reformer into native customs for the sake of a desirable match appears to us Westerners unwise and cruel, and is to be deplored, yet the agitation on the subject throughout India seems to show that the native unchristian usages are in a state of disintegration as well as the old polytheistic doctrines. Monier Williams, the Sanskrit professor at Oxford, said ten years ago that in the matter of religious belief all India is in much the condition of the Roman world at the time of the dawn of Christianity. Whether Christianity as a religious system is likely to acquire much of a hold in India is perhaps doubtful. A German deacon has called the Brahmo Somaj "a limit to missionary activity," and it appears to be certain that the straiter Christian sects entertain no theological doctrine that India has not already held in vital counterpart.

—An important branch of German mediæval literature has recently been treated at length by R. Cruel in his 'History of German Preaching during the Middle Ages' ('Geschichte der deutschen Predigt im Mittelalter.' Detmold. 1879). He divides his subject into two periods. The first, extending from 600 to 1200, is marked by the unoriginal and unorganic character of the sermon, which borrowed its materials from the earlier collections, and, except the double classification into homilies and sermons (the former mere explanation of the text, the latter the treatment of some abstract subject with or without a text), offers no systematic arrangement of topics. The sermon of the second period, reaching to the Reformation, is distinguished by originality of contents and logical disposition of materials. The first part of the work treats of the missionary (600–900), the episcopal (900–1100), and the parochial (1100–1200) sermon, with a special chapter on the delivery of the sermon, liturgy, and singing in the German language, addresses at festivals and funerals, homiletic aids, and the condition of the clergy during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The chief sources of the sermon during this period were the collections of Latin and German sermons, which the author examines at length; besides these, examples or anecdotes were furnished by the popular 'Vitæ Patrum,' the 'Dialogue' of Gregory the Great, the 'Dialogus Miraculorum' of Cæsar of Heisterbach, and the 'Physiologus,' one of the oldest Bestiaires. The second period is marked, of course, by greater individuality, and contains such well-known names as Berthold of Ratisbon, Albertus Magnus, Dr. Tauler, Geiler of Kaisersberg, etc. The third chapter contains an interesting account of the sermon-books of the fifteenth century, which are valuable for the Culturgeschichte of the period, and also to the student of comparative storiology, as throwing a flood of light upon the mode of diffusion of mediæval tales. The most valuable single conclusion arrived at by the author is that "the language of the public sermon in Germany from the beginning and at all times was German." The mass of interesting anecdotes and citations from rare sources will incline the scholar to overlook the author's lack of a strictly scientific method, especially as one is informed in the preface that the present work is intended only to pave the way for a more complete treatment of the subject.

DUFFY'S YOUNG IRELAND.*

TO those who remember the career of the author of this book previous to 1850, and have heard little or nothing of him since, his appearance on the title-page as Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, a knight of the British Order of St. Michael and St. George, will seem one of the oddest of transformations. Between 1840 and 1850 he was one of the most prominent and most formidable enemies of English rule in his own country. In 1848 he fell, with many of his coadjutors, into the clutches of the law, and was tried for "treason-felony," but acquitted. After his liberation he tried politics once more as a member of the British Parliament, but had the good sense to see that that was not an arena in which a man of his antecedents could hope to accomplish much either for his own fame or his country's good. So he emigrated to the colony of Victoria, in Australia, and threw himself into political life there with such success that he was for some time Prime Minister, and only this year resigned the Speakership of the Parliament in order to come to England to superintend the publication of his book. What is most remarkable in his colonial career is that, though it lay among Englishmen mainly, and though he began it with the taint of being an "ex-rebel" resting on him, and though he never for one moment professed anything like repentance, he secured the confidence and esteem of both colleagues and competitors, and received the highest honors with which the Crown recognizes colonial eminence. During his absence Ireland has undergone much change. Concessions, such as the disestablishment of the Protestant Church and the ballot, which were in O'Connell's day scouted as wildly impracticable, have been made. The population has much diminished, but what there is is much more comfortable and prosperous. The English conscience, or at least the conscience of the English Liberals, has become far more sensitive about Irish grievances than it was in his day. Coercion is not so lightly talked of, much less resorted to, by Englishmen as a means of meeting Irish discontent. A new element, too, and a very serious one, has appeared in the Irish problem, in the shape of Irish-American sympathy. The sympathy of native Americans with Irish political aspirations is, it must be confessed, gone or greatly reduced in strength, but it is for all practical purposes more than compensated for by that of the two millions of Irish who now live on American soil, and are prosperous enough to aid their friends at home with money as well as with instigation to revolt. Sir Charles Duffy, however, does not find in these things reason for regretting anything he ever said, or regretting anything he ever did, as an Irish agitator, although, as he explains in his preface, "a larger experience of mankind, the responsibilities of public office, and leisure for reflection, have, he trusts, enabled him to scrutinize them [the events which he has undertaken to record] from a new point of view, and to revise whatever was rash or ungenerous in earlier judgments." In fact, although long absence from the country may incapacitate him for forming a correct judgment on the actual situation in Ireland, it probably has done much to strengthen his authority as an exponent of the causes which, apart from the land question, make Irish hostility to English rule so deep and bitter and lasting.

He could hardly have thrown his exposition into a better shape than the history of the "Young Ireland" movement between 1840 and 1850. It and the Volunteer movement of 1782, which resulted in securing the independence of the Irish Parliament, are the only two episodes in Irish history which can really be called brilliant, and which contained the seeds of real political promise. The former was, however, simply the victory of the Protestant colony over the mother country; the conquered Catholic sons of the soil had no share in it. The Young Ireland movement was, on the other hand, thoroughly national. It was the first sincere and able attempt made on Irish soil to dissociate politics from religion, and, to use Chief Baron Wolfe's words, which formed the motto of Duffy's paper, the Nation, "to create and foster public opinion in Ireland, and make it racy of the soil"; to find in Irish history some materials for healthy national pride; and to support the movement for the restoration of Irish legislative independence by such a display of Irish political capacity as mere journalism would permit.

It has been ever since 1848 the common opinion that the Young Ireland movement was due to a revolt of the young men of the repeal party against O'Connell's policy of peace and moral suasion, and that the disastrous result furnished a fresh proof of his wisdom and moderation. Sir Charles Duffy produces ample proof that this is a mistake; that O'Connell was himself committed to physical force in the last resort, before the projected Clontarf meeting and his trial, and that the Young Irelanders simply carried out a programme for which failing health and courage, and divers defects of character, left him no heart. In fact, the account of O'Connell's faltering is one of the most interesting and instructive portions of the book, and there seems to be little doubt that he, before the impairment of his powers, was just as well satisfied as the Young Irelanders were then, and as the Land Leaguers apparently are now, that Irish agitation, as long as it contains no threat of violence, produces no effect on English opinion. That they by no means ignored the land question is shown by the following remarkable passage from a manifesto of principles published in Duffy's Nation, now more than twenty-five years ago. The prediction with which it concludes is, in view of what is now occurring in Ireland, very striking:

"On the Tenure Question our course has been an open and decided one.
"We seek to secure to the peasant land at a just rent.
"A just rent would leave him comfort and some leisure.
"We seek for him the value of all the labor or money he spends in improvements.
"And we seek prospective laws, which shall tend, by a natural and easy change, to reduce the great estates and create a body of small proprietors in fee throughout every part of Ireland.
"But we are not ready to jump into a servile war for this purpose.
"On the contrary, we shall do our best to make the landlords recognize that the postponement of the tenure settlement, or the decline of the political agitation, would lead to an anti rent movement, which might end in a disastrous rebellion, but would begin by reducing them to beggary, and could not be quelled by the defeat of insurgent armies."

The Young Ireland movement was essentially, as its name indicates, a movement of young men. Few if any of those who started it were over thirty, and they began and carried it on mainly through the Nation newspaper, which Duffy founded in 1842, and edited until its suppression after the rising in 1848. They were men of both races and belonged to both creeds; and there is nothing more remarkable in the history of journalism than the versatility, the fire, and the force which they brought to their work and the tenacity with which they maintained such excellence as it possessed. It was the first Irish newspaper on that side of politics which made a distinct impression outside Ireland. English Conservatives acknowledged from the start that it was the most dangerous weapon with which English supremacy had ever been assailed in the field of either oratory or literature. Nor did the members confine themselves to newspaper work. A "Library of Ireland," consisting of a series of small volumes devoted to Irish biography and the elucidation of Irish history, was also issued by them and had a great circulation, ten or eleven volumes in all appearing before 1848. They worked the poetic vein, too, with considerable success, and a collection of the songs and ballads which had appeared in the Nation was very respectfully treated even by hostile English critics. The most remarkable man of the group was undoubtedly Thomas Davis, a young Protestant barrister, who was one of Duffy's coadjutors in establishing the paper, and we believe first tried his hand at writing in its columns at the age of twenty-eight. His contributions, both in prose and verse, during the ensuing three years were not only full of great promise, but had a power and brilliancy which probably did more than anything else to give weight and fame to the movement, and to command respect for it both in England and Ireland. He died in 1845 at the age of thirty-three, and there is in his literary remains plenty of evidence to support the belief that Sir Charles Duffy's tribute to his memory is not extravagant when he says:

"Judging him now, a generation after his death, when years and communion with the world have tempered the exaggerations of youthful friendship, I can confidently say that I have never known a man so nobly gifted as Thomas Davis. If his articles had been spoken speeches his reputation as an orator would have rivalled Grattan's, and the beauty and vigor of his style were never employed for show, as they sometimes were by Grattan; he fired not rockets but salvoes of artillery. If his programmes and reports, which were the plans and specifications of much of the best work done in his day, had been habitually associated with his name, his practical skill would have ranked as high as O'Connell's. . . He was singularly modest and unselfish, but the phrases employed to express modesty and unselfishness are weak and absurd when applied to him. In a long life I have never known any man remotely resemble him in these qualities. The chief motive power of a party and a cause, laboring for them as a man of exemplary industry labors in his calling, he not only never claimed any recognition or reward, but discouraged allusion to his services by those who knew them best. Passionate enthusiasm is apt to become prejudice, but in Davis it was controlled not only by a disciplined judgment, but by a fixed determination to be just. He brought to a political controversy a fairness unexampled in Ireland. In all his writings there will not be found a single sentence reflecting ungenerously on any human being. He had set himself the task of building up a nation, a task not beyond his strength had fortune been kind."

The Young Ireland movement came to an untimely end in 1848, through causes which are still operative in Irish politics. O'Connell was openly hostile to it as a sort of revolt against his authority, but this would not have injured it seriously if he and his following had not managed to bring it into disrepute as an organization of infidels. In 1846 the priests were arrayed against it as hostile to religion, so that its hold on the popular mind was seriously weakened before the final outbreak. The news of the success of the French Revolution in 1848 precipitated the attempt at revolt which ended so ludicrously in the cabbage-garden at Ballingarry. It was called for in the Nation by an announcement that "Ireland's opportunity, thank God and France, at last has come." The defeat of the troops in the streets of Paris by the mob had evidently turned the heads of the Irish leaders, and blinded them to the real nature of the military problem which any Irish insurrection involves. They had neither officers, arms, organization, money, commissariat, nor a general. Any one who looks in Duffy's book for an explanation or palliation of the immense folly of the appeal to arms will be disappointed. In fact, the sanity and clearheadedness which he shows only deepen the mystery which surrounds the events of 1848. That so rational a man should have been mixed up in such a harum-scarum adventure seems now incomprehensible. But his tale is, nevertheless, not only both graceful and touching, but full of instruction regarding the existing situation in Ireland, and is told in a style of remarkable simplicity and clearness.

HOMICIDE, NORTH AND SOUTH.*

MORE men have fallen in personal combat at the South since 1840 than were killed in battle on both sides in the rebellion (p. 120); in the same section there have been more homicides since the war than there have been deaths from yellow fever (p. 196)—this number is at least 40,000 (p. 10). In Texas there were more assassinations in 1878 than homicides of all kinds in Massachusetts in 1877–78 (p. 64), and always there are more manslayers at large than in confinement (p. 77). In South Carolina there were three duels in 1878, against none among the more than thirty millions of the Northern population (p. 90); and of a single affray in Edgefield, which "leads us into accounts of seven different homicides," all the survivors were acquitted on trial (p. 91). The number of homicides along the route of the Cincinnati Southern Railway from Cincinnati to Chattanooga, "during its construction through Kentucky and Tennessee, I believe to be equal to half the length of the road measured in miles—that is, for every two miles of road there was a man murdered in the vicinity of the line" (p. 167). The population of the three sample Southern States—Texas, Kentucky, and South Carolina—is less than that of New England by half a million, but the homicides are eighteen times as numerous (p. 15); there are often more in Kentucky in a month than in Massachusetts in a year, and as many in South Carolina in two as in Massachusetts in ten years (pp. 14, 18), though the Northern State has much the larger population in each case. In Massachusetts, the ratio of killing has decreased with the increase of population—ten per cent. against eighteen per cent. in 1869–78 (p. 154); in South Carolina, crimes against the person show no diminution under Hampton as compared with those committed under Chamberlain and Scott (p. 105). In Mississippi, according to the Vicksburg Herald of May 25, 1879, there is an average of a murder a day (p. 152). At the South the highest ratio of homicide is in the country, at the North in the cities (p. 31). The foreign element forms less than two per cent. of the population at the South (p. 15), and in Mississippi, for example, "so far from the foreigners being the cause of so much murder, it is more probable that so much murder accounts for there being so few foreigners" (p. 153).

Such are some of the multifarious forms in which Mr. Redfield strikingly illustrates the difference, as regards the sacredness of human life, between the South and not only the North but any civilized country on the face of the globe. His work, though systematic in its way, is still an endless variation of one theme. If he treats of Ohio by itself, the conclusion is: "Draw a line through the State, east and west, so as to divide population equally, and a very much larger number of homicides will be found south of this line than north of it"; while "the very lowest per cent. of homicide to population is found where those who have investigated such subjects would expect to find it—in the agricultural counties of the Western Reserve, settled very largely, in fact, almost entirely, from New England and New York." If Indiana and Illinois are under discussion, it appears that in the former State, "in 1878, there were eighty-four prisoners in the Southern prison charged with murder and manslaughter, and but forty-nine in the Northern," these two penitentiaries being recruited from nearly equal divisions of the population; and that Illinois shows a similar excess of bloodiness in the counties bordering on Kentucky and largely settled from the South. In short, this conscientious study of a great social evil, based almost without exception for the North (because it was possible) upon official records, and without exception for the South (because there was no alternative) upon unofficial records in the newspapers—often in a single newspaper in a State—and therefore necessarily defective, involves such a contrast between the two sections as to suggest the enquiry (p. 19), "Have we not here two civilizations?"

Now, nothing is more noticeable in any discussion, however moderate, of the feelings which the North does actually or ought to entertain towards the South, than the offence taken by Southern writers at the assumption that there are two civilizations in this country, and that the higher exists at the North. It is a part of the disease which Mr. Redfield seeks to eradicate by exposing it in its hideous deformity, that representative Southerners fail to see in the spirit of violence which gives the tone to their section an essential distinction, to which Northerners have a right to point deprecatingly on the one hand and with justifiable self-righteousness on the other. And yet—

> "There is nothing that so distinguishes the Southern civilization from the Northern as this one matter of homicide. Murder there is everywhere, but the fact that it is so very much more frequent in the Southern States than elsewhere should put the Southern people upon enquiry as to the cause and the remedy. To do this is the object of the book."

It is no longer an abolitionist who speaks these words, but one closely acquainted and allied with the Southern people, who has words of admiration for many of their qualities, and whose sincerity is attested on every page. No political motive whatever inspired this laborious investigation, which was prompted by an unusually wide experience and a philanthropic and patriotic desire to wipe away what is something more than a sectional stain. The fairness of Mr. Redfield's statistics, estimated as they too often have to be, will not be questioned by anybody. The least skilful part of this tract, if we may so call it, is its discussion of the cause of the Southern evil—in fact, formally there is no such discussion. The nearest approach to it is the final chapter, on carrying concealed weapons, as to which Judge Guild, of Tennessee, is quoted as saying, "More than half the homicides which occur grow out of this debased practice," and the author himself asserts that seven-eighths of the homicides in South Carolina grow out of it. It is therefore clear that the effective suppression of this practice would do more than anything else to assimilate the Northern to the Southern civilization. But why is it not attempted? Is it because the black population is dangerous and threatening? On the contrary, Mr. Redfield shows that in Texas, South Carolina, and Kentucky, in 1878,

434 whites were killed by whites,
16 " " " " blacks,
109 blacks " " " whites,
98 " " " " blacks.

And while there is no adequate punishment for white killing of blacks, there is a surety that either by court or by mob the black murderer will meet his reward. It is, however, but a short time since society in the South rested upon a war basis—for that is the constitution of every slaveholding community; and if it was only exceptionally, after some Nat Turner rising, that, as Mr. Broadnax said in the Virginia House of Delegates, men would "lock their doors at night and open them in the morning, to receive their servants to light their fires, with pistols in their hands," this was but the open manifestation of a perfectly normal relation between master and slave. Out of this grew inevitably the "code of honor" among the ruling class and lynch law among the mob of poor whites; hence the resort to the pistol or the knife in "personal difficulties," the most prolific source of life-taking, and hence the absolute indulgence of public sentiment for any standard of "self-defence."

"There are very many instances in the Southern courts where men are acquitted of manslaughter when their only justification was a blow from a cane or even the fist. Indeed, in some instances this is carried to the extent of acquitting for murder when the murderer killed his enemy in revenge for an insult by words, and when he was in no bodily peril whatever."

Mr. Redfield continues (p. 160):

"One wonders why murderers are so often acquitted by juries in Mississippi. Not many years ago, in one of the counties of that State, a murderer was being tried. An ex-sheriff of the county told me that the defendant would be acquitted. He spoke with confidence. I asked why. He replied that he was acquainted personally with every man on the jury, and that a majority of them had been engaged in what he called 'killing scrapes' themselves. Having been sheriff of the county he was personally cognizant of each case."

Any general and successful movement at the South to put down the carrying of concealed weapons would mark the first voluntary act in condemnation of the moral code which sheltered slavery. Before that comes about there is perhaps more hope for a subordinate but by no means trifling reformation intimately related to the subject under review.

"Probably one-half of the homicides in the Southern States," says Mr. Redfield, "are to be attributed directly or indirectly to whiskey. One who has lived long in the rural districts South, and having previously been acquainted with communities where there was less disorder, enabling him to draw comparisons, could hardly fail to be impressed with the prevalence of whiskey-drinking and the frequency of fighting with deadly weapons. . . . Often these deadly difficulties arise from very trifling causes, and parties are drawn in to help their friends who had nothing to do with the beginning of the affray. Originating in whiskey, they usually end in blood."

Pending the beneficent operation at the South of the American Peace and National Temperance Societies, we shall watch with interest the reception given to Mr. Redfield's book in that quarter. Will the Southern press quote largely from it? Will it praise or will it controvert and condemn it? Whatever may come of it, his appeal is one for which every Southern family, already bereaved by homicide or liable to be at any moment, ought to be profoundly grateful to him.

MISS BIRD'S JAPAN.*

THE beaten tracks in Japan have been well travelled by women as well as men during the last decade. Miss Weppner, Miss Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Ayrton, Mrs. Carrothers, have told the story of their rambles in books or periodicals. Many other foreign ladies, guiltless of the pen, have made themselves familiar with the highroads; and honeymoons spent on Fusiyama are not unknown. Miss Bird, however, resolutely sought the sequestered vales and bridle-paths, and in every case chose the worst of two roads. She went out in quest of an unhackneyed view, and found it. Her method of studying Japan reminds us of the American tourist who, tired of hearing of Britain's glory, went to London, and visited only the slums and Billingsgate market. Miss Bird did indeed see Tokio and Kioto, and travelled famous highroads, but the letters which treat of the most charming portions of the Mikado's domains are suppressed, as they relate to her pet aversion—"beaten tracks." A score or two of Americans, if not more, may be disposed to quarrel with the title which the English lady has given to her book. It reads like a challenge. Several American ladies and many gentlemen have traversed the major part of Miss Bird's journey. Still, in gross and in detail, no foreigner of her own sex has preceded Miss Bird on her route.

This lady on horseback is a skilled traveller. She spent 'Six Months in the Sandwich Islands,' and has told from experience 'A Lady's Life in the Rocky Mountains.' She is an excellent observer, and her wide and accurate knowledge of botany and natural history, as well as of people, gives her an unusual sweep of view and freshness of style. As a woman, too, she notices many particulars that escape a man's eye. The evidences of culture are seen on every page of her narrative, and her accuracy has the quality of a sweet perfume. It is a positive pleasure to find the names of places and things spelled correctly, even when repeated several times. By this mark of care words otherwise uncouth and empty of suggestion soon become full of individuality, and stimulate and refresh the memory instead of jading it. Her itineraries are carefully made out, and will bear verification from native maps. Her statements are almost invariably trustworthy as they stand, though others supplementary might be added with advantage. Added to this, she has read her proofs conscientiously, so that printers' mistakes are creditably few. One funny oversight, however, occurs on page 201, vol. ii., by which one might suppose that the favorite iris-gardens of the capital received their name from the old punctilious code of suicide, instead of artificial excavation: Hari-kiri should be Hori-kiri. Miss Bird also clings to the spelling Tôkiyô for the simpler Tôkiô, even to mangling the name of the sprightly but now defunct Tokio Times, conducted by an American journalist of some reputation.

* 'Unbeaten Tracks in Japan. By Isabella Bird.' New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1880. Two vols. 8vo.

The style of the book leads one to suppose that the author actually saw the most of what she writes about, during the six months spent by her in Japan, and that what she records is the fruit of her observation. This, however, is not the fact. The indefatigable lady did, indeed, accomplish a prodigious amount of sight-seeing and reflection during her stay of half a year; but her method does not differ from that of the German father of books on Japan. Engelbert Kaempfer is popularly supposed to have acquired his amazing knowledge of the Japanese and their country by direct personal investigation. In reality, the manuscript of Camphay, the superintendent of the Dutch factory at Nagasaki, which was given to Kaempfer to bring home, furnished the famous author with most of his material. So Miss Bird has plucked her grapes liberally from various vines, not always labelled, though the wine and its flavor are her own. We do not think that her account of the great temple at Asakusa, of household superstitions, of children's plays, of proverbs or of woman's studies could have been presented in the form she gives them without well-remembered, but usually unacknowledged, reading of a well-known work on Japan, written by an American.

Miss Bird first caught a glimpse of Japan's supreme landmark, Fusiyama, on the 20th of May, 1878. She gives an impossible sketch of the peak (or is it an old cut?) such as is not seen in any of Hokusai's 'One Hundred Views of Fusi,' and states its height to be 13,080 feet. The average of two weeks' observation on the summit by Herr Knipping proves the height to be 12,235 feet. After a short rest in Yokohama, she goes to the capital, called, by "the pathetic conservatism of the British Legation, 'Yedo,'" but by the Japanese Government and people, since 1868, "Tokio." As a rule, Miss Bird prefers the more euphonious native names of things to the hybrid Chino-Japanese terms of the pedants who affect the purer archaic Chinese pronunciation, e. g. "Tokei"—to the mystification of Americans, who wonder whether Jeddo, Yeddo, Yedo, Tokio, Tokiyo, are all one place, or parts of a place. For jin-rika-sha she substitutes kuruma; that is, a "wheel" for a "man-power carriage." We are sceptical in regard to her statement that the eighteen-mile railway between the port and the capital "earns $8,000,000 a year."

From first to last Miss Bird freely vents her conviction that the Japanese are a degenerate race, possessed of a miserably poor physique. She calls the men "manikins," and ridicules their concave chests, bow-legs, and lack of complexion. The women's faces have an inane, vacant expression, with an obvious lack of soul.

"Physically, they look below par, as if the race was wearing out. . . . They look as if a girl passed from girlhood to middle age almost at once, when weighted with the cares of maternity. . . . The men don't look much better. They impress me as the ugliest and the most pleasing people I have ever seen, as well as the neatest and most ingenious" (p. 79, vol. i.)

"After the yellow skins, the stiff horse hair, the feeble eyelids, the elongated eyes, the sloping eyebrows, the flat noses, the sunken chests, the Mongolian features, the puny physique, the shaky walk of the men, the restricted totter of the women, and the general impression of degeneracy conveyed by the appearance of the Japanese, the Ainos make a singular impression" (p. 75, vol. ii.)

Old Japan, with its picturesque glories and horrors, exists now only on the boards of the theatre, and a rather sarcastic account is given of the "Reformed Theatre," in which the actors make their bow in a travestied "evening dress," with tight boots, white kid gloves, and black clothes supposed to fit. In the capital, old Yedo is represented by the grandeur of the castle walls, banks, moats, and esplanades. Even these are kept linked in association with the old régime by an occasional assassination of a cabinet minister. Tokio is architecturally represented by the public buildings in debased Europeanized style, noted chiefly for their superabundance of oblong glass windows. Glass, however, was a great curiosity two decades ago. From Tokio Miss Bird sets out to Nikko by the meaner of two roads, and thence, after studying the art lavished on the mausoleum and shrines of Iyeyasu, she leaves comfort behind and strikes across the island to Niigata. Her entire outfit is limited to one hundred and ten pounds. Her only companion, interpreter and guide, is Ito, a characteristic specimen of modern young Japan. This youth hates Christianity, loathes the missionaries, eagerly learns English, affects to despise foreigners, is a radical when away from officials and a cringing slave in their presence, is not an inborn liar because he has no instinct of truth, is a polished gentleman in his manners and an unscraped savage at heart. Under the eye and will of the English spinster lady he serves faithfully for twelve dollars a month, having already broken faith with and deserted another master who paid him but seven.

Our traveller's opinions of the native horse are severe, and her constant inveighings against its moral character are rather monotonous. She herself was obliged to force open the mouths of the sorry brutes, because "no Japanese horse ever opens his mouth except to eat or bite." She describes his three only movements—a drag, a roll, and a scramble. Travelling in summer, she beholds a vast and startling area of human cuticle; for in hot weather the women strip to their waists and the costume of the men consists mainly of a long handkerchief knotted round the body from front to rear. The villagers were all agog to see the stranger, and she ate her staple diet of boiled rice and eggs under the concentrated glare of eighteen pair of black eyes. Privacy is next to unknown in a Japanese house, and the lone lady discovered an eye at every crack and hole of the paper partitions of the yadoya. Her minute accounts of the smells, the discomforts, the fleas, the general meanness and vileness of the inns and villages of the Tsu River valley are tediously realistic. Miss Bird's journal in some respects reads strangely like the mediæval Nikki (diaries) of the Kioto noble travellers of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. These native authors poured contempt on "the boors of the East" and North, considering Japan above the thirty-sixth parallel as purgatory, and Kioto as heaven in comparison. Nevertheless she notices the redeeming features of modern Japan—the hospitals, equipped in scientific style, the silk-filatures having improved machinery, the public schools and educational conventions, and the missionary work at Niigata; and though her narrative abounds in condemnation of the vices of heathenism, she emphasizes the fact that the national reform proceeds from within.

The contents of volume second, which open with her arrival in Yezo, are, in our estimation, much more valuable than those of the first. Her tracks are here less unbeaten and her matter less strange to print. Her account of the Ainos is by far the most detailed, systematic, and readable yet written. She actually installed herself in an over-inhabited Aino hut for several days, questioning and taking notes. These irreclaimable savages are rude, dull, dirty, fond of drink, but well-formed, Caucasian in feature, not overhirsute in body, as is popularly believed, and exceedingly gentle in manners. Nothing, however, in her observations goes to disprove the possibility that the Ainos were formerly the aborigines of northern Japan. She visited the shrine of Yoshitsuné, whom the Ainos have deified, but is not, as she supposes, the first European who has done so. She does not mention the theory, first propounded by Mr. E. H. House and elaborately investigated by Mr. Suyematsu, which makes it highly probable that the great conqueror Genghis Khan was none other than the Japanese hero Yoshitsuné.

Chapters on Kobé and Kioto, with favorable notices of the Christian missions at these places, a chapter on public affairs, and a not irreproachable index conclude this itinerary—for Miss Bird objects to its being classed as "a book on Japan." As a traveller's diary, then, it is vastly superior to, while fully as entertaining as, Hübner's sparkling narrative. Nevertheless, the book leaves on the mind an impression of unfairness and onesidedness. To record in full the defects of a nation in its transition stage from orientalism to modern civilization without the relief afforded by the background of antique virtues—the loyalty, patriotism, filial love and self-sacrifice for which old Japan was noted—seems as much opposed to the canons of truth as of art.

PROGRESSION AND RETROGRESSION FROM AN EVOLUTIONARY STANDPOINT.*

IT has been generally contended by evolutionists that, as a necessary consequence of the operation of the laws of natural selection, a universal system of progress must have marked the advance of life from its earliest dawn to the present day, and that, correlatively with such progress, the more complex and more perfect organism must have arisen as an outgrowth from the less complex and less perfect. The doctrine of progressive development has met with but little opposition from the professed followers of Darwin and Spencer, and, in fact, it is only very recently that any formulated attempt has been made to show that a converse development could likewise be produced as the result of natural selection. Retrograde development or degeneration, as Professor Lankester aptly urges, truly forms a chapter in

* 'The Past in the Present: What is Civilization? By Arthur Mitchell, M.D., LL.D.' Edinburgh: David Douglas. 1880.
'Degeneration: A Chapter on Darwinism. By Professor E. Ray Lankester, F.R.S., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford.' London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1880. "Nature Series."

Darwinism; through its teachings we are led to understand much that has hitherto appeared unintelligible, and facts seemingly antagonistic to the principles laid down by the doctrine of transformism have thereby received an explanation in conformity with that doctrine. The two authors before us treat the general subjects of progression and retrogression, to which their works mainly refer, from widely varying standpoints; the one from the more or less historical, the other from the purely biological.

Dr. Mitchell is manifestly no thorough Darwinist; he believes in the efficacy of natural selection as far as the lower animals are concerned, but denies its action, whether for his mental or physical development, on man, or, at least, on man as we know him through history and archæological enquiry. He thus falls considerably behind Wallace in the estimation of the operation of nature's forces, since that naturalist, while denying the probability or even possibility of man's environment effecting any material alteration in his anatomical structure, still recognizes in the expansion of his mental capacity the equivalent of physical expansion or development in other animals. But Dr. Mitchell fails to find any evidence tending to prove that man's mental capacity "has actually been favorably influenced by evolution," any more than his bodily form, and concludes from his premises (p. 175) that "the skulls and brains of the fossil man, that is, of the earliest man we know anything about, appear to have been as good as, if not better than, the skulls and brains of the latest, belonging to individuals living in the highest state of civilization." The latter part of this rather naïve statement is probably due to a passage contained in a late address by Virchow, cited from the 'Freedom of Science in the Modern State,' to the effect that the "troglodytes, pile-villagers, and bog-people" have heads so large that many a living person would be only too happy to possess such.

Dr. Mitchell's chief arguments as to the non-applicability of the laws of natural selection to man are based mainly on considerations set forth by Wallace sixteen years ago in the Anthropological Review, namely: that isolation, involving a lack of community of action, and of consequence the necessity of self-dependence, is the primary condition of animate objects being brought under the controlling influence of nature's laws, and that so long as this condition of things is maintained there will be a general struggle for existence and a resulting survival of the fittest. The more absolute this condition the more marked and varied will be the effects of natural selection. But man, Dr. Mitchell maintains, nowhere exhibits such a state of complete isolation, or condition necessitating independence of action, action in concert being one of the characteristic traits of the human species. He has everywhere and always, so far as we know, combined with man to combat that universal law, which, through the exercise of his mental power, he alone has succeeded in overcoming. In his case, therefore, there will be no such individual struggle for existence (with attending modifications of structure) which we observe among other animals, and for this reason, it is contended, he holds a position in relation to external forces apart from all other animate beings. Man, in other words, has become civilized; for, in the opinion of our author, "civilization is nothing more than a complicated outcome of a war waged with Nature by man in Society to prevent her from putting into execution in his case her law of Natural Selection" (p. 170). It will be readily perceived that all existing nations of men are civilized, or possess civilization, since "the measure of success which attends the struggle of each band or association so engaged [in defeating the law of natural selection] is the measure of the civilization it has attained." Our author, while admitting the existence of a struggle for existence between the various tribes, races, or nations into which mankind has united itself, denies any possible effect of natural selection upon such associations beyond that of raising them (by elimination of the less powerful) to a uniform level, since the law, which, it is assumed, must necessarily operate first upon the individuals composing the aggregates, could effect nothing where, as is alleged, there has been no change in the environments, and where, consequently, no powers have been called into operation which (otherwise little used or needed) might if developed produce "men altered in structure either for the better or the worse." We fail, however, to see the force of the argument, or to detect, as far as the evolutionary process of natural selection is concerned, the essential difference between the conditions which in the one case determine the exercise of the physical powers, and in the other that of the mental powers. An association, it appears to us, holds precisely the same evolutionary relation to the individuals composing it as that which the complete organism holds to its own anatomical parts. It is not the individual requirements of the various tissues of the body which call forth certain modifications of structure in conformity with the law of natural selection, but the requirements of the organism itself which they subserve, and of which they form integral parts. And so in like manner with an association. We are now no longer directly concerned with the respective wants or conditions of its different members—there being no individual struggle for existence—but with the wants and conditions of the association as a whole or unit. Here, as Wallace has so clearly shown, natural selection will react, not upon the physical but upon the mental qualities.

It may with propriety be asked, since we are all civilized, what constitutes the criteria of a high civilization? or, in the language of the author, what are the data which enable us to ascertain when we have most thoroughly overcome the great law of nature? These are furnished, according to Dr. Mitchell, by the possession of leisure, "that most important of all steps in the history of the march of civilization." But, it may further be asked, has it ever been proved that the savage (in the general acceptation of the term), although he be compelled to hunt and fish for his own sustenance, does not enjoy an amount of leisure equal to that enjoyed by the average civilized man? and may not, consequently, his civilization be fully equal to our own? We believe there are few who will admit this last proposition, yet if the author's interpretation of the term civilization be the correct one we do not see how such a conclusion could readily be avoided.

The early portion of the work, devoted to an account of the primitive manners and customs of the Scotch islanders, their implements, houses, and superstitions, is an attempt made on historical grounds to prove the futility of the reasoning which attaches to archæological finds an immense antiquity, and to demonstrate the existence already in the Stone Age of an intellectual culture perhaps equal to that of the present day. Although the conclusions arrived at may not generally be accepted, the chapters will, nevertheless, be found worthy of careful reading, and ought, from their suggestive reasoning, to merit the attention both of the specialist and of the reading public generally. Part II. is an examination, in some of its more important bearings, of the question of civilization, and is that to which we have mainly confined our remarks. In Lecture III., in discussing the possibilities of a general advancement, the author expresses himself in decided antagonism to Herbert Spencer, whose views on social evolution he considers a mere speculation. Dr. Mitchell favors the theory held by many that most, if not all, savage races are the degraded remnants of a more civilized people, and from this circumstance argues that "we may safely accept the occurrence of retrogressions as a reality, and the theory of a universal progression as untenable."

Professor Lankester recognizes in an organism three conditions as the result of natural selection: elaboration, balance, and degeneration. The doctrine that, in general, all existing forms of life were maintained in one or other of the first two conditions, was, until lately, considered as one of the foundation-stones of evolution, and it was not until Dr. Dohrn clearly pointed out the wide applicability of the laws of degeneration, as explaining certain anomalies in the way of Darwinism, that any special attention was paid to this third condition. By degeneration, as Professor Lankester defines the term, we are to understand the condition of an organism which, as "the total result of the elaboration of some organs and the degeneration of others," is lower (the animal being "fitted to less complex action and reaction in regard to its surroundings") than that of the ancestral form to which it may be compared, whether "actually or in imagination." The author instances as the immediate antecedents of degenerative evolution: 1, parasitism; 2, fixity or immobility; 3, vegetative nutrition; 4, excessive reduction of size; and arrives at the general conclusion that "any group of animals to which we can turn may possibly be the result of degeneration," and that "accordingly, whenever we can note that a group of organisms is characterized by habits likely to lead to degeneration" (such as above enumerated), "we are justified in applying the hypothesis of degeneration, even in the absence of any confirmatory evidence from embryology." From these premises, Professor Lankester argues, we may safely look upon the sponges, polyps, corals, moss-polyps, and star-fishes as examples of true degeneration, no less so than the tunicate mollusks, which the recent remarkable embryological researches of the Russian naturalist Kovalevski have proved to be nothing but degraded vertebrates. Viewed in this light, certain supposed irregularities in the chronological succession of life, a circumstance forcibly insisted upon, among others, by Barrande, as destructive of transformism, such as the occurrence of the cephalophorous mollusca in strata more ancient than those characterized by the oldest known species of the Acephala, receive their explanation, for, as in the present case, we are justified in concluding that these lower types are only the degenerate representatives of the more perfect types that preceded them. The importance of this method of palæontological interrogation has been pointed out by Professor Perrier, in his recent address to the biological section of the French Association.

Primer of French Literature. By George Saintsbury. (New York: Macmillan & Co.)—The readers of Mr. Saintsbury's admirable sketch of French literature in the ninth edition of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' will be glad to have their attention drawn to this shorter and more general outline, which should be in the hands of every French student. In the brief compass of one hundred and thirty-eight 16mo pages the author has, in his own words, "set before the learner such a general view of the outline of French literary history as he may best be able to fill up for himself afterwards. No writer of importance has been omitted, and the literary tendency of all such persons has been indicated, though of necessity in a kind of shorthand." This task has been very satisfactorily accomplished; the older literature has been fairly dealt with, and in spite of its necessary condensation the work has a literary value of its own, being singularly free from the perfunctory tone of such manuals. We have noticed an occasional slip of the pen, as on p. 18, where 'Le Castoiement d'un Père' is spoken of as translated or adapted from the Arabic, whereas it is a translation of the Latin 'Disciplina Clericalis,' which was compiled from Oriental sources; and we cannot agree with all the author's judgments, that on George Sand, for example, hardly laying emphasis enough on her style. Indeed, the final chapter on "Contemporary French Literature" is much the weakest, and if it were not that its predecessor on the "Romantic Movement" is one of the best, we should be inclined to think that Mr. Saintsbury had tired of his task toward the end. His treatment of the drama is at all times a little inadequate (excepting only the clear and simple and altogether admirable account of its genesis), and especially unsatisfactory is his criticism of the dramatists of our own day. To describe Scribe as "the most prolific of recent French dramatic authors, but distinguished from the Romantic school by a loose and careless style and by vulgar and unpoetical thought," is to miss entirely the characteristics of the man who first made play-making as easy and as intricate as watch-making. The two or three lines given to M. Émile Augier, the foremost French dramatist of our generation, and to M. Sardou, the most popular, are in the first case insufficient and in the second inaccurate. And quite out of proportion is the space given to the patriotic but feeble dramas of M. Henri de Bornier. The entire absence of bibliographical references is to be regretted.

La Sociologie d'après l'Ethnographie. Par Charles Letourneau. [Sixth volume of the 'Bibliothèque des Sciences Contemporaines.'] (Paris: Reinwald; New York: F. W. Christern. 1880. Pp. 581.)—After briefly discussing the number and distribution of the human races, the author divides his volume into five books, treating respectively of the nutritive, sensitive, affective, social, and intellectual life of man. In the first book unusual importance is ascribed to the discovery of the art of cooking. Not only the physical but the social condition, especially that of women, was improved, and the art of pottery was developed when man became comparatively omnivorous by learning to boil his food. The habit of drunkenness, although implying much skill in the preparation of beverages, was acquired very early, to check hunger and appease pain. The second book begins with a long account of the sexual instincts of primitive tribes. The instinct of ornamentation shows itself as soon as sight is well developed. Up to this point man is only an animal, and the affective and intellectual life is an "epiphenomenon." A fundamental assertion of the third book is, that reflex-action is vastly modified by race and civilization. The cerebral equilibrium is very unstable, at the mercy of the slightest and most manifold incidents of life in higher races or in individuals. Politeness and ceremonious forms are at first copies and at last survivals—often fragmentary and distorted enough—of reflex-action, which are as native to our physiological constitution as the wagging of a dog's tail or the pricking of a horse's ears. From a study of burial customs our author concludes that most races believe in only a temporary duration of the soul after death. They are so intoxicated by the fever of life that they cannot readily accommodate their mind to the fact of death as it really is, and hence their faith is not in immortality but in a delayed mortality.

From his survey of the customs of inheritance M. Letourneau is convinced, as Lassalle was, that the child's right to the father's property is an acquired one, and argues, as J. S. Mill did, for a "modest maximum of heritage," to be gradually diminished till most, if not all, individual property is reduced to usufruct. Family ties, he thinks, are relaxing; the authority of the parent has become almost inversely as the obligation of the child to him. As the hold of the head of the family upon its members decreases, the duties of society to them increases. It must teach them better, and ensure, at least, that a life of honest and useful labor shall not end in misery. While the affective side of family life is thus diminishing, and the family is being absorbed in the state, the scientific spirit will continue to occupy itself more and more with heredity and consanguinity, direct and collateral, with results of great practical significance for the more remote future of the race. The author lays great and redoubled stress upon the assertion that morality is very tardily and feebly developed; that high character is a common cause of failure; and that Europe, "while justly proud of her mechanical and industrial civilization, is not yet good or honest." The conclusion of the last book is that the division of labor has caused such disparity of knowledge and goods that unless vast reforms are soon wrought we must look forward to a future of social convulsions which will imperil our civilization.

The plan of the book is extremely comprehensive, and the author's reading has been wide; but, while complaining of Spencer for forcing sociological facts into accordance with the laws of biology which he had previously expounded, M. Letourneau, who has also written a biology, reverts often in the second, and still more in the third book, to his own biological formulæ. This is, of course, to a great extent just and necessary, and perhaps our objections ought, after all, to rest more against his reproach of Spencer than against his own practice. His book is well written; and, while the author contributes comparatively little that is new in matter or method, it is quite worth reading.

The Great Navigators of the Eighteenth Century. By Jules Verne. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1880.)—This work covers a period of maritime enterprise that will never lose its charm, comprehending as it does the achievements of Cook and his predecessors, the voyages of the French, explorations in Asia and Africa, together with observations by sailors and savants in North and South America. The list extends from Selkirk to Humboldt, while a preliminary chapter gives an account of "The Astronomers and Cartographers," and an estimate of the work done by them during a century that witnessed so many interesting and important ventures on land and sea. As respects dramatic interest and style, this volume, which is the third of the author's series devoted to the exploration of the world, has little or no advantage over the better class of English and American books having the same scope; yet an improved method has been pursued, inasmuch as care has been taken to indicate precisely the results accomplished within a given period. This is done, in part, by the aid of maps indicating to the eye the exact progress of exploration. The author clearly shows a disposition to meet the growing demand for more thoroughness in treating the entire department of historical geography. The portraits and views add to the interest of the work; but it is necessary to call attention to the fact that both the translator and the printer show too much haste in the effort to make an early market.

La Reliure Française, depuis l'invention de l'imprimerie jusqu'à la fin du XVIIIe siècle. Par MM. Marius Michel, Relieurs-Doreurs. (Paris: Damascene Morgand et Charles Fatout; New York: J. W. Bouton.)—MM. Marius Michel have furnished for the connoisseur of book-binding an elegant monograph. The subject needs, for such connoisseurs, no apology; the story is interesting even to those who have never given to book-binding a serious thought; and the book itself, even without being bound and gilded at the hands of its authors, is already an objet de luxe. The illustrations do not all exhibit the art of the heliogravist, if that is what he calls himself, to special advantage, but they do high honor to the art of the book-binder, and that is their main purpose. The text is just long enough, full of information about persons and things, and written in a style at once serious and light, as becomes the serious discussion of so trivial a subject. The curious technical processes of binding, and especially of gilding, are rather illustrated than explained, and the raw material of history—the dates, anecdotes, and genealogies which would have encumbered the text—forms an appendix for which the amateur of book-binding may well be grateful.

Beginning with the time of Charles VIII., and continuing the history to the outbreak of the French Revolution, the book celebrates the triumphs, first, of the monkish book-binders, and then of the famous Les Eves, Le Gascon, Pasdeloup, De Rome, and Dubuisson, and of an unknown artist who, at the end of the reign of Louis XV., promised for a season to revive the glories of a better day. But this delicate art, which had barely been kept alive by the fostering enthusiasm of fastidious connoisseurs, flourishing most in the cool shade of private patronage, perished outright in the full sunshine of popular favor brought upon it when Madame Du Barry, who could hardly read, brought handsomely-bound libraries into fashion. Of a sudden the art became a trade, and the race of original artists was pushed off the stage by the crowd of imitators who sprang up on every side to supply the new demand. The graceful fashions in design which for a few years gave distinction to the reign of Louis XVI. came too late to revive an art which of all others was perhaps best adapted to profit by their influence. Long before the time of Fay and Salembrier the art of the relieur-doreur had, if we may believe our authors, ceased to live.

Brief and unimportant as is this chapter in the history of art, it is by no means devoid of interest and value. It furnishes on a small scale a perfect example of what is meant by decorative art, and capitally illustrates the influences to which all decorative art is subject. In the first place, the gilding of designs on the outside of books is decorative art pure and simple, without a trace of useful motive. The study is as much a study of pure form as any the history of art can offer, and the best results, as here shown in the work of the half mythical Le Gascon, whose masterpieces, dated during the middle half of the seventeenth century, mark the culmination of the art, are as purely ideal as the decoration of Greek vases or of Indian rugs. Here, as everywhere in the best decoration, the imitation of natural forms is conspicuous by its absence, the few examples of it to be found in these plates proving the rule by their exceptional position. It is interesting to notice, also, here as elsewhere in the history of these arts, how they borrow from each other, the earlier examples deriving their patterns from mediæval manuscripts and wall-paintings, the next from Oriental faïence, the last from laces and embroideries. Throughout, their beauty is owing not to the worship or the study of nature, but to the grace and balance of form and harmonious composition of line, to which the beauty of nature itself is due.

NEW BOOKS.

BALLADS AND OTHER VERSES. By James T. Fields. 1 vol. 16mo, gilt top, $1.

This volume includes, in addition to the best part of Mr. Fields's previous volumes of poetry, the last of which was printed for private circulation, the choicest of the many pieces he has written during the last twenty years. Some of these have appeared in the leading magazines, and have attracted no little admiration for their freshness, humor, and grace.

ON THE THRESHOLD. By T. T. Munger. 1 vol. 16mo, gilt top, $1.

A book of thoroughly sensible, judicious, sympathetic, helpful talks to young people on Purpose, Friends and Companions, Manners, Thrift, Self-Reliance and Courage, Health, Reading and Intellectual Life, Amusements, and Faith. Few books for young men, and young women too, are so wholesome and every way excellent as this.

THE LORD'S PRAYER. By Washington Gladden. 1 vol. 16mo, gilt top, $1.

A series of chapters designed to bring forth in clear light the comprehensiveness, simplicity, and full significance of this petition, which, though repeated for ages, is to-day the natural and sincere utterance of all Christendom. Mr. Gladden's strong common sense, freedom from cant, and healthy religious spirit make this a peculiarly valuable and winning book.

DREAM CHILDREN. By Horace E. Scudder. A new and greatly-improved edition of this charming book for young folks. Illustrated. $1.

"Stories delightful alike in feeling and in fancy."—North American Review.
